Ephrem, Sr., born at Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, and deacon of the Church of Edessa, in Syria, was born in the fourth century, at the commencement of the reign of Constantine the Great. St. Ephrem states in his works that he was born of Christian parents, who suffered as confessors for the faith of Christ. "Yea," he adds, "I am the kindred of martyrs." He studied in early life as a catechumen under St. James, Bishop of Nisibis, whom he may have accompanied to the Council of Nicaea in 325. Upon the death of this bishop, Ephrem seems to have migrated to Edessa, where at first he devoted himself to teaching the natives, but afterwards he embraced the monastic life, and began to write his numerous works. He travelled to Caesarea, in Cappadocia, and was well received by St. Basil, who had a particular regard for him, and by whom he was made a deacon. From Caesarea Ephrem returned to Edessa to refute numerous heresies that had sprung up there. He succeeded in destroying the influence of the heretical songs which were becoming popular, by composing Christian hymns, and training choirs to sing them. Sozomen relates that when Basil of Caesarea would have made Ephrem a bishop, the saint pretended madness to avoid the honour of consecration. He retired again to his monastic life, only issuing forth from time to time to combat the heretics. His last recorded act was to prevail upon the rich in Edessa to distribute their stores of food to the poor during the severe famine that raged in that city. He probably died in 373. He wrote several tracts in Syriac, which, according to St. Jerome, were so well received that they were read publicly in churches after the Holy Scriptures. They were translated into Greek, and are cited by St. Basil and St. Gregory of Nyssa. Photius had seen forty-nine homilies by this Father, and made extracts from them. St. Ephrem wrote many hymns in Syriac, which were sung in the churches. Also he is said to be the author of a commentary on all the Bible, of controversial tracts against a great many heretics, and of a book on the subject of the Holy Ghost. His commentaries and controversial tracts are lost, but Gerard Vossius has published a considerable number of his moral discourses and hymns. Some have questioned their authenticity, but on slender grounds. Ambrosius Camaldulensis published some of St. Ephrem's works in 1490, but Vossius's edition, printed at Rome, in three volumes, in a single volume at Cologne in 1603, and at Antwerp in 1619, is much more complete. The Syrians profess to have a great many manuscripts in Syriac and Arabic written by St. Ephrem, whom they call the Syrian Prophet. Bellarmine describes Ephrem's works as "pious rather than learned." As a commentator his object is rather to edify than to instruct; as a poet he possesses considerable talent, but his style is marred by too great diffuseness. His personal character, his great humility, his deep piety, his gentleness and self-sacrifice, stamp him as a saint of God.

Epictetus, a native of Hierapolis, was in his youth a slave to Epaphroditus, captain of Nero's Guard. He was a Stoic philosopher, and during his captivity gave many instances of his capability of carrying out the motto of his sect, "Bear and forbear." A story is told of him that one day his master, in a rage, gave him a blow on his shin, and Epictetus begged him not to break his leg. Whereupon Epaphroditus dealt a still heavier blow, and succeeded in breaking his slave's leg, and the only remark he vouchsafed was, "Look ye, sir: did I not tell you you would never leave until you had broken my leg?" After his death his discourses were published, which contain many passages more like the ideas of a Christian than those of a heathen, and St. Augustine quotes him several times, and frequently adds words of commendation. In the reign of Domitian an edict was issued for the banishment of all philosophers, and Epictetus was naturally included in the list; but on the death of the Emperor he was enabled to return.

Epicurus [6, 342 B.C., d. 270].—An Athenian, the founder of one of the two main systems of heathen philosophy and morality with which early Christianity was brought into contact [Acts xvii. 18]. In morals, as based upon philosophy, Epicurus taught and accepted happiness as the greatest object in life, and placed this happiness in the sensations of the individual; hence he exhorted to moderation on the ground that excess diminished enjoyment by injuring health. The weakness of such a system obviously rests in the fact that it does not condemn moderate indulgence in what is called vice; and there can be no doubt that in many of the followers of Epicurus his system led to abandonment of all moral restraint. He himself, however, appears to have been moral and decorous in life. Lucretius speaks of him in terms that imply real moral elevation, and it is possible that his real meaning was in the sense of that utilitarian system of morality which was in the last generation elaborated by Bentham and his school, and which is subject to similar weakness. Epicurus at least made an effort after some sort of moral system, which he failed to find in the decaying religion around him, and so far was probably better than his fellows. His philosophy of the universe attributed it to the concourse and combination of atoms, one of the products being even the soul of man. Such teaching necessarily negatived all ideas of future immortality in the individual, and so came into direct conflict with Christian doctrine. But here, too, it was almost appear from Lucretius that the ruling idea of the philosopher was to deliver men from the fear of constant interference on the part of gods—who, according to the belief of the Agean were not moral, but acted capriciously and tyrannically from mere personal feeling—setting up the uniformity of nature and of life. From this point of view his physical philosophy also may have been a real moral advance upon popular belief. It is remarkable how many of its ideas are adopted by modern science. [Stoicism.] It is to be feared that much of the morality of our own day rises little at all, above that of this ancient heathen.

Epigonation.—A square piece of cloth which hangs from the girdle on the right side. It is worn by both bishops and priests in the Greek Church, and is intended to present the napkin with which Christ gave Himself when washing the disciples' feet.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Pavia [b. 438]. He was prepared for holy orders, and ordained by St. Crispinus, Bishop of Pavia, at the age of twenty. St. Crispinus nominated him his successor, and on his death St. Epiphanus was elected by the clergy and people. He was instrumental in effecting a reconciliation between the Emperor Anthemiun and son-in-law, Ricimer, in 469, and, in 474, was despatched to Eutic, King of the Goths, at Toulouse, to conclude a treaty between him and the Emperor Glycer. On the expulsion of the Emperor Romulus Augustulus by Odoacer, King of the Heruli in 476, when Pavia was sacked by Odoacer, Epiphanus saved his sister, St. Honorina, and many others, from being taken captive and far prevailed with Odoacer as to the town an exemption from taxation for five years. When Odoacer was defeated by Theodoric, the Ostrogoths, in 489, Epiphanus was again employed to use his influence on behalf of the prisoners, and was so successful that Theodoric sent him to Gundobald, King of the Burgundians, to redeem the prisoners who had been carried away into Italy. He said that he succeeded in effecting the release of six thousand captives, some of whom Gundobald set free without a ransom. In 490, he went to Theodoric's court at Ravenna and requested a discharge of the taxes levied on Liguria, and two-thirds of what he asked was granted. He died in 495, a few days after his return to Pavia from this expedition.

Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, in the Island of Cyprus, was born probably between 310 and 320, at Besanduke, in Palestine, near Eleutheropolis. Much of his youth was spent in Egypt among the monks, who impressed him with a strong religious devotion and prepared him for an ascetic life. He was at one time a great danger through the temptations of of destroying the Origenism which still remained there. He was welcomed by some of the citizens who had become discontented with St. Chrysostom's administration, and his first act on arriving in the city was to ordain a deacon in the monastic church. He requested that the Patriarch would subscribe to a document condemning Origen and his monks, and on his refusal Epiphanius held a council, and was urged by his supporters to preach against St. Chrysostom openly. Beginning to feel that he had gone too far, Epiphanius made up his mind to return to Salamis, but died on his way in the spring of 403. He is celebrated in the calendar on May 12th. His works, of which the most important are the Ancoratus and the Panarion, are entirely composed of expositions of doctrine and attacks upon heresies, particularly upon Origenism.

Epiphany, or Manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles.—The word Epiphany being Greek, points out to us that this festival, observed on Jan. 6th, is of Eastern origin. In the early days of the Greek Church this festival was considered the most important after Easter, and the celebration of our Saviour's birth was always associated with it. Probably their name Epiphaneia originally had reference to the "shining forth" of the Divine Light when Christ was born. They also sometimes called it Theophaneia, "shining forth of God." The first time we hear of it is in the year 200, when it is mentioned in the writings of Clement of Alexandria, and in the fourth century we find that in Gaul it was kept as a separate festival from Christmas. The incident of the visit of the Wise Men was probably taken as typical of the extension of the Gospel to the Gentile world. There is no doubt that in the early days of the keeping of this festival the story of the Wise Men did not receive the prominence, in the different instances in which Christ manifested Himself to the world, that it has now. This prominence arose from the fact that the story of their visit was read in the Gospel for the day. The story that there were three of them, that they were kings, and that their names were Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar, are all purely romantic additions of the twelfth century. The festival of the Epiphany commemorates, not only the visit of the Magi, but the Manifestation of Christ at His Baptism [morning second lesson], and in His first miracle [evening second lesson]. Although not now regarded as part of the Christmas festival, its name of Twelfth Day shows the close connexion in which it stood to that day in the early days of the Church.

Episcopacy.—This institution of the Church has been discussed under the head Bishop, and to it, therefore, we would refer the reader. A few words may be added here on the history of the distinctive theory, that the threefold ministry is of Divine institution. That "bishop" and "presbytery" are convertible terms in the New Testament seems clear, and upon this fact the Congregationalists rest their contention that Episcopacy was a later development of the Church. We shall consider this theory more at length under the head Presbyterian, but it is clear that Episcopacy was the practice of the Church in the age succeeding that of the Apostles, and one opinion is that it was instituted by the Apostles after the fall of Jerusalem. But so important a change would hardly have been wrought in silence; we should have had some hint of it in the later writings of the New Testament. That the Church of Jerusalem was under the rule of St. James seems clear, and this was the form of government likely to have been adopted in the other Eastern Churches. In the West and in Asia Minor, St. Paul evidently kept his Churches under his own hand, and when this was no longer possible to him he sent representatives, like Timothy and Titus, to ordain elders; the inference being that the ordinary elders could not do so. He sent them to Ephesus and Crete for this purpose, and thus it is argued, that though these Churches had been in existence several years, their resident ministers had no powers to ordain.

Whether the angels of the Seven Churches in Rev. i.—iii. were bishops, it is impossible to say with absolute confidence, though the probability is great. Bishop Lightfoot, of Durham, the most learned prelate on the bench, and second to none in candour and breadth of view, in his Commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans expressed the opinion that Episcopacy, though valuable as a form of Church government, was post-Apostolic. In his recently published edition, however, of the Apostolic Fathers, he has withdrawn this opinion, and tells us that a close examination of the Epistles of Ignatius has convinced him that Episcopacy was an earlier institution of the Church, and therefore Apostolic, though he is still of opinion that "sacerdotalism" finds no countenance.

Episcopal Register.—The volume containing the official acts of the Bishop of a See. Such a volume is always kept by each bishop. It generally has at the beginning the record of his consecration, or appointment, then in former times followed Bulls and other privileges which he received from the Popes, then the records of the diocese. The fulness of these varies much in different dioceses. Those of Canterbury and York contain accounts of visitations, convocations, councils, as well as a vast number of letters. Some contain transcripts of older documents, which were in bad condition, and therefore in imminent danger of perishing. From the Bishop of Chester's invaluable work, Regis-trum Sacrum Anglicanum, we gather the following information respecting the Register of each See:

Those of Canterbury begin with Archbishop Peckham in 1279. His predecessor, K warby, on being preferred to a foreign See a made a cardinal, carried away to Rome all registers up to his own time. Since Peckham, those of the Archbishops Stratford a Bradwardine are missing, and a few are imperfect. They are in the Lambeth Library as far as the end of Potter. Those of Hurri and his successors to the present time are the Vicar-General's Office, Doctors' Commons. There is an excellent index to the contents each volume in Lambeth Library by Ducarel.

London begins 1306, with Bishop Baldo-Segrave, Newport, Bintworth, Strafo Northburgh, and Sudbury, are missing. There is an abstract of them in the British Museum.

Winchester begins with Pontoise. Part Beaufort is missing. There is an index given by Alchin in the British Museum.

Those marked with a star in the following list have either a transcript or copious tracts in the British Museum:

- Ely begins 1336; * Lincoln, 1217; * Li-field, 1296; * Wells, 1309; * Salisbury, 1266; * Exeter, 1257; * Norwich, 1299; * Worcester, 1296; * Hereford, 1275; * Chichester, 1397; * Rochester 1319; * York (Gray), 1215; * Carlisle, 1296; (Halton, Ross, Kirkby, Welton, Appleby; rest lost). * Durham, mostly lost. Welsh, in before the sixteenth century, except a few extracts.

Episcopius, Simon [b. 1583, d. 164] the principal support of the Arminians, born, and died, at Amsterdam. He studies Leyden, under Jacob Arminius and Fran Gomarus, and took his M.A. in 1606; he applied himself chiefly to the study of divinity and was ready to take orders when the great disputes commenced between Gomarus; Arminius; and Episcopius, siding with latter, met with unexpected difficulties in matter of his ordination. He therefore Leyden in 1609, and went for a short time to Franeker, and thence to France. Return to Holland in 1610, he was ordained mini of Bleyswick, a small village near Rotterdam. He was one of the delegates at the Conference of the Hague in 1611, held before the States of the province between six contra-Restrant and six Remonstrant ministers, and gave proof of his learning and abilities. The same year, Gomarus having resigned Chair of Divinity at Leyden, Episcopius chosen to fill it, but he had to suffer in censures and insults on the score of being an Arminian. The States of Holland has invited him with the rest of the professors the seven united provinces to the Synod Dort, he went thither with some of Epistle and Gospels, as part of the surgical worship of the Church, are of con-derable antiquity, as appears from the testi-mony of the ancient Fathers. St. Chrysostom ys, \textit{Hym. xix., in Aeta. cap. ix.}, “The Deacon ends up, and with a loud voice pronouncees, \textit{Let us attend!} Then the lessons are begun;” high lessons, as appears from his liturgy, are a Epistle and Gospel, which follow in-mEDIATELY after the deacon has put the people in kinds of this attention. To this testimony we add that of St. Augustine, in the preface his commentary on the Epistle of St. John, in his tenth sermon de \textit{Verb. Apost:}—"We read first the apostolical lesson, then we sang psalm, and after that the Gospel was read," he portion of Scripture appointed for the pistle is usually taken from the New Testa-ment, and mostly from the Epistles of St. tul, but passages from the prophecies of aiah, Jeremiah, and Joel are also read as pistles. Special dignity has always been tached to the reading of the Gospel in the communion Service: the people stand to show reverence, and “throughout all the Churches the East,” St. Jerome says, “when the Gospel is about to be read, tapers are lighted, ough it be broad daylight, not to scatter darkness, but as a sign of joy, … that, nder the symbol of bodily light, that light ay be shadowed forth of which we read in Psalter, ‘Thy word, O Lord, is a lantern to my feet, and a light unto my paths’ ” (Psist. adv. Vigilant.).

Epistle Side.—The side of the altar at which the Epistle is read—supposing the altar to be at the east, it is the south side.

Epistolarium.—A book containing the Epistles for Sundays and Holy Days.

Epistoler or Epistler.—The priest appointed to read the Epistle. The 24th Canon of the Church of England contains these words: “In all cathedrals and collegiate churches, the Holy Communion shall be administered on principal feast-days, sometimes by the bishop (if he be present), and sometimes by the dean, and sometimes by a canon or prebendary; the principal minister using a decent cope, and being assisted with the gospeller and epistler, agreeably according to the advertise-ments published in the seventh year of Queen Elizabeth.” Jebb says: “Epistolers are still statute officers in several cathedrals of the new foundation, though in most it has fallen into desuetude. It is retained at Durham. The epistoler and gospeller are sometimes called deacon and sub-deacon in the cathedral statutes. The epistoler, according to our present rubric, strictly interpreted, must be a priest. In the Roman Church he is a sub-deacon. But by Archbishop Grindal’s In-junctions in 1571, it was required that parish clerks should be able to read the first Lesson and Epistle.”

Epitaphs.—A name originally given to verses sung in honour of the dead at their funerals, though it soon came to be used, as at present, for inscriptions on their monu-ments. The Greeks inscribed only the name of the dead person, with the words, “Good man, happiness to you!” The Athenians wrote the person’s name, with the name of his father and of his tribe. The Romans prefixed “D. M.”, or “Diis Manibus,” to their epitaphs, and in addition often used the opportunity to threaten anyone who should disturb the dead man’s ashes. It was also customary to adorn the monuments with representations of the famous deeds of the dead. The earliest Chris-tian epitaphs existing are those in the Roman catacombs, dating from the times of the early persecutions, and they one and all breathe the language of hope and faith, in contrast to those of pagan origin. [Catacombs.] In England epitaphs are subject to the control of the clergyman of the parish in case of any unorthodox doctrine being expressed in them. But his discretion is limited by the legal courts.

Era or \textit{Era.}—A word which Spanish authors introduced into chronology, to express the beginning of some extraordinary change, as of reigns, etc. It comes from \textit{Era}, a tribute imposed on Spaniards by the Emperor Augustus, 39 B.C., under the consulsiphip of L. Marcus Censorius and C. Calvisius Sabinus, about the year 715 of Rome. It was used in Spain till about 1383, and in Portugal till 1415, when the years of Jesus Christ were substituted in its place. Other famous eras in chronology are the Roman era, A.D.C., dating from the building of the city, corresponding to 753 B.C.; that of Nabomassar, corresponding to 747 B.C., used by the ancient Persians and astronomers; that of the Greek Seleucidae, 312 B.C., when Seleucus Nicaem settled in Syria, twelve years after the death of Alexander the Great; the Christian, dating approximately from the birth of Christ; the Diocletian, and the Jewish. The date of an era is fixed upon by the general consent of a nation or community. The Greeks were the first to adopt the system of eras: their Olympiads were periods of four years, the first Olympiad dating 776 B.C. The Jews did not use an era until the time of the Maccabees; and then they adopted that of the Seleucidae, dating from 312 B.C. But the Jews now use an era of their own, dating from the Creation, which they place in 3761 B.C.

The Christian era begins upon the 1st of January, after the birth of our blessed Saviour, which is commonly fixed to Dec. 25th, and 754 years after the building of Rome, in the consulship of Lentulus and Calpurnius Piso. This is probably not the exact year of our Lord's birth. But for practical purposes this date has been generally accepted throughout Christendom. The Venerable Bede uses it in his history. This era has sometimes been called the Dionysian, from the fact that Dionysius Exiguus was the first advocate and proposer of it. Research has made it probable that our Lord's birth really took place four years earlier than the received era, therefore in our Reference Bibles the birth of Christ is marked “A.C. 4.”

The Diocletian era is called the key of Christian chronology; this period begins at the first year of Diocletian's reign, which falls in with Aug. 29th, A.D. 284. This computation is made good by the authorities of Theophilus and St. Cyril, Archbishops of Alexandria, of St. Ambrose, of Dionysius Exiguus, and others. This era is still used by the Copts in Egypt, and was in general use throughout the West of Europe, until the introduction of the Christian era.

The Era of Constantinople, called also the Byzantine era; it reckons from the Creation, which it places in 5508 B.C. It was formerly in use in the Eastern Empire, and is still used by the Albanians.

In the sixteenth century it was found that the calendar founded by Dionysius Exiguus upon that of Augustus was defective, owing to the solar year consisting of 365 days, five hours, forty-nine minutes, instead of 365 days, six hours, as had been reckoned. Consequently, the calendar had fallen ten days wrong, and the vernal equinox fell on the 11th instead of the 21st of March. Consequently, Pope Gregory XIII. ordered that 1582 should consist of 355 days only, and a year ending a century should not be sextile, with the exception of that ending the fourth century. Thus 1700 and 1800 were not leap-years, nor will 1900 be so, tho' 2000 will. All the Western European countries gradually adopted this New Style before the end of the sixteenth century, except Great Britain, which did not accept it until 1751. The dislike which was felt by the rural population to the change is no entirely passed away but that the prewrite has heard old people lamenting, averring on the authority of their grandmothers that Old Christmas Day was the true one, evidence being that their bees still hum on old Christmas Eve. In Russia, and East generally, the Old Style is still retained.

Erasmus, Desiderius, was born Rotterdam, Oct. 28th, 1467. His father a physician named Gerard. This made between which and Desiderius Erasumst a doctor at first sight appear to be any affinity, the son dropped in early youth. Dr. J. remarks on this:—"In his youth he took the name of Erasmus, having before gone by that of Gerard, which in the German language means 'amiable.' Following the fashion of those times, who affected to give their names a Latin or Greek turn called himself Desiderius, which in Latin, Erasmus, which in Greek, has the same signification as Gerard." A notion prevails in Holland that Erasmus was reckoned dullest child, though, on the other hand, it appears that his father, on discovering in him marks of talent, resolved to give him the education in his power. Both these accounts may be true. The wretched and heavy task of school learning then in fashion was laboured against his genius by a sharp, stern, and when he was afterwards sent, at years of age, to school at Deventer, at time one of the best in the Netherland classical literature, he gained such a respect that one of the masters prophesied of him "he would one day prove the envy and wonder of all Germany." While at school he had the misfortune to lose his father and mother the latter died of the plague at Deventer on a visit to her son, and her husband died long survive her. The plague drove Erasmus from school when he was about four years of age, upon which his guardians, who seem to have treated him very badly, resolved, in order to get what little fortune he had into their hands, to force him to enter a monastery. Accordingly he passed several years from one convent to another, learning, while, to hate much that he saw of system, and gaining that intimate knowledge of the corruption of the Church which afterwards showed in the books he published on the subject. He was able through...
fluence of the Archbishop of Cambrai, to obtain a post in the University of Paris.

Among his pupils were some English noblemen, particularly William Blount, Lord countjoy, at whose invitation he first visited England. Before going to Paris he was dedained priest by the Bishop of Utrecht. He ent to Oxford when he came to England, and there made the acquaintance of those men with whom his name is always associated—John Colet, afterwards Dean of St.
Paul’s, and Thomas More. With their aid
he was successful in introducing at Oxford
that alarming novelty, the study of Greek.

Up to this time this language had been utterly neglected, and many people were alarmed, saying that it might tend to shake the faith of the young men at the university. About his time he published his Adages, and several other works in Latin. He was appointed raveling tutor to the son of one of the royal physicians, and with him visited Italy. His name had preceded him to Rome, and the leading divines of that city vied with each other in trying attentions to one so distinguished for ecclesiasticity, and for his exertions as a restorer of learning. On the accession of Henry VIII., his friends asked him to return to England to joy the patronage of the young king, to whom he was already well known. He willingly undertook, telling Colet on his arrival that there was no country which had furnished him with so many learned and generous benedictors as even the single city of London.”

He lived with Sir Thomas More, and while here wrote with wonderful rapidity an attack on the Pope and the Court of Rome, which he called the Praise of Folly, a composition which drew on him the hatred of the clerical body. In 1512, Dr. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, appointed him to the Lady Margaret Professorship of Divinity at Cambridge. He was still Greek professor at
At this time he was busy with the preparation of his Greek New Testament, and when it was ready, determined to take it to Basel for publication. Before leaving England he visited Canterbury, and afterwards wrote a pamphlet exclaiming of the lavishness with which the bride of Thomas à Becket was decorated.
His most popular work, the Coloflognes, was all of sarcasm against monks, pilgrimages, and worship of saints. He and Colet, each in his different way, were trying to restore the ancient faith to its simplicity, and were thus laying the foundation of the great Reformation which began soon after. It has been aid with reference to his part in this great movement, “Erasmus laid the egg and Luther hatched it.” He left England in 1514, and wo years later his great work appeared at Basel, the first Greek Testament ever printed.
It was accompanied by a Latin translation, and with annotations reflecting on the ecclesiastics of his time. Although greatly opposed to the ignorance, superstition, and corruption which existed in the Remish Church, he never really joined the Reformation, for he had no grand enthusiasm as Luther had. Consequently he cut himself adrift from the Reformers by degrees. In a letter to Leo in 1520 he disclaimed fellowship with Luther, and in 1524 he wrote against him, and Luther sorrowfully declared that he was no better than a sceptic and Epicurean.
One of his publications was dedicated to Pope Adrian VI., and Paul III. is said to have designed for him a cardinal's hat, with the intention of keeping him quiet. But his arduous study and roaming life had undermined his constitution, and he declined the honour. In the last ten years of his life he published his editions of the Fathers. He died at Basel in 1536, and was buried in the cathedral.

Erastians.—The followers of the opinions of Thomas Erastus, a celebrated physician and theologian. He was born at Baden Dourlach, in Switzerland, in 1524; died 1583. His family name was Lieber, or Beloved, which he Latinised into Erastus. He studied at Basel, then went to Italy, and took his M.D.
at Bologna; he became physician and coun-ciller to the Elector Palatine, Frederic III., who made him Professor of Physic in the University of Heidelberg. He wrote some celebrated medical works, but his fame as an author rests chiefly on his ecclesiastical controversies. In his book de Cland Domini he upheld the figurative meaning of the words “This is My Body,” etc., and defended it at the conference of Maulbronn [1564] against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister of Strasburg. His chief work, however, was his Explicatio Questionum Gratissimae de Ecom-unicatione, written in the form of Theses directed against Caspar Olevianus, the head of a strong Calvinist party, who wanted to confer on ecclesiastical tribunals the power of excommunicating and punishing heretics.
Erastus denied the power of any but civil magistrates to inflict these penalties. Beza wrote a treatise in opposition to Erastus, which was considered as conclusive by his party. Church discipline was established, and Erastus was its first victim, being excommunicated on a charge of Unitarianism.
Many eminent men have held the same views of Church Government; among them, Cranmer, Selden, Lightfoot, Hobbes, etc. The term Erastian has long been a favourite term of reproach in Scotland, and Erastianism is now held to mean the doctrine of State supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, or denying the power of the Church to alter any of her own laws without the consent of the State.

Erastus’s work on Ecclesiastical Excom-unication was not published till six years after his death. It was translated into Enlish in 1669, and again in 1845 by Dr. Robert Lee, of Edinburgh.
Erkenwald, Sr., is allowed by all to be the son of a king of the East Angles, but it is not certain whether Offa or Anna was his father. His early history is obscure; he is said to have been born at Stallingdon in Lindsey, and his early education was committed to Mellitus, who was Bishop of London from 604 to 619. After leaving him, he led a holy and retired life at home. His sister was St. Ethelburga, who, following his example, devoted herself to the service of God. Erkenwald was above fifty years old when he built, in conjunction with Frithewald, a monastery at Chertsey, and retired thither with a number of monks. The foundation of this house is said to be about 666, in the reign of Egbert, and three years later, he built a convent for his sister at Barking in Essex. On the death of Wina, Bishop of London, Erkenwald was chosen to succeed him, and he was consecrated by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, about 675, under whose guidance he did very much for his diocese. The history of this period is so obscure, that very little detail is left of his life, but the great honour and reverence shown to his memory prove that he was no ordinary benefactor to his city. The Venerable Bede tells us in general terms that he lived a holy and laborious life, and that many miracles were done in favour of such as honoured his memory; it is said that the sick were cured by being placed in the carriage he used in his illness. The exact year of his death is not known, but it seems clear that he was alive in 692 from a charta of King Ina dated in that year, in which that prince says he had advised with Erkenwald, one of his bishops, about making such laws as were conducive to the peace of his kingdom and the salvation of his own soul. He died at Barking, and there was a quarrel between that monastery and the one at Chertsey as to which should have the honour of receiving his remains; but he was buried in his own cathedral of St. Paul. In 1148 his relics were removed to a new shrine, at which offerings were made and miracles recorded till the time of the Reformation. Until that time the Church kept two days in his honour, April 30th, as the probable day of his death, and Nov. 14th, the day of his translation.

Erskine, Ebenezer, an eminent Scottish divine, was born at Dryburgh, June 22nd, 1680. His father, the Rev. Henry Erskine, formerly a Presbyterian minister in the north of England, had been expelled in 1662, and had retired to Dryburgh, where he had suffered much religious persecution. After the Revolution of 1688, he became minister of Chirnside, and here Ebenezer was educated until he was fourteen, when he entered the University of Edinburgh, taking his degree of M.A. in 1697. In 1702 he was licensed to preach at Kirkcaldy, and in the following year was ordained minister of Portmoak. For some time his nervousness in the pulpit was a serious drawback to his work, but after about two years this wore off, and he became the most eloquent and most attractive preacher in the neighbourhood, so that only his own parishioners, but those of surrounding parishes, came in crowds to hear him. We are told that at Communion season people travelled sixty miles to attend Portmoak services, and at one time there were 2,067 communicants. In 1720, Erskine became concerned in the controversy which arose with regard to a book of some few broad views by Edward Fisher, called "Morale of Modern Diety", the enthusiasm of admirers of which were known as "Man-Men." The book was condemned by General Assembly as containing unscriptural doctrines, whereupon Erskine drew a representation on the subject, which was signed by twelve ministers, and in which doctrines were defended. The two brethren received a reprobate from the General Assembly, and the matter was allowed to drop, but immediately afterwards a second controversy arose, respecting the right of parishioners to choose their own minister. In 1731, after long discussion, the General Assembly decided that when the filling a vacant parishes devoted upon presbyter one or more of their number should appoint the heritors and elders, as to the choice of their minister. The decision caused great dissatisfaction, and in 1732 a petition for the right to appoint the minister, signed by forty-two ministers, was presented, but was not allowed to be read. Erskine was one of the petitions, and his anger against the Assembly, he preached a somewhat violent sermon against the Act the following Sunday. This was followed by another sermon, some months later, in which the Synod of Perth and Stirling, contained some abusive reference to the members of Assembly who had passed the Act. Synod held a Council on the subject, to demn the expressions which had been made, but could not induce Erskine to retract, a formal reprobate was administered, the effect of which was that he made a prayer against the Act of Assembly, being joined this by three friends. The four were then summoned to appear before the Assembly, but refused to obey, and on being suspended from their ministerial functions, they took notice of the sentence. They were declared to be no longer ministers of the Church, but Erskine announced his intention of still holding office, and of maintaining communion with other members of the Covenant Church of Scotland. This was celebrated by the Synod, the date of which was November, 1742. Immediately after this, the four friends met near Kinross and formed themselves into the Associate Presbytery, Erskine being made first Moderator.
general Assembly, with a view to healing the enmity, empowered the Synod to restore the ministers to their functions, but Erskine denied to make any concessions, and as the Secessionists continued to attack the Established Church by every means in their power,
they were finally deposed from their office.
His circumstance roused the sympathy of people, and by 1742 the Secessionists had so increased in number, that they had seven ministers in the Associate Presbytery.
But their violence was something marvellous.
George Whitefield was at this time in the ninth of his fame. The Secessionists desired him to visit Scotland, and to become associated with their movement. When he arrived in Scotland he preached his first sermon in a Secessionist pulpit. A few days after he was called on to give his pledge that he would preach in no other class of pulpit.
Why? said he. "Because we are the Lord's people," was the answer. He replied that he did not regard questions of Church government as of primary importance, and would rather preach the Gospel wherever he was allowed.
Hereupon they passed a resolution that they would have no more to do with nor listen to him again; and they published the most vicious pamphlets against him, calling him a blasphemer. "A child of the devil, mingling with the most wicked and scandalous purposes," and other names too shameful even quote. In a very short time this spirit of rice turned in upon itself; dissensions sprang among them, and their quarrels grew so terrible that, in 1750, some of them attacked Erskine and some of his ministers, and the matter was brought before the Associate Synod, who pronounced a sentence of excommunication on Erskine.
Secession. It was a great grief to him, and he followed shortly after by the death of his wife and brother. His health gave way under the repeated sorrows, and he died at Airlie, June 2nd, 1754, in his seventy-fourth year. His brother, Ralph Erskine, d. 1752, joined him in the secession, was a popular teacher, and author of Gospel Sonnets, and the other religious works.

Erskine, Thomas, of Linlathan, a layman who exercised a remarkable influence on the Scottish Church, and on English-spoken theology generally, was born in 1788, the son of David Erskine, Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh, and was a descendant of the Earl of Mar, the Regent in the days of James VI.
He was educated at Edinburgh and Durham, and studied for the Bar. During that time he was the intimate friend of Cockburn, Scott, and Jeffrey. In 1816 his elder brother and left him a family estate, whereupon he retired from the Bar and gave himself to the study of those great questions which date to man's highest welfare. His essays are very beautifully written, and full of spiritual insight, but they gave great offence to the popular prejudices of his day, and on account of the opinions expressed in them, he was expelled from the Scottish Kirk. He belonged in the main to the same school of theology as the Rev. F. D. Maurice, caring little for historical criticism or the external evidences of Christianity, and attaching deep importance to spiritual intuition. The Incarnation of Christ, he said, was the manifestation to man of an eternal sonship in the Divine nature,
and without that sonship, earthly relationships would lose their sanction. His principal works are:—Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion [1820], an Essay on Faith [1822], The Unconditional
Freeness of the Gospel [1828], The Brazen Serpent [1831], and The Doctrine of Election [1837]. He did not write any books during the last thirty-three years of his life, but enjoyed a close and affectionate correspondence with Maurice, Stanley, Carlyle, Bishop Ewing, etc. He died at Edinburgh in 1870. His letters, edited by Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley, have been published in 2 vols.

Eschatology.—The study of the doctrine of the Future State. The opinions which have been held in the Christian Church may be classified thus:—There are some who hold that the state of the soul is irrevocably fixed at death. This may be said to be, on the whole, the avowed doctrine of most of the Protestant bodies, though there are, as might have been expected, many shades of opinion on a question so confessedly mysterious.
[Conditional Immortality, Destructionism.]
The Church of Rome holds that there are three states—Heaven, Hell, and Purgatory;
that the latter state is that into which those who have died in faith pass, before reaching the blessedness of heaven. [Purgatory.]
There have been, again, others, from the beginning of Christianity, who have held that there is universal hope, and that even the wicked may be converted in the unseen world,
and so be saved. [Universalism.] As regards children, idiots, and the ignorant, it will only be in accordance with our intuitive convictions, with the teaching of Scripture, and with the analogy of God's moral go-dernment in this life, to believe that the change at death admits of discipline, change, and purification, and the proclamation of the tidings of reconciliation. In Barclay's Apology, the Quaker, expressing his belief in the Atonement, also holds a state of grace for every man who does not resist it. The Church of England, in 1662, when the Prayer Book was last revised, made a bold advance.

Then, for the first time, appeared the rubric that baptised children, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved.
Jeremy Taylor went much further when he taunted the Church of Rome with teaching that unvaptised children should not see the face of God. The Church of England, he says, "teaches no such fierce and uncharitable doctrine." Milton, Isaac Barrow, and Bishop Ken are on the same side. In Ken's Vision of Hadès, he sees "infants numberless" in the "region of the happy dead," not because they have been baptised, but as being "pure from wilful sin," and "numerous souls" of Gentiles, "trophies of universal grace, who ne'er beheld the evangelic light." [Eternal Punishment.]

Espousal. [Marriage.]

Essays and Reviews.—The title of a book published in 1860, which created an immense excitement at the time, but is now almost forgotten. It consisted of seven articles, the authors of which, as the preface stated, "wrote in entire independence of each other, and without concert or comparison." The fact was that the publisher, the late J. W. Parker, had been in the habit, year by year, of publishing "Oxford" and "Cambridge" essays. They had that year fallen through, and he applied to seven writers of his own thought to supply him with material for a substitute volume. This material was as follows:—The Education of the World, by Frederick Temple, D.D., head-master of Rugby; Bunsen's Biblical Researches, by Howland Williams, D.D.; On the Study of the Evidences of Christianity, by Bulen-Powell; The National Church, by H. B. Wilson; On the Mosaic Cosmogony, by C. W. Goodwin; Tendencies of Religious Thought in England [1688–1750], by Mark Pattison; On the Interpretation of Scripture, by R. Jowett. Two of these writers—the second and last—were already known as writers of what was called the "Advanced Broad School," and some alarm was expressed at the very outset by the religious world; an alarm which was considerably increased by a review which appeared in the Guardian by a well-known authority in ecclesiastical matters. He began by drawing a line of demarcation between two of the essays and the other five. "The first essay contains little or nothing which need give pain or occasion surprise. . . Mr. Pattison's essay . . . is almost entirely of an historical character." And he spoke of its "solid and durable truth." The rest were severely handled. Probably little more would have been thought of the book, but, unfortunately, two other notices came out which changed the situation. The Westminster Review taunted the writers with holding ultra-Rationalistic views and yet remaining in the Church; and the Quarterly, by the forcible but rash pen of Dr. Wilberforce, took the same line from an opposite standpoint. Then the storm began. The newspapers were crowded with letters of dismay; the Lower House of Convocation condemned the book as heretical; and half the clergy of England, not one in twenty of whom had probably read the book, signed a protest against it on the ground of extracts which had been, not too fairly, detached from their context. Two volumes were published in answer; one edited by Bishop Wilberforce, Replies E. and R., a feeble work; the other, AIDS FAITH, a collection of essays, some of them very able. Two of the essayists were prosecuted—Dr. Williams by his bishop (Hamilton Salisbury), and Mr. Wilson by a private clergyman. Out of the many charges made two were held by the Dean of Arches, Lushington, to be proved—namely, the den of Eternal Punishment, and of the inspiration of Scripture. Against this condemnation Essayists appealed to the Privy Council, the judgment against them was reversed the first point on the ground that it is contrary to the teaching of the Church express "the larger hope" for mankind, on the second, that the Church has not yet the nature of Inspiration. Some protests were made against this judgment, but the ex- intent soon subsided, especially as the Bill was allowed to go out of print.

Essenes.—An ancient Jewish sect found in Syria and Egypt, who lived a secluded and, probably for that reason, are not mentioned in the New Testament. They divided into two classes, the Practical, associated with the world, carried on ordinary occupations, and were in some cases married, and the Contemplative, who avoided society, devoted themselves to studying the dispensation of the soul, on account of which they were sometimes called "Therapeutae." Both classes led an ascetic life, and were remarkable for the purity of their conduct. They held that the Messiah is the director of the events of life, believed in the immortality of the soul, and a future happiness or sorrow.

Establishment.—A term used to describe any Church regarded as the religion of the State. That religion and the State should be officially connected, seems to have been almost universal idea of antiquity, and cases too numerous to mention the kinship of great occasions acted as the chief part. Later on, the priesthood became dissolving from the sovereignty; but on the whole, it appears to have been still the except at the time of the establishment of the Jewish Theocracy, and thus Jeroboam himself sacrifices at the inauguration of his schism, and idolatrous worship in Bethel. Under the Theocracy, however, the priesthood was given to Moses, who represented both civil government and Jehovah as King, but to Aaron and his line. In the early days of Christianity the worship of the State was largely kept up by the State, as was also, by private offerings from the worshippers. Rome was, however, liberal in religious matters, and Christianity was an exception.
being regarded by the Empire as a religio Nicolaita, a religion not licensed by authority, it was the rule of the Romans to "license" the religion which they found prevailing in any country which they conquered, and to exercise control over it. Thus, though they did not attempt to interfere with the ceremonial and ritual of the Temple of Jerusalem, they more than once deposed the High Priest and compelled the Jews to choose another. Christianity, not being the religion of any nation," was not recognised, and by some of the most just of the emperors was persecuted on the ground of its illegality. When Constantine the Great became emperor, he declared himself a Christian, and made the religion which he had adopted the State religion, built and endowed churches, and issued an edict giving free permission to all his subjects to bequeath their fortunes to the Church, as well as assigned in each city a regular allowance of corn for the sustenance of the clergy and the poor [Gibbon, c. xx.]. From that time onwards Christianity became the religion recognised by every State which grew out of the ruins of the ancient Empire, and also of the new kingdoms which were formed out of the dominions of Charles the Great.

The growth of the Papal power thus made every kingdom more or less subject to the papacy. We say more or less, because the claims to universal dominion which were put forth by Popes Gregory VII. and Innocent II. were never fully admitted, and conflicts between the ecclesiastical and civil powers were frequent. [Concordat.] In England he abjurer submission of John, and the Becket struggle later on, show the extent of the claims of the Roman Church over the State, and the formidable power it possessed; while, on the other hand, the legislation of the Plantagenet kings against Papal and clerical encroachments were a marked protest on behalf of British national independence and of the State supremacy. [See Green's History of the English People, vol. i., pp. 331-2.] At the Reformation the Roman authority was rejected altogether, and the king was declared supreme in all matters, civil and ecclesiastical. [England, Church of.] But the identity of the Church of England before and after was clearly asserted in the Acts of Parliament which bore on the question; the clergy ordained under the older form of government continued in their benefices; the endowments of parochial churches remained as before; and the bishops received their orders from those who had been ordained under the ancient rule. [Rarker.] It would therefore be untrue to say that the establishment of the Church of England dates from the time of Henry VIII., unless the word be taken in the limited sense that the State was then declared to be supreme in its affairs, whereas previously it was the Church which claimed to be supreme. The Church of England claims to be the same Church that has been established in this country from the beginning; all her members are taught to believe in "the holy Catholic Church," or, as it is expressed in the Nicene Creed, "one Catholic and Apostolic Church." In a manifesto put forth in March, 1851, by the two archbishops and twenty bishops of England, "the undoubted identity of the Church before and after the Reformation" is declared, and again mention is made of "one uniform ritual" decreed, but "without in any degree severing her connection with the ancient Catholic Church." The defenders of the Church thus assert that at the Reformation she asserted her independence of Rome, rejected Roman innovations and errors, and returned as far as possible to the pattern of the primitive Church: "the face has been washed, but the features are the same" [Sir R. Phillimore].

The Revolution resulted in the overthrow for the time being of the Episcopal Church, and the establishment of Independency in its place. The restoration of the monarchy was followed by that of Episcopacy. But in Scotland, Presbyterianism was established as the national religion by an Act of the Legislature in the reign of William III. [Scotland, Church of.] In 1801, on the Union of the English and Irish Legislatures, the Episcopal Church became the established religion of Ireland, and the two State Churches were united under the title of the Established Church of England and Ireland. But as the great bulk of the people were Roman Catholic, a feeling of hostility grew steadily, in company with disaffection arising from other causes, and in 1869 the Irish Church was disestablished [Ireland, Church of], and there is in that country no religion in union with the State.

The arguments respecting the establishment of a State religion turn upon two main questions: the one is of principle, the other of expediency. Its defenders hold that the State is bound to maintain a definite religious system, which, in the words of the late Dr. Chalmers, "shall make Christianity so bear upon a population as that it shall reach every door, and be brought into contact with all the families." And the same writer goes on to maintain that as a matter of expediency the only way in which this can be done is by a recognised organisation. The opponents of this view hold that there is political and social injustice involved in giving exclusive privileges to one denomination over another. In the controversies which surround this question, three times of thought are to be discerned. There are, first, those who would keep the status quo in the belief that the present system, with the needful reforms which are from time to time called for, is the best that can be devised for the religious instruction of the mass of the population.
There are, secondly, those at the opposite pole, who would disestablish the Church, and some of whom would secularise its revenues, though the majority of religious Nonconformists profess a desire to leave it in possession of all that has resulted from private endowments since some fixed date, to be chosen on the supposition that after it a discriminating intention to endow the Church as then known, and distinct from other religious bodies, may be inferred. And there is a third party, which, whilst it would keep the Establishment and its revenues as a State religion, would so widen its basis and remove the distinctive formularies, that it should include those Christian bodies who are now outside it. But probably this method would settle nothing. The first-named class object to such a scheme on the ground that the position of the Church is that of a religious teacher, and that the body proposed to be substituted would be without any definite religious teaching at all; while the second maintain that a grievance would still remain in the minds of those who would object to the Liturgy and ceremonial still left, as not representing the religious sentiments of some portions, at any rate, of the community.

With respect to the advantages to a Church itself of establishment, opinions differ widely. There are those who hold that the Church loses her liberty through her union with the State, and would be stronger if freed from State control. In answer to that the defenders of the Establishment maintain that by 24 Henry VIII., c. 12, the Crown is supreme over all manner of persons in the realm, both of the spirituality and temporalty, and in all causes spiritual or temporal, and that therefore State control is unavoidable, and that not only the Establishment, but all religious bodies in the kingdom, are subject to it. Moreover, it is necessary for the well-being of the kingdom that religious bodies be subject to the Crown, for the tendencies and doctrines of religious bodies may possibly be prejudicial to the general welfare of the people. Again, Article 37 of the Church of England defines this State control to be "that only prerogative which we see to have been given always to all godly princes in Holy Scripture by God Himself." It is, however, true that the State control over established Churches does extend further in practice than is felt by unestablished bodies. Against this, on the other hand, is to be set the practical dependence of an unestablished ministry upon the goodwill of the congregations, which is well known to have often caused lamentable results. The truth appears to be that, as regards mere advantage to a religious body, there is something in each system. Neither can a conclusive argument be drawn from experience. Amongst nearly all the Continental nations establishment is the rule; the Lutheran Church in one of its forms being adopted in general by the more northerly free races, and the Roman Catholic by the southern, Russia adhering to the Eastern communion. In no cases the control of the State is considered greater than in England, except as regards the Roman Catholic Church, relations between the State and which, where established, a usually defined by a formal instrument called a Concordat [q.v.]. In the United States, on the other hand, there is now Establishment, though it is remarkable that the Puritans of New England made one of the most definite attempts on record, if not to establish a Church, at least to make State itself synonymous with the Church and to govern the whole community upon "godly" principles. In most, if not all the free British Colonies there is also no Establishment. These facts prove, at least, that establishment is no necessary part of a Church system, and that whenever such union between a Church and the State is dissolved any really spiritual mission and authority the Church cannot be altered thereby. It only such countenance, or favour, or emolument, as is bestowed by man, that man can take away.

A good statement in favour of Establishment is published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, for a shilling entitled The Case for Establishment Stated, by Rev. T. Moore. For the other side see a volume published by Messrs. Longman, "I would Disestablish, a collection of esss.

Estate.—A word used occasionally, in the Book of Common Prayer, in a sense almost obsolete, e.g. in the second Collect Good Friday we offer prayer for "all estate of men" in the Church, hereby acknowledging an equality in all the members of Church, irrespective of their temporal position. In the Office for the Visitation of the Sick, sick person is required to examine himself to his estate both toward God and man, i.e. spiritual condition; and a deacon at his option is charged "to search for the sир poor, and impotent people of the parish, intimate their estates, names, and places where they dwell unto the curate, that by his examination they may be relieved with the alms of the parishioners." Here the word would seem to apply to their temporal condition alone.

Eternal Punishment.—The Gr. word aiēnios, from aiēn, "age," is transliterated in our Bibles sometimes "eternal," sometin "everlasting." By the majority of Christ people these two words were until lately to mean the same thing, and "endless would have been received as a perfect equivalent. But a fuller examination of language will show that this does not of necessity follow. Between "eternal" and "endless lies this broad distinction, that the one w belongs to a region which is out of time altogether, while "endless" lies within conditions of time. When we speak of God as eternal we are conscious that we are accepting a truth which we can indeed believe, though it is absolutely out of our comprehension. Now whatever the word άιωνιος may mean as regards a future state, it is certainly used with a limited meaning as regards visible things, viz., "of which the end does not appear." It is sometimes used for the beginning of the world, sometimes for the end of it. [See Hudson’s Greek Concordance, s. v. άιων.]. And therefore there have been always some theologians who have maintained that, seeing that the word is used with a limit in regard to visible things, the possibility of limit in things unseen cannot logically be denied. The texts which have been adduced, on the one side by those who hold that eternal means endless, and on the other by those who hold what the poet calls the larger hope [see Matt. xxvi. 24; Mark ix. 41-48; 1 Cor. xv. 22; 1 Tim. ii. 4, iv. 10], might convince us that there is an absence of systematic teaching in Scripture. Isolated texts can be cited for every view, and it will probably be felt by those who study the Scripture most closely that we best express the sense of it when we say that the intended impression of the whole of it on this subject seems to be one of solemn dread, with more or less of uncertainty.

The popular doctrine on this subject is to be largely traced to medieval theories and beliefs, which have come to be accepted as Scriptural doctrine, but which were in fact glosses upon it. Much of the language of the mediaeval writers was derived from heathen imagery, notably the terrible pictures in Dante’s Inferno. Still, such language undoubtedly represented more or less a popular belief, and the extent to which it passed into current theology is shown not only in the pages of many Roman Catholic writers, but by that of Calvinist theologians, our Milton, Pollok, and others. It cannot be overlooked that such representations were framed at a time when there was an almost utter callousness to human suffering, and bodily torture was actually inflicted to an extent that now almost defies belief. They indicate ideas of “Divine justice” drawn from the arbitrary and cruel doings of human governments, and transferred to the Eternal; while the belief in the Fatherhood of God was for a while obscured. It was probably in part a reaction from this which gave birth to the doctrine of purgatory, as actually tempering the lurid light shed upon the future by the fierceness of a dark age. In the present day it is notable that, on the most opposite sides, language is used which presents a marked contrast to that which formerly prevailed. In all ages of Christianity there have been some theologians, such as Origen, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and St. Chrysostom (in some of his writings), who have expressed what Tennyson calls “the larger hope,” whilst they also felt that on such a subject it does not become man to dogmatise rashly. But besides these, there are others who, maintaining that the Scriptural language precludes belief in universal salvation, yet modify, if they do not reject, the doctrine of endless pain. Recent treatises have displayed a larger approximation than heretofore, even between universalists and those who accept the doctrine of endless punishment. Most Christian universalists admit, that while punishment may be received as deserved chastisement, and lead to repentance and salvation, this is not necessarily the result of it, but that on the contrary it may harden men into the resistance of a rebellious slave. Recognising this, the terrible evil of sin, and the too evident fact that there appear around us, even now, examples of apparent personal antagonism to good and to God, they will admit that there must be for such an appalling loss both in blessedness and spiritual growth, which, relatively to others, may never be recovered, and in that sense may be termed eternal, even in the event of final salvation. On the other hand, many who feel bound to believe in punishment as endless, find it rather in moral than in physical suffering; in the awakened consciousness of what he has become, and that he is what he has made himself, on the part of the sinner. Some such have further avowed hope, if not belief, that even then, humble acceptance of due desert may make vast difference in result, and that God may make even of such whatever they are yet capable of. The mutual approach of such views is evident, and it may be that in it rests the real truth. At least the idea of a permanent loss (and it may be noted that the word “damnation” means literally “loss”) arising from present ill-conduct, is an idea which we can all recognise as probable. “I have given,” says Cardinal Newman, “a full inward ascent and belief to the doctrine of eternal punishment, as delivered by our Lord Himself, in as true a sense as I hold that of eternal happiness; though I have tried in various ways to make that truth less terrible to the reason.” [Apologia, p. 62].

In 1833 this question came prominently forward in the English religious world, in consequence of the dismissal of Mr. Maurice from his professorship at King’s College, London, on the alleged ground that, in his recently published Theological Essays, he had denied the eternity of punishment. He defended himself by disclaiming the charge of Universalism, and contending that “endless” is not a correct translation of άιωνιος, and that he entirely adopted the doctrine of the creeds, while he felt “that ‘God is love’ is the deepest of all theological truths.” [MAURICE.] Much information concerning the present state of the controversy on this question will be gained from the following works:—Eternal Hope, by Archdeacon Farrar; What is of Faith concerning Everlasting Punishment? by Dr. Pusey; What is the Truth concerning Everlasting Punishment? by F. N. Oxenham; The Spirits in Prison, by Dean Plumptre.

Ethelard, 14th Archbishop of Canterbury, lived in the eighth century. He was brought up as a monk, and had the government of an abbey, and was promoted to the See of Canterbury about 791. He found the church at a very low ebb, and, in consequence of the revolt of the Kentish nobles, he was obliged, in 796, to leave this post, and it is probable that he took refuge in the court of Kenuf, King of Mercia. Alcuin seems to have written him many letters of advice, and to have urged Offa to reinstate the Archbishop; but Offa died shortly afterwards, and for the next three years Canterbury was chiefly ruled by an apostate cleric named Edbert. Offa had, in opposition to Archbishop Lambert, removed the Archbishoppal See to Lichfield, and procured a confirmation of this translation from Pope Adrian; and, in 801, Kenuf writes to Leo III. and requests his Holiness to gratify the general desire of the English nation so far as to revoke the act of his predecessor, and restore the archbishopric to its proper place. Ethelard went to Rome with this request, and his mission proved successful. On his return home he called a Council at Clovesho, not far from Rochester, and on Oct. 12th, 803, very severe canons were passed against those who should attempt to remove the Metropolitical See from Canterbury. This synod was attended by a large number of bishops, abbots, and clergy, a list of whom is given by Sir Henry Spelman from the Records of Canterbury. Ethelard died in 805.

Ethelbert, St.—Ethelbert came to the crown of Kent about 560; he married Bertha, a Christian, and daughter of Charibert, King of France, on condition that she should be allowed the free exercise of her religion under the care and direction of Bishop Luidard, who came over with her. But this alliance did not procure the conversion either of the king or his subjects; that was reserved for St. Augustine. Ethelbert had granted to Bertha for her worship the little church of St. Martin at Canterbury, which had formerly been used for British Christian services. Augustine landed in the Isle of Thanet, and from thence sent to Ethelbert, who kept court at Canterbury, to tell him that he was come to put him in the way of securing a more valuable and glorious kingdom after death, than that he now enjoyed. The king, with his natural humanity, gave the missionaries leave to stay where they were, until he had considered their proposal, and in the meanwhile he ordered that they should be supplied with all necessaries. Some days after he went to them and declared his willingness to hear what they had to offer; but, full of superstition, he would not meet them in any building, but only in the open air, where he imagined himself secure from any magical attempt on his person or senses. When he had listened to their discourse with attention for some time he expressed himself civilly, but in a manner that seemed to give them but slender hopes of gaining him to the Christian religion. "These," said Ethelbert, "are indeed fine words and most agreeable promises, but they are new, distant, and uncertain; and, therefore, not sufficient to prevail with me to abandon the religion of my ancestors. But your journey hither has been long and full of difficulties, and undertaken to serve us, by communicating to us what you believe the most valuable, and take for truth. We shall therefore, be so far from treating you ill, that you shall be kindly received in our dominions allowed to settle there, provided with what is necessary, and have free liberty to make what conquests you can in favour of your religion.

He performed his promise by introducing them into Canterbury, the capital of his kingdom, then called Durobernia, and here the church was worshipped at the old church of St. Martin. At length Ethelbert was converted, and we baptised on Whit Sunday, June 2nd, 597. A old Saxon temple was made over to Augustine for a regular place of Christian worship, and dedicated to St. Pancras; both this and St. Martin's were outside the city walls. St. Augustine was consecrated as the first Archbishop of Canterbury, and Ethelbert determined to give him a dwelling-place and land within the city; so he retired himself to the old Roman fortress of Reculver and gave Augustine his own wooden palace in Canterbury. Of this gift Dean Stanley writes:—"This grant of house and land to Augustine was a step of immense importance, not only in English but European history, because it was the first instance in England, or in any of the countries occupied by the barbarian tribes, of an endowment by the State. As St. Martin's and St. Pancras' witnessed the first beginning of English Christianity, so Canterbury Cathedral is the earliest monument of the English Church Establishment,—of the English constitution of the union of Church and State." St. Gregory was extremely glad to hear such favourable accounts of the progress of Christianity in England, and wrote to Ethelbert in 601, exhorting him to persevere, and holding up Constantine the Great to him as an example to inflame his zeal. Thus encouraged, he gave the missionaries every assistance in his power, built a church in the city of Canterbury, which was dedicated to the Saviour, and established the Metropolitan See there. Though the cathedral has been several times rebuilt, still keeps the name of Christ Church.
then built a church and monastery without the walls of the city, and dedicated it to St. Peter and St. Paul, and endowed it very largely; after his death it was known as the Abbey of St. Augustine. St. Andrew's Church at Rochester was also built and endowed by Ethelbert, and by his direction St. Augustine built a church at Ely; this was ruined by the barbarity of Penda, King of the Mercians. Ethelbert's zeal was not confined to the limits of his own dominions; he procured the conversion of Sebert, King of the East Saxons, by sending Mellitus to preach to him and his subjects, and founded the church of St. Paul, at London, which that bishop made his cathedral. Ethelbert died Feb. 24th, 616.

Ethelburga, Sr., was the sister of St. Erkenwald, Bishop of London, and the daughter of a King of the East Angles (probably Offa). Erkenwald built for her, about the year 669, a monastery at Barking, in Essex, where he placed her at the head of a religious community of her own sex. It was so unusual to have monasteries for women in England at that time, that those who wished to spend their lives as nuns were generally sent over to France, and either ended their days there, or returned to their own country full of experience in monastic discipline, and brought up others in the same way. Hildelitha, who was sent for to assist St. Ethelburga, was probably one of this number, and they together established such order and discipline that the monastery of Barking became one of the most flourishing in England till the time of the Reformation. Bede, who was contemporary with this saint, speaks of miracles said to be performed by St. Ethelburga. The date of her death is unknown; she is commemorated on Oct. 11th.

Etheldreda, Sr., Queen and Abbess, was the daughter of Anna, King of the East Angles. From a child she wished to lead a conventual life, but, greatly to her distress, her parents married her, in 652, to Tondertb, Prince of Girwich, in East Anglia; he, respecting her wishes, allowed her to marry without legal consent. Tondertb died soon after, and Etheldreda was then married to Egfrid, King of Northumbria, in 660, he consenting to her resolution of perpetual virginity; but after a time he repented of his promise, and at last he begged Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, to use his influence to change the Queen's determination. In this Wilfrid did not succeed; indeed, it is said that he secretly advised her to adhere to her resolution; at any rate, through his means a divorce was carried out, twelve years after their marriage, though much against Egfrid's wishes. Etheldreda retired to the monastery of Coldingham, where she received the veil at the hands of St. Wilfrid. She had an estate at Ely, left to her by her first husband, and here, according to the custom of the age, she built a double monastery, but the nuns were the more numerous. She became the first abbess of her house, and maintained in it a very strict discipline. After six years she died of the plague, June 23rd, 679. She made it her dying request that she should be buried with the other sisters, without any mark of distinction, and this wish was carried out by her priest, Huna, and she was buried in a wooden coffin. In 695, Sexburga, her sister, who had succeeded her as abbess, ordered her relics to be taken up; this was done, and they were enclosed in a stone monument till 1106, when Robert of Ely had them removed with great solemnity into the cathedral church of Ely. In 1235, Bishop Northwold caused a new shrine to be made for the saint; this perished at the Reformation.

Ethelwald, Sr., Bishop of Winchester, was ordained priest in the reign of Athelstan, by Alphege, Bishop of Winchester, and lived with him for six years; he then went to Glastonbury, and received the monastic habit at the hands of St. Dunstan. In 954 he became Abbot of Abingdon, in Berkshire, and in 963 Bishop of Winchester. He, in conjunction with Dunstan, and Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, set about reforming the manners of the clergy. He ejected some of the secular clergy of his cathedral who were leading dissolute lives, and filled their places with monks from Abingdon. He is said to have repaired or rebuilt many churches in his diocese, and to have founded monasteries in several parts of England, and having obtained a grant of such religious houses as had been plundered or destroyed by the Danes, rebuilt and endowed several of them, particularly that of Ely, where Queen Etheldreda was buried. Ethelwald died Aug. 1st, 984.

Ethelwulf.—A Saxon king, who granted a tithe of his lands to the Church. The following is a translation from the original charter:—"I, Ethelwulf, by the grace of God King of the West Saxons, at the holy solemnity of Easter, for the health of my soul and the prosperity of my kingdom, and the people committed by God Almighty to my charge, have, with the advice of the bishops, earls, and all the persons of condition in my dominions, fixed upon the prudent and serviceable resolution of granting the tenth part of the lands throughout our whole kingdom to the holy churches and ministers of religion, our subjects officiating and settled in them, to be perpetually enjoyed by them with all the advantages of a free tenure and estate: it being likewise our will and pleasure, that this unalterable and indefeasible grant shall for ever remain discharged from all service due to the Crown, and all other incumbrances incident to lay fees. Which grant has been made by us in honour of our Lord Jesus Christ, the blessed Virgin, and all saints, and out of regard to the Paschal solemnity, and that God Almighty might vouchsafe His blessing upon us and our posterity. This charter is engrossed and signed in the year of the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, dccccliv. Dated at Easter, at our palace called Wiltun. Now, whoever shall be disposed to make an augmentation to our grant, may God Almighty reward him in the increase of his posterity. But if any person shall presume to alienate the donation, or make it suffer in any kind, let him give an account of it before the tribunal of Christ, unless he repents of his injustice and makes timely restitution.” The charter may be seen in the Latin original. It being so famous a record for settling the tithes in England, some people, anxious to find arguments to weaken its authority, endeavour to limit it in the extent, and object that Ethelwulf was only King of the West Saxons, as appears by his style, Rex Occidentalem Saxorum, and not monarch of England. This law, therefore, they argue, could not oblige any further than Cornwall, Devonshire, Somersetshire, Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Berkshire, these counties comprehending the whole of the West Saxon dominions. To this it is replied, that he is styled King of the West Saxons by way of eminence, not exclusively, being most fond of that title upon the score of its being his father Egbert’s hereditary kingdom before he became monarch of all England. It is true there were two other petty subordinate kings at the council where this charter was signed—viz. Burhred King of Mercia, and Edmund King of the East Angles, which two princes, according to Ingulphus, consented to the acts of the synod. It is further objected that the King granted only the tithes of his crown lands, not in Domino, but in Domino suo—not in all his dominions, but only in his demesnes. To this it is answered that there would have been no necessity to summon so solemn an assembly of the principal clergy and laity for the passing away of a private bounty; besides, it appears by other authors—amongst them Henry of Huntingdon—that the grant reached to the whole kingdom in general.

Eton College was founded Oct. 11th, 1440, by Henry VI., on the model of Wykeham’s foundation of Winchester. It was intended that pupils from Eton should proceed to King’s College, Cambridge, as the Winchester boys were passed on to New College, Oxford. It had originally endowments for a provost, ten “sad” priests, four lay clerks, six choristers, twenty-five poor grammar scholars, and twenty-five poor men, whose duty it was to pray for the King. Great changes were introduced in 1872 by the Public Schools Parliamentary Commission. Attached to the foundation are several scholarships at King’s College, Cambridge; two scholarship at Merton College, Oxford, and forty-seven livings.

Eucharist.—One of the names given to the Holy Communion, being derived from the Pauline word eucharistia, “thanksgiving. [1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 15, ix. 11, 12 Eph. v. 4; Phil. iv. 6; Col. ii. 7, iv. 2; Thess. iii. 9; 1 Tim. ii. 1, iv. 3, 4.] In some of these passages, it has been held by certain divines (e.g. Bishop Wordsworth, Dr. Hook, etc.) that there is special allusion to the Holy Communion, but this must be admitted to be a question of opinion. But the reason of the application of it to the sacrament is clear. It is taken from the narrative of the institution as given by St. Luke [xxii. 19], and St. Paul [1 Cor. xi.]. Our Lord is said to have given thanks [Gr. eucharistias] and there is no question that from the very beginning Christians have regarded this service as the highest act of Christian worship and therefore of thanksgiving. It is, therefore, emphatically “the Eucharist,” an Christian writers from the first age (Ignatius, Clement, Origen, etc.) have used the name in this sense, and it was Latinised like the Hebrew “Amen” as soon as the Church reach Latin-speaking lands. The first Latin writer Tertullian, uses it. The controversies which have arisen concerning the Holy Sacrament are manifold. That which specifically connect itself with the name Eucharist is the question whether it is to be regarded as a sacrifice. The doctrine of the Church of Rome is quite explicit in answer, for it calls this sacrament “the Sacrifice of the Mass.” The Church of England calls it “this our sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.” But such definition fails short of the Roman doctrine, as will be seen by the Roman definition of sacrifice, “the oblation of a sensible thing made to Go through a lawful minister by a real change in the thing offered, to testify God’s absolute authority over us, and our entire dependence on Him.” Thus theologians hold that the thing offered must be visible, because sacrifice pertains to external worship, that it must be offered to God alone, because He is the sole Lord of life and death, and that a thing must take place in the thing offered which must convey it directly to God in heaven and that it must be a substitution of the life of the victim for the life of those in whose behalf it is offered. It is clear that the Church of England, by rejecting the doctrine of Transubstantiation, does not accept this view of the sacrifice. But a doctrine of Eucharistic sacrifice is admitted by some of the greatest writers of the Anglican communion, notably, Mede, Archbishop Bramhall, Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Bull, John Wesley, and Keble. Perhaps we may venture to quote from a sermon of Dr. Hook the doctrine which the author first named would accept as expressing thei faith:—"The chief reference to the sacrifice of the Cross belongs, according to the right doctrine, to the sacramental part of the Eucharist. The sacrifice of the Cross is exhibited and represented before God and men, under the symbols of the bread and wine; and the bread and wine being duly consecrated, become to the worthy communicants, to all intents and purposes, virtually and interpretatively the Body and Blood of that precious Lamb of God, who was once, and once for all, offered upon the Cross; and by partaking of them we become partakers of the atoning Sacrifice. The grand Sacrifice, once offered, is dispensed and communicated to individual believers in the Eucharist, by and through the consecrated symbols, but it is not repeated. Hence the Eucharist is regarded as a feast upon that great sacrifice" [The Eucharist a Sacrifice, a Sermon preached in 1846]. Some Nonconformists have avowed a belief not very much short of the above, except as regards the implied efficacy or necessity of "consecration;" and very recently the Rev. R. W. Dale, in a Congregational manual, expressed views as to an element in the Lord's Supper beyond mere commemoration, which led to considerable strictures from others in that communion.

Euchites, or "Praying People."—So called from their regarding prayer as the one means of their salvation. Neander says that they had their origin in Syrian Monachism. The sect propagated itself from the second half of the fourth century down to the sixth, and in its after-effects even to later times. "They were called sometimes after the names of those who at different times were their leaders—Lampetians, Adelphians, Eu- stathians, and Marcians; * sometimes after various peculiarities supposed to be observed in them—Euchites, Messalians (from the Chaldee) on account of their theory about constant inward prayer; also Choroeutes from their mystic dances; Enthusiasts, on account of the pretended communications which they received from the Holy Spirit. They discarded all manual labour as being a disturbance to their state of inward prayer; and were the first mendicant friars. Their fundamental principle was that every man brings into the world an evil spirit, under whom he lives, and that, though baptism might clip away the earlier sins, the root yet remained, and that the new sins which would constantly germinate could only be overcome by true inward prayer. They looked on themselves as exalted far above other Christians, because they believed themselves to be recipients of special spiritual communion, and they therefore thought the outward ordinances of the Church a matter of indifference for them; yet they joined in the celebration of the Lord's Supper in order that they might be considered members of the Catholic Church. They considered fire as the creative principle of the universe. It was difficult to get any clue to their doctrines, as they thought it right to conceal from ordinary men, yet enslaved by sin, the higher truths, until their senses were spiritualised to receive them. Flavian, Bishop of Antioch [about 381], managed to enter into a conference with Adelphians, their superior, pretending to agree with him, and thus enticed him to a confession, which he made use of against Adelphians and his whole sect. The first public action taken against them was at the Synod of Sida, in Pamphylia, in 383. They were many times condemned in various dioceses; one important condemnation was issued at Constantinople in 427, which was confirmed at the Council of Ephesus, in 431. A book called Asepticus, by one of their body, was produced at this council and condemned; it was almost their only literary production.

In the eleventh century, in the Greek Church, there was a numerous sect under the name of Euchites, or Enthusiasts, who believed in one perfect original Being, from whom they derived two sons, the good and evil principle, the relation between whom seems to have constituted, according as it inclined one way or the other, an absolute, or to a relative dualism—a main difference, and, indeed, the ground of two several parties in this sect. To this same distinction may be referred the main difference between the Bogomiles and the Catharians [Novatians], of whom the Euchites may be called the precursors.

Euchologion.—The chief book of the liturgy of the Eastern Church. In its simplest form it contains only the liturgies of Chrysostom and Basil, and the so-called liturgy of Gregory the Great. It generally includes also offices for the administration of the sacraments, and other forms of prayer. It has been proved that the Euchologion was in existence about A.D. 800, and it may have been compiled before that date, but this is not known.

Eudoxians.—Heretics of the fourth century, so called from their founder, Eudoxius, Bishop of Germania, in Syria, who became Bishop of Antioch in 357, and four years later of Constantinople. He was the friend of Aetius and Eunomius, and held their views of the inferiority of the Son to the Father, and also denied the Trinity. He was one of the most mischievous of the Arians, and his doctrines were condemned by the Councils of Seleucia [359] and Lampsis [365]. He was banished for a short time by Constantine, but held the See of Constantinople until his death in 370.

Churches concerning Monothelitism. Pope Martin I. had been deposed in 653 because he had denounced the Emperor Constans' declaration called "The Type," and had also excommunicated the Bishop of Constantinopole. Eugenius was, in 654, chosen in his place, but was not lawfully Pope till Martin's death in the next year. The messengers who were sent to Constantinopole to announce his election to the Emperor, returned to Rome with a rather unorthodox confession of faith, acknowledging one will in Christ and also two. Eugenius was rather disposed to sign it, but the clergy and people would not allow it. Another evidence of his want of zeal is, that he neglected Martin during his last years, leaving him almost to starve. Eugenius was said to be very good to the poor, and it is probably this that has gained for him the name of saint. He died in 657, and is commemorated on June 2nd.

Eunomians.—An Arian sect of the fourth century, who took their name from Eunomius. He was born at Dacora, in Cappadocia, and came to Alexandria in 358, where he became the pupil and secretary of Aetius, from whom he imbibed his extreme Arian views. He accompanied Aetius to the Arian Council at Antioch, in 358, and was there ordained deacon by Eudoxius, the Patriarch of Constantinopole, through whose influence he was made Bishop of Cyzicus, in 360, but in the same year was deposed and banished in consequence of his Arian views. He put himself at the head of the Anomoeans, who were henceforth called Eunomians. He died about 394. His doctrine concerning Christ was that He was a created Being, of a nature unlike that of God, and that the Son of God did not substantially unite Himself to the human nature, but only by virtue of His operations. The Holy Spirit, he said, was the first among the created natures, formed according to the command of the Father, by the agency of the Son; which Spirit, as being the first after the Son, has received, indeed, the power to sanctify and to teach, but wants the divine and creative power. Eunomius was the first who discontinued baptism in the name of the Trinity, substituting words which made it a baptism in the Name of the Creator and into the death of Christ. He had a great literary reputation; he wrote a commentary on the Romans, forty epistles, an Apology for his doctrines, and an Exposition of Faith. The latter work alone is extant.

Euphemia, Sr., Virgin and Martyr of Chalcedon, in her fourth century. She suffered in the persecution by Galerius [307]. A church was built over her tomb, in which the Council of Chalcedon was held in 451, and the success of that assembly was largely attributed by the Fathers to her prayers. Her relics were removed in the seventh century to the Church of St. Sophia, in Constantinopole, and four churches were built in that city to her memory. Constantine Cupronymus threw her relics into the sea, but it is said that they were rescued and deposited in a small island, whence Constantine and Irene had them removed to Constantinopole in 796. She was regarded as the patroness of Chalcedon.

Eusebius, Bishop of Cesarea, in Palestine, and one of the most learned men of his age, was born in Palestine about A.D. 260, towards the end of the reign of Galerius, and during the bishopric of Dionysius. Having been ordained presbyter by Agapius, Bishop of Cesarea, Eusebius set up a school in that town; he also assisted his friend Pamphilus in the copying of the Scriptures and of the works of Origen. In 309, the last persecution of Diocletian broke out, and Eusebius suffered the sorrow of seeing many of his friends and of his flock destroyed by it, notably the "holy and blessed Pamphilus," as Eusebius calls him, who suffered martyrdom after two years' imprisonment. Probably Eusebius shared the imprisonment with him, for they were engaged together in a defence of Origen, which must have necessitated constant intercourse, and it would be difficult otherwise to explain his escape from martyrdom. In 313, peace was restored, and soon after Eusebius was appointed to the bishopric of Cesarea. At the beginning of the Arian controversy his sympathies were on the side of Arius, thinking, with some other bishops of Palestine, that he was persecuted too hastily by Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria. Eusebius wrote to Alexander in favour of Arius, and not having interest enough to procure his being restored, allowed him and his partisans the privilege of meeting in their churches, on the condition that they submitted to the jurisdiction of their bishop, and made humble application to be restored to his communion. When the Council of Nicaea assembled, in 325, Eusebius took a leading part in it, probably for the reason that he stood high in the favour of the Emperor Constantine. After much discussion he agreed with the rest in condemning the Arian heresy, and subscribed to the doctrines of the Nicene Creed, though objecting at first to the words "of the same substance," to which he afterwards consented for the sake of peace, and also because the words had formerly been in use in his own Church of Cesarea. One work in which the Council was engaged was the settlement of the dispute concerning the time of keeping Easter, and it has been asserted that the cycle of nineteen years, or Golden Number, was determined at this time, and that Eusebius, being the most learned member, was entrusted with the arrangement; but in the documents containing accounts of the proceedings, there is no mention of the method of calculating Easter, and it is more probable that the Council only sanctioned the old Monastic cycle which had been applied for this purpose by Anatolius, of Laodicea, about A.D. 284. Eusebius was present at the Council of Antioch, in 330, when Eustathius, Bishop of Antioch, against whom Eusebius had brought charges of Sabellianism, was deposed, and the See offered to Eusebius. The prejudices of the people were too strong against him to admit of his accepting the offer. He attended the Councils of Cesarea and Tyre, which were held to examine the doctrines of St. Athanasius; but the proceedings were stopped by the flight of the accused to Constantinople to appeal to the Emperor. The Council therefore gave sentence of condemnation against St. Athanasius. Immediately afterwards the Emperor Constantine issued a summons to the bishops to appear at Jerusalem, on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of his accession, when the dedication was to take place of a basilica built on the site of Calvary. A synod was held for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation among the various disputants, which had long been desired by the Emperor and by Eusebius. The event is marked by the readmission of Arius to communion. Eusebius was, at the same time, selected to justify the proceedings against St. Athanasius to the Emperor, and he made a panegyric oration in reference to the occasion, which was afterwards appended to his Life of Constantine. The Emperor only survived this festival by about twelve months. He died in 337, and it is believed that Eusebius died two years later. It is certain he was not living in 341, for we find Acacius in possession of the bishopric in that year. Eusebius was a voluminous writer; he is known chiefly by his Chronicle, and Ecclesiastical History, both of which appear to have been published in 325. Among other historical works he wrote a Life of Pamphilus and the Life of Constantine. He also wrote innumerable Letters, Defences, and Apologies, and various doctrinal works.

Eusebius, Bishop of Samosata, makes a considerable figure in ecclesiastical history, and proved one of the greatest supports of the orthodox faith against the Arians. He was a native of Samosata, in Syria, on the banks of the Euphrates, of which city he was made bishop in the reign of Constantius. Nothing is heard of him till Meletius was raised to the See of Antioch, in 361. Constantius assembled a council at Antioch with a design of condemning the terms Consubstantial and different in substance, and thus to preserve some medium between the Catholics and the pure Arians. The bishops who met on that occasion, among whom was Eusebius, petitioned that the Church of Antioch might be provided with a bishop, for Eustathius had been deposed by the Arian party, and Eudoxius, whom they had chosen in his room, had been removed to Constantinople. Meletius was elected by both Catholics and heretics, and the writing which contained the free act of both sides for his election, and was subscribed by all the bishops, was lodged in the hands of Eusebius. The first discourse the new bishop made sufficed to show the Arians that they were mistaken in their man, and when he had only been in possession of the See for a month, they prevailed on the Emperor to banish him, and, further, to demand from Eusebius the writing which confirmed Meletius's election. This he firmly refused to give up without the express consent of all concerned in it, and on the Emperor threatening, if he refused, to cut off his right hand, he calmly extended both his hands, and declared he would lose them both rather than part with so flagrant a proof of Arian injustice. Thenceforth the Arians looked on him as a dangerous enemy. On the accession of Julian the Apostate, the exiled bishops, both Catholic and heretic, were reinstated in their Sees, and in 363 his successor Jovian restored peace to the Church, and gave Meletius the liberty of convening a council at Antioch, at which Eusebius and twenty-five other bishops all declared for the doctrine of the Church as established by the Council of Nice.

In 370 the Metropolitan See of Cesarea in Cappadocia was vacant, and Eusebius, being urged thereto by St. Gregory Nazianzen, went thither, and was instrumental in securing the election of St. Basil, who became one of his most ardent friends. It is said that for a time he travelled disguised as a soldier, in Syria, Phoenicia, and Palestine, in order to fortify the orthodox Churches, and to ordain presbyters and deacons wherever they were wanting. It is very probable that he was the Eusebius who presided at the Council of Gangra [372 or 373], which condemned the heresy of Eustathius [q.v.], but it is not absolutely certain. From a letter of St. Basil, in 373, we learn that Eusebius had successfully interfered to secure the election of an orthodox bishop at Tarsus, and, indeed, he worked so untiringly against the Arians that it was impossible to conceal the hand which every day gave some stroke to their party, and sank their interest wherever it was employed; and at length they prevailed with Valens, who was devoted to their sect, and who had hitherto for some unaccountable reason left him unmolested during his bitter persecutions of the orthodox, to order his banishment into Thrace. Eusebius was at Samosata when the messenger came, late in the evening; he begged him to conceal his business, for, knowing the affection of his people, he said, "If it takes air, the people will fall on you, throw you into the river, and then I shall be charged with your death." He then went calmly through his usual devotions, and late at night he left his house on foot, attended only by one trusty servant, who carried after him a pillow and a book. With this slight provision he took a boat to Zeugma, about seventy miles down the river. This event is generally fixed at 373. At break of day the whole town was in an uproar, and many of his friends followed him to Zeugma, urging his return, but he refused, urging the authority of St. Paul for submitting to the powers in being. They then besought him to let them supply him with money and comforts for his journey, but he would only accept a trifling sum, and having prayed with his flock, and exhorted them to uphold the apostolical doctrine, he pursued his journey into Thrace. Both St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil wrote to him, commending his courage and constancy. His flock left his successor, Eunomius, a man of gentle temper, in complete isolation, and he retired, and in his place Lucius was appointed, a rough and oppressive man. In 378 Valens died, and his successor, Gratian, permitted Eusebius to return. Thus restored to his post, he began to consider the distressed condition of the Churches in Mesopotamia and Syria, which were deprived of their pastors. Historians tell us (though it would be out of the jurisdiction of his See) that he consecrated bishops for Beroea, Hierapolis, Cyrus, and other Sees. He was about to ordain Maria at Dolica, a small town in Syria, when an Arian woman threw a tile from the top of her house, which broke his head, and he died in a few days. Anxious to imitate his Divine Master, he made his attendants promise that the woman should not be prosecuted. He is venerated as a martyr in the Latin Church on June 21st, and in the Eastern Church on June 22nd, but both agree that he died in 350.

Eustathians.—A sect resembling the Euchites. They took their name from Eustathius, a monk living in the fourth century, who, under pretence of a more perfect way of living, introduced several erroneous opinions and practices contrary to the usages of the Church. He was formerly Bishop of Sebaste, in Armenia, and was deposed by the Council of Gangra, the date of which is uncertain. The bishops who met there, in their synodical epistle charge him and his partisans with these errors:—

1. With condemning marriage and parting women from their husbands.
2. With quitting the public congregations and setting up private meetings.
3. With encouraging servants to leave their masters, and children their parents, under a pretence of living in a more self-denying way.
4. With allowing women to wear men's clothes.
5. With rejecting the fasts appointed by the Church, and practising other days of abstinence according to their own fancy, not excepting Sunday.
6. With forbidding to eat flesh at any time.
7. With rejecting the ministrations of married priests.
8. With paying no regard to consecrated places and the tombs of martyrs.
9. With maintaining that nobody could be saved without parting with all his estate. These doctrines stand condemned in twenty canons inserted in the Code of Canons of the Universal Church.

Eustathius, Patriarch of Antioch, was born at Side, in Pamphylia, in the fourth century. He was translated against his will from Berea to Antioch on the death of Philogonus [323]. Two years later he assisted at the General Council of Nice, where he made a considerable figure, and opened the synod with a speech to the Emperor Constantine. His zeal against the Arians caused them, in 330, to calumniate him, and they charged him with Sabellianism and immorality. These false charges gaining credit, he was uncanonically deposed, notwithstanding the opposition of several bishops; but the people of Antioch mutinied to keep him with them. The Eusebians applied to the Emperor, and charged Eustathius with maltreating the Emperor's mother and being the cause of the insurrection. Constantine, believing this information, banished Eustathius to Trajanopolis, in Thrace, where he died about 337. According to St. Jerome, this bishop was the first who wrote against Arianism. He was the author of many tracts and homilies, and of a treatise against Origen. The last is the only work of his extant.

Euthymius, Sr., the Archimandrite, was born at Melitene, in Armenia, in 377. He was at an early age placed under the care of Otreius, bishop of his native town, and on his ordination as presbyter he had charge of all the monasteries in the neighbourhood. At the age of twenty-nine he went to Jerusalem to visit the holy places, and settled for the next five years in a community of monks at Pharan, about six miles from Jerusalem. Here he formed a great friendship with a hermit named Theoctistus, and after a time they determined to live apart from the world in a cave in the wilderness. This they afterwards turned into a church, and built a monastery close by. A story is told of a wonderful cure effected by the prayers of Euthymius on Terebon, the son of Aspetebus, prince of the Saracens. In consequence of this the whole party became Christians. He was visited by Peter, Bishop of the Saracens, on his way to the Council of Ephesus in 431. Euthymius was very zealous in his defence of the orthodox faith against the Nestorians and Eutychians, and is said to have been instrumental in persuading the Empress Eudoxia to renounce Eutychianism. He died in 473, and received saintly honours in the East, which were also recognised in the Roman Calendar.

Eutropius.—A reader in the Church of Constantinople in St. Chrysostom's time. After the banishment of this Father the cathedral was set on fire, and Eutropius was tortured to make him confess that St. Chrysostom's clergy were concerned in this mischief; but he resolutely declared the ontry, and died under tortures of the most merciless barbarity.

Eutychians.—The followers of Eutyches, abbot and Presbyter of Constantinople in the fifth century. The first notice we have of im is that he left his cloister to raise his voice against Nestorius at the Council of Ephesus in 431. He fell into a fresh heresy himself concerning the nature of Christ, maintaining that one nature only existed in Christ, namely, that of the Incarnate Word, and pushed his argument so far as to annihilate the humanity of Christ. Domnus, his Patriarch of Antioch, is said to have accused Eutyches before the Emperor Theodosius II. of reviving the Apollinarian heresy. But little notice was taken of it till, in 448, the Synod of Constantinople, he was accused to Flavian, Patriarch of that city, by Bishop Eusebius of Dorylateum, in Phrygia alaturis. At first he haughtily refused to appear when summoned before the Synod; but after the third summons, and just as the bishops were about to proceed with him according to ecclesiastical law, as one who, by refusing to appear, had confessed that he was guilty, he presented himself; not alone, however, but accompanied by a large train of monks, soldiers, and notables of State, who would not part with him till the Synod gave him their consent that he should be permitted to return in safety to his cloister. Neander vol. iv., p. 207 thus speaks of his trial:—

Eutyches professed to be unwilling to hold anything except what he found expressly affirmed in the Holy Scriptures. He reverenced, he said, the sayings of the older church teachers; but they could not possess, in his view, the authority of a rule of faith; for they were not free from error, and they sometimes contradicted one another. To all questions proposed to him concerning Christ, he had always ready the same reply: 'I confess him to be my God, the Lord of heaven and earth; His essence I do not allow myself to comprehend.' Finally, on being pressed, he declared that he did indeed suppose there were two natures before the Incarnation, but that after it he could confess but one nature. By this, beyond all question, Eutyches intended to say, that which was meant by the adherents of the Alexandrian system of doctrine, that two natures should be distinguished in conception; ut in actual manifestation only the one nature of the Logos become flesh must be recognised. But, by his rude form of expression, he furnished occasion, it must be acknowledged, for many suspicions of heresy, to those who fastened only on the letter of the expression, as though he believed in a pre-existence of Christ's humanity, and the like. Furthermore, Eutyches was wont to call the body of Christ the body of God; and though he did not deny that Christ possessed a human body, yet it seemed to him derogatory to its dignity, as the body of God, to call it the same in essence with other human bodies. A certain mistaken and undefined feeling of reverence kept him from this. True, he would have found no difficulty in expressing himself precisely as the Synod required that he should, although he had never hitherto expressed himself thus; but yet he would not consent to condemn the opposite form of expression, which in truth appeared to him the better one. Since, then, he could not make up his mind to recognise the two natures in Christ, nor to join in the formula of condemnation, the Synod gave sentence against him that he should be divested of all his spiritual titles, and excommunicated from the Church." Eutyches, with the aid of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Dioscurus, and Chrysaphius, one of the most powerful men of the court, applied to the Emperor for a new trial. He declared that the proceedings against him were illegal, that his sentence of condemnation had been prepared even before his trial, and that many false statements had been made. The Emperor ordered a revision of the earlier proceedings, but Flavian would not be influenced in his judicial actions by fear of the Imperial power, and the revision only resulted in a confirmation of the sentence. Eutyches had said at the Synod of Constantinople that he would consent to profess his belief in the two natures of Christ, if the Bishops of Alexandria and Rome would also approve of it. He well knew the feeling of Dioscurus, and he trusted to be upheld by Leo the Great, from the manner in which the Bishop of Rome had espoused the cause of the monkish party in the contest with Nestorius. What he aimed at was an appeal to a General Council, to be attended by both the other Patriarchs. Flavian was desirous of preventing such a meeting, as he said that the doctrine of the Church was sufficiently decided against Eutyches. Leo also thought the council inadvisable, and proposed to be arbiter between the other parties; but the Emperor had already summoned the new council. It opened at Ephesus, 449; Dioscurus was named by the Emperor president of the council, and the judges of Eutyches—Flavian and Eusebius, for example—were to attend the Council, not as judges, nor even as voters, but to learn the decision of the council. Of course, Eutyches was reinstated, but the unorthodox proceedings of this council have caused it to be justly branded in Church history with the name of the Robber Synod. [Ephesus, Robber Council of.]

The sudden death of Theodosius II., in 450, changed the state of affairs; Marcian, who succeeded him, was orthodox. He convened a General Council to meet at Nice, in 451; 630 bishops had already assembled there, but some fanatical ecclesiastics, monks and laymen, probably belonging to the party of Dioscurus, created such a disturbance there that it was transferred to Chalcedon, where it was decided to draw up a profession of faith on the disputed question. Neander describes this council at length, and after speaking of the various controversies between the different branches of the Church says [vol. iv., p. 228]:—"The commissioners declared, though doubtless after many other things had transpired which have not been reported to us, 'Dioscurus had avowed it as his doctrine that Christ consists of two natures, but could not allow that two natures subsisted in Christ. Leo teaches that two natures are united without confusion, without change, and without separation, in one and the same Christ. With which of these two do you agree?' The bishops—who could hardly all of them have been the same as had opposed every change in the ancient creed—now exclaimed, 'We all have the same faith with Leo; whoever contradicts this faith is a Eutychian.' Upon this the commissioners suggested, that nothing more was needed than to receive into the creed that article from the letter of Leo. After this proposal had been generally received, they held with the select committee a secret meeting, in which the new symbol of faith was drawn up accordingly. In this it was defined that the one Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten, should be recognised in two natures, so that all confusion, change, and division of the natures is excluded. No one should be allowed to profess any other creed than this, to teach or to think otherwise."

Eutyches, who had already been banished by the Emperor, was condemned, and Dioscurus shared the same fate. Of the last days of Eutyches nothing is known. Eutychianism was afterwards merged in Monophysitism. [Monophysites.]

Eutychius, Sr., was born in Phrygia, about 512. His father, Alexander, was an officer in the guards under Justin I., a great favourite with that Emperor, and his successor, Justinian, and served under the celebrated Belisarius. The education of Eutychius was confided to his maternal grandfather, Hesychius, a man of remarkable sanctity as—some say, treasurer of the Church of Augustopolis, and, according to others, a bishop. He afterwards pursued his studies at Constantinople, and formed a design of becoming a monk, but was diverted from it by the Bishop of Amasea, Metropolitan of Pontus, who designed him to fill a vacant see in that province. With this view he received the tonsure, and at the age of thirty was ordained priest. But the Metropolitan changed his mind, and promoted another to the bishopric, so Eutychius was free to carry out his original wish, and he entered the monastery at Amasea. Here he lived for ten years in retirement, but, in 553, the Emperor Justinian had called a General Council to meet at Constantinople about the Three Chapters, i.e. three documents written by three different authors, which were suspected to contain or favour the errors of Nestorius. The Bishop of Amasea being ill, sent Eutychius to represent him at the council. Mennas, then Patriarch of Constantinople, received him at his own house, and is said to have predicted to his clergy that "that monk would be his successor." This proved true; Mennas died on Aug. 25th, 552, and Eutychius was proposed by the Emperor for the patriarchate. The council was opened in May 553, and Eutychius presided at it, for Pope Vigilius, although then at Constantinople did not think fit to appear at the synod. The Patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch were there with one hundred and forty-seven prelates of their jurisdictions. Eutychius opposed the errors in question, and clearly set forth the doctrine of the Catholic Church. The Three Chapters were condemned. Twelve years later, on his refusing to subscribe to the doctrine that the Body of Christ was incorruptible, he was deposed by order of Justinian, who had him arrested by a band of soldiers while celebrating the Holy Communion. They seized him and took him to a small monastery, called Choracudis, and the following day removed him to that of St. Osiris near Chalcedon. He was then tried by an assembly of bishops, and many ridiculous and trifling charges were brought forward. Sentence was pronounced against him, and he was banished to one of the islands in the Propontis and then removed to the monastery of Amasea. Here he remained for twelve years, and Eutychius, a priest of Constantinople, who was with him in his exile, and wrote his life records several miracles said to have been wrought by him. On the death of St. Scholasticus, who had been made Patriarch his room, the people demanded of Justin I. who had succeeded Justinian, that Eutychius should be reinstated in his dignity. He was recalled, and received with acclamation at Constantinople, Oct. 3rd, 577. He afterward fell into what was deemed heresy concerning the Resurrection. He affirmed that the body of men at the general Resurrection would "subtil and fine as air, and consequently palpable." St. Gregory argued the point with him in the presence of the Emperor Tiberius and the opinion being held erroneous, the Patriarch submitted to have his treatise the subject burnt. Shortly after this he died on Low Sunday, April 5th, 582, in the seventieth year of his age.
Evagrius, surnamed Scholasticus.—An ecclesiastical historian. He was born in 356, at Epiphania, in Cæle-Syria. He began his studies at a very early age, and became an advocate at the bar at Antioch. He gained the favour of Gregory, Bishop of Antioch, and accompanied him to Constantinople, and here successfully defended him against false accusations. Tiberius Constantinus made him a questor, and Mauricius Tiberius appointed him Master of the Rolls. But he is to be especially remembered for his Ecclesiastical History, a work in six books, giving an account of the period between the Council of Ephesus (431), and the year 594. It was intended as a continuation of the histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. It is an especially valuable work in relation to the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, and gives excellent accounts of the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. His writing is, however, in many places corrupted with fabulous narrations, the result of over-credulity of monkish legends. The exact date of his death is unknown.

Evangelical Party.—In the history of the Church of England, the party so called is directly traced to the influence of Whitfield and Wesley. The zeal of those great preachers and their followers, while it excited opposition among many of the clergy, communicated itself to some of the most eminent of the rest, who, without calling themselves Methodists, or accepting all the principles of that sect, yet largely drank of its spirit. They joined themselves with the old-fashioned Low Churchmen of the Tillotson and Burnet school, and after a sharp conflict with the Orthodox Church party, represented by such men as Secker and Horsley, gradually gained so high an influence in the Church that they may be said to have held a predominating position for many years. The four divines who stood in the forefront of the Evangelical ranks at the commencement were John Newton, Thomas Scott, Joseph Milner, and Henry Venn; whose respective positions are forcibly stated by Sir James Stephen thus:—"Newton held himself orthodox, and was celebrated by others, as the great living example of the regenerating efficacy of the principles of his school; Scott was the interpreter of Holy Scripture, Milner the ecclesiastical historian, Venn their systematic teacher of the whole Christian institutes. In some respects these men closely resembled each other. A certain sturdiness of character and independence of mind belonged to them all. They all possessed that free, flowing, and artificial style in which a full man pours out the mature results of his studies and meditations. Each of them was, to a considerable extent, self-educated. As soon as he had made good any position in theology, each of them was accustomed to retain it firmly as a post in advance, or basis for further conquests of the same kind." An account of each will be found under his name. We pass on to consider the disciples of these men, the carriers-on of their principles into the next generation. With the name of Newton will always be associated that of the poet Cowper, who, as the principal religious poet of his day, had a vast influence in shaping its religious sentiment, as Keble afterwards had when the High Church movement came. Richard Cecil, "the one clerical genius of his party," as Bishop Wilberforce called him, was appointed to his living in London the year after Newton became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth [1780]. If the latter spoke correctly, Cecil made the third Evangelical clergyman in London, for Newton declared on his appointment that himself and Romaine were the only two. But prominent among the second generation of the Evangelical fathers was a layman, "a man who, by paths till then untrodden, reached a social and political eminence never before attained by any man unaided by place, by party, or by the sword." Such is Sir James Stephen's eulogy upon William Wilberforce. [WILBERFORCE.] Born within a month of him, and surviving him for three years, Charles Simeon was the chief representative of the party at the moment when it had risen to its highest point of influence. Among their most prominent followers we may name Henry Martyn (one of the most heroic names which adorn the annals of the English Church), Josiah Pratt, Charles Bradley, Henry Melvill, and Archbishop Sumner.

By the beginning of the present century the Church was divided into two great parties, the old High Church, or Orthodox, and the Evangelical. The former were the more numerous, no doubt, but they were lifeless, conforming very carefully to the directions of the Book of Common Prayer, but resting their action, not upon the spiritual character of the Church, but upon the fact that it was "by law established." They disliked the Evangelicals because they were following new practices, using extempore prayers and preaching extempore sermons. Had the Church found no better defenders of her historic position than these, she might have sunk into the poorest Erastianism; for the Evangelical party did not possess either the historical learning or the historical enthusiasm needed to preserve it. At this critical period, however, two new influences arose, which profoundly modified the position of both. The one was a new band of independent thinkers, of which we cannot say that they owed their origin to any one leader. The greatest of them was Coleridge, but we have to place among them Whately, who was certainly no disciple of his. [WHATELY; BROAD CHURCH.] These writers were endeavouring to find room in the Church system for German divinity, and for the disciples of natural science, which had suddenly taken a great stride in the progress of knowledge. The other influence to which we have adverted, and the most powerful of all, was that represented by the Tracts for the Times, begun in 1833. Towards the Tract movement, before long, the Evangelical party placed itself in uncompromising antagonism, and many years passed before the Tractarians gained the ascendancy. Popular opinion was on the side of the Evangelicals, until it became evident that they had no answer to give to the great problems which scientific discovery and historical criticism brought to the front, and which clamoured for a solution. They could only bring piety of life in their hands. Their divinity had sunk into poor and unfruitful Calvinism, and was ready to die. The Tract writers pleaded antiquity and history, and claimed unity with the great past from the beginning. The literature of the other side was experimental, which in colder minds became Rationalism.

But though the Evangelical party, as a party, has almost ceased to be, that which was good and noble within it has probably never been more effective and powerful than now. The need of personal piety, the personal responsibility of each soul to God, the necessity of the work of Christ in the salvation of man, the power of the Spirit to sanctify; all these truths were brought to the front by the Evangelical clergy at a time when dry morality and mere expediency were the staple of pulpit teaching. Among those who so teach now, are men who also hold the need of the visible Church, of the Sacraments, of the ordained ministry; and who do not disdain the use of external symbols as suggestive of spiritual truths.

Taking a broader view of these questions, as presented hitherto in the history of the Anglican Church, it will be seen that Evangelicism was the embodiment of a pole in religious thought and feeling which has been represented in all communions, the history of Nonconformity presenting in different manner the same differences. So also in the Roman Church, the Jansenists of France are examples of Evangelical thought and feeling even under its severe limits; and in our own day, amongst English Nonconformists, Mr. Spurgeon is as widely apart from the late Mr. Baldwin Brown as Bishop Ryle of Liverpool from the late Rev. F. D. Maurice. Evangelicism is essentially the theology of the inner life of the individual soul. As such it must ever have a permanent place in all true religion; and whenever unduly ignored, or even thrust into the background, it may be expected, by the great law of reaction, sooner or later to reassert itself, perhaps at first in more or less extreme and narrow forms, as it is in the tendency of all systems based upon individual experience to do.

Evangelist.—One appointed to preach the Gospel of Christ. The early Evangelists were so called because they told in writing the history of our Lord's life and death, and from their time all others who studied these writings, and made it their business to teach their doctrines to others, have received the same name.

Evangelistarium.—A book containing the portions of the Gospels appointed by the Church to be read in the Communion Service.

Eve, or Even.—The evening or nigh before certain holy days of the Church. In former times religious services were held on these evenings. "These vigils, or watchings were originally nocturnal services held on the eve of a festival, not necessarily, but naturally and, in process of time, invariably a fast. The only day for which the Church has appointed a special service for an eve is Easter Even.

"The Table of Vigils is, of course, determined generally by the Table of Feasts; but it is to be noted that no fast was kept in the two great festal seasons from Christmas to Christmas, and from Easter to Whitsuntide. Hence, in the one season, there are no vigil to St. Stephen, St. John, and Innocents' Day the Circumcision, Epiphany, and Conversion of St. Paul; in the latter to St. Mark, St. Philip and St. James, and St. Barnabas. The feast of St. Michael and All Angels, as commemorating the bliss of heaven, has no vigil. The omission of the vigil of St. Luke's Day is probably accidental, in consequence of the occurrence, on the day preceding, of the well-known feast of St. Etheldreda" [Bishop Barry, Teacher's Prayer Book].

Evening Communion.—The practice of administering the Communion in the evening has always been more or less common amongst Nonconformist bodies, many of which observe the Lord's Supper in the morning an evening alternately. A similar practice we begun about fifty years ago in the Church of England. The intention was partly to express sympathy with other bodies, partly to give servants and mothers of families an opportunity which, it was alleged, the could not else obtain. The practice has been strenuously opposed by the High Church party, on the ground that it is contrary to the whole custom and spirit of the Catholic Church. And as to the second reason above quoted, it is answered, "Why such a necessity should exist in this country alone, is inexplicable. Our Continent neighbours, whether Catholic or Protestant find no demand for such a deferred Communion, though they are much stricter, enforcing a universal reception. In Scotland, not only do the Presbyterians find possible to give up a whole Sunday for Communion, but the Thursday and Saturday previous for preparation, and the Monday after for thanksgiving." It is further argu that such a habit encourages the proneness, too great, to deprecate the beginning of the Lord's Day, and that devotion would be increased if the earlier portion of it were given to the holiest purpose, whereas now there is danger of weariness, of perturbed spirit, and distraction of mind. The late Bishop Wilberforce spoke strongly against innovation, and Archbishop Tait also disapproved of it, and the practice is less frequent in the Anglican Church than it was a few years ago.

Evensong. — The same as Evening prayer, which is appointed to be sung at, and refers more especially to the Psalms and Canticles which are sung. It is synonymous with Vespers. The term Evensong occurs in the Prayer Book in the titles of Proper Lessons and Proper Psalms.

Evergreens. — The practice of decorating our churches and houses with evergreens at Christmas may be traced back to ancient times; it is a custom expressive of the glory and triumph of the Incarnate Son of God, of the everlasting freshness and verdure of the Church triumphant. Isaiah lx. 13 would seem to sanction the use: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of My sanctuary, and I will make the place of my feet glorious." Many of the old Christmas carols allude to the use of holly and bay at this season.

Evidences of Religion. — The old method of Christian apologists put miracles in the foreground, and looked upon internal evidence as auxiliary only. The more modern system relies chiefly on the character of Christianity itself, and the unique excellence of Christ, while miracles are regarded as appendages rather than as component parts of Revelation. Both sorts of proof, however, in the end support one another, and each adds what the other wants. Our Lord's exposition, that if men would not believe His words, at all events they should believe Him for His works' sake, is an appeal for evidence both to the doctrines He taught, and to the miracles He performed. In addition, it may be observed that miracles were the credentials of an Apostle, and that the Apostolic teaching was founded on facts, on miraculous acts, which were constantly attested as the basis of the doctrine delivered. All that can be done, however, on the present occasion, is to take a very cursory glance at the two methods of proof, or sorts of evidence — the external and the internal, as they have been called.

External evidence is what the first converts would chiefly rely upon, for while paganism grew gradually by tradition, Christianity came all at once with authority; and while the pagans believed their miracles because of their creed, Christians received their creed because of the miracles. Hence it seems that the external evidence afforded by miracles had preponderating weight with the earliest followers of the Christian religion.

Briefly, it may be stated here that the old pagans exhibited credulity; the first Christians, faith. Faith requires evidence; credulity dispenses with evidence. Faith often goes against natural inclination; credulity generally falls in with existing prepossessions. For instance, the Ephesian worshippers of Diana were credulous, when, for the sake of gain, they accepted as genuine "the image that fell down from Jupiter;" but a direct appeal was made to faith grounded on the evidence of miracles when our Lord said, "The works that I do in My Father's name, they bear witness of Me."

The real question seems to be, not whether miracles are incapable of proof because they are contrary to experience—for the experience of the race, as a whole, may be quite opposite to the experience of certain individuals that compose it—but as to the capacity and honesty of the witnesses who have borne their testimony to the miracles in question. On this latter point Paley, in his well-known work, has enlarged with emphasis and clearness, and has made out the case he undertook. But besides the honesty and capacity of the first witnesses of the miracles, the character and attendant circumstances of the miracles can be cited in proof of their reality, and, in consequence, of the truth of the religion they advocated. Now, these miracles were wrought in public, and in the presence of enemies; their actual occurrence was not denied at the time, but was attributed to the exercise of magic or the influence of demons, which was a charge that in its very nature proved their veritable performance. The unique character, also, of the miracles has to be taken into account. They were not tentative; no failures are recorded; they appealed directly to the senses, and left no room for doubt; their object, too, was always moral or beneficent; the means, too, employed in each case, if unusual in their selection, were instantaneous in their operation, and the results have been lasting. In this respect ancient miracles occupy quite another position from modern miracles, which begin and end in themselves; which teach us nothing, which effect nothing, and pass away like smoke along with the aimless curiosity they satisfy.

If it be asked, on the other hand, why, since our Lord's miracles were of such a character, the Jews, who witnessed them, did not at once acknowledge Him, two reasons may be given — first, our Lord's mean appearance and unambitious programme disappointed their carnal expectations; and, next, the evidence they had was in some respects inferior to the evidence we possess, who have seen the fulfilment of prophecy in the wide establishment of Christianity. It is true, indeed, that they saw some very remarkable details of ancient prophecy fulfilled in Christ's own Person; but, as it has been said already, their eyes were blinded by their prejudices.

To suppose that Christianity, being such as it is—overturning as it did the national hopes of the Jews, running counter as it does to the natural inclinations of mankind—could have been propagated without miracles, by mere peasants, like its Founder and first preachers, is much more difficult of belief than to suppose that Christ employed miracles in proof of His divine claims, and gave specimens in His own Person of the superhuman power He possessed. Of the two difficulties, it is most philosophical to prefer the least.

A word may be introduced here on the Lord's Resurrection, a fact unique in itself, inasmuch as He alone rose from the grave, to die no more; and also a fundamental fact, as the historical basis on which the Apostles relied, and Christianity itself rested. The evidence, therefore, that proves the reality of the fact, proves also the truth of the religion it supports.

Now, the unanimous testimony borne by the Apostles to the Resurrection of their Lord was either an imposture or a delusion. If it was an imposture, they knowingly propagated a falsehood, to their own hurt, and without any adequate motive. Again, had they hidden the Lord's body, the task would have been perilous, and discovery ruinous. Moreover, had the whole story been a fiction, how could it have caused such a sudden and complete revolution, as it did, in the character and conduct of those who were consciously guilty of the deception practised? The change from despair to joy, from timidity to boldness, is easily and naturally accounted for on the supposition of Christ's Resurrection and their own persuasion of the fact, but is altogether unlikely, had they started on a career of hypocrisy with a gigantic lie upon their lips.

If, on the other hand, the Apostles' belief in their Lord's Resurrection was a delusion, how was it that the risen Saviour showed Himself to those especially who were most familiar with His Person, and therefore the best judges of His identity? How was it, again, that He was visible at various places and times, and to a considerable number of persons? A few might be deceived, but not the many. How came it about also that after His visible Ascension all such appearances of His Person ceased on earth altogether, which was but natural, if His previous Resurrection had been a reality? So far, again, from the disciples being easily credulous, it is expressly recorded that they considered the first news of the Resurrection of their Lord as idle tales—a piece of behaviour that gives to their after testimony all the greater weight.

As for what is called "the vision theory," by which mental impressions were received for actual occurrences, it would make the Lord a deceiver, and His followers foolish, a supposition altogether out of harmony with what is known elsewhere both of His character and their conduct.

Our Lord's Resurrection, therefore, was neither an imposture nor a delusion, but a fact; a fact unique in itself, potent in its influences, a visible proof of the truth of His Divine claims, and a grand moving cause, of which, from that time to the present hour, the Christian religion is the world-wide result.

On the whole, then, it may be concluded that the old method of resting on the external evidence afforded by miracles to the truth of Christianity, as a main support, accords well with the claims to belief put forth by the Lord and His Apostles, and with the character and circumstances of the miracles themselves.

When what are called the internal evidences are examined, only a bird's-eye view can be taken of them here. One thing, however, may be stated at starting: Though the human mind cannot decide what ought to come from God, or not, it may inquire whether the Christian religion in itself is like what I would expect God to give, or man to invent. For instance, it may ask such questions as these: Was the religion of Christ such as Jew would have invented for his own purposes, when it contradicted the national hope altogether, and supplanted the Mosaic ritual and law by another system and code the called the national pride to the quick? Has our Lord, again, been a mere impostor, holding out inducements to gather followers round him, would He have so plainly stated that the result of adhesion to His cause would not be success and worldly prosperity, but on the contrary, persecution, ridicule, an death? Where, too, on the same supposition, would He discover that unique morality, extending to the motives as well as the conduct, which shone in His own example, as was re-echoed in the teaching of His Apostles. Why, too, if He was an impostor only, did He tell a lie to inculcate truths of the severe and highest kind?

Besides these questions and their inevitable answers, the style of the New Testament especially of the Four Gospels, is a phenomenon fact that demands explanation. How can it about that four men, some of them unlearned men, should have been found in or and the same country, and that country Palestine, which was not conspicuous for its art or culture; and not only so, but should have been found at one and the same period in the world history, writing on the same subject, the life of one extraordinary man; and yet have done so in such an artless manner, so free from ostentation, so realistic in its brief biographic touches, as to produce an effect never equalled among men? All this, taken together, looks as if the coincidence in question was not the unaided work of chance, but the effect of Divine superintendence of some sort. Should it be objected, however, that the Cane...
the New Testament is still an open question, and that the genuineness and authenticity of the Four Gospels may be disputed, it is sufficient for present purposes to reply that there abundant evidence that these books were known by the end of the second century as having come down from the times of the Apostles.

Nor can the case of the Jews be altogether fit without notice in speaking of the proofs of the Christian religion. Their rejection of Christ and their rejection by Christ; the fall of their city and the destruction of their temple and its worship, especially the cessation of sacrifices to this day; their consequent disjuncture, and preservation in dispersion; all these were beyond human foresight, yet were distinctly foretold, and have also visibly come to pass; and they form together a living and sensible proof of the truth of that Revelation not predicted their occurrence.

Sometimes an objection is advanced on the core of the slow progress Christianity has made. Such slowness only shows the great-ness of the obstacles in human nature to be overcome, and therefore indirectly proves that the religion was not invented by man.

Finally, the relationship between modern science and Revelation has been a prolific source of objection. But their provinces are totally distinct. The aim of Revelation is moral and religious, and when it speaks of nature, its language is popular, not scientific.

To make it the last, is to "multiply essentials," a practice which Baxter says is "the same of the Church." The true question seems to be, not whether Science and Scripture are in hopeless contradiction, but rather this is this: what Scripture really means, and what Science truly knows. The "Reign of Law" has not destroyed one essential doctrine of the Christian faith.

Evolution.—The theory called by this name is that which professes to indicate the process by which the universe and its inhabitants have arrived at their present condition.

1. Physical Evolution. We know as a matter of fact that every living being comes from a particle of matter in which no trace of the adult form is discernible. This particle of matter is known to biologists as the germ. This germ is developed according to certain fixed laws until it assumes the completed distinctive character. This is the evolution of the individual. The observations brought to bear by students of nature upon evolution, the facilities for new discoveries afforded by the microscope, and other helps formerly unknown, led to a further generalisation, namely, that "all kinds of animals may have come into existence by the growth and modification of primordial germs." One of the first writers to formulate this theory was Descartes, who laid it down that the physical universe is a mechanism, and as such explicable on physical principles. But this was more of a guess than the result of inductive reasoning; the arguments on which the theory rests have been stated by subsequent writers, who have demonstrated the gradations of structure from the simplest to the most highly organised creatures, presenting close analogies among groups, some of the most widely different habits. The organs which are found complete in one class are found to exist in others, but in the most rudimentary and apparently useless condition, and seem to have been developed by the conditions and circumstances of the creature. The theory of development through the continuous action of natural causes was applied to the Solar System and the earth by Kant and Laplace, then to the crust of the earth by Sir Charles Lyell. The wonderful geological discoveries of later times brought forth into light the evidence that existing plants and animals are formed with differences upon the model of extinct kinds, and lead to the probability that the later have been developed from the extinct, and hence the further probability that the extinct races of animals have been evolved from a yet earlier group of ancestors, simpler as they recede into the past. So far the case was stated by Lamarck, by Goethe, by Erasmus Darwin, by St. Hilaire—the doctrine of descent, but not the process by which the changes were wrought. Facts were brought forward, and marshalled with skill and convincing power, but the causes were still in great measure hidden. The theory of Law was set forth and elaborated with wonderful skill and patience by Charles Darwin, who died in 1882 at the age of seventy-three. In his Origin of Species, published in 1859, we have a Theory of Evolution, which professes to account for the facts which previous scientists had adduced. He observed how breeders produced new forms of pigeons, cattle, vegetables, most widely different from the original form; that they do so by making use of the natural occurrence of variations, and of the hereditary transmission of variations. A pigeon breeder wants to intensify some particular characteristic of a bird: he selects those birds which have this characteristic in a slight degree, and allows only these selected specimens to breed, and in the course of long time, by watchfulness and patience, he produces the greatest possible variation from the original parent germ. The horticulturist does the same with flowers. This being so, the question arises, is there any agency in Nature which thus takes the place of the breeder, and persistently selects favoured varieties for breeding whilst destroying the others? His answer to this question was, There is such an agency, and it is the struggle for existence, or competition for food and for place. If all elephants that were born survived, a single pair in 750 years would have 19,000,000 of progeny living.
annual plant produced two seeds a year, and these all survived to reproduce, in twenty years that single plant would have a progeny of a million. Hence the conclusion that as all which are born do not survive, only the varieties best suited do so, and the rest perish. This Spencer called the survival of the fittest, and the theory is known as "The Theory of Natural Selection." Of course such a growth and development required vast ages to complete itself. But the slow process thus indicated had been already shown to be also needful to explain geological facts.

A vast number of questions gathered round this theory, and many difficulties, of which Mr. Darwin himself lived to solve, some of which still remain for his followers to attempt. Thus, the strange shapes and colours of flowers, and the formation of honey by plants, were shown by him to be the result of insect fertilisation; the shape of the pitcher plants, of the carnivorous habit of the plants; the rudimentary and apparently useless organs of some plants and animals, he explained to be the survival of structures inherited from ancestors to whom they were useful, though now, through want of being needed, they have dwindled away. It followed as a consequence that living plants and animals have reached their present position on the earth's surface by natural means of transport—flying, walking, swimming. They were not specially created each for their several elements; natural causes brought the Polar bear to the Arctic Ocean and the tapir to Brazil.

As regards the truth or otherwise of the theory thus briefly sketched, so far as it has been tested it agrees with facts, and probably this is all that can be said with absolute confidence. The writer of these lines asked a very eminent geologist, "Is Evolution absolutely proved?" The reply was, "That would be going too far; but we may say that it is extremely probable. And I do not think we have got at the whole truth yet. There are probably other agencies to be discovered, and other facts yet to come out, of which as yet we know nothing." Mr. Darwin's first work rested the whole process upon Natural Selection; but he himself, in his later writings, acknowledged that this factor was insufficient to account for many of the known phenomena, and that the prominence he had given to it was "probably the greatest oversight" to be detected in his works. He latterly largely supplemented this factor by that of Sexual Selection, or the preference by either sex of a certain type in the other; and it is probable this has largely acted. Professor J. D. Dana attributes much to "Cephalization," or the growth of brain-power and co-ordination of structure therewith; and Mr. St. George Mivart, with most other naturalists, believes that we have yet to learn much of the laws which really have operated. Both this eminent naturalist, Professor Asa Gray (the first botanist of America), Professor J. D. Dana (one of the first amongst geologists), and many others, hold that there is sufficient evidence of the operation of a co-ordinating Intelligence, guiding development along what Gray terms "beneficial lines." At times Mr. Darwin himself seems to have been impressed by the probability of this, whilst at others he expressed different views.

It is obvious at the outset that nothing in the doctrine of Evolution is necessarily in conflict with the first article of the Christian creed, that "God the Father Almighty is the Maker of heaven and earth." Christian men, holding this as a certain; which nothing can shake, are not in collision with any theory as to the method which the Creator pursued. This is obvious; but it can further be shown how the theory even harmonises with the Christian belief in the unity of God, and of His purpose and will. (See the Charges of the Bishops of Durham and Carlisle bearing on this subject.) I may further be said, and has been said, the the narrative in Genesis is on its very face a narrative of Evolution, since it presents a account of the world and its inhabitants being formed, not only by continuous stages, but by orderly and progressive stages. This has been seen and admitted by such an anthropologist as Haeckel; while, on the other hand, the 90th Psalm, ascribed for centuries to "Moses, the man of God," evidently attributes to these stages vast periods of time. At most, the Creation narrative is only concerned with the broad order of events narrated; and concerning this point, whether or not it be insisted upon, it is noteworthy that Professor J. D. Dana, who since the death of Sir Charles Lyell stands in the very front rank of geological authorities, has found nothing as yet to shake his acceptance of the most profound "agreement" in all essential matters between Genesis and the rocks; the strata. Mr. Darwin's theory does explain the beginning of things, nor the existence of any powers of modification, on their growth when once started on the course. As to the_whence, and as to the final Object and Aim, science has nothing to tell. The beginning and the end remain—a mystery.

But what shall we say concerning the orig of Man? The theory of Evolution goes on account for the origin of man as a continuous development from the most complete form of ape. "There is a greater difference between the lowest form of monkey and a gorilla, than there is between a gorilla and the lowest ord of savage man," says a prominent follower Mr. Darwin. That this part of the theory came into conflict with the received conviction of religious persons cannot be questioned. And concerning this portion of the question we must speak with peculiar caution, simi as science does not speak with certainty, there are facts which many biologists hold to be a clear line is drawn between the best form of beast and man; that there is soul and spirit in man, to which there is a hint correspondent in any other creature.

Wallace, who shares with Mr. Darwin honour of discovering the law of Natural action, believes that the body of man was lived by ordinary natural laws, but that spiritual nature was imparted by a special line act, and this view is adopted in the by so devout a Catholic as Mr. St. George Mivart, as well as by Professor Dana. He has even been pointed out that the words Genesis which, rightly or wrongly, have held to imply direct Divine action are fixed to man's spiritual nature, the lower being used concerning his body (e.g., deity "created man in His own image;" "the God formed man of the dust of the and "). It has been yet further pointed that when all the occasions for which word "bara" is employed, or other phrases "the Spirit of God moved "), implying or direct Divine action are col- and examined, such phrases are found to be confined to [1] the origin of matter; [2] the origin of motion, or energy; [3] the life of mind; and [4] the origin of the soul man. These are precisely the four points each science at present confesses inability to decide over. The coincidence is strangely sufficient, while it seems to leave all other as of the narrative, if required, for the invention of secondary methods, which in not w. cases, indeed, the phraseology ("let the h bring forth ") seems to imply. Without ever, laying stress on these points, and aiming ourselves to a more general view, following words of Bishop Temple furnish sufficient answer to any who would attack Book of Genesis on the ground that its elements are in conflict with modern science.

Examining the first chapter of Genesis discover its purpose, and adding from the grounds the probabilities that the or intended to use symbols in speaking in the week, he goes on thus concerning the tion of man: — "When the writer of Genesis passes from creation in general to a in particular, it is still clear that he has mission to tell those to whom he was gong by what processes man was formed, how long these processes lasted. This as alien from his purpose as it would appeared to tell what every physiologist new of the processes by which every animal man is developed from a small to a breathing and living infant. He his men—and he could not but take men—sees them, with their sinful nature, with moral and spiritual capacity, with theirions of sex, with their relations of family.

has to teach the essential supremacy of among creatures, the subordination in position but equality in nature of woman to man, the original declension of man's will from the Divine path, the dim and distant but sure hope of man's restoration. These are not and cannot be lessons of science. They are worked out into the allegory of the Garden of Eden, but in this allegory there is nothing whatever which crosses the path of science, nor is it for reasons of science that so many great Christian thinkers from the earliest age of the Church downwards have pronounced it an allegory. The spiritual truth contained in it is certainly the purpose for which it is told; and evolution, such as science has rendered probable, has done its work in forming man such as he is before the narrative begins. It may be said that it seems inconsistent with the dignity of man's nature as described in the Bible, to believe that his formation was effected by any process of evolution, still more by any such process of evolution as would represent him to have been an animal before he became a man. But in the first place it is to be observed that science does not yet assert, and there is no reason to believe that it ever will assert, that man became a fully developed animal with the brute instincts and inclinations, appetites and passions, fully formed in animals, such as we see other animals now, before he passed on into a man, such as man is now. His body may have been developed according to the theory of evolution, yet along a parallel but independent line of its own; but at any rate it branched off from other animals at a very early point in the descent of animal life. And further, as science cannot yet assert that life was not introduced into the world when made habitable by a direct creative act, so, too, science cannot yet assert, and it is tolerably certain will never assert, that the higher and added life, the spiritual faculty which is man's character-istic prerogative, was not given to man by a direct creative act as soon as the body which was to be the seat and the instrument of that spiritual faculty had been sufficiently de-veloped to receive it. That the body should have been first prepared, and that when it was prepared the soul should either have been then given or then first made to live in the image of God—this is a supposition which is inconsistent neither with what the Bible tells nor with what science has up to this time proved" [Bampton Lectures, pp. 184-6].

2. Mental and Religious Evolution. The theory of physical life which we have been considering has been applied by analogy to the growth both of mental and religious pheno-menon. Mr. G. J. Romanes, in his Mental Evolution in Animals, gathers together a great number of facts by way of finding a physical basis of mind, and traces mental growth from consciousness, through the gradations of sensation, pleasure and pain, memory, association of ideas, perception, imagination, lower and higher instinct, to reason. But he expressly leaves the question alone "whether there is any distinction in kind between the whole mental organisation of an animal and the whole mental organisation of a man."

Mr. Herbert Spencer, in his Ecclesiastical Institutions, applies the evolution theory to religion, accounting for all religious belief as generated in men by evolution from early feelings of superstitions awe, leading in the first place to fetish worship. Professor Max Müller has shown, however, that if there be anything demonstrable in the history of religion, it appears to be that fetishism is a later and degraded phase of religious history wherever it can be traced. Professor Huxley [in the Nineteenth Century, March and April, 1886] takes a view similar to Mr. Spencer's of the "Evolution of Theology," urging that in the days of Samuel (as he dates those days) the religious views of the Jews were the same as held at the same time in other countries. This can, however, only be maintained by making vast assumptions, by simply ignoring the moral tone and character of the vast bulk of the narrative, and by fastening attention upon a few isolated fragments. On the other hand, that Revelation was itself progressive, and adapted to the then age of the world, no intelligent Christian doubts; and this is indeed stated in Scripture, and implied in the very advent of Christ at, and not until, the "fullness of time." As has been truly said, the Bible is very largely the "history of a Revelation," and while this may possibly have been given and continued in conformity with some general law, for all we can tell, the fact has to be accounted for that the teaching of this particular line of Revelation alone (supposing there to have been others) has always been in marked advance of contemporary human thought as interpreted by history.

The same system has been applied to morals, and it has been widely taught that marriage, for instance, slowly emerged from mere promiscuous intercourse, followed next by polyandry, and only finally by polygamy and true unions. It seems overlooked that such a history implies a moral "Fall" far beyond any recorded in Genesis, since many even of the lower animals, as well as the anthropoid apes, have risen far above the degradation here implied, which rests for proof solely upon the doubtful meaning of certain ancient customs and terms.

Ewald, Georg Heinrich August von [1803-1875]. He was born at Göttingen, the son of a linen-weaver; at the age of seventeen he entered the University of his native place, where Elchhorn was then teaching. In 1823 he became a teacher in the Wolfenbüttel Gymnasium, and in 1827 was made Professor of Philosophy at Göttingen, and in 1835 Professor of Oriental languages. On Dec. 12th, 1837, he was dismissed from his post on account of having signed, with six of his colleagues, a protest against the abolition of Constitutional law and liberty in Hanover, by the new Sovereign, Ernest Augustus. He then visited England, and was called in 1838 be Theological Professor at Tübingen; he remained for ten years, during which time he had many quarrels with his colleague, and in 1848 he returned to Göttingen, where he remained till 1866, when his strong political feelings, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the King of Prussia, caused him once more to lose his post. He was most indefatigable lecturer and author. Only did he lecture at Tübingen and Göttingen, on Jewish and Arabic literature, also Persian, Syriac, Coptic, and Sanskrit. His authorship commenced as early as 1824 when he wrote a work on the composition of Genesis. Among his most important works are a Critical Grammar of Hebrew, a work on Judaism, a Commentary on the Apocalypse, a Poetical Books of the Old Testament; Prophecy of the Old Testament. His most celebrated work was published between 1843 and 1875 in seven volumes, History of the People of Israel until the Time of Christ, Antiquities of People of Israel, History of Christ and Time, and History of the Apostolic Age, also published many volumes of Biblical criticism. It is difficult to say what clergy and theologians he belongs to, as he always precated being classed with any. He is, however, specially distinguished for his love for the concrete forms of Divine truth, in opposition to the abstraction of over-spectacle minds.

Ewing, Alexander, Bishop of Argyll and a divine of considerable influence in the 18th century, was born on March 25th, 1811 at Aberdeen, where his father practised law. Both parents died soon after birth, and he was brought up by his uncle, who had him educated at Aberdeen and University of Edinburgh. He married and then went abroad for the sake of health, which was never strong, and prevented his taking orders till 1838 when his strong repulsion to Calvinism led him to the Episcopal Church in preference to the Presbyterian. The doctrinal Election, which he called "Calvinist trine of favouritism," was so offensive to him, that he was never weary of repeating the phrase from the Church of England chiasm, "Christ has redeemed me at mankind." He first ministered at an Episcopal Church in Forres, and in 1842 was elected to the Bishopric of Argyll. It was a very tall, thin man, with a striking face, wonderfully bright and manner, in the early part of his episcopate with long black locks, which at the ex
some silvery white; and the black skull with which they were covered gave him aspect like that of the divines of Baxter's
s. He had the keenest sense of humour, whichasuencedot,him in his manner of telling anecdote; and, as is not uncommon with suchgifts, had a keen and most sensi tivespirituality, and was a constant student of Iocal, Fénelon, and Madame Guyon, with all whom he had the closest sympathy. To seegiftsmust be added an excellent mutalet, and considerable artistic and ticalpower. His theological position will best understood when we say that ling was a disciple of Macleod Campbell, Thomas Erskine of Linlathen, who, not ent with the usual Scottish conception
God as the Sovereign of the universe, that this conception, begotten at a period tumult and confusion, when those who read the Scottish political chronicle most of all idea of a Supreme Governor, required
the supplemented, if not superseded, by th in Him as the Father of mankind.
Corynly it was this doctrine which Ewing ale it his business to preach in his new ese. It was a difficult task that he had love him—to take charge of a wide area in-bited chiefly by Presbyterians; there were, over, a fair number of Episcopalians in west and north of Argyllshire, and in wild districts about Glencoe. To these he devoted himself with untiring energy,
cept when ill-health obliged him to travel Southern Europe, an event of frequent occurrence. At such times he devoted himself writing theological pamphlets, and to correspondence with many eminent men at he and abroad. The late Archbishop Mr. Maurice were among his most imate friends; and the present writer has can met them at the Archbishop's, who had ep affection for him, and delighted in his versation. Among his most characteristic tological works must be reckoned the Pre-Day Papers, a collection of essays which ited, and of which he wrote several. A trovery on the doctrine of the Eucharist, ich arose in the Episcopal Church, known
he Cheyne case, and which in its day prod great excitement, resulted in an ecclesi-cal trial, at which Bishop Ewing presided;
though his opinion was entirely against
"high" view of Mr. Cheyne, he declined vote for sentence against him, believing such would be only a form of religious secution. In the controversy which arose
the publication of the Essays and Reviews, at which treated chiefly of inspiration and r punishment, Ewing took a conspicuous and, in so doing gave offence to many of fellow bishops, as he did also by express-his opinion that the Athanasian Creed was unintelligible to the great majority of congregations as are "the special legal cessions in a title-deed, or the terms in a physician's prescription," and that it ought to be "consigned to the charter chest as an old and curious heirloom." It is not to be wondered at that some of his brethren partially ostracised him, so that he eagerly sought opportunities of friendly relations with the Presbyterians. There is a glowing account of him, his catholicity of spirit, and carelessness of piety, in Dean Stanley's Lettures on the Church of Scotland. His life, for the reasons we have given, was, though a happy, yet a lonely one. He was often seen in his private chapel, buried in silent thought and prayer. One of his last addresses to his synod was described by a hearer as "a voice crying in the wilderness." His life had many personal sorrows, but he did not lose his cheerfulness, not even when bowed down with bodily pain. He frequently expressed the hope that his name might not be forgotten in Argyllshire, a touching sign of the love which he felt for his scattered flock.
He died in 1873, surviving his friend
Erskine by three years, and Macleod Campbell but one. An admirable biography has been written of him by his friend Dr. Ross.

Ex cathedrâ.—Lat. Ex, "from"; Gr. Katathedra, "a chair." A phrase used in speaking of authoritative decisions on matters of faith, or other matters, given by prelates in their official capacity. The Pope is held to be infallible when he gives his opinion "ex cathe-drâ" concerning any doctrine to be believed by the whole Church of Rome.

Excommunication was in use among the heathens and Jews, as well as in the Christian Church. Among the Greeks and Romans the excommunicated were forbidden to be present at the sacrifices, and consigned to evil spirits with imprecations. But this was regarded as so terrible that it was seldom pronounced. Cæsar tells us that this was the severest punishment among the Gauls.
Speaking of the authority of the Druids, he acquaints us, "That when anyone refuses to stand to their award, they bar him the privilege of being present at their religious ceremonies. Those who are thus thunderstruck are looked on as wicked and scandalous wretches; everybody shuns their company. If they have any occasion to commence a suit, they are not allowed the benefit of a court of justice. They are never admitted to posts of profit or honour; and all this infamy and disregard continues for life, and passes on their memory." When the excommunicated person repented, and desired forgiveness of the gods, he applied to the priests to be restored, and then, one of that order having first examined the case and found the delinquent sincere, restored him to his former condition of privilege. And when the excommunicated person happened to die unrestored,
the priests offered a sacrifice to the Dii Masæ, praying them not to use his soul roughly when he came amongst them.

In the Jewish Church excommunication was threefold in character:—[1] The casting-out of the synagogue for thirty days; [2] the “delivery to Satan”—a severer sentence than the former, being pronounced in the face of the whole congregation, and the minatory sentences of the Law read; [3] the Maranatha (i.e. “the Lord will come”), in which the person excommunicated was threatened with the Divine vengeance. The Samaritans were thus excommunicated. Traces of these forms may be seen in the language of the New Testament [1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. xvi. 22], and those passages will guide us in understanding the purpose of the Church in exercising this solemn function. It was partly remedial, that the souls of the offenders “might be saved in the day of the Lord” (Church of England Commination Service); partly for the warning of other offenders. In some cases those who were “put to open penance” were excluded from Communion for a time; in the case of apostates and impenitent sinners they were cut off from the Church altogether.

Canonists make two sorts of excommunication, the greater and the lesser. The greater excludes altogether from communion, disqualifies clergy from administering or receiving the sacraments, or performing any ecclesiastical functions whatever. The lesser deprives of receiving the Communion, but not from attending worship. Besides excommunication, the canonists mention two other kinds of censure, Suspension and the Interdict. Suspension bars an ecclesiastical person from the exercise of his office, and sometimes from the profit of his benefice; and that either for a set term or indefinitely. An Interdict is a censure which prohibits a Church the use of the sacraments, divine service, and Christian burial. Lastly, the canonists make several sorts of immoralsities or impediments, which either disable persons from receiving holy orders, or exercising them when they have them.

The warrantable grounds for excommunication may be ranged under three heads—Heterodoxy, Immorality, and Disobedience; and according to the maxims and practice of the ancient Church, prelates should be very cautious and backward in launching their excommunications, and not do it without necessity and regret. In the first ages of the Church the spiritual sword was never drawn but upon spiritual occasions. But later Coun- cils have excommunicated those who seize on the estates of the Church; and afterwards this censure has been discharged to force people to a discovery of their knowledge of private injuries. This, called a monitory, was frequently practised in the Middle Ages. It will thus be seen that the main effect of excommunication was to exclude offenders from Christian society, to deprive them of the benefits of divine services and the sacraments, and all other privileges of Church communion. An excommunicated person is looked upon as no better than a pagan, or publican, as the Scripture speaks; but then this censure does not make a man incur any civil forfeiture. Whatever belongs to him as a man, a citizen, a father, a husband, or a king, by the law of nature, of nations, or the Constitution of his country; whatever belongs to him upon the score of any capacity or qualification with reference to these things, remains untouched. However, the Apostles exhorted the faithful to break off correspondence with persons excommunicated, to avoid their company, neither “receive them into their houses, nor bid them God speed” [2 John 10]. But early interpreters interpreted the prohibition as extending only beyond necessary duties, as excluding familiarity but not charity. Thus (I use a verse of the canonists),

i.e. it forbade conversation, prayer, salutation, eating, but it allowed intercourse between husband and wife, parent and children, masters and servants.

The power by which popes have pretend to deprive kings by virtue of an excommunication was unknown in early times, and was first claimed with disastrous consequences from Gregory VII. It came to pass in course of time that a man dying excommunicate was refused burial in a consecrated place, and none of the clergy prayed for his soul. It has bee the case that men have been excommunicate after their deaths. This was done by razr their names from the list of those who we commemorated at the Eucharist.

Exedra.—The general name of such buildings as were distinct from the main body of the churches, and yet within the bounds of the Church taken in its largest sense. Th Eusebius, speaking of the church of Paulin of Tyre, says, “When the curious artist finished his famous structure within, he the set himself about the exedra, or buildings joined one to another by the sides of the church.” Also he speaks of them in conjunction with aei, rooms for conversation, “he provided spacious exedra and aei on e- side, united and attached to the royal fabr and communicating with the entrance to the middle of the temple.” Among the exedra the chief was the baptistery, or place of baptism. Also the two vestries, or sacristies as we should call them, still found in Oriental churches; viz., the Diaconicum, where in the sacred utensils, etc., were kept; and the Prothesis, where the side-table stood, of which the elements before consecration we placed [Jebb].
Exemption.—A privilege granted to some churches or monasteries, whereby they are free from the jurisdiction of the bishop whose dioceses they are situated. While dispensation frees persons from the operation of a certain law, exemption frees them from the authority of certain persons. Religious houses thus exempt from the rule of the bishop were responsible to the Pope alone.

Exeter.—Until the year 703 the southern part of England from Kent to the borders of Cornwall was under the Bishops of Wessex, but in that year it was divided into two, and the See of the western half was fixed at Sherborne. Two hundred years later it was necessary, owing to the large increase of converts, to make further subdivisions, and Cornwall and Devonshire became two separate dioceses. The See of Cornwall was first fixed at Bodmin, and then at St. Germans; the See of Devonshire was fixed at Crediton, Aidulf being its first bishop. There were nine bishops of Crediton, and Leofric, the last of them, moved to Exeter, and the See of St. Germans was united to it by order of Edward the Conqueror, who himself was present at the ceremony of installation in 1050, at St. Peter’s Abbey Church, which had been chosen for the cathedral. The Sees of Cornwall and Devonshire remained united until 1877, when the See of Truro was founded.

The Church of St. Peter was founded in 62, for the Benedictine monks; but the monastery had suffered much from the Danes and the tenth and eleventh centuries. Leofric said to have been a great benefactor his cathedral, but of this Saxon church, which occupied part of the site of the present cathedral, no vestige remains. The bronio of the Church of Exeter assigns William Wavelwast, a nephew of the Conqueror, who became bishop in 1107, the honour of rebuilding the cathedral. Of that structure we have remaining the north and south towers, forming the transepts of the present church, and some traces in the apses of St. Andrew and St. James, and the south-east door leading into the chapter-house. Wavelwast laid the foundation in 12, but it was not completed till 1206, in the episcopacy of Marshall. Six bishops occupied this cathedral, and during the siege of Exeter by King Stephen, in 1136, it was much damaged.

Bishop Bruere built the chapter-house in the thirteenth century. To him are attributed the misericors, probably the oldest in the kingdom. Bishop Peter Quirinus (1280) began the transformation of the main cathedral to the Decorated style, and was finished in the last year of Bishop Andisson (1369), leaving it, except in a few details, much as it stands at present. 1859 the nave was fitted for public use, and in 1870 a complete restoration was commenced under the care of Sir Gilbert Scott. The income of the See is £4,200. The cathedral chapter consists of the dean, four canons residential, three archdeacons, twenty-four prebendaries, and four priests vicars.

Exhortation.—An address made to move people to the due performance of their duty. There are several of these in the Church Service, but the one which begins Morning and Evening Prayer, "Dearly beloved brethren, the Scripture moveth us in sundry places," is by way of pre-eminence called The Exhortation. It grasps the whole idea of worship—[1] thanksgiving and praise, [2] hearing God’s Word, [3] prayer as preparatory to the Confession of sin and the Absolution. Other exhortations occur in most of the principal services of the Church.

Exorcists.—The second in rank of the lesser Orders of the Church, whose business it was to exorcise or cast out the evil spirits from persons possessed, i.e. demons. In the Apostolic age the power of exorcising was a miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost given to many Christians; but for the first three centuries the bishops and presbyters were the usual exorcists. When this miraculous gift was withdrawn from the Church, then the special office of exorcists was instituted. The Greek Church does not reckon them as an ecclesiastical Order at all. In the Latin Church they are mentioned in the Canons of Antioch [341] as one of the lesser Orders; they stand next to the acolythi, or servers: the ceremonies of their ordination are inserted in the ancient rituals. They received a book of exorcisms from the bishop, who pronounced these words:—"Take this book and get it by heart, and have authority to lay hands upon catechumens and baptised persons possessed." This form was concluded with a particular benediction upon the exorcist. The Jews had their exorcists (many of them impostors), as we may learn from the Gospels, from the Acts, and Josephus. Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho, charges the Jews with superstitious practices in their 'exorcisms,' and that they made use of perfumes and ligatures like the heathen. Hence we may conclude that exorcising was practised among the heathen; and Lucian bears witness that such was the case. In one sense every man is his own exorcist, in that, by his prayers, he may resist and drive away evil spirits.

Expectation Week.—The week before Whitsuntide, so called in memory of the Apostles' waiting for the promised Comforter after the Lord's Ascension. The Sunday between the two events has been strikingly called "the Sunday without Christ" (W. Page Roberts). The Church services for this week are specially solemn in tone, as seeming to ring out the Church's Expectation for the perfect comfort which is still to come. The Collect prays for the gift of the Holy Spirit to comfort us who are orphaned (this is the real force of the original word in John xiv. 18, translated "comfortless"), the Epistle is taken from St. Peter, "the Apostle of Hope," as Archbishop Trench happily designates him, and speaks of the end of all things at hand, as it practically is to each one of us, and exhorts to sobriety, devotion, charity, practical usefulness. The Gospel is part of our Lord's parting address to His disciples, an exhortation to the Church to patient waiting.

Expiation. [Work of Christ.]

Extreme Uction.—The ceremony of anointing the sick with oil, practised by the Romish Church. Of Extreme Uction, the Romish Council of Trent asserts, "The holy uction of the sick was instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, as truly and properly a sacrament of the New Testament, as is implied indeed in St. Mark; but commended and declared to the faithful by James the Apostle and brother of the Lord (James v. 14, 15). 'Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.' From which word as the Church hath learned from apostolic tradition handed down, she teaches the mate form, proper minister, and effect of this whole some sacrament; for the Church has understood that the matter is oil blessed by a bishop, for uction most aptly represents the grace of the Holy Spirit wherewith the soul of the sick man is invisibly anointed; that the form consists in these words: 'I this anointing, etc.' Four canons were passed by the Council on this subject:—

1. If any shall say that Extreme Uction is not truly or properly a sacrament instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, and declared byt blessed Apostle James, but only a rite received from the Fathers, or a human invasion; let him be accursed.

2. If any shall say that the holy anointing of the sick does not confer grace, remit sins, nor relieve the sick, but that it ceased, as if it were formerly only the gift of healing; let him be accursed.

3. If any shall say that the rite a usage of Extreme Uction, which the holy Roman Church observes, is contrary to the sentence of the blessed Apostle James, therefore should be changed, and may despised by Christians without sin; let him be accursed.

4. If any shall say that the presbyt of the Church, whom St. James dire is to be called for the anointing of the sick, not priests ordained by the bishops, but old in age in any community; and that thereof the priest is not the only proper min of extreme uction; let him be accursed.

Oil was an ordinary means of healing among the Jews, but there is no proof in Scripture that the custom of anointing was intended to be continued in the Church. The ceremony of Extreme Uction as now practised by Roman Church dates back only to the end of the twelfth century. They no longer anoint the sick person with a view to healing body, but this sacrament, as they term it only administered to those apparently extremis, as the last of all religious rite. Uction is performed on the five senses; form of words at each uction is: "By holy uction, and by His most tender mercy may the Lord forgive thee whatsoever thou hast committed by sight," substituting by hearing, etc. Extreme Uction is usually administered after the Viaticum. The 21 Article of the Anglican Church declares it is the Lord's Supper to be the only sacraments ordained by Christ, and in enumerating the five other sacraments held by Church of Rome, amongst them Extreme Uction, says they "are not to be courted for sacraments of the Gospel, being such have grown partly of the corrupt follows of the Apostles."
of the diocese, by which the Ordinary gives his sanction for various purposes. In cases where it is desired to make any alteration in the structure or ornaments of a parish church, the law requires that a faculty be obtained before such alteration is taken in hand. The procedure is as follows:— the rector and churchwardens of the parish petition the presentee of the chancellor of the diocese to issue a faculty, they presenting at the same time plans of the intended alterations. A copy of this petition must be affixed to the church doors to give due notice to all concerned of the intended alterations. Any parishioner may appear before the court to oppose the issue of a faculty. The chancellor, having heard the case and examined the plans submitted, gives his decision. Appeal lies from this court to the Court of Arches, and thence to the Privy Council. But it was laid down, in the case of Woolcombe e. Oddridge, that the superior court is very reluctant to interfere with the inferior court in the matter of faculties; however, in the case of the church of St. Mary-at-Hill, in the city of London, Lord Penzance, on appeal, revoked the faculty granted to the rector and churchwardens by the chancellor of the diocese for reseating their parish church. In one case the court ordered a confirmatory faculty to be issued, sanctioning the alterations that had been illegally carried out, the archdeacon having first notified to the court his approval of the said alterations. In the case of an ornament having been introduced without a faculty, such ornament cannot be legally removed without a faculty. A clerk in holy orders may be proceeded against criminally for making alterations without a faculty, but, as Sir R. Phillimore says, "such a course is inexpedient." Faculties are not granted unless there is ample security that the necessary funds will be forthcoming. Faculties are also issued to allow the churchwardens to sell church furniture and utensils when no longer necessary, as, for example, when they have been replaced by new articles. A faculty may also be issued for admitting a person into the diaconate before the age of twenty-three. In this case the faculty, as it seems, must be issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury [Phillimore]; but in no case is a faculty issued for admittance to the priesthood before the legal age of twenty-four. Faculties have been also issued for appropriating pews and seats to certain individuals, but these are very sparingly issued, and only in very exceptional cases. A faculty once granted is irrevocable, unless it can be proved that it was obtained by "surprise and undue connivance." Faculties are required also for building vaults, erecting monuments, for removal of bodies, and for altering churchyards, or building thereon vestries or schools. The stamp duty on a faculty is ten shillings, and the necessary fees payable into court amount to five guineas.

Faber, Frederick William, D.D. [d. 1863], a distinguished divine and poet of Huguenot family, educated in the Church of England, of which his father was a minister, joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1845. He was a graduate of Balliol College, Oxford, where he was a friend of the late Archbishop Tait and F. Oakeley, became Fellow of University, and was ordained. Like most enthusiastic spirits of the Oxford of that day, he fell under the influence of J. H. Newman, though he had left Oxford during his excitement of the Tracts for the Times. In 1843 he became rector of Elton, in Huntingdonshire, and during that time wrote a very beautiful poem in blank verse, entitled Lancelot, describing the movement of a purely spiritual towards the light, and evidently intended to describe his own movement towards the rest of the infallible Church. Other poetical works published at that time were:—The Styrian Lake and The Cherwell Water Lily, and he also wrote Sights and Thoughts in Foreign Churches, the outcome of four years' travel on the Continent with a pupil. After becoming a Roman Catholic, he went for a while to Italy, and returning to England, founded a religious society at Birmingham. In 1849 he became the head of the Brompton Oratory, and there remained till his death. Some of his hymns have gone to the first rank, and are known all over the world, as, Sweet Saviour, bless us ere we go; lark, lark, my soul; O come and mourn with a wailing; O Paradise, etc. His prose works mostly will not live, but the hymns we can prove that he had true poetic instinct and grace.

Faber, George Stanley, D.D., uncle of the preceding [1773–1854], a distinguished wine of the Evangelical school, author of Love Monastic (Bampton Lectures for 1801); difficulties of Romanism, Sacred Calendar of the Church, etc. He was a prebendary of Salisbury.

Fabian, Bishop of Rome, succeeded Athanasius in the year 236, and was martyred under Decius, Jan. 20th, 250. There is a legend at what the brethren were assembled to choose the Pope, a dove settled on the head of a man who was a layman just come to Rome, and thus he was elected. Very little known of him, but he is said to have caused the body of Pritianus, the predecessor of Athanasius, who had been martyred in Sardina, to be brought to Rome, and buried in the martyrs on the Appian Way, in which he himself was afterwards interred. Three various decreals are attributed to him.

Faculty.—A faculty is a legal instrument, issued in the court of the chancellor.
Fagius, Paul, an eminent Protestant minister and Hebrew scholar, was born at Rheinzabern in 1504. He studied at Heidelberg and Strasburg, in the latter town under Elias Levita. In 1537 he was appointed head of a school at Isny, where he remained six years, at the end of which time he returned to Strasburg as Hebrew professor and preacher. But when the Interim [q.v.] was introduced into Strasburg, Fagius, at the invitation of Archbishop Cranmer, came to England, and became Professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, where he died in the same year [1549]. During the reign of Queen Mary his body was dug up and burnt. He translated a great many Latin works into Hebrew, as Thissites Eliae, Tobias Hebraicus, Sententiae sapientium Hebraorum, Annotationes in Targum, and Isagoge in lingua Hebraica.

Fairbairn, Patrick [1805-74], one of the founders of the Free Church of Scotland, Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. He was the author of several theological works, of which the principal are:—The Typology of Scripture [2 vols., 1847], Ezekiel and his Prophecies, The Pastoral Epistles, and a Treatise on Pastoral Theology, published posthumously, with a biographical preface.

Faith.—This word is used in Holy Scriptures in several different senses, springing out of its primary significance of "trust." It sometimes denotes merely the assent of the intellect to the credibility of this or that assertion, as in the Epistle of St. James, where faith without works is regarded as equivalent to the unproductive assent of the understanding to a truth set before it. It is also used of simple trust and confidence in a person, as, e.g., with regard to the Apostles' fears of shipwreck [Matt. viii. 26], "Why are ye fearful, oh ye of little faith?" and in the case of St. Peter walking on the water [xiv. 31], "Oh thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt?" The same Greek word is used in Acts xvii. 31 of the assurance given by one person to another: "Whereof He hath given assurance unto all men, in that He hath raised Him from the dead." Akin to this is its usage for "good faith," "faithfulness," as in the enumeration of the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith, Matt. xxiii. 23; and Gal. v. 22, where faith, in the list of the fruits of the Spirit, seems to mean "trustworthiness," though possibly it may rather signify "trustfulness," "willingness to trust others." [See also Rom. iii. 3; Tit. ii. 10.]

But its most frequent use is to express the exercise of that faculty of the soul by which it embraces the promises of God and the revelation of His will, and that especially with regard to the Person, sufferings, and mediatorial work of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is in this sense of the word that the acts of the worthies of old time are said in Heb. x to have been wrought by faith, their authors believing that what God had promised, He was able to perform. Of a similar nature was the faith of those who received the blessings of healing, whether for themselves or for others, from our Lord and His Apostles. Take, for example out of numerous instances the faith of the blind man mentioned in Matt. ix. 28, 29: "Jesus saith unto them: Believe ye that I am able to do this?" The said unto Him, Yea, Lord. Then toucheth He their eyes, saying, According to ye faith be it unto you;" and the want of faith on the part of the father of the lunatic child [Mark ix. 22, 23], "If Thou canst do any thing, have compassion on us and help a Jesus said unto him, If thou canst believe all things are possible to him that believeth, and compare the limitation which Jesus put upon His own power: "He could there do mighty work, save that He said His hand upon a few sick folk and healed them. And He marvellèd because of their unbelief [Mark vi. 5, 6; see Matt. xiii. 58].

But the highest object of faith is the Person of Jesus Christ, His Atonement and mediation; and its highest office that of being "the hand by which we stretch forth to take the blessings God's mercy offers in the death and risen life of Christ or Saviour. "Justifying faith," as this term'd, is no mere assent to the historical fact of the Crucifixion, not even the intellectual apprehension that Christ's death was a perfect, and sufficient sacrifice for the sins of the whole world; it has to do with the heart and the affections, as well as with the understanding: "with the heart man believes unto righteousness" [Rom. x. 10]. It productive of results [James ii. 14]. Some of its fruits are—works of love [Gal. v. 6]; true wisdom [2 Tim. iii. 15]; victory over the world [1 John v. 4]. It is the gift of God "by grace are ye saved through faith; at that not of yourselves—it is the gift God." [Eph. ii. 8]. It is the instrument cause of the reception of justification [q.v.] on our part; it opens the way to Sancification [Acts xxvi. 18]—"that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith that is in Me;" it leads to the Indwelling Christ:—"that Christ may dwell in yo hearts by faith." [Eph. iii. 17].

There remains for notice one other usage of the word: when, generally with the artice prefixed, it signifies the body of the truth most surely believed among us, and so equivalent to the Christian religion. Th St. Jude [v. 3] exhorts the Christians contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints; St. Paul preached the faith which once he destroyed [Gal. i. 23]; warns Timothy that in the latter days some shall depart from the faith, and says of oth that concerning the faith they have made shipwreck [1 Tim. i. 19; iv. 1]; he addresses Titus as his own son after the common faith [Tit. i. 4]. In Gal. iii. 23 either the word "faith" is used in two different significations, or the article ought to be prefixed to the word in each instance. In Gal. vi. 10 Christians are termed the servants of the faith; and there are many other instances. In Eph. iv. 5 it occurs without the article: “One Lord, one faith, one baptism.”

Faithful Men.—This title is given in the Nineteenth Article of the Church of England to every member of the Church. It was the recognised expression in early times for all who had been baptised, and signified that just as the Church is called "holy," as signifying that this is God’s intention with regard to her, so is faithfulness required of each member, as his proper and consistent character. But the expression soon became restricted to those baptised persons who were in full communion, as distinguished from Catechumens and Penitents, and it was generally applied to the laity only. The “faithful” only were admitted to the Holy Communion, and to join in the Lord’s Prayer, as well as to hear discourses on the profounder doctrines of the gospel, where the catechumens only heard lessons of plain morals and daily duty. The epiptarial expressions, "perfect" and "enlightened," in 1 Cor. ii. 6, and Heb. vi. 4, seem to have the same meaning.

Faith-healing.—The name given to a ingenious movement of recent origin. It seems to have arisen in the Swiss village of Laumenendorf, where Dorothea Trudel, a worker in artificial flowers, between the years 1860–69, is said to have effected wonderful cures by the power of prayer, resting her arm on St. James v. 14. A similar movement sprung up almost simultaneously in the village of Motlingen, in the Black Forest, where lived Pastor Blumhardt, an able missionary. Certain cases had sprung up his neighbourhood, not unlike demoniacal possession. His prayers over them, he tells us, were answered by cures, and he goes on to say, “Everything concerning illnesses in my irish began to be changed. Seldom did a medical man appear in it. The people would their pray. The general state of health better.” Blumhardt died in 1880, aged sixty-five; Dorothea Trudel died of typhus fever at the age of forty-eight. Both of them established homes in which their practice is continued. Sweden and America have seen the nursing homes of this movement, which has spread from the latter into England. There are centres in London, Brighton, Liverpool, and elsewhere, which are called Beth- (houses of security). The head of the movement is presided over by an American sister named Boardman. Meetings are held at 3 p.m. every Wednesday, open to any one. Some of the literature connected with this movement is very objectionable, some merely foolish. None of it, however, is very remarkable. There have been already signs of disagreement among the devotees, as to the nature of the cure, whether miraculous or not; as to the means, whether oil should be used; and as to the name, whether it should be called faith-healing or Divine healing. The best accounts of the movement are published by Messrs. Morgan and Scott.

Faith, St., Virgin and Martyr (Oct. 6th), suffered under the Diocletian persecution. Although nothing more is known of her, yet, most likely on account of her significant name, many churches in England have been dedicated to her. She is commonly represented in art with sword and gridiron, or resting on an iron bed, with a bundle of rods in her hand.

Fakirs.—A sect of Dervishes or wandering Mahometans, who live on alms. When they enter a town they each blow a hunting-horn, and then some go and beg for the rest, distribute what they receive equally among the whole company, and if anything remains, give it to the poor, leaving nothing for the next day. Some maintain that they are privileged to commit acts which would be considered wicked in other people, and therefore give themselves to all sorts of impurities. They have chiefs, who give audience to the people, while their disciples recite their virtues and favours from God. Sometimes one chief has as many as two hundred disciples, and they have a standard, and lances and other weapons. There is a third kind, the children of poor people, who retire into mosques to study the law in order to become Muqals, or doctors. There are also Penitent Fakirs, who always maintain the certain position, sometimes during their whole lives, as holding their hands across over their heads, or turning them behind them. They have other Fakirs to serve them with necessaries. There are said to be about two million Fakirs in India. The term is, however, often employed there to describe a religious mendicant of any faith.

Faldstool.—This word comes from the German falten, “to fold”; and stuhl, “a chair”; and designates a portable folding chair, like our camp stools. Formerly a bishop used sometimes to take such a chair with him, or one used to be placed for him in the choir when he went to officiate in any church not his own cathedral. The name is now commonly, though incorrectly, applied to the “Litany stool.”

Falk Laws, The.—So called after the Prussian Minister, Falk, who, in 1872, received the supervision of ecclesiastical and educational affairs. After the promulgation of the dogma of Papal Infallibility by Pius IX. in 1870, the Roman Catholic Church began to extend its interference over the temporal affairs of the countries of Europe. In Germany the matter took something of the form of the struggle between William Rufus and the Pope concerning Anselm—Had the Pope or the King the power to appoint and set down the bishops? In the case of Germany, the Roman Catholic Church deprived a number of clergy and teachers of their offices, whereupon the Prussian Government, in order to counteract this, passed in May, 1873, a law for the inspection of schools, by which all schools in Prussia, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant, were placed under the direct superintendence of the State magistrates. In July of the same year the Jesuits were expelled from Germany, the Government considering that the setting up of the Infallibility of the Pope was due in a great measure to their influence. In order to establish a definite division between the spiritual and temporal powers, the so-called "Laws of the Church" were passed, whose chief aim was to curtail the powers of the Roman Catholic clergy, especially with regard to the imposition of penances, etc., and to provide for their training and education, which up to this time had been carried on by the Jesuitical schools. By the same laws a royal court of justice was formed for the management of ecclesiastical affairs, and arrangements were made for the abolition of the convents, to be carried out if necessary. At the same time the Protestant Church received a firmer organisation, and the laity were given a stronger voice in Church government. A proclamation issued in September, 1873, announced that a system of synods, parochial and provincial, was in the course of formation, which would include Protestant and Roman Catholic representatives, all of which would be subject to the High Clerical Council, under the presidency of the Kultur-Minister, Falk. The whole question caused great excitement and bitterness in Germany. In the course of the quarrel—the Kulturkampf, as it is generally called—the Pope appointed Ledochowski to the See of Posen. Prussia did not approve, and absolutely refused to allow him to take possession, Bismarck exclaiming, "Wir wollen nicht nach Canossa gehen" ("We will not go to Canossa"), referring to the struggle between Henry IV. and Gregory VII., and the humiliation imposed on the former. Posen was in 1875, Ledochowski was for many years without employment, until the Pope made him a cardinal and gave him a post in the Vatican. The German Chancellor certainly never anticipated so stubborn a resistance as he found, and on the death of Pope Pius IX., in 1878, a hope of reconciliation appeared. Bismarck took the opportunity of saying publicly that the new Pope, Leo XIII., was "a wise, moderate, and pacific gentleman," that he was "not a Guelph, nor a Pole, nor a Liberalist, nor had anything to do with Social Democrats." Negotiations began, and have slowly continued. A truce dispute having arisen in 1885 between Germany and Spain relative to the Caroline Islands, Bismarck arranged that the Pope should be invited to arbitrate between the two nations, and on the other hand it was the subject of much remark in the German papers, when on this occasion the Pope gave a dinner to the foreign ambassadors and prominent members of the Church, Ledochowski was not invited. At length, in April, 1886, the dispute was ended by a compromise which left the German State victorious in form at the Roman Church in substance. The great battle had come to rest largely on the question of the Anzeigerpflicht, i.e. the Duty of Notification which the State demanded from each bishop of the transference of any clergyman to a new duty. This is yielded by the Pope whilst the objects intended by it are abandoned. In education the question is quit conceded by Bismarck, and so the heart at kernel of the "May Laws" is taken out. There is one other law which Germany owes to Falk, and which has been productive much evil to the Church—namely, that which declared the civil contract to be all that necessary to make marriage legal. As no children can be baptised except those who parents were married by a pastor, the law done, especially in the large towns, is ended.

Fall of Man. [Original Sin.]

False Apostles.—St. Paul speaks such in 2 Cor. xi. 13: apparently persons who had seen, or pretended to have seen, the Lon and made their claim to be Apostles on that ground. These were the Judaisers. St. Joh allies to those who have gone out in the world and carried with them a corrupt Gospel. In his case they were probate Gnostics, forming sects who denied the true one form or another respecting the Ine nation. These must be the same as those th elsewhere calls Antichrists. There is a ce distinction between "False Apostles" at "False Christs." The latter are outside t Christian Church, the former within it, bis tised even; the one opposers of Christ, t other schismatical members of His Body.

False Christs.—The most prominent distinctive characteristic about Christianit both as an historical fact and as a theoretical doctrine, was (as it ever will be) the Incurion of God. There was nothing in Judea of at all an analogous kind; and, although some resemblances to it may be found in heathen mythology, it may well be doubt whether the resemblance was perceptible the heathen mind, it is so very faint. A men having a natural belief in One who stood to them in the relation of God, t Jews believed further in that God's won and acts, as He had made them known
...them; and the heathen added to their natural religion (or superseded it by) a system of Polytheism, by which the One God was forgotten, and many imitations set up in His stead. Christianity, on the other hand, went forth into the world declaring that there lived a Man in heaven, Who had lived upon earth for thirty-three years, seen by a few—but a very few—of the world's inhabitants; that this Man was God Himself; that all religion for the future was to converge towards His Person; that anyone wilfully rejecting the religion so offered was rejecting the only Person, and the only system, which could help him on here, and make him acceptable to God, or give him hope for the future that lies beyond the grave. Thus the claim was made that Jesus Christ, sprung from an obscure family of an obscure nation, living an obscure life, and dying the death of a criminal, was to be received as the personal centre of religion by the whole world; and this claim was made, too, in such a comprehensive sense, that no qualification whatever of the terms offered was possible. The first attack was naturally against the bare facts on which his Christian theory was grounded. The Jews averred that Christ was a mere man, that He had died as ordinary men die, and that nothing had since happened to show that He was more than an ordinary man. Hence the Apostles were sent forth into the world as witnesses to these fundamental facts of Christianity, especially to the fact that Christ's instantaneous Resurrection from the dead on the third day after His Crucifixion, and His subsequent ascent into heaven, proved Him to be not mere man, but God; and, as it was found after a time that the facts could not be disproved, so the attempt to disprove them was gradually given up.

Then there appear to have sprung up veral rivals to the Person on whose account its claim of universal faith and universal worship was made, according to our Lord's predictions that men would arise saying, 'I am Christ,' and that "false Christs" would v to lead away the disciples of the true. These such leaders are mentioned in the Acts; the, that is Theudas and Judas (who claimed to be Divine leaders of the Jews in our Lord's fancy), by the Jew, Gamaliel (Acts v. 36); and another, the Jew for whom St. Paul was first mistaken by the Roman governor of the castle at Jerusalem [Acts xxi. 38]. The pretender led a large multitude out of the holy city in the year 55, and is said to have been able to work some of those false signs and wonders" which the Lord had predicted that "false Christs" should have ever to do. He promised his followers that they would go with him to the Mount of Olives, they should see the walls of Jerusalem torn down at his command; but Felix led troops against him, put him to flight, and lightened a large number of his associates.

"And he," says Josephus, "was only one of many like him, who arose about that time to mislead the people."

Among such false claimants to a Divine mission were also Simon Magus, Menander, and Dositheus, of whom the first seems to be the type, as he was also the first in order of time. He was born a Samaritan, as were the other two, but educated in Egypt, probably at Alexandria, where he became imbued with the subtle metaphysics of Oriental philosophy. He gave out that he was the "great power of God," not denying altogether the Divine nature of the Lord Jesus, but claiming a still nearer place to the Godhead. Tradition declares that he was able to work miracles, and his name of "the Magian" probably indicates as much. Of his conflict with St. Peter at Samaria an account is given in Acts viii. 8—24; and an account is given by ecclesiastical historians of a still later encounter at Rome. By these it is said that Simon had carried his imitation of Christ so far that, at last, he promised his disciples he would ascend to heaven in their sight from the Capitol, and fixed a day for the miracle. St. Peter prayed to God that he would defeat the supernatural devices of Satan, and after Simon had risen a short distance from the earth, he fell down and was killed. Of Menander little is recorded, but it is distinctly said of Dositheus that he claimed to be the Messiah, and that the high priest of the Jews endeavouring to apprehend him in consequence, he fled to a cave, and there miserably perished. Claiming a Divine origin, and Divine authority, and supporting his claim by the exercise of preternatural power, Simon Magus was the type of those "false Christs" who tried to suppress the religion of the true one, standing in some similar relation to Christ as that which was held towards Moses by the Egyptian magicians. Familial. [Inquisition.]

Familists or "Family of Love."—A sect which arose in the Netherlands in the middle of the sixteenth century. It was founded by an Anabaptist, named Henry Nicholas, a native of Amsterdam, who had become implicated in the insurrections, and fled to Emden in 1533. From thence he came to England during the reign of Edward VI., and in 1555 he started this sect. Their tenets were that there is no true knowledge of Christ except in their community, and that as Moses is the prophet of hope, and Christ the prophet of faith, so is Henry Nicholas the prophet of love. They were extreme Antinomians, and immorality was very common among them. This sect is often confused with that of David Joris [Joris, David], who was a Dutch Anabaptist, with whom Nicholas was intimate. The sect was at first popular in England, but they soon began to be considered dangerous, both to civil order and to morality and religion, so in 1560 Queen Elizabeth ordered an investigation into the matter, which resulted in the proclamation issued "against the sectaries of the Family of Love." Severe measures were also taken against them under James I., and the sect disappeared.

Fanaticism, Fanatics [Lat. fanum, "temple"]).—A fanatic was originally one who spent his time in assisting in the services of the temples, so as to cut himself off from all worldly employments. The name is now applied to one whose zeal in religious matters is allowed to outrun his judgment, and who works himself into a state of excitement which he believes will be pleasing to God. As a rule, fanaticism is a kind of monomania, produced by a diseased imagination. In ancient times the diviners of oracles were known as fanatics.

Farel, Guillaume, born in 1489 at Gap, in Dauphiny. He studied in Paris, and became professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine. In 1521 he was invited to Meaux by the Bishop Briçonnet, but was expelled thence with other Reformers two years later, and went to Basel, where he was welcomed by Ecolampadius. Here a similar fate awaited him, probably brought about by Erasmus, and he went to Strasbourg, and afterwards to Switzerland. At Zurich he made the acquaintance of Zwingli, and travelled in various parts, preaching the doctrines of the Reformation, which he established at Geneva in 1532. Calvin settled there three years later, and both were expelled in 1538. Farel preached subsequently at Neufchatel, Metz, and Gorze, in which latter place he and his followers were attacked in 1543 by the troops of the Cardinal of Lorraine. Farel fled in disguise to Mompelgard, where he carried on his labours. He also preached the Reformed doctrines at his native town, Gap.
He died at Neufchatel, Sept. 13th, 1565. He was the author of many theological works.

Farmer, Isaac [b. 1714, d. 1787].—A learned Dissenting minister, for forty years at Walthamstow, and in the latter part of his life a lecturer in the City of London.
His writings display great originality of thought, as well as learning. The principal are three treatises on [1] Our Lord's Temptation, in which he contends that that event was internal and subjective; [2] on the New Testament Demoniacs, holding that these were persons afflicted with mental and physical diseases; [3] On Miracles, contending that they are absolute arguments of a Divine interposition.

Farnovians.—The followers of Stanislaus Farnovius or Farowski [died 1615], a Pole, who separated from the Lutherans in consequence of his Arian opinions, though he declared that Jesus ought to be worshipped. His followers, however, became more and more rationalistic, and finally deny the Divinity of Christ. [Socinians.]

Farrar, Robert, Bishop of St. David's, one of the Protestant martyrs, was born pro-
ably in Yorkshire, in the reign of Henry VI.
He received the first part of his education at Cambridge, but removed to Oxford, and made a canon of St. Mary's College, which he was then in high repute, because Erasmus studied there; Farrar took his degrees in 1526 and 1533. In 1535 he accompanied Bishop Barlow, who was sent by Henry VII.
as Ambassador to Scotland. He was afterwards chosen prior of the monastery of Oswald's, in Yorkshire, which he surrendered to the commissioners at the time of its dis-lution in 1540, and had a pension grant him of £100 per annum, which he resign on his promotion to the See of St. Davi.
He was one of the first persons in the Uni-ersity of Oxford to embrace Protestantism this was mainly through the influence of the Rev. Thomas Garrol, of All H.
Hows, Honey Lane, London, who, being active promoter of the doctrine of the B.
and the Reformation, was afterwards bure at Smithfield, in 1541. Dr. Farrar was one of Cranmer's chaplains, and followed example in marrying; this was alleged as crime against him by his enemies in Mar time. He was esteemed one of the most a preachers of his day, and in April, 1547, was appointed one of a body of visitors to preachers sent throughout the kingdom
royal authority for the better reformation religion. He was made Chaplain to the D.
the Duke of Somerset, and by that appointed to the Bishopric of St. Davi.
he was consecrated Sept. 9th, 1548, by Cran assisted by Ridley, Bishop of Rochester, Holbeach, Bishop of Lincoln, in the Ar bishop's chapel at Chertsey. He was first bishop consecrated on the bare nomi
of the Sovereign. Troubles awaited him
the very entrance of his bishopric; Tho Young, the precentor, and Rowland Merr
one of the canons, had been appointed com missioners during the vacancy of the See,
they had taken advantage of their situation to strip the cathedral of its plate and or ments, and to appropriate to their own priv use the money gained by the sale of the bishop hearing of this, issued his commis

his chancellor, for visiting the chapter
well as the rest of the diocese; the chance drew up the commission in the old for which did not sufficiently acknowledge King's supremacy, and this circumstance was taken advantage of by those whose co
duct was to be the subject of inquiry, only to disobey the commission, but to see the Bishop of criminally designing to set
he Pope's authority in opposition to the king's. In consequence of these proceedings, he Bishop was first obliged to go to London to answer these accusations, which consisted of fifty-seven charges, most of them extremely frivolous as well as malicious; then he was sent to the assizes at Caermarthen, and afterwards taken back to London and imprisoned in the Tower. His imprisonment prevented him from paying his dues to the crown, as he could not receive his revenues, and this was afterwards laid to his charge as further crime. Owing to the fall of his patron, the Duke of Somerset, he was kept in prison till the death of Edward VI., and when Mary came to the throne charges were brought against him very different from those or which he had previously been confined. During the year 1554 he appears to have been either in the Tower or the King's Bench, a company with many who were imprisoned while changes were making in the Act of Parliament, to enable the Papists to put to death those who would not submit to the Roman church. On Jun. 28th, 1555, Cardinal Pole, the Pope's legate, granted a commission to cardinals, Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor, and other bishops, to sit upon an ad judge, according to the laws revived against heretics, all such ministers and others were in prison for heresy. On the 30th Bishop Farrar appeared before them, together with Taylor, Bradford, and Saunders. On Feb. 4th he was again called before the commissioners, but refusing to retract his opinions, he was in the course of ten days sent down to his own diocese in Wales to be condemned. On Feb. 28th he was brought before Dr. Morgan, his successor as Bishop of St. David's, in custody of the sheriff, he delivered him over to the officers of the ecclesiastical power. On March 4th, being called again before Dr. Morgan, he demanded a copy of the articles exhibited against him, instead of which he was required to subscribe to the following tenets of Rome:—

That marriage in a priest is unlawful; [2] that he believed the doctrine of Transubstantiation; [3] that the Mass is a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; [4] that several councils, lawfully assembled, never mortal can err; [5] that hope and charity, less than faith, are necessary to justification; and [6] that all men are bound to abide by the decisions of the Church of Rome. To these articles the Bishop refused to subscribe, and at his next appearance he delivered a written declaration of his own sentiments on these subjects, similar to that which, with Cooper and others, he had signed on May 15th in the preceding year. On Wednesday, March 13th, he appeared again, and being demanded whether he would renounce errors, he appealed from Dr. Morgan, as an incompetent judge, to Cardinal Pole. Morgan, enraged at this, proceeded to pronounce the definite sentence against him, as a heretic excommunicated, to be degraded from the priesthood, and delivered over to the secular power to be put to death by burning in the fire. On Saturday, May 30th, 1555, the sentence was put in execution in the market-place of Caermarthen, the Bishop sustaining the torments of the fire with wonderful constancy and patience.

Farse.—The term used for the vernacular amplification read between the verses of the Epistles and Gospels, which were read in Latin, and then each verse was paraphrased for the benefit of the unlearned.

Fast.—Strictly speaking, this signifies total abstinence from food and drink for any given period; but the word is commonly used to signify abstinence from particular kinds of food, particularly flesh meat, and sometimes it expresses abstinence from certain pleasures not unlawful—in a word, self-restraint.

Fasting was practised by the heathens of old, and also by the Jews. The latter, indeed, had only one fast in the year prescribed by the Law [See Lev. vii. 29-34], but there are many voluntary fastings mentioned in the course of the sacred history. In the days of our Lord there was much fasting. There is no record of His having commanded it, but in the Sermon on the Mount He assumes the practice, and we know that the Apostles used it [Acts xiii. 2-3; xiv. 23; xxvii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 5; xi. 27]. But the absence of express Scriptural commands on the subject has ruled Anglican practice so far as this, that the Church of England has not laid down set rules such as are laid down by the Roman Catholic Church. Consequently, while the English Prayer Book notes expressly what are “days of fasting or abstinence,” there are no directions at all what food may or may not be eaten, but the matter is left to the discretion of individual consciences. [See the Homily on Fasting.] In the reign of Elizabeth eating of flesh on fish days (i.e. Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays) was forbidden by statute. It is very common in old parish registers to find an entry that “A. B. received a licence to eat flesh in Lent.” The contention that fasting is advantageous in respect to bodily health is probably to a great extent true in particular circumstances. How far it is also advantageous as an aid to devotional feeling is a question which is much discussed by Protestant theologians. While many contend that it is a great help to self-discipline, others maintain that habitual temperance is far more beneficial; that mortification beyond this has a tendency to disturb the healthy relation between body and mind, and to excite the imagination. But the setting aside of seasons like Lent for self-examination and special prayer has the sanction of past ages, and the example of some of the holiest of men. That such an observance of seasons has been common among members of the Church needs no proof, and there have been also Nonconformist writers—like Doddridge, for example—who have borne testimony to its usefulness. The following vigorous protest against the too frequent neglect of fasts is from a well-known member of what is known as the "High Church" school in the Anglican Church:

"The Church of England has appointed two-sevenths of the year as days of Fasting or Abstinence, but their widespread neglect is a reminder of Prince Bismarck's saying, 'Britannia metal is to say one thing and do another.' The Ember Days are well-nigh forgotten. The close connection pointed out by our Lord between prayer and fasting, if evil spirits are to be cast out, was forgotten when the Day of Intercession for missions to the heathen, originally appointed in 1872 on an Ember Day, was moved to the Feast of St. Andrew in the following year, though by the recent change to St. Andrew's Eve we have been, though too apologistically, reminded of that connection. Many individual efforts have indeed been made during the past fifty years to remind Church people of the duty of fasting. Archbishop Longley once refused an invitation to dine at Court on a Friday. Bishop Hamilton religiously observed the Ember Days. The present Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London have more than once pleaded for the observance of the Ember Seasons, pointing out their suitability for intercession for the home and foreign missionary work of the Church. The late Archdeacon Freeman, as examining chaplain to the Bishop of Exeter, used to urge upon candidates for ordination the practice of refusing all invitations on Fridays, saying how he and his family had done this for years, and had found the benefit of having one quiet week-day for religious uses. But these necessities have been too few. There are fewer clerical dinner parties on Friday than there were; but many clergymen who call themselves High Churchmen have no scruple in going to tennis parties, or balls, or giving school-treats on that day. One of the chief contributions of Dr. Pusey to the Tracts for the Times was his tracts on Fasting Nos. 18 and 66. In the second of these he points out that retirement from social enjoyment is a part of fasting, and that fasting is a most important part of spiritual discipline. As to vigils, fasts, and days of abstinence, his judgment is, that the English Church does not mark any difference between them; and he counsels generally such an amount of self-denial in all matters as each individual can bear, avoiding ostentation and censoriousness, though not being ashamed to confess by his acts his obedience to the Church. During these thirty years High Churchmanship has become in a measure popular; but is there the same spirit of discipline, of humble, deep thoughtful resolution, that there was fifty or forty years ago? There have been instances of extravagance, and we have learnt the useful caution, that while fasting is intended to subdue our passions, it is not intended to impair our strength of body or mind; but it must be a real self-denial if we would be true to the Church and to Christ, Who has joined almsgiving, prayer, and fasting together—part of the righteousness which He taught His disciples. The clergy are bound to teach the laity to fast by their example. Meditation is doubly useful in these times activity and excitement. And the observance of fasting days cannot but increase the opportunities for reading, which is so necessary to the clergy, that their teaching may be deep pointed, and definite. Lastly, the observance of Friday would teach the people the true spirit of the observance of Sunday, which cannot be more happily described than by phrase used in a public notice in the city of Milan, where on St. John Baptist Day, 1872, being a Sunday, the custom of closing shops on every Sunday was by common consent begun for the festal repose of the Lord Day.'"

Fasting Communion is compulsory in the Roman Catholic Church, and an extra section of the Church of England also declares that "if antiquity is unanimous in anything it is the necessity of receiving this Sacrament fasting." The following quotations are from a tract issued by the English Church Union:

"In the third century, certain persons were afraid lest the smell of wine in the morning should betray them to be Christians, and to adopt water instead, and thought to make up for this compromise by a second celebration in the evening with a mixed cup, which they justified themselves by reasoning that the Lord offered the mixed cup, not in the morning, but after supper. St. Cyprian, however, utterly repudiated the idea that our Lord intended this ceremony at all, and that the Reformation of Institution was any precedent. 'Christ said, 'must needs offer at the evening the cup, that the very hour of the Sacrament might indicate the setting and evening of the world. But we celebrate the Resurrection of the Lord in the morning.' This difference between the original Institution of our Lord and the practice of His followers is everywhere acknowledged. St. Gregory Nazianzen says, 'He delivered the Paschal Mystery to His disciples in a guest-chamber and at supper, we in temples and before supper.' Augustine (ad Januar): 'It is as clear as though the Apostles first received the Lord's Body and Blood in fasting, and later He commanded His followers to break their fasts, so that when the Apostles first received the Lord's Body and Blood, they did not fast. He taught them, then, to be a matter of rejoicing to the Catholic Church that the Sacrament is always received fasting. From that time, it seemed good to the H
The Eucharist for long periods. I see it dividing the clergy, and making some unwilling to attend, and some unable to receive, at the only eucharistic gatherings possible for their brotherly intercourse. I see some clergy falling into idle habits, and wasting the morning hours of Sunday, in order to be able ‘to take a late celebration,’ as it is said. And if these sights startle us with at least apparent reminders of certain Divine remembrances, the awe of them deepens as we connect them with contemporary phenomena.

"If materialism in various shapes outside the Church alarms many as a tendency of the age, we have read and noticed but little if we do not, with the earliest Fathers, perceive, and with the latest observers verify, the fact that within the Church there is sure to be some corresponding and correlitative tendency. And so it proves. There is a materialistic tone and temper about certain denunciations and directions which are published among us. Materialists might point to them (if they thought it worth their while) to show that the identification of spirit with matter is not so novel a doctrine. If Christian priests even remotely assist that issue (and this assistance does not appear to be so very remote), one of the Church’s redemptions will be marred unawares from within. But do not let me be misunderstood. True reverence and true self-discipline will not cease to long for and to use every hint by which we can help them to get further from self and nearer to God. Fasting Communions would not cease, though the utmost contrary to materialism were taught. The sick would not go without their Communions if the use of the Church of England be humbly followed. And that use it must be remembered, has probably never negatived any apostolic or sub-apostolic custom" [p. 97].

Fatalism.—The doctrine of irresistible necessity, not as the result of the inevitable laws of the Creator, such as Hobbes contended for, as does the modern atheist, but as the result of His arbitrary power. It can hardly be distinguished from the extreme or logical form of Calvinism, which triumphantly quotes the text about the clay in the hands of the potter, and bids men not cavil at the irresistible will of the Supreme. But it reaches its completeness in the calm submissiveness to fate which marks the fanaticism of the Mahometans. [ELECTION; FREE WILL.]

Fathers.—This name of Father is given to those early Christian bishops whose writings have been handed down through all ages of the Church, and are still quoted. Their worth lies in the insight they give us into the laws and uses of the Church in the early ages, and in the statements of their ideas on all points of Christian doctrine.

Feast. [HOLY DAYS.]
Feastings of the Jews were more than ordinary preparations of meats and drinks, for the entertainment and good-fellowship of friends and acquaintance. The extraordinary and more liberal kind of entertainment, by way of feastings, was called "Mishteh," from their free drinking at such times. And there was also a kind of feastings in which they made merry together, eating the remainder of their sacrifices. In these greater feastings there were ceremonies preparatory, which were chiefly "Salutation," either by words, or, "The Lord bless you," or "Peace be upon thee," or by asking each other of their welfare; or else by gestures, as prostrating the whole body; but most commonly by an ordinary kiss. The second preparatory ceremony was washing the feet, which was the office of the meanest servants in the family. The third ceremony was pouring of oil upon the head, and thus Christ reproves the Pharisee that invited Him, for not anointing His head. After the performance of these ceremonies, the master of the house, sitting down with the rest of his guests, took a cup of wine in his hand, and thus began his thanksgiving, which we call grace before meal: "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, which createst the fruit of the vine." After this blessing of the cup, the master of the house took the bread, which he hastily cut, but not quite through, in order that he might break it more easily, and holding it in both his hands, he blessed it with these words: "Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, the King of the world, which bringest forth bread out of the earth." Which done, the master broke the bread, and distributed it to every one that sat at the table, and then they began to partake of the dishes that were provided. At the end of the feast the master of the house, or somebody for him, gave thanks again, after this manner: "Let us bless Him who has fed us of His own, and by Whom we live;" and then all the guests answered, "Blessed be He of whose meat we have eaten, and of whose goodness we live." Which done, he that began proceeded with a "Blessed be He, and blessed be His name:" [1] For their present food; [2] for their deliverance out of servitude; [3] for the covenant of circumcision; [4] for the Law given by Moses. Concluding with a prayer that God would have mercy [1] on His people of Israel; [2] on His own city, Jerusalem; [3] on Sion, the tabernacle of His glory; [4] On the kingdom of the house of David, His anointed; [5] that He would send the prophet Elias; and lastly, that He would make them worthy of the days of Elias, and of the life of the world to come. Which done, a grace-cup went round the table, blessed after the same manner as at the beginning. Besides the daily sacrifices, the Jewish Sabbath was a perpetual weekly feast, and observed with as much strictness and religion as any other festival. The first day of every month (which was lunar with the Jews), was also a holy day, and called the "New Moon." They had five other solemn festivals, which were celebrated every year. As for their posture at table, it is apparent that it was the same as with the Romans; that is to say, lying or leaning upon couches round a round table as described by Ezekiel; where he says, "Thou satest upon a stately bed with a table prepared before it." And the custom of pulling off their shoes implies the antiquity of the same custom.

Feasts of Charity, or Agape, were held at fixed times in the early days of the Christian Church, when Christians met together for a common meal. They were probably held on the first day of the week, and were provided by the richer members of the Church. The food consisted of bread and wine, meat, milk, and fruit, but varied according to the means of the guests. Both men and women attended the feast, though the sat at different tables, and in the course of the meal a special loaf and cup were blessed and passed round in commemoration of the Lord's death. The meal was followed by prayers, exhortations, and explanations of Scripture, and afterwards by the salutation and holy kiss. At first these feastings were assemblyed of rich and poor alike, but in time social distinctions began to reassert themselves, they became either banquets for the wealthy, or distributions of food by the rich among the poor. Another cause which led their falling into disuse was that Christian began to build or set apart places of worship and would not use them as mere refectories whereas hitherto they had used the same room for dwelling-place and church. Attempts were made later to revive the ancient custom and St. Augustine speaks of his sister Monica frequenting the agape; but these efforts had no lasting effect, and for a long time the on-trace of the feasts was in the dedication festivities of churches, at which times agape continued to be held as late as the sixth century.

Fealty, Daniel, D.D. [1582–1645] rector first of Lambeth, then of Acton. I was a member of the Assembly of Divines 1643, and was the last episcopal writer to remain in it. He wrote [1] The Dippe diet, or the Anabaptists duckt and plunged or head and ears at a disputacion in Southwark [2] Mystica Clavis, a set of sermons on hagiorist; [3] a book on Private Devotion.

Fees.—Ecclesiastical fees may be divide into two main divisions:—[1] Those payable to the clergy; [2] those payable to dioecesan officials. [1] Of fees payable to the clergy what are called "surprise fees" form the main part; they are fees paid to the incumbent performing certain offices of the church individuals; in their origin these fees were quite voluntary, but long and immemori custom has now made them obligatory. In the Constitutions of Archbishop Langton it is enacted, "We do firmly enjoin that no sacrament of the Church shall be denied to anyone upon the account of any sum of money, nor shall matrimony be hindered therefor; because if anything hath been accustomed to be given by the pious devotion of the faithful, we will that justice be done thereupon to the churches by the Ordinary of the place afterwards;" and there is a similar law as to burial. It is to be noted that no fee can be lawfully demanded for Holy Baptism, nor for the registry thereof [35 & 36 Vict., c. 36, an Act obtained by the Bishop of Winchester to set at rest all doubts on the subject].

Fees for Marriage depend upon special custom of each parish, and the obligation to pay such fees is enforced by 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 86. This Act also gives power to the bishop of the diocese, when marriages are performed in licensed chapels or churches, to assign a part or the whole of such fees to the minister and clerk of such chapel, with the consent of the incumbent and clerk of the parish church. By 3 and 4 Vict., c. 60, the consents of the said incumbent and clerk were no longer necessary. By the Act of Will. IV., the fee for searching in the registries "over a period not exceeding one year, is the sum of one shilling, and sixpence additional for every additional year, and the sum of two shillings and sixpence for every single certificate."

Fees for Churcning of Women. — The rubric says, "The woman who cometh to give her thanks must offer accustomed offerings." In the case of Naylor v. Scott, in the year 1728, the custom was recognised as established, but the amount was not recoverable at law.

Fees for Burials depend upon the particular usage and custom of each parish. In cases where the churchyards have been closed, and cemeteries established, the cemetery company are bound by law [10 & 11 Vict., c. 65, sec. 52] to pay a certain sum prescribed in the Act to the incumbent and clerk of the parish from which a body is brought for burial in the consecrated part of the cemetery. In the case of a cemetery provided by a borough, the council of the borough have power to fix the fees, subject to the approval of the bishop of the diocese.

In some cases, the vestries have had to place prohibitory fees on the burials of non-parishioners, in order to preserve the parish churchyard for the use of the parishioners. By 59 George III., c. 134, the power of fixing the amount of fees was vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with the consent of the vestry and the bishop of the diocese. These fees were often, in olden times, lass'd under the head of altarage, because they belonged to the priest by reason of the altar (obeventio altaris) "[Phillimore]. They are also termed obventions. The incumbent of a parish is also entitled to fees for the erection of monuments and gravestones, in church or churchyard, and for the construction of vaults for burial.

[2] Fees payable to the diocesan officials. By Constitution of Archbishop Stratford, the fee for Ordination was not to exceed sixpence; and by canon 35 of the year 1603, the fee is not to exceed ten shillings; but for the letters testimonial of ordination under the bishop's seal, extra fees are payable, on the ground that these are no part of ordination, but are provided for the security of the clergy. The fees payable by the clergy at ordination and on other occasions, to the officials of the diocese, were fixed by an Order in Council of March 19th, 1869. According to this order, clergy pay £2 7s. at ordination.

Fees on Institution are fixed by an Order in Council of July 24th, 1857, under Act 1 & 2 Vict., c. 106, at £7 13s. 6d., and for Induction £1 8s. [For other fees payable, see Fruits and Tenth.] For licence to a perpetual curacy, the fee is £4 9s. Fee for licence to a curacy is 13s., in addition to stamp duty. For licence of non-residence 18s., plus stamp duty. Under the order of March 19th, 1869, the following fees were fixed:— For resignation of a benefice, £1 1s., paid to the bishop's secretary; for visitations of bishops and archdeacons, 18s.; for consecration of church and churchyard, 12 guineas; for burial ground alone, 10 guineas.

The fees payable by the clergy at institution are recoverable by monition and sequestration. The most important Acts dealing with Fees are 1 & 2 Vict., c. 106, & 30 & 31 Vict., c. 135.

Felicissimus. — [1] A schismatical deacon of the Church of Carthage, in the third century. He was appointed by Novatus without St. Cyprian's consent, and opposed himself to the episcopal system of government, which St. Cyprian upheld. During the Decian persecution, and the absence of St. Cyprian, Felicissimus, and five other priests like-minded with himself, joined with the persecutors of the Christians. He persuaded the presbyters to readmit the lapsi to Communion before they had gone through the usual course of penance; and this being forbidden by the prelate on his return, Felicissimus and his party assembled and formally excommunicated him and all others who did not adhere to their views, and chose Fortunatus as their bishop [Easter, 251]. Felicissimus endeavoured to gain the support of Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, but failed; the Novatian controversy having just broken out between Rome and Carthage, making Cornelius and St. Cyprian natural allies.

[2] A confessor at Carthage, imprisoned with Rogatianus at the beginning of the Decian persecution. It was to these two confessors that St. Cyprian wrote, exhorting them to take care of his flock in his absence, in conjunction with the Bishops Caldonius and Herculanus, and whom he commissioned to excommunicate the schismatic Felicitus. Their festival stands in the Roman martyrology on Oct. 26th.

Felicitas, St., was a Roman lady of high rank, who had been left a widow with seven sons. Her influence in Rome was so great that the heathen priests petitioned the Emperor that she might be imprisoned. Authorities do not agree as to under which emperor she was persecuted, some saying Antoninus Pius, and some Marcus Aurelius. The Governor of Rome, Publius, thought he would be able to persuade her to recant by working upon her feelings as a mother; but she refused even to beg for her children's lives, still less for her own. The governor then caused her and her sons to appear before him publicly, and when she still persisted in her refusal to sacrifice to the gods, ordered her to be struck on the face. He then turned to the boys, and asked each separately to renounce his faith and so escape martyrdom, but they one and all remained steadfast. They were sent to prison, waiting the Emperor's orders. He decreed that they should be treated as rebels and enemies of religion, and be executed by different methods. The eldest, Januarius, was beaten with whips loaded with lead; Felix and Philip were killed with clubs; Silianus was thrown headlong from a high place; and the three youngest—Alexander, Vitalis, and Martial—were beheaded. Felicitas was kept in prison, enduring great hardships, and at length she too was beheaded.

Felix I. Pope and martyr, was a Roman by birth. He succeeded Dionysius, in 269. His first act was to depose Paul of Samosate [SAMOSATA, PAUL OF], Bishop of Antioch, who had founded a heresy very similar to that of the Sabellians, and to set up Domnus in his place. At this time he is said to have written a letter to Maximus, Bishop of Alexandria, stating the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation. He was murdered in 274, in the Aurelian persecution, after having himself, as it is said, buried 342 martyrs.

Felix II.—When Liberius, in 355, was banished on his refusal to sign the condemnation of Athesanius, the Arian party made Felix Pope. A petition was soon brought forward for the recall of Liberius, and the Emperor Constantius proposed that the two should hold the See jointly. But the Romans refused to allow this, so Felix was compelled to retire. His fate is unknown. Some hold that his adversaries killed him, others that he rebelled, and others that he died in seclusion at Porto.

Felix III. succeeded Simplicius I. in 483. He is chiefly noticeable as assisting in the first rupture between the Eastern and Western churches. Acacius, the Bishop of Constantinople, being a favourer of the Monophysites [q.v.], persuaded the Emperor Zeno to issue the HENOTICON [q.v.], and deposed the Bishop of Alexandria, setting up Peter Mongus, one of the sect, in his place. The deposed bishop appealed to Rome, so Felix sent two bishops, Messinus and Vitalis, to order his restoration. The legates were corrupted by bribes, and did not fulfil their trust, whereupon Felix called a council of seventy-seven bishops at Rome, and excommunicated Acacius, Peter Mongus, and the legates. This caused a schism, which was not healed till 819. Felix died in 492.

Felix, St., Bishop of Nantes in the sixth century, was descended from an ancient and noble family. He was born at Bourges in 513 was ordained priest in 540, and was chosen Bishop of Nantes after the death of Eunomius, in 550. He assisted at the third Council of Paris in 557, and on his return home endeavoured to enforce the discipline that was decreed by the Council. When King Clothaire took Nantes in 560, he made the Bishop governor of the town, which post he held until the King's death, and then resigned in order to be able to give himself up to his proper work. He was present at the Council of Tours [566], and the fourth Council of Paris [573]. At the latter Council he had a dispute with Archbishop Gregory of Tours, who describes him as careless and boastful, and states that if Felix had been Bishop of Marseilles the Egyptian ships, instead of bringing oil and spices, would have only transported thin paper on which the Bishop could write against the good men of his time. Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers, describes in one of his poems Felix's great success in converting the Saxons round him. Becoming dangerously ill, he nominated his nephew Burgundianus as his successor. But Gregory declared the nomination to be irregular, and refused to consecrate him. Felix died in 584. His day is July 70.
him, so he again hid himself for six months, till the storm was over. After Maximus's death, all wished to elect Felix bishop, but he refused the promotion, and persuaded them to choose Quintus, while he spent the remainder of his life in quietude. The date of his death is not accurately known, some placing it in 256, and some ten years later. He was noted for his great charity, often exchanging his only good coat for beggars' rags in the street. A great many miracles were said to have been done at his tomb. His festival is kept on Jan. 14th.

Felix, Bishop of Treves, lived at the end of the fourth century. He was consecrated in 356, by a synod of Ithacian bishops, or followers of Ithacius, who made himself notorious by persecuting the Priscillians.
The rest of the Catholic bishops refused to recognise Felix as properly consecrated, as the ceremony had been performed by schismatics, and shortly afterwards, when Ithacius had been deposed by a Council convened by St.
Ambrose at Milan, they refused to receive Felix into their communion. This took place about the year 392, and he accordingly resigned his bishopric, and retired to a monastery which he had himself founded near Treves,
and where he died two or three years later.
Notwithstanding his belonging to a party with which the principal Catholic bishops refused to communicate, his name is entered as a saint in the calendar for March 26th.

Felix, Bishop of Urgel, in Catalonia, with the co-operation of Eliipandus, Archbishop of Toledo, was the originator of the theory of Adoption, towards the end of the eighth century. They affirmed that Christ as to His Divinity was truly the Son of God, but that, as man, He was the Son of God in name and by adoption. The sect grew very quickly, and a Council at Narbonne and a Synod [792] at Ratisbon were called to confute it. Charlemagne was present at Ratisbon, and called upon Felix to abjure his error, which at last he was persuaded to do. They did not trust him, however, so he was sent to Rome, where he wore the renunciation of his opinions on St.
Peter's tomb, and was allowed to return to Spain. Before he had been there long, he again relapsed into heresy, and Charlemagne called upon Alcuin to formally refute the errors of the Adoptionists, so a Council was called at Frankfort, at which Felix and his books were condemned. The condemnation was repeated at Friuli in 796, at Rome and at Aix-la-Chapelle in 799. At the latter Council he argued with Alcuin, was convinced, and made an orthodox confession. He was not allowed to return to Urgel, but went to Lyons, where he died in 818.

Fell, John, son of Dr. Samuel Fell, Dean of Christchurch, was born at Sunningwell, near Abingdon, in Berkshire. He was admitted to Christchurch, where he took the degree of Master in 1643, about which time he carried arms for Charles I. at Oxford, and was afterwards made an ensign. He became a clergyman, and was deprived of his preferment by the Parliamentarians in 1648. He
wealth, and had a private congregation of Royalists, to whom he ministered in accordance with the now forbidden Liturgy.
At the Restoration he became Canon, and afterwards Dean of Christchurch, besides being one of Charles II.'s chaplains in ordi-ary. In 1675 he became Bishop of Oxford, and died in 1686. He was very charitable, and a munificent patron of learning,
and greatly promoted the buildings and privileges of the University. He was a good classical scholar and philologist. His chief works were:—The Life of Dr. Hammond; Sermons; Responsio ad Epistolam Thomas Hobbesi, Malavibariensi, etc.

Fellowship.—A foundation in a college, awarded by examination. The Fellow is entitled to a share of the revenues and a voice in the government of his college, and, if he be in holy orders, to presentation to one of the livings attached thereto. Formerly all fellowships ceased on marriage; but of late this rule has been much relaxed, and now nearly all colleges have special rules of their own regarding them.

Feltham, Owen [4. 1610, d. 1678].—The author of Resolves, Divine, Moral, Political; a work which has gone through many editions.
Little is known of his life.

Fénélon, François de Salignac de la
Mothe, was born in Périgord, 1651, died 1715.
He was early destined for the ministry, and made such rapid progress in his studies, that before he was eighteen he was called on by his uncle, the Marquis de Fénélon, to preach before a learned assembly in Paris; but fearing lest the praises bestowed on him should cause vanity, he was sent for several years to the seminary of St. Sulpice, where he passed his time in devotional exercises, and at length took orders in 1675. In 1688 he was made director of an institution in Paris for female converts to the Roman faith, and while here he published his first work, De l'Éducation des Filles, a very well-known book in this country. He formed a friendship with Bossuet, who brought him under the notice of Louis XIV., who was at that time trying to unite the Churches of France; by him Fénélon was sent to Poitou, in 1685, to convert the Protestants. He was appointed by the King tutor to his heir-apparent, the young Duke of Burgundy, a task which he discharged most faithfully, striving to prepare the mind of his pupil for the real business of life, and impressing on him the futility of all earthly glory and power which was not founded on the great principles of justice and truth. In 1694, the King presented him to the Abbey of St. Valery, which he renounced the following year on being made Archbishop of Cambrai. Just at this time began the controversy about Quietism (q.v.), which afterwards brought about his disgrace. In 1687 he formed the acquaintance of the celebrated Madame Guyon, whose piety and exemplary life seemed to have blinded Fenelon to the practical consequences of her doctrines. At first Madame de Maintenon held her in favour, but she was persecuted by Bossuet, and at length the protection afforded her by the former was withdrawn. Bossuet required Fenelon to condemn her doctrines, but instead of this he published a book called Maximes des Saints sur la Vie Intérieure, which was a defence of some, at least, amongst the doctrines of Madame Guyon. Bossuet answered this by publishing a rival treatise, Explication des Maximes des Saints, which was received with universal approval, while his opponent’s work was loudly condemned. The King, already irritated by what he thought were censures on himself in some of Fenelon’s works of fiction, ordered that his book should be submitted to the tribunal of a body of ecclesiastics, of whom Bossuet was one. Fenelon refused to accept him as judge, and the work was then sent to Pope Innocent VIII., who delayed his reply for a long time, and at last, in 1699, came a decision condemning it. Fenelon at once submitted, and signed a renunciation, but it was a severe blow to him. Bossuet was touched by his meekness, and would have sought a reconciliation, but Louis XIV. was just then specially irritated against him on account of the publication of Télémaque. This had originally been written for his pupil, the Duke of Burgundy, and Fenelon had given it to an amanuensis to make a fair copy of it for the prince, but he treacherously made a duplicate copy, which he published without the consent of the author. The King, suspecting that some passages in it were a satire on his court, was furious, and the book was suppressed in France, and Fenelon was forbidden to hold any intercourse with his late pupil. He retired to his own diocese, and there led a quiet life till his death in 1715. Fenelon was a voluminous writer. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote:—Dialogues des Morts, Dialogues sur l’Éloquence, Directions pour la Conscience d’un Roi, Démonstration de l’Existence de Dieu, etc. Many of his works were written for the instruction of his pupil, whom he hoped to see govern with liberal views, but who died two years before his tutor.

Ferial Days.—Days which are neither festivals nor fasts—ordinary week-days. The name has a curious history. Feria, amongst the Romans, were holy-days [hierai, “holy;” and hémerai, “days”], especially marked by the cessation from all work. Some were private, observed by particular families, the others public in honour of the gods. Thus the Lupercalia in honour of Pan were ferial. So were the Nundine (so called because they were kept every ninth day), on which the country people met to buy and sell. Hence the derivation of our word “fair.” In 316, Pope Silvester, because he would not call the days of the week as the Jews did—Sabbatum, Prima Sabbati, Secunda Sabbati, etc., nor by the names of the planets or false gods as the pagans did, called Sunday, Dies Domini; Monday, Feria Prima; Tuesday, Feria Secunda, etc., and Saturday, Dies Sabbati; and said he called them Feria, non quod a necessarius operibus, sed quod a vitios Christiani ferienatur.

Ferrara, Nicholas [b. 1592, d. 1637].—A clergyman of the Established Church, close friend of George Herbert. He was ordained deacon by Laud, while Bishop of St. Davids, in 1626, but never proceeded to priest’s orders. His life was one of devout asceticism, and he devoted his means, which were ample, to pious uses. His house was like a monastery in which he scrupulously observed the hours of sleeping on the floor, and rising at one in the morning. He provided a free school in his neighbourhood, and regularly taught in it. [Life by Jebb and Mayor, 1855.]

Ferrara, Robert. [Farhar.]

Ferrara, Council of.—Summoned by Pope Eugenius IV. in 1438, in opposition to the Council of Basle, and with a view to restoring union between the Latin and Greek Churches. The four questions proposed were:—I. The Procession of the Holy Ghost, whether from the Father alone, or likewise from the Son. II. The use of leavened or unleavened bread in the Eucharist. III. Purgatory. IV. The Supremacy of the Pope. On account of the plague the Council was transferred to Florence. [Florence, Council of.]

Ferry Law.—The law passed in France under the guidance of Jules Ferry, in 1871, after a very bitter contest, which prohibited the members of any not recognised religious association to be the teachers of a public school. It was aimed at the Jesuits, and had the effect of closing twenty-seven of the colleges, and stopping 850 teachers. [Gallica Church.]

Festivals.—The origin of these is very ancient, as well among the pagans as among the Jews and Christians. The observance may be said to come naturally, as does external worship. The simple fact that we are visible and material creatures implies visible worship, and the same object which sought by it, namely, to manifest and heighten inward devotion, is that which is intend by the observance of festivals. Some of those of Christianity were probably instituted in the earliest ages, others were afterwards added at different times. The first day of the week, as the day of the Lord's Resurrection, was kept holy ever since the Apostles' times. Upon this day, as Justin Martyr observes, the Christians used to meet for public prayer and the receiving the Eucharist. Of the chief festivals of the Church account will be found under their respective headings. They are, first of all, those connected with the principal events of the Saviour's life. Some are "immovable feasts," as Christmas Day, which always falls on Dec. 25th; others are movable, as Easter, and Whitsun-tide, which depends on Easter. They are fully given at the beginning of the Book of Common Prayer. Then come festivals of Apostles and Evangelists, and of Christ's forerunner, John the Baptist. There is one in commemoration of the Holy Angels, Sept. 29th, and one dedicated to All Saints, Nov. 1st. Those festivals which have a special Collect, etc., for the Communion, are Red-Letter Days (q.v.), the others Black-Letter Days.

The Christian festivals are chiefly designed for Divine Worship, and since business and labour are hindrances to this purpose, these are ordered to be forborne upon the great holidays. This laying aside work and employment with respect to Sunday was turned into a law by Constantine the Great, which regulation was confirmed by succeeding princes. However, working is not forbidden upon festivals, and here the practice is not the same in all places. Among many Nonconforming bodies, festivals are little observed except as holidays. The festivals in the Roman rubrics are distinguished into annual festivals, solemn majors, solemn minors, doubles, semi-doubles, and simples.

The Mahometan festivals are fewer in number than either those of the Jews or Christians. Friday is the Mahometan's day of rest, as being the day upon which Mahomet was born. On this day they meet for public prayer, and keep it with the same solemnity as the Christians do Sunday, and the Jews Saturday, praying six times, whereas upon other days they are not obliged to say above five prayers. Besides Friday, they have their Easter or Bairam, and two other solemn festivals; the first, called the Festival of Sacrifices, is kept on the tenth day of the last month of the year; the second comes up at the end of the fast of the month Ramadhan, and stands on the first day of the month Chevut; no sacrifices are offered during this festival, it being only distinguished by some particular prayers said in the mosques. They have also some festivals upon particular occasions, as prayers for the prospering of their arms, for rain, or fair weather, for discharging their vows, and in memory of some of their predecessors.

Fetichism or Fetish-worship.—The word fetich comes from the Portuguese feticho, feitio, "magic," "charm," or "oracle," and it is the term the negroes of Western Africa, where the Portuguese were the first European traders, applied to their religion. The word was brought into use in Europe by De Broose, in his book Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches, published in 1760. The term fetichism may be explained as worship rendered to objects of art or nature, to animate or inanimate bodies, or their qualities—in fact, anything to which a magical power is ascribed. Thus superstition might cause a piece of wood, a horn of a goat, a certain plant, etc., to become a fetish in the eyes of a savage who thinks that it exercises any influence upon him, and then this fetish becomes his idol. Fetishism is identical with a belief in charms, and the poor savage will not unfrequently destroy his fetish if it does not favour his wishes.

Feuerbach, Ludwig A. [b. 1804, d. 1872].—A Rationalist teacher of Germany. He was a disciple of Hegel, but forsook him, and started for himself as a Materialist, holding that God is a creation of the human intellect, which forms an ideal of its own. His principal work was translated by Miss Evans ("George Eliot"), under the title of Essence of Christianity.

Feuillans.—A monastery near Toulouse, founded towards the end of the sixteenth century by Jean de la Barrière [b. 1544, d. 1600]. He was a Cistercian, and his new sect was only a reformation of the Order. Barrière became Abbot of Feuillans in 1574. There was much opposition on the part of the Cistercians, but in 1586 Pope Sixtus V. confirmed their reforms and fortified all interference with them, and in 1595 they were formed into a separate congregation. Nunneries, on the same principle, were also formed, the nuns being called the Feuillan-ines.

Fiacre, St., son of Eugenius IV., King of the Scots, was probably born about 606. He was educated by Conanus, Bishop of Man, who inspired him with the desire of a secluded life. He went with his sister to France, and was received with great kindness by the Bishop of Meaux, who entrusted him with the erection of an oratory near the forest of Fordile. It was dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and became a favourite resort of pilgrims. Upon his father's death a message was sent him urging him to take the crown, but he refused to give up his life of solitude, and lived at Meaux till his death in 670. He was buried in the cathedral, and his name is associated with many miracles supposed to have been wrought by him both before and after his death.

Lessing, whose first theories involved the principle that by “God” is meant the Moral Government of the World—that in this sense, and in this only, the belief in God is true and needful. Later in life he approached Christian views. His Destinatio of Man, Way towards the Blessed Life, etc., were attempts to formulate views and convictions for himself concerning Christianity, and he so far succeeded as to realise that it is something more than a code of morals. How far it was a symbolic presentment or historic fact he never seems entirely to have settled. He had been an enthusiastic admirer of the French Revolution, and this lay at the bottom of much of the movement of his mind. He was continually at work upon the inquiry—what was needed to make him free, to enable him to fulfiil his destiny? And this inquiry led to a conviction that he needed a true God, one who was not evolved from his own mind, but who was above him. His contemporaries charged him with inconsistency. He could only answer that he must have what he required, and could not do without a personal Lord. And the purity and nobleness of his life was the best attestation of his earnestness, and of the path by which he was being more and more guided towards the eternal Truth. He died in a career of brave self-devotion, of pestilence caught in ministering to the sick and wounded on the battle-field. His son, Immanuel Hermann Fichte (d. 1879), was an influential Christian teacher.

Field, Richard, noted for his book on the Church, was born at Hempstead, in Hertfordshire, in 1561. He became a student at Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1577, from whence, after taking his B.A. degree, he moved to Magdalen Hall, where he became M.A., and afterwards Bachelor and Doctor of Divinity. While at the University he spent much time in controversy between the Churches of England and Rome. In 1598 he was made rector of Burghclere and chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth. James I. made him a prebendary of Windsor, and in 1610 Dean of Gloucester. He was a great friend of Hooker, and was noted for his good preaching, his learning, and his powers of controversial argument. The first four books of his great work Of the Church were printed in 1606, and four years after a fifth appeared, with an appendix, containing “A Defence of passages of such of the former books that have been excepted against or wrested to the maintenance of Romish errors.” He also published a sermon preached before the King at Whitehall, 1604. He died November, 1616, and was buried in the outer chapel of St. George, at Windsor.

Fifth-Monarchy Men.—A set of enthusiasts in Cromwell’s time, who said that Christ would come personally to reign on earth and establish a “Fifth Universal Monarchy,” and that, until that time, His saints would provisionally administer the civil government, and that no single person should be allowed to rule any kingdom.

Filioque Controversy.—The words et Filio or Filioque, in the phrase “Who proceed from the Father and the Son,” which appear in the Nicene Creed as it is used in the Western Church, are traced by some to the Council of Braga in 411; by others to that held at Toledo in 889. The Eastern Church has always refused to receive them; and though they were gradually adopted by the Churches of the West, yet Pope Leo III., resolutely declined to approve of the alteration, and ordered a copy of the creed without the interpolated words to be engraved on silver plates and set up in St. Peter’s. Subsequent Popes, however, insisted on the insertion of the phrase, and demanding obedience to their mandates, provoked the great schism between the Churches of the East and the West, A.D. 1014. For the Greek Church, asserting with truth that the creed, as it stands without these words, had received the sanction of the Ecumenical Councils of Ephesus [A.D. 431], and Chaledon [A.D. 451], as well as that of Constantinople, declared its conclusion that the insertion was a deprivation of the Creed, and a departure from the orthodox faith. [GREEK CHURCH.]

Finnan, an Irishman by birth, and Culdee monk [Bishop of Lindisfarne 562, died 661], had great success as a missionary among the heathen English, and was an uncompromising opponent of the Roman ritual which Augustina and his companions were desirous of enforcing throughout Britain.

Fire-worship. [PARSEEISM.]

Firmilian was Bishop of Cessara in Cappadocia, in the third century, and a disciple of Origen. He took a prominent part in the Council of Iconium in 256, where he and another Eastern bishops met against the Montanists, and decreed the necessity of the baptism of converted heretics, as their former baptism being performed by a heretic, was not valid. Pope Stephen I., not approving of this decree, deprived the bishops that made it of the Sees. Firmilian wrote a letter to Cyril in which he speaks very severely of the Pope. Roma Church historians have vainly endeavoured to suppress this letter, or have declared it forgery. Firmilian died at Tarsus in 260.

First-fruits.—It became a custom early in the Christian Church to dedicate the first-fruits to God. It was at first quite voluntary, but when the idea became established that the clergy were entitled to all the rights of the Levites, the giving of first-fruits began to be considered obligatory, and a the Council of Friuli [791] Malachi iii. 10 was quoted as a proof of this. The first-fruits of corn and wine were the chief, but presents clothes, alms, etc., were also made, to be distributed to the poor. The amount given ranged between one-sixtieth and one-fourtieth.

In the English Church before the Reformation, the Pope used to give English benefices to foreigners, on condition that he should receive the first year's produce. He also made the patrons force their clergy to pay them. When King Henry VIII. declared himself head of the English Church, he took these first-fruits for himself. They came to the Crown until the reign of Queen Anne, who applied them to adding to the small livings, and thus formed what is now known as Queen Anne's Bounty.

Fish.—This was a very common symbol in early Christian art. It is frequently found in the Roman Catacombs, which probably contain the oldest Christian monuments in existence. The explanation of the fish is that its Greek name, ICHTHUS, forms an acrostic, the first letters being the initials of the words Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς Θεοῦ Υἱὸς Σωτὴρ, i.e., "Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour."

Fisher, John, Bishop of Rochester, was born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, in 1459. He studied at Michael House (now Queen's) College, Cambridge, of which he became master in 1495. He was afterwards confessor and chaplain to Margaret, Countess of Richmond, Henry VII.'s mother, whom he is said to have persuaded to found St. John's and Christ's Colleges, at Cambridge, and also divinity professorships at both Universities. He himself was the first Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. In 1504 he became Bishop of Rochester. When Henry VIII. came to the throne, Fisher was in great favour until 1527, when the King applied to the bishops for help in his divorce. All of them declared in favour except Fisher. Again in 1534 he alone stood out against Henry in the matter of the King's supremacy. Sometimes he led him into mistakes, as in the case of the Maid of Kent, whom he knew to be an impostor, and yet did not expose. He was found guilty of treason, but the King did not proceed against him until he and Sir Thomas More refused to take the oath of supremacy, and he was thrown into prison. Pope Clement, as a reward for his fidelity, gave him a cardinal's hat, which so incensed the King that Fisher was beheaded on Tower Hill on June 22nd, 1535.

FIVE-MILE ACT. The, passed in 1665, was one of the four Acts known as the "Clarendon Code," which were framed to deprive the ejected clergy of a means of earning their livelihood by preaching or teaching. It enacted that all who taught should take the oath of non-resistance, and swear not to try to make any alterations in Church or State, and that no Nonconforming minister should come within five miles of any town where he had been a minister, except when travelling.

Flagon.—The vessel in which the wine for the Holy Communion is contained previous to being poured into the chalice for consecration.

Flavel, John [b. 1627, d. 1691].—A Nonconformist minister. He was born in Worcestershire, educated at University College, Oxford, ordained at Salisbury, and appointed, in the days of the Parliament, first incumbent of Deptford, then of Dartmouth. In 1662 he was deprived, and retired to Devonshire. Under James II.'s declaration of the dispensing power, he returned to Dartmouth, and refused to quit his charge there for a richer post in London. He was through life a great student, and wrote several works, of which Husbandry Spiritualised is still read.
Flavian, Bishop of Constantinople, was noted for his great piety. He was a priest and treasurer of the great church, when he was chosen successor to Proclus in 447. He refused to make the customary present to Chrysaphius, favourite of the Emperor Theodosius, after his election, who in revenge endeavoured to deprive him of his See. In Flavian's time the Eutychian heresy sprang up, which he condemned in a synod at Constantinople; for which he was deposed in 449 in another pseudo-synod, held at Ephesus by Dioscorus of Alexandria, and he died on his way into exile at Epipa, in Lydia. Afterwards, when the heresy was suppressed, his remains were brought to Constantinople and buried in the church of the Apostles. [EUTYCHIANS.]

Fléchier, Esprit, Bishop of Nismes, was born in 1632 at Pernes, in Venaissin, near Avignon. His uncle, Father Hercules Daudefret, was general of the congregation of the "Fathers of Christian Doctrine," so Esprit was educated here, and when he left he became famous for his panegyrics on the saints, and for his funeral orations, in which he is said to rival, or even to excel, Bossuet. He was ordained, and became a tutor, and in 1673 was chosen one of the Forty of the French Academy in place of Godeau, Bishop of Vence. In 1685 he went to convert the Protestants in Poitou and Brittany, and on his return became Bishop of Lavaur, where he only remained two years, being translated to the See of Nismes, where he remained till his death in 1710. During his episcopate the Edict of Nantes was revoked, and this was followed by cruel persecutions of the Huguenots. Fléchier was very mild and tolerant, and carried out his orders with as much temperance as possible, so that he was beloved both by Catholics and Protestants. He was very charitable, and at his death left over twenty thousand crowns to the poor. His works were collected and published in 1782. The chief were the Lives of Cardinals Xinemos and Commandon, and of Theodosius the Great. Of his funeral orations the most famed are those on Madame D'Aiguillon and Marshal Turenne.

Fleetwood, John.—The author of a Life of Christ, which was very popular in the last century, but worthless as a critical work, being a mere compilation and paraphrase of the Gospels. Nothing is known of him, and it is probable that the name was assumed.

Fleetwood, William [b. 1650, d. 1723], Bishop of St. Asaph [1706] and of Ely [1714], a very learned prelate, and famous as a preacher. His sermons were reprinted in 1854.

Fletcher, Giles. A religious poet, son of Dr. Giles Fletcher, and nephew to Richard Fletcher, Bishop of London. He was born at Cranbrook, in Kent, about 1584. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. He remained at Cambridge, where he became a noted preacher, till 1617, and then was presented to the living of Alderton, in Suffolk, where he died in 1623. He is chiefly celebrated for his poem, Christ's Victoria, which he published in 1610. It is certainly a very remarkable work; its style shows that he was greatly influenced by Spenser.

Fletcher, John William, the companion of John Wesley, was a Swiss by birth and education. His real name was Jean Guillaume de la Flèchère. He received his early education in his native place, Nyon, and then went for seven years to the Academy of Geneva. From childhood he had a tender conscience and devout spirit, and desired to become a Christian minister; but when he was twenty his views considerably changed, and he sought a military career instead. Against the wishes of his parents, he went to Lisbon and enlisted, receiving a captain's commission in the Portuguese service. He was just about to sail for Brazil when an accident—the upsetting of some boiling water over his legs—prevented him. On his recovery he returned to Switzerland, but shortly after set out for Flanders where his uncle had procured a commission for him; but again his plans were frustrated by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle terminating the war, and by the death of his uncle. Fletcher now determined to go to England and after eighteen months spent in learning the language at the school of Mr. Burchell a Hatfield, he became tutor in the family of Mr. Hill, of Tern Hall, in Shropshire, whose post he held for seven years. It was while living in Mr. Hill's family that Fletcher came under the influences which determined his whole future course. He was led by a casual conversation to go and hear the Methodist and soon joined himself to them. The exact date of his joining is not certain, but in 1756 he was a member of one of their classes. He was urged by some of his friends to enter the ministry, but having doubts as to his own fitness he asked the advice of John Wesley, who strongly recommended Fletcher's being ordained. Accordingly, on Sunday, March 6th, he received deacon's orders from the Bishop of Hereford, and the following Sunday was ordained priest by the Bishop of Bangor, licensed as curate to the parish of Madele in Shropshire; this appointment was, however, merely nominal, Fletcher still retaining his tutorship in Mr. Hill's family. He, however, often read prayers and preached in the Methodist chapels of London, and formed acquaintance of Charles Wesley and Whitfield, the Countess of Huntingdon, and other Mr. Hill offered his tutor the living of Dadham, in Cheshire, but Fletcher refused it on the ground that there was "too much mo and too little labour;" Mr. Chambre, of Madeley, was then appointed to Dunham, and Fletcher became the incumbent of Madeley. This was in 1760, and here he laboured till his death in 1785. The inhabitants of his parish were a very rough class, and little or nothing had been done to raise and improve them. Fletcher worked hard amongst them, and preached in a fearless manner, often at a risk to his life from some of the most violent of his flock. In 1768 he undertook the management of Lady Huntingdon's College at Trevecca, but he did not give up his own parish, and he resigned his presidency in 1771 on account of the Calvinist controversy. Wesley was an Arminian and Whitfield a Calvinist, and naturally they could not always act in harmony. Fletcher was an Arminian, and most of his writings are against Calvinism and in defence of Wesley. Wesley always grudged Fletcher to his obscure parish of Madeley, and wanted him to take up itinerant preaching, and in 1773 he proposed that Fletcher should succeed him in the direction of the Methodist preachers and societies, but he did not feel equal to the task; his health was failing him, and for a time he was obliged to give up his work, and lived abroad for three and a half years. In 1781 he married, and returned to Madeley. Sunday-schools were just being formed in the end, and Fletcher at once organised one for his flock. His labours in his parish were greatly blessed. Wesley says that if he had had physical strength, he would have been the most eloquent preacher in England; his personal character and earnestness of devotion were sermons in themselves. His principal work is Five Checks to Antinomianism.

Fleury, Claude [b. 1660, d. 1723], Abbé de l'Académie, writer of many works, of which his Ecclesiastical History, in 20 vols., is the greatest. Part of it was translated by Dr. J. H. New- man in 1842. Fleury's work extended to 114, and was continued by Fabre to 1384.

Fliedner, Theodor, D.D.—The renovator of the Order of Deaconesses in Protestant Communi- ons [b. near Wiesbaden, 1800; d. 1864]. He was a simple-hearted, pious man, with great- ers of work, and skill in organisation, his first cure was at Kaiserswerth. His flock was a very small one, the bulk of the population being Roman Catholic, and as his people were early starved, owing to depression of trade, undertook in 1822 to go about begging for them, the result of which was that he gained large knowledge of Christian organisations, hospitals, almshouses, and the like, and of the spirit needed to keep them alive. This knowledge he put to use on his return, and while made permanent arrangements for the benefit of his flock at Kaiserswerth, he proceeded to arrange wider means of good. He visited both America and the Holy Land, visited the Anglican Bishop of Jerusalem in founding a house of deaconesses at Jerusalem, and, by the help of the King and Queen of Prussia, founded a Christian hospital with deaconesses at Berlin. Daughters of the mother institution at Kaiserswerth sprang up on all sides, and now the institution is established on a successful basis nearly all over Europe. [Deaconesses.]

Florence, Councilor.—This Council was removed from Ferrara, on account of an outbreak of the plague; it had been summoned by Pope Eugenius IV., in opposition to that of Basle, as he could not agree with the Fathers there assembled. The Emperor of the East, John VI., Paleologus, and the Patriarch, and the most noted persons of the Greek Church, attended the Council, at which also the Pope and his cardinals were present. Champions were chosen on each side: on the Latin, Cardinal Julian Cassarini, and John, the Provincial General of the Dominican Order in Lombardy; on the Greek, Isidore of Russia and Cardinal Bossarion. After two fine harangues made by this last, on the Procession of the Holy Ghost, all the Greeks subscribed to the belief of the Western Church, except Mark, Bishop of Ephesus. Afterwards some other matters relating to Purgatory were determined, and a union between the Greek and Latin Church concluded; but the conduct of the Eastern bishops not being approved by their party when they returned home, prevented the agreement from taking any effect. The Abyssinian Church and the Jacobites desired to be comprehended in this union; this was in 1439. The Acts of the Council of Florence were signed on the part of the Latins by the Pope, eight cardinals, two Patriarchs, two bishops, ambassadors of the Duke of Burgundy, eight archbishops, forty-seven bishops, four heads of orders, forty-one abbots, and the Archdeacon of Troyes; on the part of the Greeks, by the Emperor, three Patriarchs, nineteen archbishops and bishops, the dignitaries of the Church of Constantinople, the head of the Imperial monastery, and four abbots. [Papal Schism.]

Florence of Worcester.—A chronicler who lived in the twelfth century. His work, Chronicon Chronicorum, beginning with the history of the world, reached to his own time (i.e. 1118). Another monk of the same monastery carried it on to 1163. Florence also wrote a treatise on the royal family of England.

Florinus.—A Roman priest of the second century, who had been a disciple of Polycarp, but who joined Blastus in publishing a book containing heretical doctrines. He declared that God was the author of evil. Pope Victor excommunicated Florinus and Blastus, who nevertheless contrived to gain many followers of their heresy. Irenaeus wrote to him, seeking to overthrow his arguments, and afterwards went to Rome on purpose to hold a conference with him; in the course of this he reminded him that Polycarp, who had taught them both, had held no such heretical opinions. Florinus afterwards joined the sect of the Valentinians.

Florus, surnamed Magister of Diaconus, lived at Lyons during the ninth century, and took an active part in theological controversy. He opposed vehemently the doctrine of Transubstantiation as set forth by Paschasius Radbertus. Most of his writings were on the subject of Predestination, which he declared to be twofold—one of the Elect to everlasting life, and another of sinners to everlasting death. He was appointed by the Church at Lyons to write against Scoto Erigena on this subject, and accordingly wrote in 852 his Liber adversus Joh. Scotti erroneous definitions. Florus was present at the Council of Chiersy in 849, when Predestination was the subject discussed. He wrote many letters with reference to the contest between Agobard and Amalarius, and other theological works.

Fo-ism.—China is the birthplace of the oldest institutions known in history. It was an ancient nation before Athenian influence or Roman conquest began. The religion of this wonderful people has taken a threefold form:—1. The State religion, Confucianism [Confucius]; 2. Tao-ism [q.v.]; and 3. Fo-ism, or Chinese Buddhism. The name Fo is the first syllable of Foct-ta = Buddha. It is of later date than either of the others, and, in fact, owes its origin to their failure. One of them had succeeded in imparting form to Chinese society, but it was altogether secularist, and tended continually to ignore everything invisible. The other was mystic and wild in its imaginations, becoming more and more a system of demonology. It was while brooding sadly over the deficiencies of these religious systems that the Emperor Ming-te, about A.D. 60, is said to have seen a vision of a gigantic and glorious figure. Consulting his Ministers of State upon it, they bade him seek over the western mountains for the interpretation. A deputation was accordingly sent, which returned accompanied by a Hindu teacher, who brought with him a collection of sacred books and a portrait of Sakya-Mouni. [Buddhism.] And thus Buddhism gained a footing in China, though it has never displaced the old religion. Some monarchs patronised, others persecuted it as a foreign religion. But the growing intercourse with India was favourable to the growth of Buddhism, which culminated with the fall of the Mongol dynasty in 1368. But the transcendentalism which characterises the Buddhism of India forms no part of the Foism of the Chinese. There was probably no room for it in the matter-of-fact worldly sharpness of the Chinese character. The only genuine devotees are the monks and mendicants. The rest of the professors are expected to confide in some particular Buddha to reverence the books, to abstain from gross vice, to support the monks. The devotees of Fo recognise the excellence of the Confucian morality, but hold Fo superior to Confucius as being an object of worship. The distinctions between Fo-ism and the Lamasism of Thibet will be considered under LAMAISM [q.v.]. Unlike other forms of Buddhism, Fo-ism has no regular, graduated hierarchy, and, though, as we have said, a worship of Fo is recognised, it is of a shadowy character—almost impalpable. Ethical writings are devoid of reference to his personal rule, and there are no precepts on duties owed to him. When the Buddhist monk is called to his devotions by the sound of the wooden bell, he utters the aspiration that "all living creatures may become enlightened"; there is no address to the Supreme, no sympathy even with good in the struggle against evil. Yet China is studded with Fo-ist temples, in which the colossal form of Buddha and two attendants are almost always seen; many of these, however, are in ruins, and the offerings at most meagre. Flowers and perfumes are offered to him. But, generally speaking, it is not the Buddha of India, Sakya-Mouni. He is superseded by Amitabha, or Omct (i.e. "Infinite Light"), who is held to be the more perfect Buddha than Sakya-Mouni who is thought to have retired into deep abstraction. To Amitabha, enthroned for ever on a lotus, the Fo-ist looks for deliverance from evil, and hopes to enter into his paradise. The history of this change of deities is obscure, but there seems strong reason to believe that the Christian missions in the seventh and following centuries had much to do with it. Fo-ism is a flexible creed, an when Christian preachers—Latin, Nestorian and others—dared to plant their missions at Peking, the speculation which they excited the Chinese mind seems to have led to a considerable adoption of Christian phraseology and some mingling with the ancient faith. The same thing showed itself some years late in the case of the Taeping Rebellion. Son of the descriptions of Amitabha’s paradise a apparently borrowed from the Book of Revelation [see Christ and other Masters, by Hanwick, vol. II., p. 102], only the central thought of the New Testament is omitted altogether—namely, the primary necessity of holiness of heart and life as the condition blessedness. Thus, whereas faith in Amitabha is declared to be absolutely necessary to him who will be delivered from evil, as the phraseology seems clearly to echo parts St. Paul’s Epistles, there is no hint of failure resulting in repentance or good works: the monks of Fo-ism are said, indeed, to surpass their pupils in the puerility of their superstitions and the immorality of their lives.
Foliot, Gilbert, Bishop of Hereford, and afterwards of London, lived in the twelfth century, and was concerned in the controversy between Archbishop Becket and King Henry II., siding with the latter. We first hear of Foliot as opposing Becket's election to the primacy. Some accused him of wanting the archbishopric himself, or the removal of the Metropolitan See from Canterbury to London. He was a pious, austere man, and of great learning. In 1164 Foliot went as ambassador to Rome (while Becket was in exile in France), to defend the King's cause, and to accuse the Archbishop of resistance against him, and on his return to England, he sequestered the archbishopric of Canterbury. In 1169, when Becket was recalled, Foliot was excommunicated, and had to go to Rome to have the sentence removed. When the King did penance in 1174 for Becket's murder, Foliot preached the sermon, in which he said the King was guiltless, but that his words had been misinterpreted. He died in 1187.

Folkestone Ritual Case.—This was the first case tried under the Public Worship Regulation Act, and being regarded by both sides as a test case, was elaborately argued first before the judge, Lord Penzance, and then (his sentence being appealed against) before the Privy Council. The "three aggrieved parishioners" made their representation on Aug. 10th, 1875, the case was heard on Jan. 4th and 5th following, and judgment was given by Lord Penzance on Feb. 3rd. The matters complained of were the following:—

The use of lighted candles when not required for purposes of light.
* The wearing of alb and chasuble.
* The mixing of water with the Sacramental wine.
* The use of wafer bread.
* The standing eastward during the consecration prayer.
* The singing the Agnus Dei after it.
Communicating with one person only.
A procession between Matins and the Communion Service.
A procession round the church at evening service.
* The placing of a crucifix (with candles) on the rood screen.

Lord Penzance condemned each of these points, but the incumbent (Rev. C. J. Ridsdale) only appealed upon the four marked thus.* The case of these four was argued in Jan. and Feb., 1877, and on May 12th the judgment was delivered. It is a most elaborate and carefully worded document, expressed with great moderation and gentleness. It forbade the use of the vestments [q.v.], considered the wafer bread not proven against the incumbent, allowed the Eastward Position, and pronounced the crucifix unlawful, as having been placed without a faculty, but guarded the judgment by stating that the Ordinary had a discretion in the matter, resting on his judgment whether such an ornament would be likely to be turned to superstitious uses. A correspondence between the Archbishop and Mr. Ridsdale ensued, in the course of which the latter declared that though he could not conscientiously admit the authority of the court, yet he should feel bound to obey the admonition of the Archbishop, if he would give him written authority to discontinue the practices in dispute. The authority was given, and peace was at once restored.

Followers of the Lord Jesus.—The name of a congregation so returned in the Registrar-General's Report.

Font.—The vessel which contains the water for the administration of Holy Baptism. As that sacrament is the admission into the spiritual temple, the Church of Christ, so it is natural that the instrument and symbol of baptism should be placed near the chief entrance or extreme west of the material temple. Great varieties of form and arrangement are found in ancient fonts, many of them being exquisite both in design and execution, showing that the greatest care and art had been lavished on them; and these have often been preserved through the successive changes which have come on the surrounding buildings. Thus it happens that we have many more Norman fonts than Norman churches. The first well-defined shape which the font assumes is that of a circular tub-shaped vessel, with little grace of form. Some of these may be Saxon. Many are certainly Norman. [Baptism; Baptistry.]

Fontevraud, Order of.—A religious Order of both men and women, founded by Robert of Arbrisele in 1093, under the title of Pateras Christi. The rules were very severe, involving total abstinence from flesh and wine. At one time there were a great number of devotees of this Order, and in fact it lasted until the great Revolution, when it was abolished.

Footpace.—The name given to the broad step immediately round the Lord's Table.

Forbes, Alexander Penrose, D.C.L. [b. 1817, d. 1875], Bishop of Brechin, one of the most able and learned theologians of his day, was the son of the eminent judge, Lord Medwyn. He went out to India, but his health becoming impaired, returned to England and became a student at Brasenose College, Oxford. He took his degree in 1844, and was ordained in Scotland, but soon after was appointed to the curacy of St. Saviour's, Leeds. After two years he was elected Bishop of Brechin, which post he held for almost thirty years. Bishop Forbes was an able and active writer, and an acute controversialist, his chief works being commentaries on the Canticles, the Penticential Psalms, the 'Te Deum, and the Writings of the Fathers. He also wrote explanations of the Nicene Creed and the Thirty-nine Articles.
He was the principal leader of what was called the "Catholic School" in Scotland, and a warm supporter of the old Scottish Communion office, for which he was severely censured by some of his countrymen. But even greater than his literary ability was his deep spirituality of character, which gave extraordinary power to his preaching, and it was remarkable that his Presbyterian neighbours were all proud of him, and testified their respect by crowding to his funeral. "He was a man," said Mr. Gladstone, "of devoted life and labour, of wide learning, of balanced mind, uniting with a strong grasp of Catholic principles the spirit of a true historic student,
and a genuine zeal for literary culture."

Forbes, John, a Scotch Episcopalian writer, was the son of Patrick Forbes, Bishop of Aberdeen. He was born in 1593, studied at Heidelberg, and in 1619 was appointed Professor of Divinity to Aberdeen University, a professorship founded by his father. During the struggle between the Episcopalians and Presbyterians he showed great toleration, but as one of the "Aberdeen Doctors" carried on a dispute with the Covenanters. In 1640 he was deprived of his office, and went to Holland, where he remained till 1646. While here he carried on a debate with Vossius, the celebrated Dutch scholar [Vossius, Gerard], whether St. Augustine's opinion concerning Grace was agreeable to the doctrine of the Church in all ages. Forbes died in 1648, two years after his return to Aberdeen. His chief works are in favour of toleration, as "Irenicum Amatorius Veritatis et Paeis in Ecclesia Scotiana" [1629] and "A Peaceable Warning to the Subjects in Scotland" [1638]. He also wrote Instructiones Historico-Theologice.

Formosus, Bishop of Porto, in Etruria, in the ninth century, succeeded Stephen V. as Pope. In 878 he had been excommunicated, with many others, by Pope John VIII., for having contested with the Pope the election of a new emperor, but Martin II. removed the sentence, and reinstated him in his See in 882. In February, 891, Formosus crowned Stephen V. as Pope, and when the latter died, later in the year, Formosus was elected as his successor. The election met with much opposition at Rome, for in the first place it was counter to the canonical law that bishops should be translated from one See to another, and the fact that Formosus had previously been degraded and excommunicated was an additional reason against his claim. Besides this, a contrary faction had fixed upon Sergino as the new Pope, and were about to crown him when the partisans of Formosus interposed and persisted in inaugurating him.
In 892 Formosus crowned Lambert, son of King Guido of Italy, as his father's colleague, but soon afterwards invited Arnulf, King of Germany, to take the crown, and actually crowned him at Rome in 895. Formosus died in 896, and his body was treated with great indignity by Stephen VI., who had long wished to occupy the Papal See.

Formulary.—A compilation of prayers or articles of belief. The Prayer Book may be called a formulary, as it contains the rites, ceremonies, and prescribed forms of the Church.

Fossari, or Fossores ["Diggers"]—Men appointed by the early Church to bury the dead. This duty was at first performed voluntarily by the Christian brethren, but as Christianity spread it was found necessary to appoint men for the purpose, and this was done by the presbyters of the tituli of Rome
at the people's expense.

Foster, John [b. 1768, d. 1843].—A Baptist minister, best known for his excellent Essays.
These were published in 1805, and comprise:
1. On a Man's writing Memoirs of Himself;
2. On Decision of Character; 3. On the Ap-application of the Epithet Romantic; 4. On some of the Causes by which Evangelical Religion has been rendered less acceptable to Persons of Cultu-rated Taste. These have passed through many editions, and are still considered models of clearness and purity in English style.

Fox, George, the founder of the Society of Friends [q.v.], was born at Drayton, in Leicestershire, in 1624. He began by keeping sheep, and then was apprenticed to a shoemaker in Nottingham, till he was nineteen,
when his religious impressions became so strong that he gave up his work, and wandered through the country. His friends persuaded him to return home, where he stayed for a short time, but again in 1646 he left them. He discontinued his attendance at public worship, saying that it had been revealed to him that it was not education, but the presence of God in the heart, that qualified for the ministry. He first began teaching his doctrine at Manchester in 1648, and at the same time started the customs peculiar to his folwowers, e.g. the adoption of the terms "thee" and "thou," the refusal to take any oaths, and the discontinuance of all tokens of respect,
as taking off the hat, and using the word
"sir." These customs, quite as much as his religious opinions in themselves, were causes of his persecution. After preaching at Manchester, he travelled through the midland counties, exhorting the people to give up all forms of vice and adopt the Christian graces. His followers were first known by the name of "Quakers" at Derby, in 1650. The rest of his life was taken up by teaching and imprisonment. In 1655 he was brought before Cromwell, who dismissed him, pronouncing his character and doctrine to be blameless. In 1671 he went to America, where he remained two years. On his return to England, he was imprisoned at Worcester, and then went to Holland and North Germany, where his tenets took a firm root. He died in London, Jan. 13th, 1691.

Fox was not an educated man, nor a clever man in the ordinary sense, and is held up to bitter ridicule by Macaulay, who was, however, one of the last to appreciate enthusiasm and self-sacrifice like his. There is, indeed, some reason to think that at times he was, if not actually disordered in mind, on the verge of being so. But with all its vices and occasional sheer nonsense, his Journal is at the bottom a noble book, abounding in passages of the most genuine piety; and his chief and foremost doctrine, of the indwelling and teaching of the Holy Spirit in the heart and conscience of every man, was one peculiarly needing to be enforced in the times in which he lived.

Fox, Richard [b. 1466, d. 1528], Bishop successively of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester, founder of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and the patron of Cardinal Wolsey, whom he made his chaplain, and who is said to have ungratefully done his best to supplant his benefactor in the royal favour. The beautiful chantry of Fox is one of the most interesting objects in Winchester Cathedral.

Foxe, John, the martyrlogist, was born at Boston, in Lincolnshire, in 1517. He became student at Brasenose College, Oxford, in 1533, and was afterwards elected Fellow of Magdalen College. He early showed an inclination for Latin poetry, and was well versed in the fathers and Church history. In 1545 he adopted the principles of the Reformation, and was expelled from his college in consequence. He became tutor in Sir Thomas Lucy's family, and to the Earl of Surrey's children, but on his accession of Queen Mary he fled the country and went to Basle. He returned to England in 1559, where he received a prebendal stall at Salisbury, the living of Cripple gate, and a stall at Durham. The probable cause of his not receiving more preferment, is that he was a rigid Calvinist, and refused to subscribe the Canons of the Church. He died 1587, and was buried in the church of St. Iles, Cripplegate. The work for which John Foxe is famed is his History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church, commonly known as Foxe's Book of Martyrs. He received the help of Cranmer and others, and took eleven ears to complete it. The first English edition appeared in 1563. It was ordered to be put on the table of every high dignitary of the church, and in all colleges, etc., and it has gone through many editions. Foxe is the author of some other treatises, both in Latin and English. There is a Latin play of his extant, entitled de Christo Triumphante.

Francis, Sr., the founder of the Order of the Franciscans [q.v.], was born at Assisi, Umbria, in 1182. He was first christened John, but when his father, Peter Bernardini, who had been trading in France, returned, he changed the name to Francesco. In his youth he was gay and fond of pleasure, but seems from the first to have been generous to the poor. He fought in one of the wars that were perpetually breaking out between Assisi and Perugia, and being captured remained in prison a year. When he was twenty-five he fell sick, and on his recovery had lost all delight in his former pleasures. He felt he had something better in him, and while he was passing to decide he heard that Walter of Brienne was about to set out against the Germans, so Francis joined. When he had marched as far as Spoleto he was taken ill again, and saw a vision telling him to return home, which he did. He now utterly changed his manner of life. Calling poverty "his bride," he resolved never to refuse alms to any poor person, travelled to Rome, where he threw down all the gold he had on the altar at St. Peter's, exchanged clothes with the beggars outside, and began to beg with them. His father not understanding him, shut him up for some time, and brought him before the Bishop, in whose presence St. Francis declared "Peter Bernardini was my father; I have now but one Father, He that is in heaven." He spent some time tending the lepers in the hospital at Gubbio, and on his return to Assisi, began to build up the ruined church of St. Damian, begging the materials, and working with his own hands. In time his townsmen saw his earnestness, ceased to despise him, and eventually many joined in his work. He afterwards assisted in the restoration of the churches of St. Peter, and St. Maria degli Angeli or the Portiuncula. One day, according to tradition, on the Feast of St. Barnabas, 1208, he heard the text, "Provide neither gold nor silver nor brass in your purses, nor scrip for your journey, neither two coats, neither shoes, nor yet staves. And as ye go, preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand." This he looked upon as a direct message to him, so he began preaching. He soon gained followers, the first two being Bernard di Quintavalle and Pietro de Catania, both fellow-townsmen. He chose a rule for them, by opening the Gospels three times, and taking the texts thus found. He went to Rome, and gained the approval of Pope Innocent III., though at first only by word of mouth. They then settled at the Portiuncula, going continually on missionary journeys. In 1219 St. Francis went to preach to the Mohammedans, with some of the brethren, where he was taken before the Sultan, and offered to enter a fire with the priests of Islam, to show the truth of his words. It is said that on his return to Assisi he saw a vision of the Crucifixion, and ever afterwards bore marks of nails on his hands and feet, and a wound in his side. He died two years later, Oct. 4th, 1226. He was the author of many sermons, treatises, and hymns.
Francis of Paula, founder of the Franciscan Order of the Minims, was born at Paula, in Calabria, in 1416. He entered the monastery of San Marco on his return from pilgrimage with his parents to his patron saint, St. Francis of Assisi, but soon afterwards withdrew to a cave near Reggio and became a hermit. His fame soon spread, and he was joined by many, so that by 1436 he founded an Order. They followed the Franciscans, to whose three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, they added a fourth of perpetual fasting, and kept Lent the whole year. Francis gave them the motto of "Charity." Sixtus IV. confirmed the Order in 1476, and Alexander VI. gave them the title of Minims, because they called themselves the least of all in the Church of God. Francis grew famed as a miracle-worker, and Louis XI., who was dying at Plessis-le-Tours, sent for him and implored him to prolong his life, which the Saint declared his inability to do. Louis's successors, Charles VIII. and Louis XII., kept Francis in France, where he founded many monasteries, and died in 1507. He was canonised by Leo X. in 1519, and Charles VIII. founded and endowed the church of Trinita de Monti at Rome in his honour.

Francis of St. Domingo.—A Portuguese Dominican, whose pious zeal led him and several of his brother-monks to undertake missionary work in the Philippine Islands. They laboured with much success here. He then went on to Formosa, and converted many pagans to Christianity. At length, in his endeavours to reconcile the people and the governing body, who were engaged in a cruel civil war, he lost his life, being shot to death with arrows, A.D. 1633.

Francis of Sales, St., Bishop and Prince of Geneva, and founder of the Order of the Visitation, was born in the castle of Sales, near Annecy, in Savoy, on Aug. 21st, 1567. He studied in the college of Annecy, and, finding himself inclined to the profession of an ecclesiastic, took the clerical tonsure at eleven years of age, and afterwards travelled to Paris, where he remained under the care of the Jesuits. He studied under Genebrard and Maldonatus till 1584, when he went to Padua, to study civil law under Panciroli. Here he made the acquaintance of the Jesuit Antonio Possevino. Francis gained a great reputation for his learning and piety, and commenced Doctor in Laws. He then made a journey to Rome, returning by Loreto and Venice to Savoy. He found that his father had obtained for him the appointment of counsellor to the senate of Chambory, but St. Francis had become possessed by a great desire to devote himself wholly to the Church. Being the eldest son, he was very unwilling to inform his father, so in his perplexity consulted his cousin, Louis of Sales, Canon of Geneva, through whose mediation the Count of Sales was reluctantly induced to surrender his son. Thus, in 1591, Francis was ordained. He at once began preaching, and attracted all who heard him by his powerful and pleasant voice and animated and earnest manner. He was made President of the Collegiate Church at Annecy, but in 1594 was sent as one of the missionaries to the valleys of Savoy. The city of Geneva, which was an independent republic, had gained possession of the territories of Gex, Verni, and Gaillard, all peopled by Zwinglians and Calvinists. Claude de Granier, Bishop of Geneva, wishing to reconvert them to their former faith, sent out several of his clergy, among them Francis and his cousin Louis. It is said that when they arrived at Tonon, the capital of Chablais, it contained only seven Roman Catholics, but on Christmas Eve, 1597, eight hundred persons were admitted to the Holy Communion. He ever made an attempt to convert Theodore Beza [q.v.]. On his return to Annecy in 1599 he was appointed coadjutor to the Bishop of Geneva under the title of Bishop of Nicopolis. At first he refused the post but consented at the request of Pope Clement VIII. He was obliged to defer his consecration, being seized with an illness which nearly proved fatal; but he recovered, and went to France to resume his missionary labours. Cardinal Perron used to say that he himself could confute any heretic, but their conviction and persuasion could not be effected without the assistance of the coadjutor of Geneva. Father Berulle, afterwards Cardinal, consulted him as to the rule for the Congregation of the Oratory. Henry IV., charmed with his preaching, offered him 20,000 livres pension and the first vacant bishopric, but he refused and returned to Savoy. On the way he heard that Granier was dead, and he went sole bishop. He retired for twenty days to prepare himself for his consecration, which took place on Dec. 8th, 1602. His first care was to reform his diocese and to regulate all the religious houses, after which he returned to his work of preaching to the Calvinists, of whom he is said to have converted 72,000. In 1610 he began the Order of the Visitation, with the help of the Baroness Chantal. In 1618, finding that his health was failing, he appointed his brother, John Francis of Sales, his coadjutor, with the title of Bishop of Chaledon. Francis died of paralytic stroke at Lyons, Dec. 25th, 1622. He was buried at Lyons, but his remains were transferred to Annecy on Jan. 29th, which day his festival is held by the Roman Church. St. Francis wrote many practical discourses, of which the chief is his Introduction to a Devout Life.

Franciscans.—One of the principle
Orders of Mendicant, Grey, or Preaching Friars

The society of Fraterculi ("Little Brethren"), by which name Francis ordained that his disciples should be called, was patronised by Pope Innocent III., and afterwards confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223; for the popes thought that it might in some degree remedy the corrupt state of the Church. The Franciscans first came to England in the reign of Henry III., and set up an establishment at Canterbury in 1224, and, like the Dominicans, soon gained much of the wealth and influence which had formerly belonged to the regular monasteries. As an instance of the way in which they accomplished this purpose and pushed their way, the following bold "miracle" is recorded. Some of their number were on the way to Oxford when they were overtaken by a storm, and compelled to take shelter in a Benedictine abbey. At first the abbot believed that they were jugglers, and anticipating sport, gave orders that they should be admitted, but finding out the true state of the case, he refused to allow them the shelter that they asked, and turned them out of doors. A young monk took pity on them, gave them some food, and hid them in a hay-loft for the night. Afterwards he went to bed himself, and dreamt that St. Benedict appeared, and charged the abbot with having neglected to carry out the rules which he had appointed, upon which our Lord commanded that the abbot should be hanged. Then St. Francis came and claimed as his own the young monk who had befriended the Franciscans; upon which he awoke, and went to tell the abbot, but found him and the rest of the monks strangled in their cells. The report of this tragedy circulated throughout England, and thenceforward the Franciscan friars met with a better reception. After their power was increased they became celebrated for their theology, which was a advance of that of the time, though they practised too much subtlety and ingenuity in their arguments; and they did not confine themselves to the instruction of members of their own society, but travelled about through he kingdom, preaching for the benefit of all who chose to listen. About this time colleges were first instituted at the universities, and or two or three centuries the most learned members belonged to this Order. In course of time the more ancient Orders were roused to endeavour to rival the Franciscans in earning, and colleges were endowed at Oxford and Cambridge for the accommodation of students from the different monasteries. At the dissolution of the monasteries, the Franciscans had fifty-five houses in England.

Franck, Sebastian [b. at Donauworth, 1499; d. at Basle, 1542].—He at first held a post at Gustenfeld as Evangelical preacher, but resigned it in 1528 in order to join the Ana-baptists. Not being satisfied with their creed, he determined to be independent of any particular sect, and to follow the line of an eclectic. He believed all sin to be of equal magnitude, and maintained that men ought to follow the dictates of the Holy Spirit, without attending much to the letter. With the intention of spreading his opinions, he set up a printing press as his means of livelihood, and published many theological works, some of them opposing the doctrines of the Romish Church, and some those of the Protestant. He contrived by this means to draw upon himself the indignation of both parties; and the divines of the Augsburg Confession, who met at Smalcald in 1540, entrusted Melanthon with the task of confuting Franck's fanaticism. The latter suffered much persecution, and was driven from place to place. Luther occasionally took part in the storm raised against him.

Francke, August Hermann [b. 1663, d. 1727], a native of Lubeck, was an eminent religious teacher of his day, but more famous for his practical philanthropy. In 1698, having for the previous three years gathered into his house a large number of poor orphans, he founded for them at Halle the first Orphan Home, the model of many which have been founded since. It grew mightily—so much so that he had 2,000 orphans under his care when he died. He had never appealed to Government for help in this good work: his benevolence and wisdom were so widely known, that voluntary contributions flowed in unasked. He had set them to work as printers, and now the establishment is one of the greatest publishing houses in Germany.

Franconia, House of.—This family was the second great line, after the Karlings, which ruled over the "Holy Roman Empire." The Franconian period followed the Saxon [SAXONY, HOUSE OF], and comprised the reigns of four Emperors—viz. Conrad II. [1024-39], Henry III. [1039-56], Henry IV. [1056-1106], Henry V. [1106-25]. During this period the Pope shook off the Imperial yoke, and began the fight for supremacy, which lasted almost three hundred years. The clergy and secular princes united against the Emperors, and took advantage of the Papal efforts to secure their own independence. Henry III. made two expeditions to Rome, and called a synod to depose three rival Popes—Sylvester III., Benedict IV., and Gregory VI., appointing in their place a German, under the name of Clement II. The great struggle of Henry IV. against Hildebrand is told under the name of GREGORY VI. In the reign of Henry V. the investiture question was settled by the Concordat of Worms. [CONCORDAT.]

eleemosynam, "in free alms." Such tenants were bound to offer prayers, masses, or other Divine Services for the souls of the grantors and their heirs, and therefore were quit of temporal duty or service for such possessions. It was by this tenure that almost all ancient monasteries held their possessions, and many of the parochial clergy. At the Reformation the tenure of frankalmoigns was continued, though the nature of the services was "altered, and made conformable to the purer doctrine of the Church of England" [Blackstone].

Franks.—The name of a powerful Teutonic tribe, who exercised the greatest influence upon the history of modern Europe. They established themselves within the boundaries of the Roman Empire, in the latter part of the fifth century, pushing the Goths into the south-west part of France, and establishing a kingdom, which they strengthened by entering into close alliance with the orthodox clergy, the Goths having alienated them by holding Arian doctrines. Two great dynasties succeeded each other in the beginnings of the Frankish kingdom. The first was the Merovingian, the first monarch of which was Clovis [q.v.], the second the Carolingian, named after Charles Martel. In the latest historical form of nomenclature, these two lines are known as the Mezings and the Karlings. The greatest member of the latter race was Charles the Great, commonly known as Charlemagne, the grandson of Charles Martel. [Charles.] His coronation as Emperor of the West, in 800, was the restoration of the Roman Empire, which, in fact, had never ceased in theory to exist. Henceforward it was known as the "Holy Roman Empire," and it continued, though with many changes, until the year 1806, when Napoleon put an end to it. [Roman Empire.]

Fraternity.—A term applied to some religious societies formed for mutual improvement, or chiefly to insure a regular attendance on the ordinances of the Church, or the performance of certain devotional practices.

Fratricelli.—A name given to a body of Franciscan friars, who formed themselves into an independent community under two Minorite monks, by the authority of Pope Celestine V., who established them by a Bull in 1294. They made a vow of poverty, and lived on the charity of the populace. The Fraticelli were much hated by the other Franciscans, and in 1302 Pope Boniface VIII. dissolved the Bull, upon which the brethren fled into Sicily, and united themselves with the sect of the Beghards, to whom they declared that they were filled with the Holy Spirit, and no longer needed the sacraments, being free from sin. Clement V. endeavoured to conciliate them, without success, in 1312; and, as their fanaticism continued to spread, John XXII. had recourse to the Inquisition, which he entrusted with the task of stamping out the heresy. From this time the Fraticelli gradually disappeared, or became merged in other sects of heretics. They based their doctrine chiefly upon a commentary on the Revelation, by Peter John Oliva, a friar of the monastery of Béziers.

Free and Open Church Movement. [Societies.]

Free Christians [10]; Free Grace Gospel Christians [1]; Free Gospel Christians [7]; Free Gospellers [3]; Free Christian Church [2]. The names of certain religious bodies as given in the Registrar-General’s Report. The numbers after each are those of places of worship duly registered in the name of each, in England and Wales.

Free Church of England.—A name taken by a few congregations, who have expressed themselves dissatisfied with some of the doctrines and practices of the Church. The Registrar-General’s return gives thirty-three places of worship registered under this title. [Dissenters.]

Free Church of Scotland. [Scotland.]

Free-will.—The Necessarian or Fatalis view of actions and events can never be reconciled with the felt freedom of the human will. As long as self-consciousness and self-determination co-exist in every man’s bosom, every man will feel himself a free and responsible agent, be the arguments on the other side what they may. As regards self-consciousness, the very power to think involves the separate existence of the thinker; and the faculty of perception, whether the object perceived be material or mental, shows the reality of the inner self that perceives. With respect to self-determination, exercise of will implied in the term. If the mind were passive under impressions from without, there could be no self-consciousness, and if thoughts and desires from within could not be resisted, there could be no praise nor blame, because there could be no merit nor demerit. The Necessarian view then, which thus explains away the instinctive feelings of human nature, can never be practically accepted by the god-like sense of mankind at large. Society would become impossible under such conditions and, as it has been well observed, we should have no more reason to resent the well-aimed stab of an assassin than the random kick of horse.

Looked at theologically, the question whether man's will is free or not depends very much on the extent of the mischief introduced by Adam's fall, whether the deprivation of man's nature in consequence was total or only partial. Those who take the first view would deny to man all volition in a good direction, and would make him a mere machine for irresistible grace to use, or not to use, as it likes; those who hold the second view, though they consider man's corruption through the Fall to be very serious, yet look on it as partial only. They assert that man is still in God's image, as originally created, though it is much obiterated [Gen. ix. 6; James iii. 9], and hence they infer that though man needs the help of grace, he can co-operate with it, and must do so if he is to reap the benefit. According to his view, nature and grace supplement each other; and while nature cries out for grace, grace meets the cravings of nature.

This last opinion has upon the whole most recommended itself to modern theology. It is generally held that in the Fall man did not lose his entire freedom of will, but that, although that will became fatally and strongly and universally biased in a wrong direction, were yet remain some instinctive leanings towards the right once natural to it. This being so, co-operating grace is all that is necessary at conversion, when old inclinations to evil, and so long slumber of bad habits, have to be overcome. As for the testimony of Scripture on the point, if it says that "the Lord opened [his] hand to attend unto the things that were spoken," if it declares that it is "God that works in us to will and to do," if believers are called "His workmanship, created unto good works," on the other hand, we are to strive; we are to "ask, seek, and knock," and to "work out our own salvation with fear and trembling." In such a scheme with God's co-operating grace and man's cooperating will have each their place and part assigned to them.

It is needless to enter, in addition, on the historical aspect of the question; how, among the Schoolmen, Thomas Aquinas took one side, and Duns Scotus the other; how, again, at a Council of Trent, the Franciscans maintained the one view, and the Dominicans the other; with a host of other names that might mentioned. The present state of the controversy may be well summed up in the singular words of the Tenth Article of the Church of England, as follows: "The grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will; and working with us (operate) when we have that good will."

Frewen, Accepted. eldest son of John Frewen, rector of Northiam, in Sussex, was born in 1588. He was educated in the Free School at Canterbury, and afterwards at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he was demy, Fellow, and divinity-reader. He then went as chaplain to the Earl of Bristol to Germany and Spain. While he was in the latter place, he, Prince of Wales, heard him preach, and the sermon made a great impression on him, so that when he became king Frewen was made one of the chaplains. He afterwards became President of Magdalen College, where he continued about eighteen years, and was four times Vice-Chancellor, as well as Dean of Gloucester and prebendary of Canterbury. In 1644 he became Bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, where he stayed till 1660, when he became Archbishop of York. He died in 1664, and is buried under the east window of York Cathedral. He was one of the members of the Hampton Court Conference.

Freylinghausen, Johann Anastasius [b. 1670, d. 1739].—A German theological writer of the Pietist school, and a writer of very beautiful hymns, several of which have been translated in Miss Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, and hence have found their way into most of our popular hymn-books.

Friar [Lat. frater, Fr. frère].—This name is applied now to all Orders of monks, but it was formerly the distinguishing title of the Mendicant Orders, of which the four principal ones were the Franciscans, or Grey Friars, founded 1210; the Dominicans, or...
Friars, Observant, or Observantines. — A branch of the Franciscans, who in the thirteenth century separated themselves from their brethren, on account of the relaxation in discipline permitted by their minister-general, Elias of Cortona. The Observantines desired to keep up the original strictness of their rule, and lived apart in places of their own choosing, after the manner of hermits, while their brethren remained in the convents, living under the relaxed rule, and were called Conventuals.

Friday. [Week.]

Fridolin, St.—A native of Ireland, who followed the example of Columbanus by going missionary journeys on the Continent of Europe. He is memorable for the monastery he founded on the banks of the Rhine, near Seckingen.

Fridstole, or Frith-stool.—Literally, “the stool of peace.” Formerly there were in certain churches, of which Hexham and Beverley are examples, stone seats placed near the altar for those who claimed the privilege of sanctuary. Any criminal escaping to one of these might enjoy his life and liberty.

Friends, The Society of.—A religious body, commonly known by the name of “Quakers,” founded in 1646 by George Fox, the son of a Leicestershire weaver, whose tenets stand in the strongest antagonism to what we may call external worship, and who, it has been well said, offer the remarkable spectacle of a Christian body “without a creed, a liturgy, a priesthood, or a sacrament.” The name Quakers was given to the Friends by Gervase Bennett, a magistrate, on Fox exhorting him to tremble at the Word of God. Fox was only twenty-two when he commenced to preach his doctrines. Amongst these he taught that preaching, to be effectual, must come from the direct operation of the Holy Spirit on the soul, and that therefore it was not necessary to have a separate order of men educated for the ministry, but that the humblest person, whether male or female, who had an inward call from the Spirit of God, was qualified for the office of a Christian preacher. He abandoned all the ceremonies which the Reformation had allowed to survive, even the rites of baptism and the celebration of the Lord’s Supper, holding them as outward signs which had in them the danger of gradually coming to be regarded as possessing in themselves the saving power which they were meant only to represent. He allowed no prescribed form of devotion, saying that the silent converse of the soul is as acceptable a worship to God as the utterance of prayer and praise. He opposed all adornment of places of worship, the use of music in the praise of God, and the observance of fasts, whether national or private. As regards other matters, there is ample evidence that Fox and his early colleagues as a body held firmly what are commonly understood as the fundamental truths of the Gospel, which are set forth with great clearness in a letter on Christian doctrine addressed to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671. At a somewhat later period the writings of Penn and Barclay gave a more dogmatic form to the principles of the Society. The Friends profess to endeavour to carry out the admonitions of the New Testament in a literal and practical sense, and to observe the spirit of Christ’s teaching in all the relations of life. Thus, in obedience to the injunction not to swear, they refuse to take an oath in a court of justice; to love one’s enemies they consider involves a denunciation of all war, and consequently refuse to take military service; not to render honour to each other was carried out by ignoring the usual complimentary salutations and honorary titles and by addressing every individual by the Christian name, and the singular pronoun “thee” and “thou.” They also adopted great simplicity of dress and manner, and refused to join in any frivolous amusement such as cards, dancing, etc., even discouraging music and art. These points were formerly general, and even carried to great extremes but of late years considerable change has been observable in the practice of the Society in these respects, especially amongst the younger members. The greater portion of these now speak and dress plainly and unobtrusively, but otherwise like other people; and quite recently the Yearly Meeting authoritatively withdrew the customary insistence upon “plainness of speech, behaviour, and apparel,” leaving such matters to the conscience of individual members, whilst art and literature are no longer frowned upon.

Whilst professing to bring all question to the test of the Holy Scriptures, the Divine authority of which is fully acknowledged, Friends believe that the help of the same Spirit who inspired them is needful for their right understanding, and that, moreover, the light of the Spirit truly shines in the heart of man, and if heeded, and its teaching humbly obeyed, is a present guide and director to him. This doctrine of the “Inward Light,” which they believe is given to all men—heather as well as Christian—in sufficient measure, is their central, cardinal, and principal doctrine. In their public worship, therefore, they wait in silence for the immediate influence of the Spirit on the heart, allowing those to engage in preaching or prayer—both men and women—who really believe themselves called of God to do so, and give evidence acceptable to their brethren, of true spiritual gifts, as well as of sincerity and Christian consistency. They allow at such meetings — no stated reading, even of the Scriptures, and formerly these were never read at all in their public worship; but of late, in many meetings, the practice of publicly reading a portion of Scripture at the commencement of the meeting is adopted. They do not, however, consider themselves to be dependent upon any audible ministry whatever, regarding the silent worship of the assembled members, if so it be, as a quite normal state of things, as equally acceptable to God, and equally beneficial to those who can engage in it. They attach no peculiar sanctity to one day more than another, regarding the Sabbath as a Jewish institution done away with by Christianity, and all days alike as claimed by the Son of Man: but they consider it in accordance with the Divine will to give up one day out of seven to public worship, and to the good of others, as well as to rest and meditation.

The discipline of the community of Friends is much the same as the Presbyterian. They have three gradations of meetings: Monthly Meetings composed of the congregations from a definite circuit, who choose Elders to watch over the ministry, and Overseers to attend to the education of the children of such members as are in humble circumstances, to the provision for the poor, and to various other duties. At these meetings marriages are sanctioned previous to their attestation in public worship; the Friends holding marriage to be "not a mere civil compact, but a Divine ordinance, and that it is the prerogative of God alone to join persons in that solemn covenant, and the interference of a priest is an assumption altogether unwarranted by Holy Scripture, or the example of the primitive Church." Quarterly Meetings are held to receive general reports from the monthly meetings, and to hear appeals from their decisions; and the Yearly Meeting has the general superintendence of the society in the whole of a particular country, that held in London comprehending the whole of Great Britain. Formal discipline or organisation was at its inception considered inconsistent with their own principal tenet by many of the earlier Friends, and much resisted by Story and others.

From their rise till the Revolution, the Friends were much persecuted, except during brief periods of Charles II.'s reign, when he obtained some indulgence for his followers. These early persecutions were largely connected with their refusal to swear, and to acknowledge ecclesiastical supremacy by the payment of tithes and church-rates; but no tract was considerably increased by the intrusive manner in which some of them testified against "man-ministry" and appeal to human authorities. There be a question that some of the excesses of the ruder members—as Nayler and others—were only due to disorder of mind, caused by excitement, in an age peculiarly given to religious fanaticism.* Since 1688 the Friends have benefitted by the Toleration Act. In 1833 the British Legislature recognised the objection of Friends to taking oaths, and the simple affirmation of a Friend has since that time been accepted in place of it. This, the legal recognition of their marriages, and other privileges, have been won solely by the power of passive resistance, and are a singular proof of the efficacy of it.

By the year 1692 the Society of Friends had spread through all the northern counties, and by the time of the Restoration there were meetings not only throughout Great Britain and Ireland, but in the West Indies and British America. They are more numerous now in America than in England. The founding of the colony of Pennsylvania by William Penn induced many of the British Friends to emigrate thither, and the free institutions of the New World favoured the increase of the Quaker communities in other States also. Like other bodies, they have been somewhat weakened by division or secession: indeed, their leading tenet was peculiarly likely to lead to great differences of view, and there can be little doubt that some of the earlier and stricter Friends placed the inward teaching of the Spirit in reality above that of the Scriptures themselves. This doctrine of the "Inward Light" was pushed to excess in the earlier part of the present century by Elias Hicks, a very popular minister in the United States, and a man of remarkable powers. He ultimately embraced—if he had not held them all along—Unitarian views, which were widely spread amongst other American Friends; and the result of the controversy which could not but arise upon such a vital point, was a great schism, about one-half of the body in America seceding, and being known as Hicksite Friends, holding Arian views, and the remainder being known as Orthodox Friends. The reaction against the Hicksites was carried too far in the opinion of some of the stricter of the Orthodox Friends, and the result was a second small secession, who followed John Wilbur, and who adhere more closely than the main body to the peculiarities and original tenets of the founders of the Society. In England Friends were almost unanimously orthodox, and the Hicksite controversy excited great alarm. Isaac Crewdson, an acknowledged minister of Manchester, published a small book called The Beacon, containing extracts from the writings of older Friends, of which many could be cited, placing the "Inward Light" apparently above the authority of Scripture, and pointing out their dangerous tendency. Such a course provoked retorts, in which many joined who were as orthodox as Crewdson and his party, but who resented the implied censure brought upon their predecessors. This controversy—known amongst Friends as the Beacon controversy, from the title of Crewdson's publication—also grew in sharpness, and the result was that all over the United Kingdom a considerable number of Friends left the Society. This secession, however (about 1836), was merely of individuals, who mostly joined other Christian bodies, and never became a separate communion. The body in England, so far as known, is now not only uniformly orthodox, but in practice, as pointed out above, has approximated perceptibly in many points to that of other Christians, especially in regard to greater recognition of the desirability of audible ministry, and the partial use of the Scriptures in public worship. In at least one large mission conducted by Friends (at Bristol) even hymns are employed, as at ordinary mission-halls; and although the Friends would not consider such a meeting as one of their own, still such practice marks a change, which in the early part of the present century it would have been impossible to foresee. This change is distinctly traceable to the controversy here briefly described, and gives it considerable importance in the history of the Society.

* James Nayler had formerly been an officer in Cromwell's army, a fact which increased the fury of his Puritan persecutors. At an early stage of his disorder he was imprisoned and tortured with, and finally discharged by Friends for his excesses, and was punished in the most barbarous and torturing manner, to which death would have been preferable, both at London and Bristol, bearing his sufferings with undaunted fortitude. For a full account of them see Sewell's History of Friends, and also Sayer's History of Bristol. At a later period, when Nayler returned to his right mind, he himself recanted his errors, expressed deep repentance for his excesses, was received again by his friends into full communion, and died in perfect peace. Nothing can be more distressing than to read how men who chiefly needed the kind care of a judicious physician were tortured in a manner worthy of the Inquisition; while in New England, not only male but female Friends were actually hung by the Puritans for returning after banishment.

The number of Friends in Great Britain and Ireland at the end of 1884 was about 18,000, to which should be added about 5,000 regular attendants of their worship, though not formally in membership, which is guarded somewhat strictly. There are small communities in the South of France, Germany, Norway, etc. They are most numerous in America, where they are believed to number from 50,000 to 60,000, and the total number in the whole world is probably from 90,000 to 110,000. They have at no time exceeded 200,000 in total numbers, and nothing is more remarkable than the extraordinary influence in religious, social, and even political life exercised by so small a body. Owing to their rejection of any paid ministry, they are not able to "organise" foreign missions on any large scale, but of late years an association has been formed by some members, which supports missions in Madagascar, worked in harmony with the London Missionary Society; one in Palestine conducted by Theophilus Waldemeir, one of the captives rescued by our country from King John of Abyssinia; and in India. They have also some mission work in Japan, and even in Constantinople. What they do is very thoroughly done. Their principle is that all should be done for love, and nothing for payment; and ministers who are led to engage in any service from home, are entertained freely by other Friends, or have their wants supplied. Their home mission work, however, is very large, and very practical in character, especially as regards their Sabbath-schools. In Great Britain the number of scholars is over 30,000, or fully double the number of their total membership, which is a result unparalleled. Not being fettered by ordinary ideas about Sabbath-keeping, they have for a long period taught writing, and other useful knowledge, in their Sunday-schools and the result in attracting, and attaching and improving their scholars among the poorest classes, is eloquent testimony to the freedom of operation. In Sheffield, for instance, some 2,000 scholars are under the care in "First-day Schools," of whom over 500 attend regularly their worship, devoting as it is of any outward attraction, and man in after-life join the Society. They were amongst the originators of, and liberal support, the Bible Society; and their effort as a body in the relief of distress (besides their support of their own poor, which is undertake by them), the suppression of slaver prison reform and mission-work [Fry, Elizabeth], and other philanthropic efforts, now need reference.

Friends were undoubtedly much weakened in England by the events mentioned above and for many years were stationary, slightly declining in numbers. All propagandist zeal appears, indeed, to have left the with the cessation of persecution in 1689 and the difference between the energetic missionary spirit of Fox and his associates, a the quietism of their descendants, is ve marked. Recently, however, their number appear to be again slightly increasing, chiefly amongst the working classes. I further and authoritative statements of the doctrine and discipline, see The Book Christian Discipline of the Religious Society of Friends, published by the Yearly Meeting and the Yearly Meeting's annual Epistle. The book cited and the annual Epistles the only official exponents of the Society being the work of special committees appointed by the Yearly Meeting, and formally adopted by that body.

Friends of Light.—A sect of Lutheran Rationalists, originating in 1841. They applied the principles of Platonism to the Lutheran doctrine, accepting and interpreting it by the light of the sixteenth century, in the spirit, but no necessity in the letter, and asserting in Luth name the absolute freedom of the intellect. An order-in-council in 1845 forbade them to organise themselves, but they still exist.

Frith, John [b. 1503, d. 1553], born at Sevenoaks, martyred at Smithfield. He was a well-read man, who had been brought from Cambridge by Wolsey to be a student of his new college of Christ Church, Oxford, but having imbibed Lutheran opinions, and, moreover, entered into an intimate friendship with William Tyndall, he entered into a sharp controversy with Sir Thomas More, denying the doctrine of purgatory and the efficacy of papal indulgences. He was committed to the Tower, but probably would have escaped death had he not in his confinement written against Transubstantiation. He was the first English martyr for the Protestant doctrine of the Lord's Supper. [Foxe's Martyrs, ed. Stoughton, vol. i., p. 18.]

Frock.—A monastic gown of coarse cloth, made with large sleeves, and fastened round the waist with a leather girdle or rope. Sometimes the cowl forms part of the frock, but it is often distinct from it.

Froude, Richard Hurrell [b. 1803, d. 1866].—One of the Fellows of Oriel College, Oxford, at the time of the beginning of the Tractarian movement; an enthusiastic friend and supporter of Dr. Newman. The latter has given much pains in his Apologia to his portrait of Froude. He "hated the Reformation," was a strenuous advocate of the celibacy of the clergy, and of devotion to the Blessed Virgin. The two friends travelled together in southern Europe, and Froude's influence upon his companion was very great. Failure of health, however, forced him to quit Oxford, and he went to the West Indies, only returning to die. Newman and Keble published his Remains, comprising journals, letters, and sermons, two years after his death; and his brother, Mr. J. A. Froude, the historian, has given some interesting notices of him in his work on the history of the Tractarian movement.

Frumentius, the Apostle of Ethiopia, began his Christian ministry in 330, during the reign of Constantine the Great. According to tradition, Mercupius, a merchant, was wrecked on the shore of Ethiopia, on his way India, and died there, leaving two children, Cumuntius and Edesus. These were brought the King, who was pleased with their intelligence, and made them part of his household, entrusting them on his death with the education of his son. Frumentius afterwards went to Alexandria, and after working for a time as a missionary, was consecrated bishop of Ethiopia by St. Athanasius, under the title of Abba Saudama, or "father of peace," succeeded in establishing Christianity in Ethiopia by his untiring energy and zeal for the cause. The translation of the New Testament into the native language is sometimes ascribed to Frumentius, though there is evidence to show that this was not done till the fifth or sixth century.

Fry, Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. John Gurney, born near Norwich in 1780—an eminent philanthropist, who is sometimes called "the female Howard." She was a Quaker, but not brought up in their strictest notions, and in her early girlhood was somewhat sceptical; but the preaching of William Savery, an American Quaker, was the means of settling her doubts, and she became a "plain Friend." In 1800 she married Joseph Fry, who had a large business in London. Early in 1813 the utterly miserable state of the female prisoners in Newgate attracted her attention, and she at once set about trying to improve their condition, going amongst them, preaching and ministering also to their bodily comfort. In 1817 she formed a ladies' committee for the reformation of the female prisoners, and established a school and manulatory within the prison. The following year she turned her attention to benefiting the female convicts under sentence of transportation. The improvements made through her intervention at Newgate were carried into other prisons. She visited also the prisons in Belgium, France, Germany, and Holland, striving to get amendments in prison discipline. She took a vast interest in the abolition of slavery, and endeavoured to improve the British seamen by instituting libraries in the coastguard and Royal Navy ships, stored with religious and educational books. She was highly esteemed as a preacher amongst her own sect. She died at Rumsgate in 1843, and was buried at Barking, in Essex.

Fulda, Monastery of.—One of the most famous monasteries of Germany, founded, under Benedictine rules, by St. Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, in 744. Its first abbot was St. Stuhl [q.v.], and under him and some of his successors it so flourished that it became the very centre of German learning and progress. The Emperor Otto I. gave its abbot the title of Archechancellor of the Realm. It was not destroyed at the Reformation, but its importance and influence dwindled from that period.

Fulgentius, Bishop of Ruspe, in Africa, born at Telepte, in North Africa, in 408; died at Ruspe, 508. Though of noble birth, he devoted himself to a life of seclusion and asceticism, and lived for a short time in a monastery. Driven thence by the persecutions of King Thrasimund, who was an Arian, and a bitter enemy of the Christians, Fulgentius travelled for a time in Italy and the south of Europe. On his return he was made Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was not long allowed to remain in charge of his diocese. He was Gai was a monk, Henry brilliant some to the struct opens themselves the materials velling obtained as the refusal in the year married, rector literary wrote of his works treatises against the Arians, and he wrote also de Inearmnione, Predestinione, et Gratia. In 1532 he retired to a monastery, and remained there till his death.

Fuller, Thomas, the Church historian, was born in 1608, at Aldwinckle, in Northamptonshire, of which place his father was the clergyman. He went in 1620 to Queen's College, Cambridge, and became M.A. in 1628. He was ordained, and in 1638 became prebendary of Salisbury. Here he wrote his first literary work, a poem which is now forgotten. From Salisbury he went to Dorset, becoming rector of Broadwindsor. While here he married, but his wife soon died. In 1640 he wrote his first prose work, The Holy War, a History of the Crusades, and in the same year became member of the Convocation at Westminster. Two years after appeared his Holy and Profane State. He had given great offence to the Puritans by a sermon which he had preached at the Abbey; now refusing to take an oath to the Parliament, except on certain reservations, he joined the King's party at Oxford, where he managed in the pulpit to disgust the Royalists as much as he had the Roundheads. However, he obtained a chaplaincy in the royal army, and employed his leisure time while travelling through the country in collecting materials for his future work, The Worthies of England. In 1648 the Earl of Carlisle presented him to the rectory of Waltham. Here he immediately set about the quaintest of all his writings, Palestine. He managed to pass the "Triers," and continued his ministerial functions during the Commonwealth. In 1656 he wrote his Church History of Britain, to which was appended the History of Cambridge and of Waltham Abbey. In 1658 he was presented to the living of Cranford, in Middlesex, and was within sight of a bishopric at the Restoration, when he died in 1661. He was buried at Cranford.

The chief characteristics of Fuller's writings are their quaintness and humour, which show themselves in every page—indeed, in almost every line. His works are very voluminous, but never grow tedious. Wherever the reader opens one there is always something to instruct and amuse. He is rarely satirical, and the little satire he shows is never bitter, but always good-natured. He has been compared to Jeremy Taylor and Edmund Burke, but in some points is very unlike both. See a very brilliant essay upon his life and works by Mr. Henry Rogers.

Fullo, Peter, a follower of the Eutychian heresy in the fifth century. He had been a monk, but was expelled from his monastery on account of his errors, and for some time lived a licentious life at Constantinople. But the interest of some friends he was introduced into the family of Zeno, son-in-law to the Emperor Leo, and by a show of piety soon gained his favour. Zeno, being made Comes Orientis, came to Antioch, the capital of his government, bringing Fullo with him. There were many followers of Apollinarius in the city, and Fullo joined with them in charging Martyrius, Bishop of Antioch, with Nestorianism. Through his agency Martyrius was sent to Constantinople, and Fullo usurped his See. Pope Simplicius deposed him, and used his interest with Zeno to get him expelled, but before this could be effected Fullo and his party assassinated Bishop Stephen at the altar. Zeno restored his favourite to the bishopric in 482. During his episcopate Fullo published a new heresy, adding to the Trisagion the words "Who was crucified for us and so declaring that the three Persons of the Trinity had suffered. He refused to retract when admonished by the other bishops of the Church to do so.

Gabriel Sionita, a learned Maronite, was born at Edden, a village on Mount Lebanon, in 1577. He studied at the Maron College in Rome, where he became professor of the Syriac and Arabic languages, till he was sent for to Paris, where he became professor in 1614. He brought with him Syriac and Arabic Bibles which he had copied from the manuscripts in Rome, and which we first printed in M. le Jay's Bible. He was also the author of an Arabic grammar, and geography entitled Geographia Nubieinsis, or of Doctrina Christiana ad uso de fidelii Orientali. He died at Paris in 1648.

Gaianitae.—A sect of the Monophysite which arose in the sixth century. It took name from its leader, Gaianus, who was Archdeacon of Alexandria, and on the death of Theodorus III. was chosen bishop by monks and people, in opposition to Theodosi, the Emperor's nominee. After three mon Gaianus was deposed, and fled, first to C thage, and then to Sardina. The Gaiani held the same opinions as Julian of Harnassus, viz., that after the union of the natures in Christ, His Body was incorruptible and that He suffered neither hunger nor thirst nor any other infirmity to which man is liable by the laws of natural necessity. They also called Julianists and Aphthartodocetæ [Aphthartodocete.]

Gainas, a Goth by birth, is first mentioned as being one of the commanders...
Gal, Theophilus, a Nonconformist writer, was born in Devonshire in 1628. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took his degrees, but he adopted Presbyterian views, and received a cure at Winchester, which he resented, with his Fellowship, at the Restoration. He became travelling tutor to the son of Lord Wharton, and subsequently was assistant minister to a chapel in Holborn, London. He died at Newington in 1678. Gale was a good scholar, and particularly eminent in philosophy. His chief works are:—The Court of the Contortes, an argument that the great heathen philosophies of Plato, etc., were corruptions of the original revelations of Divine truth to the Jewish people: The True Idea of Jansenism, The Anatomy of Infidelity, and Philo-

Galerius, Emperor of Rome.—His full name was Gaius Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born in Dacia, on the Danube, either his mother had fled from the tribe of the Carpi. He joined the army, and fought under Aurelian and Probus, gained distinction, and was at last made joint emperor by Diocletian in 292. He divorced his first wife, and married Valeria, the Emperor’s daughter. Galerius had a great hatred for the Christians, which was stimulated by his brother, who was a viceroy of the Phrygian province. In 303, he being in Nicomedia, passed Diocletian to break the forty years’ truce to the Church, and to write an edict against the Christians. In 304 he returned to his own province, and a great persecution at once began. Two years afterwards Diocletian abdicated, and Galerius became sole ruler. He changed the order of death to the Christians to that of mutilation, but in 308 the persecutions became worse than ever, and it is said that from then till 310 more blood was shed than in any other two years in Roman history. In the latter year the Emperor being seized by an incurable disease was frightened, and at once made an edict of toleration. He died May, 311.

Galilee.—A porch or chapel at the entrance of a church; a term also sometimes applied to the western portion of the nave. It was considered scarcely as sacred as the rest of the church, and in it it was customary to place dead bodies awaiting their burial, and also women might here meet and converse with the monks who were their near relations. The “Galilee” answers to the narthex of the ancient church, a sort of court of the externs. There are several examples in our English cathedrals; at Durham it is an extensive chapel, built for the use of the women, who, according to the strict rule of St. Cuthbert’s Abbey, were not allowed to come farther into the church than the second pillar of the nave. At Lincoln it is a porch on the west of the great transept. At Ely it is either a porch or chapel at the west of the nave. In former times there was a Galilee to St. Stephen’s Chapel at Westminster Abbey.

Galileo [1564-1642].—This famous man was the son of Vincenzo Galilei, of Pisa, and was christened by the name by which he is now universally known, his full name being, as will thus be seen, Galileo Galilei. The history of his remarkable experiments and discoveries, deeply interesting as they are, have no place here, our business being his position in the religious history of his times. In 1609 he constructed his famous telescope, and became the founder of a brilliant series of discoveries in the solar system. He examined in turn, long and patiently, the moon and the planets, and thereby set aside opinions of the schoolmen, which had in his time been taken for granted as fixed truths. This gave occasion for the Jesuits, who cordially hated him for belonging to the party which expelled them from Padua, to denounce him to the Inquisition as a heretic, and he was openly denounced by Caccini, a friar, in the pulpit. Galileo defended himself with spirit. He never dreamt, he said, of attacking religion. The Scriptures were written to teach men the way of salvation, not astronomy. But the Inquisition persisted, and he was summoned to Rome. Pope Paul V., in 1616, gave him an audience, promised him personal safety, but commanded him not to teach the Copernican system of the motion of the earth, and Galileo left Rome in disgust. The appearance of some comets led him again to prosecute his astronomical discoveries, but he kept clear of prejudice, and was afterwards received by Pope Urban VIII. with great favour. But in 1632 he published a treatise on the Ptolemaic and Copernican system, thrown into the form of a conversation between three fictitious persons, in which the Ptolemaist gets altogether the worst of it. And unfortunately for the writer, the Pope recognised in the beaten controversialist some likeness to himself, for he had used some of the arguments which Galileo pulled to pieces, not without much ridicule. Again he was summoned before the Holy Office, and it is supposed, though hardly proved, that he was put to the torture, and a long sentence was passed upon him, of which we transcribe only a small portion:—" The proposition that the sun is the centre of the world, and immovable from its place, is absurd, philosophically false, and formally heretical, because it is expressly contrary to Holy Scripture. The proposition that the earth is not the centre of the world, nor immovable, but that it moves, and also with a diurnal motion, is absurd, philosophically false, and theologically considered, at least erroneous in faith." Consequently the sentence goes on to prohibit his book, to confine him to the prison of the Inquisition during pleasure, and to command him to say the Penitential Psalms once a week, etc., etc. In order to obtain so mild a sentence he had to abjure his "errors," which he did. On rising from his knees after doing so, he whispered to a friend, "E pur se muove" ("It moves all the same"). From that time he was kept in strict confinement, sometimes treated even rigorously when words of his were supposed to indicate unorthodoxy. He continued his studies, and wrote Dialogues on Motion, but the terror of the Holy Office was so great that he could find no publisher in Italy. A few years later the book was published in Amsterdam. He became blind in 1636.

The case of Galileo has been evidently felt to be an awkward one for the Roman Church. The late Dr. W. G. Ward faced it with much courage in two articles of the Dublin Review in 1871. He rest his defence on the ground that the sentence was not pronounced by the Pope ex cathedra, and therefore was not infallible. It was natural and inevitable, he says, that they should regard his opinion about the earth's motion as false and contrary to Scripture, seeing that the obvious sense of Scripture is unquestionably opposed to the Copernican theory, and only some overwhelming scientific probability could render it legitimate to override the obvious in favour of an unobvious sense. Later researches have supplied this overwhelming probability, and consequently all Catholics now admit that the Holy Ghost for wise purposes permitted the sacred writers to express themselves in language which was literally true as understood by them, but was figurative in the highest degree as understood by Him.

Gall, Sr., or Gallus, the apostle of Switzerland, was one of the most distinguished scholars whom St. Columbanus brought with him from Ireland to France. He was descended from a good Irish family, and entrusted to Columbanus to be educated for the service of God. When Columbanus and his associates took up their residence in the ruins of the castle of Bregenz, they found an old chapel which they determined to consecrate for Christian worship, but in it were three gilded images, which the pagans worshipped as their tutelary divinities. Gallus, being well acquainted with the German tongue, was chosen to preach before a multitude who had assembled to witness the consecration, and made a great impression on them, which he strengthened by breaking in pieces their images, and thus proving to them the nothingness of their false gods. Here the monk remained some time, but when at length the were expelled, Columbanus and his part went to Italy, but ill-health prevented Gallus from going with them; he betook himself to the protection of an old priest named Willima who took care of him till he was strong enough to seek another sphere of duty. Tradition says that he and a deacon named Hillila wandered together through the forest till there were shown by Divine guidance the exa spot where they should fix their abode, while being pointed out to them, the monastery St. Gall, named after Gallus, was afterward built thereon. Here he laboured in the education of youth, in the training of ecclesiasti and monks, by whom the seeds of Chris anity were sown far and wide. The vacant bishopric of Costnitz was offered to Gallu. but he preferred discharging the quiet duties of his convent, and declined the office. The date of his death is uncertain. The monastery he founded became one of the most celebrated Benedictine establishments. Its mon were among the best friends and preserve of ancient literature. It was for some tin subject to the Bishop of Constance, and the were often great disputes between him and the monks as to the right of electing an abbot. It was secularised in 1798, at the time of the French Revolution.

Gallican Church.—The circumstances of the foundation of the Gallican Church unknown, and it is doubtful whether it was of Greek or Asiatic origin. A letter quo by Eusebius, written in the second century is the first reliable account of Christianity Gaul, and tells of the persecutions which Christians suffered under Marcus Aurelius in Lyons, the chief missionary city of the province, and the See of the bishop. During this persecution Pothinus, Bishop of Lyon, suffered martyrdom when ninety years of age, and the names of many others are recorded. Among the survivors was Irenaeus, who presbyter in Lyons, and who was proba
the author of the above-named letter. During the persecution he was indefatigable in his exertions to help his brethren, and was commissioned by some who were in prison to take a letter from them to the Bishop of Rome; it contained a protest against the heresies which were creeping into the Church, and which so shocked Irenaeus that, on returning from Rome to Lyons, he devoted himself heart and soul to contesting the false doctrines. He was appointed Bishop of Lyons in the place of Pothinus, and was therefore in a better position for carrying out the task he had set himself. Many of his works have perished, but those which are still extant mark him out as the greatest theologian of the early Church. The persecution served as usual to promote the cause of the Church, but the Christians remained a minority until the time of Constantine, when Christianity became the established religion. It was adopted by numbers who had hitherto been pagans, but the new converts brought it down in some degree towards their own level, and it lost some of the life and energy which had marked it during the persecution. As a remedy for this state of things, some of the earnest-minded Christians, foremost among whom was St. Martin, introduced monasticism into Gaul. But a deadly danger threatened the nations which lay on the borders of the Empire. They had received the faith from Arian missionaries, and therefore rejected more or less the Perfect Divinity of our Lord. There was, therefore, a gulf between them and the orthodox Christians, and this proved disastrous to some of the Gothic States, and, as ribbon has shown, went far to prepare the way for the Mahometan invasion of Spain. It appears clear that the invasion of Gaul by the Frank King, Clovis, heathen though he was, was on the invitation of the Catholic bishops, who believed that there was less danger to be apprehended for the Church from him than from heretical patrons. That invasion was the beginning of the kingdom of the Franks. It was speedily followed by the conversion of King Clovis, at the close of the fifth century, through the influence of his wife Clotilda, herself a Christian.

His warlike zeal for the cause of the church he defeated the Arians in battle at Aiteries, and he not only gave lands for the maintenance of churches, but invited foreign missionaries to preach to the people. Towards the close of this dynasty the Moslem invasion of Spain threatened to overwhelm the land, but was beaten back by the battle of Charles Martel, at Tours, in 732.

Further invasion took place from that time, and at the accession of Charlemagne the power of the Church was greatly increased. He realised the fact that the State should be strengthened and civilised by an alliance with the Church, and he organised ecclesiastical system so carefully that after his death the Church's influence continued to extend itself on all sides, though his enormous empire fell to pieces. All through the changes which took place, Church government remained the same; the country was divided into 120 bishoprics, which were contained in eighteen provinces, each of these being under the rule of an archbishop. The Pope became possessed of almost unlimited power through the general confusion in the State, and the clergy as a whole realised that by maintaining a union with him they would best advance the cause of the Church. After the death of Charlemagne succeeded a period of inactivity, in which the religious zeal which had characterised its predecessor seemed to be dying out, and this lasted till the eleventh century. Towards the close of that century, the sufferings undergone by pilgrims in the East originated the first Crusade [Crusades], the cause of which induced men who had hitherto been only fighting one against the other to take up arms against a common enemy. The Crusades, which lasted at intervals until the end of the thirteenth century, gave a large accession of power to the popes and to the Church, while the power of the nobles was declining through the amount which they expended on war. With the end of the Holy Wars the Papal power began to decline, owing partly to the increase of power of the French Government, the advanced civilisation of the laity, and the degeneracy of the clergy; and the conduct of Philip the Fair, who took advantage of his own influence to bring contempt on, and finally to cause the death of Pope Boniface VIII., brought matters to a crisis. The successors of Boniface, who had now taken up their residence at Avignon, were remarkable for the voluptuousness of their lives, and the Church's influence grew weaker year by year, especially after their return to Rome, when the French clergy appointed a Pope of their own to remain at Avignon, and the schism thus occasioned lasted from 1378 to 1417, and was terminated by a council held at Constance, which deposed both Popes, and appointed Martin V., over the whole Church. The power of the Papacy continued to decline, and the right of nominating bishops, besides other privileges, was transferred to the French Crown. Among the earnest-minded clergy the need for reformation was strongly felt, and the first attempt to effect it was made by a few men in the south of France, under Peter Waldo. The persecutions which they suffered compelled them to escape to Piedmont, where they were little able to influence the religion of their country, and their opinions were accordingly disregarded as harmless to anyone but themselves. Only when the Reformed doctrines which originated in Germany began to spread was there any considerable movement in France in the same direction, when the Huguenots first began to excite alarm in the Church. [Huguenots.] Under Henry II., the Protestant doctrines were allowed to spread, but after his death the contest between the Houses of Guise and Bourbon, which was as much political as religious, changed the whole nature of the struggle. On the minds of the people the Reformed Religion took little hold, and the atrocious massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572 was a deadly blow to the Huguenots; but the turning point of the contest was the decision of Henry of Navarre to become a Roman Catholic, an act which destroyed the Protestant hope of ascendency. A small proportion of the population still remained Protestant, and Henry protected them by the Edict of Nantes, securing toleration for them. But in an evil hour for France this Edict was revoked by Louis XIV. in 1685. Meanwhile the Order of the Jesuits under Ignatius Loyola [q.v.] had arisen, pledged to obey implicitly the will of the Pope. The Jesuits were looked upon with anger and suspicion by men of all religions. Not only Protestants, but Catholics were arrayed against them: for their unqualified submission to the Vatican implied enmity to the ancient liberties of the Church and the nation. They were in constant conflict with the divines of the Sorbonne, who accused them of treason towards the State; and on the murder of Henry III. by the monk Clement, such a storm of popular fury was raised against the Order that they were banished from France. Henry IV., however, who at heart was a sceptic ("Paris is well worth a mass," was the phrase which truly summed up his motives), favoured the Jesuits from motives of policy, and selected one for his confessor, and, the practice being kept up during the reigns of his successors, the influence of the Order was greatly increased. Eventually such influence resulted in much evil to the Church and nation: for the high aims which had characterised the founders of the movement gave way in their successors to the desire to increase their own power, and even the Popes, whom they professed to obey, had to give way to them and conciliate them. Their controversy with the Jansenists [q.v.] lasted till far into the eighteenth century, and resulted in the Pope's censure of the Jansenist doctrines, though these were nevertheless far from being exterminated. The Jansenists had effected a reformation in the convents and other religious houses throughout France, and the Jesuits found a means of showing their animosity by persecuting the sisterhoods, and destroying their houses. In return an adherent of the Jansenists published anonymously the Provincial Letters, which became exceedingly popular, and dealt a severe blow to the Jesuits. [Pascal.] Beside the Jesuits, there were others whose zeal was as great as theirs, but far higher in motive, and who endured all kinds of hardships in the endeavour to stir up a revival of religious feeling in France. Francis de Sales was one of these, and was said to have converted seventy thousand Calvinists to the Church of Rome, besides having carried out a reformation of the religious Orders. Scarcely less famous than he was St. Vincent de Paul, the founder of so many religious institutions in France. [Vincent.] The reign of Louis XIV. saw the power of the Gallican Church increase, and in proportion the Pope's authority was diminished. The King claimed the right of appointing to vacant Sees, and this being refused he caused a series of articles to be drawn up limiting the Papal power in France, and declaring that it should be controlled by the Church's ordinances, and by canons and local customs. Here we have the origin of what is known as "Gallicanism," the tendency towards Nationalism, as opposed to Papal centralisation; the same tendency, in fact, as was shown by men like Gardiner in England, who, while holding Roman doctrines firmly were also zealous for national independence. The opposite tendency is known as Ultra- Montanism [q.v.]. We have noted in the article on Bossuet how that great prelate while earnest on behalf of a Christendom united under Rome, yet was jealous lest the unity should be corrupted into tyranny. He declared that the Pope had no deposing power over monarchs, and, indeed, no control over temporal affairs; that the authority of the Pope is not above that of general councils, and that his decisions require confirmation from the Church. This last proposition would not be reckoned heresy after the Vatican Decree of 1870. Louis XIV. was fortunate in his clergy, two of whom [Bossuet and Fenelon] stand in the first place among French ecclesiastics. The doctrine of "quietism," who was put forward by Fenelon in one of his books, and in which he had numerous followers, was condemned as unsound mysticism by a Papal brief, which was, however only issued in accordance with the wishes of the King. As Calvinism and Jansenism have been repressed, so now was Quietism [q.v.].] King Louis, who cared little for theological discussions, but was entirely under the control of his Jesuit Ministers, and was also much influenced by Madame de Maintenon. Under their rule the religion of the Court, and to a certain extent of the people, became cold a formal, wanting in fervour, though the services were conducted with elaborate ritual. Thus it became hollow and unmeaning, and is no wonder that after the King's death the people freed themselves from the restraint and cast off even the outward show of religion. But that which did most to bring about the downfall of the Church was the growth of the different schools of philosophy of Voltaire, Rousseau, D'Alembert, and others, all of whom held Christianity in contempt, though they used different methods of expressing their hatred. Through all classes of people fidelity spread, and a great number of the bishops and clergy were sceptics, though they felt bound to preach against the progress of science; a manifest hypocrisy which brought religion into further contempt. At the close of the eighteenth century the downfall came. The Jesuits were suppressed by a Papal Bull in 1773, under the compulsion of Louis XV. When the tremendous revolution of 1789 came the clergy were compelled to form part of the National Assembly, where, being outnumbered, they were forced to consent to measures which destroyed the little power that still remained to them; tithes were abolished, Church lands confiscated, the monasteries dissolved, and the clergy required to take an oath of fidelity to the Constitution, which now proposed a redistribution of dioceses to coincide with the departments. The confusion into which all was plunged by the Reign of Terror put a stop to all such plans. When his was over there came a reaction, and Napoleon fostered this by seeking a reconciliation with Rome. It was a difficult matter to carry out, for many of the clergy were strongly opposed to a compromise, while the army were determined that the clergy should have no power shown them. A Concordat was nevertheless drawn up and signed, and in accordance with its conditions public worship was resumed, and the Church re-established. The restoration of the Bourbons gave hopes to the Jesuits and the Ultra-Papalists; and Lamennais, a Breton priest, published an essay on religious indifference, denouncing all compromise, and "Gallicanism" as a spurious form of religion. [LAMENNAIS.] It had the effect of strengthening the Ultramontane spirit among the clergy immensely, and Pope Leo XII. regarded him as a new St. Bernard or Dominic. When the Revolution of 1830 came, Lamennais and others of like opinions [LACORDAIRE,ONTALEMBERT] threw themselves into it, with the design of combining Papal authority with ecumenic opinions. But they found little favour as their views developed, and over the Church has remained in opposition to republicanism, with apparently little hope of becoming reconciled. The present factions of the Church and civil power increase are strained apparently as far as they can be. The clerical party are in a minority; its attacking them as instructors of the young are passed on every occasion, and men in glory in unbelief have more than once appointed Ministers of Public Worship. The French clergy were probably never more exemplary in personal life, and there some signs, in the midst of all the jad, of aspirations after a better state of things.

Belonging to the Gallican Church and her tendencies there are now about eighteen archdioceses, viz. Aix, Albi, Algiers, Auch, Avignon, Besançon, Bordeaux, Bourges, Cambray, Chambéry, Lyons, Paris, Rheims, Rennes, Rouen, Sens, Toulouse, Tours, and seventy-two bishoprics. The parochial clergy, about 42,000 in number, comprise curés cantonaux (the ministers of the chief places in each canton).* and servantes, who serve the other churches in the canton. They are, however, substantially the same as the curés, and each in his own locality is called "M. le Curé;" only the curé proper has to be appointed by the bishop, with the approval of the Government; the servante is the nominee of the bishop alone. The stipend of a curé, which is paid by the State, is from 1,200 to 1,500 francs a year, and the commune provides him a house rent-free. The churches are under a conseil de fabrique.

Gang-week.—One of the names given to Rogation Week, because of the processions round the boundaries of parishes which take place then.

Gangra, Council of, was held in the fourth century. The exact date is very doubtful. Some place it between the councils of Nicea [325] and Antioch [341], and others later than the Constantinopolitan synod of 360. The object of the Council was to confirm the decrees that had been passed at Neo-Caesarea against the Eustathians [q.v.]. Twenty canons were made, followed by an epilogue drawn up by the bishops present, who numbered about sixteen, condemning those who, under pretence of the exercise of works of severity and mortification, "do insult those who live in a more plain and simple manner, and would bring in innovations contrary to the Scriptures and the canons of the Church." They admire virginity, but at the same time "honour honest marriage." This Council has always been a great difficulty to the Roman Catholic Church in advocating the celibacy of the clergy.

Gardiner, Stephen [b. 1483, d. 1555], Bishop of Winchester, and Lord Chancellor of England, was born at Bury St. Edmunds, and was said to be the natural son of Richard Woodville, the brother of Edward IV.'s queen. He studied at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and was well versed in canon and civil law, and a good scholar in both Latin and Greek. He became secretary to Cardinal Wolsey, and was sent to Rome in 1527, to negotiate the divorce between Henry VIII. and Catherine of Aragon. On his return he was made Secretary of State, and in 1531 Archbishop of Leicester, and at the close of the same year Bishop of Winchester. He complied with the Court in renouncing the Pope's authority, and wrote a book, de Vera Obedientia, in support of the King's supremacy, but he never abandoned in any degree the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church with respect to the Sacrament. For this reason he opposed all further reformation, endeavoured to dissuade the King from listening to the proposals of Cranmer, and was the head of the reactionary party in the latter days of King Henry. He was instrumental in the downfall and execution of Thomas Cromwell in 1540. Towards the end of the reign Gardiner fell out of favour with Henry, and endeavoured to ingratiate himself by impeaching his Queen, Catherine Parr, of heretical tendencies; but in a personal interview she managed to convince the King of the falseness of the accusation, and Gardiner fell into yet deeper disgrace. The King had named him executor of his will, but revoked this. In the reign of Edward VI. he was imprisoned in the Fleet from Jan., 1547, until the following December, and this certainly without any justification. He was then allowed to retire to his episcopal palace in Southwark; and though his sentiments continued the same, his outward compliance left no room, for a time, to find occasion against him; however, on account of a sermon preached on St. Peter's Day, 1548, he was arrested and committed to the Tower. On his refusal to subscribe to certain articles which had been drawn up, he was deprived of his bishopric. Queen Mary released him on her accession in 1553, and he became her Lord Chancellor, and was restored to his bishopric. He had a great share in the articles of marriage between the Queen and Philip of Spain, and officiated at the ceremony. In the proceedings against the Protestants, there seems no reason to doubt that much of the severity was owing to him; and when Cardinal Pole urged that the people were to be recovered to the Church of Rome by moderation and gentleness, Gardiner declared for the execution of the laws against the Lollards, insisting that terror was a more effective expedient than bare persuasion. It is remarkable that, fierce as he was against the Protestants, there was always in him a strong sympathy with some of their doctrines: he was, as we have seen, a strong Sacramentalist, but he was also earnest in his holding of the doctrine of Justification by Faith, and expressed these convictions on his death-bed.

Garnet, Henry. Superior of the Jesuits in England, was born at Nottingham in 1534. He was educated at Winchester School, and had intended to study at New College, Oxford, but gave up the idea. Having turned Roman Catholic, he went to Rome, and joined the Society of the Jesuits in 1575. He studied at the Jesuits' College, where he became Professor of Hebrew and Teacher of Mathematics. He became so famed that, in 1588, he returned to England as head of the Jesuits there. He followed various employments in order to hide his real calling, which he carried on with great zeal, and he is suspected of having joined in treasonable plots with the King of Spain against Queen Elizabeth. At the accession of James I. he purchased a free pardon, but was still suspected in consequence of his acquaintance with various Roman Catholics. At last came the Gunpowder Plot and Garnet was among those suspected, as he was known to have been in communication with Catesby, Gerard, and Greenaway, and others of the conspirators. A Bill of Attainder against these four and several others was passed. Most escaped, but Garnet and Father Oldcorn, alias Hall, his confessor, were seized and sent to the Tower, 1606. He was interrogated by the Earl of Salisbury, Dean Overal, etc. He was not tortured, but various secrets were discovered by spies who listened to the conversation between the two condemned priests; they were tried at Guildhall, found guilty of treason, and executed in St. Paul's Churchyard.

Gasparin, Argénoir [b. 1810, d. 1871]. A distinguished Protestant nobleman of France, who wrote several works urging the finiteness of religious opinion as a safeguard against Rationalism and Romanism. His wit and many English readers by her small volume, The Near a Heavenly Horizon.

Gataker, Thomas [a. 1574, d. 1654]. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; became Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, 1601, and rector of Rotherhithe, 1611. 1643 he was called to be a member of the Westminster Assembly. He was a learned writer, author of a catechism, a work on Transubstantiation, sermons and annotations on Isaiah and Jeremiah.

Gatien, Sr. 1st Bishop of Tours, d. at the end of the third century. He was buried in the choir of the Cathedral of Tours which has been called by his name since the fourteenth century, but his relics were burnt by the Huguenots in 1562. His festival is observed in the Roman Church on Dec. 18.

Gauden, John. was born at Mayfield, Essex, in 1605, his father being the vicar. He was educated at Bury St. Edmunds, thence went to St. John's College, Cambridge. He moved to Oxford in 1630, and began tutor in Wadham College, and afterwars claim to the Earl of Warwick, who made him rector in Berkshire, and vicar of a parish in Cambridgeshire. At this time he inclined the Parliamentarians, who appointed him the living of Bocking, in Essex. As it went on he sided more and more with the Royalists, became chaplain to Charles I. the Restoration, and successively Bishop of Exeter and of Worcester, where he died in 1688.

Dr. Gauden is asserted to have written a remarkable work, Eikon Basilike; or, The state, trial, sufferings of his sacred Majesty in his Solemn Sufferings," which appeared in 1648. It is written in the first person, and is an account of Charles I.'s life from 1640-48. S believe that the King himself wrote it, and the discussion about it is yet unsettled. Mr. Green writes that it is undoubtedly the work of Gauden; while Mr. Gardiner says it is an open question, and that if it was a forgery it certainly is a correct account of Charles's views and character.

Gebhard, Archbishop of Cologne, was born at Waldburg in 1547, and became archbishop in 1577. He fell in love with Agnes of Mansfeld, which may have caused him to proclaim religious freedom and to turn Lutheran at the beginning of 1553, as he was thereby enabled to marry her. At the Diet of Augsburg, in 1555, the States which had embraced Lutheranism had been confirmed in their religious freedom; but, to prevent the progress of the reformation, Charles V. brought forward the ecclesiastical reservation, that any ecclesiastic who renounced Romanism should forfeit his dignity and benefice. Thus Gebhard was exposed, his See declared vacant, and Duke Ernst of Bavaria was appointed. Gebhard held the fortress of Bonn; but the Protestants entrusted his toleration, and suspected him of alvinism, so would not come to his help. He evacuated Bonn, and retired to Strasburg, where he died in 1601.

Gehenna.—The Greek New Testament furn for the place of the wicked, or of final retribution. It comes from the word Gehinnon, the Valley of Hinnom, by Jerusalem. After Ahab introduced the worship of the Canaanite gods, the idolatrous Jews used to sacrifice their children to Moloch in this valley, because of these idolatries, God threatened to place with special manifestations of His wrath, saying that it should no more be called the Valley of Hinnom, or of Tophet, but the Valley of Slaughter (Jer. vii. 31, 32; xix. 5). It was defiled by Josiah (2 Kings ii. 19), and thenceforward became the sanctuary of all sorts of putrefying matter, from the latter ages came to be the image of Gehenna.

Gelasius I., Pope, succeeded Felix III. (11) in 492. His pontificate was mostly spent in up with a correspondence between him and the Eastern Church under Eunapius, bishop of Constantinople, concerning Arians, whom Felix had excommunicated. Gelasius died in 496. His writings, several of which still exist, express views very difficult to reconcile with those of his successors. As he rebukes the Manicheans for communion in one kind, and speaks of the bread of wine as so remaining after consecration. [Milman's Lat. Christ., i. 235.] One of his chief works attributed to him is his Commentary (q.v.).

Gelasius of Cyzicus, son of a priest of the Church, lived during the second half of the fifth century. He found an old parch-ment, which had belonged to Dalmatius, Bishop of Cyzicus, containing an account of the Council of Nicaea, and, filling up the gaps from Eusebius Cesariensis and Rufinus, he wrote a history of the Council. This history, either from the inaccuracy of his material, or from the profanity of his imagination, is very untrustworthy. The disputes are mostly his own composition, and the conferences from the eleventh chapter to the twenty-fourth, in the second book, are believed to be mere fiction. His book is faulty in other ways, as there is neither method in his narration, judgment in the choice of his matter, nor beauty in his diction. This history was published at Paris, by Robert Balfour, in 1599, and afterwards inserted in the Councils.

Generation, Eternal.—This phrase is used to denote the Catholic faith as to the Sonship of the Second Person in the Trinity. Christ is the Son of God in a sense in which no other being is. He Himself claimed to be so, speaking of "My Father" as distinct from "your Father." And again, "I and My Father are One." His Apostles teach this also, especially St. John, who speaks of Him as "the only begotten Son." And so the creeds have formulated the Scripture teaching into an article of the faith—e.g., the Apostles' Creed, "His only Son, our Lord;" the Nicene Creed, "The only-begotten Son of God, Begotten of His Father before all worlds, God of God, Light of Light, Very God of very God, Begotten, not made, Being of one substance with the Father, By whom all things were made;" the Athanasian Creed, "God, of the Substance of the Father, Begotten before the worlds. . . . Perfect God, and perfect Man. . . . Equal to the Father, as touching His Godhead." The Second Article in the Anglican Church defines the same truth as follows:—"The Son, which is the Word of the Father, begotten from everlasting of the Father, the very eternal God, and of one substance with the Father, took man's nature in the womb of the blessed Virgin, of her substance." If this were not so, then Christ's claims and words, as repeatedly recorded in the Gospels, would be nothing less than blasphemous, and were in fact so deemed by the Jews who denied them. The above definitions serve to show clearly in what respects Christ's Sonship differs from all other sonships:—First, He was begotten from all eternity; there never was a time when He was not. For although we use the words "Sonship" and "generation" in reference to the Second Person in the Trinity, yet we do not understand thereby a passing from non-existence to existence, as in physical generation; but we must understand the terms in consistency with the essential attributes of God, of which eternal existence is one [cf. John i.]. Secondly, in the eternal generation of the Son, the whole and not a part only, of the Divine Essence of the Father was communicated to the Son. "In Him dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." There could be no division of the Divine nature, so that one part should be separated from another: and though the Son be a separate Person from the Father, yet the Son still remains in the Father and the Father in the Son; different Persons, but One God. The Schoolmen describe this mystery as generatio ab intra [cf. Athanasian Creed: "Neither confounding the Persons, nor dividing the substance"]; this doctrine the Church has struggled in all ages to hold fast, as necessary to her very existence. The Jewish sect of the Ebionites were the first to deny its truth. The Arians followed, and it is extremely difficult now to realise the extent to which Arianism had permeated the Christian community in early ages. The Church had, however, faithful and victorious champions in Athanasius, Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, and many others of lesser note. These all laboured in the East. The West was not so harassed, but writers like Irenæus and Polycarp did much to build up their people in the orthodox faith, and the doctrine finally triumphed at the Councils of Nice and Constantinople. At the Reformation the doctrine of the Eternal Generation of the Son was retained by Lutherans and Calvinists, as well as by the Church of England; and both Arianism and Socinianism have ever since appeared only as uninfluential heresies.

Genesius, Sr.—A lawyer at Arles, martyred in the Diocletian persecution. When he was converted to the faith he ardently longed to receive baptism; but the Bishop deferred it for a while, whilst he comforted his scruples by assuring him that should he be martyred, his death would be even as a baptism. Soon afterwards he was arrested; whereupon, as his biographer states, "by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost he leapt into the Rhone, and thus the river became to him a second Jordan." His pursuers beheaded him there and then.

Geneviève, Sr., the patron saint of Paris, was born at Nanterre, near Paris, in 422. Seven years after, Germanus [q. v.], Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, Bishop of Troyes, passed through Nanterre on their way to England to check the Pelagian heresy, and took great notice of Geneviève, exhorting her to consecrate herself to God, and giving her a medal with a cross on it to remind her of her promise to do so. From this time she is said to have performed many miracles. Her mother it is said was struck blind for giving her a blow, and only recovered her sight about a month after on washing her eyes with some water which the daughter had blessed. When she was fifteen, the Bishop of Paris gave her the veil, and received her vows according to the usual forms of the Church. Her parents dying, she went to live with her godmother at Paris. Here she fell ill, and lay for three days in a trance, during which, it is said, many wonderful things were revealed to her. Some of the things she told to her acquaintance, and she began to be looked upon as a visionary impostor. When the ill feeling against her was at its height, Germanus passed through Paris, who greatly incensed at the calumny against her, and pronounced her innocent. But the reprobate did not last long. The Parisians were alarmed at a rumour that the Hun, under Attila, were coming. Geneviève for told that the city would not be taken, as she was accused of prophesying falsely. Her enemies were about to throw her into the Seine, when a messenger came from Germanus, who was in Italy, and sent to testify again to his reverence for her. Germanus died soon after, and Geneviève lost a protector; but she never needed one again, as the people had become convinced of her innocence and sanctity, and left her in peace. She practised great austerities on herself, eating only on Sundays and Thursdays, her food consisting solely of barley bread and beans. This course she continued till she was fifty, and then, at the persuasion of bishops, consented to take milk and flesh. Geneviève is said to have greatly assisted the conversion of Clovis, first King of the Franks. She certainly had a great influence over him afterwards, and it was her persuasion that he began to build the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, the name of which was afterwards changed to St. Denis, as a memorial for whom Geneviève had a great veneration. It is impossible to give a connected life of Geneviève, as the accounts we have of her have little else but a string of miracles scattered here and there, having been wrought by her, not only in Paris but in various parts of France. St. Geneviève died on Jan. 3rd, 512, and was interred in the new Church of the Apostles, in Paris. Present shrine was made in 1242.

Genuflectentes or Substrct. ["Kneelers," or "Prostrators"].—The person given in the ancient Church to the third order of catechumens and penitents. They were called to distinguish them from the Assist or "hearers" only, for they were allowed to remain in the lower part of the church and attend some particular prayers that specially offered up for them, whilst others were kneeling upon their knees, and were for imposition of hands and the mini benediction.

Genuflexion [Lat. genu, "knee"; fleeto, "to bend"].—The act of bending the knee in prayer, as a sign of adoration and reverence.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, or Jeffrey ap Arthur, the noted chronicler, was born at Monmouth at the beginning of the twelfth century, educated at a monastery became Archdeacon of Monmouth, and in 1152 Bishop of St. Asaph, which he only held two years, dying in 1164. Geoffrey is famed for his great work, the Chronicon sive Historia Brittonum, which was completed about 1128. The work is said by some to be translated from Brut of Breunod, a history of the Kings of Britain written by Tysilio, Bishop of St. Asaph, while others affirm that the Welsh history is of later date, and was taken from Geoffrey's. The Chronicles are a mass of fabrications, with a few historical traditions worked in. It was first printed at Paris in 1508. From these chronicles come Shakespeare's King Lear, much of Drayton's Polyhymnia, and a part of Milton's Comus.

George.—There are a great number of persons of this name who figure in the history of the Church. Dr. Smith's Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Biography enumerates seventy-three, and some have thought that the name became thus popular from the use of the word Georgios ("a tilled field"), as applied to believers, in I. Cor. iii. 9. We need only mention:

[1] St. George the Martyr.—Though little is known of him, his day is a marked one in English ecclesiology, for he is regarded as the patron saint of England, and figures in the act of killing the dragon on some English coins. He was a centurion in the army of Diocletian, and is said by some writers to have been the man who indignantly pulled down that Emperor's decree ordering the persecution, which was affixed to the wall of his palace. For this it is said he was roasted to death at a slow fire. Other historians, however, declare that the doer of this daring act was named John. One thing we may take for certain—namely, that St. George must have been a man of marked nobleness and worth, from the honour that was paid to him in the early days. Churches existed bearing the name of "the great martyr, St. George," by the middle of the fourth century. His remains are said to rest in a church at Lydda, still existing, built over them by the Emperor Justinian. The legend of his slaying the dragon belongs to mediaval times, and clearly refers to his having vanquished the devil by martyrdom. Originally it appears to have been Constantine who was so represented; the Georgian Church transferred it to their namesake. St. George was held in honour in England from the beginning of our Christianity, but his elevation to the dignity of the English patron saint, displacing Edward the Confessor, dates from the Crusades. When the Christians were hard pressed by the Saracens at the battle of Antioch, June 28th, 1098, the vision suddenly appeared, we are told, "of St. George and Demetrius hastening from the mountains and hurling darts against the enemy." The Crusaders took heart at this, pushed forward, and won the victory. Again, he appeared to Richard L., and Edward III. gave utterance to the national voice by dedicating St. George's Chapel, Windsor, to him in 1348, and making him patron of the new Order of the Garter. In the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., St. George's Day was a red-letter day, and in many parts of Christendom it is still a high day. We may mention that St. George's Day, April 23rd, was the birthday and death-day of Shakespeare. Cervantes died on the same day and the same year as Shakespeare [1616]. The poet Wordsworth also died on St. George's Day, 1850.

[2] George of Cappadocia.—Gibbon, apparently from his well-known bias, has identified this man with the above-named. "The infamous George of Cappadocia has been transformed into the renowned St. George of England, the patron of arms, of chivalry, and of the Garter." This slander, as Dean Milman quietly remarks, is disposed of by the fact, demonstrated clearly by Dr. Milner, that St. George was honoured in the Church before George of Cappadocia could possibly have been transformed into a martyr.

He was born at Epiphania, in Cilicia, and began his career as a pork-contractor to the army, but had to fly the country on account of his dishonesty. He afterwards became a zealous convert to Arianism, and was sent by Constantius to supersede Athanasius in the bishopric of Alexandria. He arrived there during Lent, 356. He forbade the adherents of Athanasius the exercise of their worship, and imprisoned them; he enriched himself by many acts of oppression on the Christians, and with an armed force he entered the pagan temples and plundered them. In 358 the people rose against him and drove him away, but he was quickly reinstated by Constantius. In 361 the news reached Alexandria of the accession of Julian, and this was the signal of another rising against George. He and two of his chief adherents, Diodorus and Dracontius, were seized and thrown into prison by the pagans, whom they had greatly exasperated; here they were kept some days, till the populace, unable to restrain their impatience, burst open the prison and literally tore their victims to pieces. This violent death was sufficient, in the eyes of the Arians, to entitle their champion to canonisation.

Gerhardt, Paul, the greatest of German hymn-writers, was born at Gräfenhainichen, in Saxony, in 1607. He studied at the Wittenberg University, and became preacher in Berlin in 1657; but after nine years was dismissed for refusing to subscribe to edicts which he thought would tend to unite the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. In 1667 he became Archdeacon of Lübben, where he died in 1676.

Gerhardt is said to have written 123 hymns, which are noted for their sweetness and easy rhythm. The best known in England is {s} sacred Head, once wounded, which was translated by J. W. Alexander in 1849.

German Catholics. [Ronge.]

German Reformed Church. [Luther; Zwinglius.]

Germanus, Sr., one of the greatest of the French bishops, was born at Auxerre about the year 380. He was the son of Rusticus or Germanilla, of high descent. He was sent to be educated at Lyons, and thence went to Rome, where he studied law with such success that he gained a reputation as one of the greatest orators and advocates. On his return to Gaul, he became one of the six "Dukes" of Gaul, his duchy including Auxerre. He fulfilled all his duties thoroughly, but was too fond of pleasure, to which he gave himself up without restraint. This incurred the displeasure of the bishop, Amator, who rebuked Germanus, which so angered the Duke that he plotted his murder. Amator heard of the design, and fled to Autun. It is said that he was here warned in a dream that Germanus would succeed him in the bishopric. Whether this is so or not, he seized his enemy, cut his hair, and made him a deacon. Germanus's heart was touched, and he was preparing to fulfil his functions when Amator died, appointing Germanus his successor. Our saint demurred for some time, but was unanimously elected, and consecrated July 7th, 418. He immediately changed his mode of life, practising the greatest austerities. He founded a monastery near Auxerre, where he spent a great deal of his time. Upon the promotion of Celestine to the Papal chair, in 422, the Pelagians, who had been condemned, attempted again to spread their errors, but were repulsed, so crossed to Britain. Here they had more success, till at last the Church there appealed to Gaul for help. A council was held at Arles, in 429, and Germanus was sent, with Lupus of Troyes, to the island. They at once began to preach, and so many flocked to them, attracted by their eloquence, that they at last had to hold their services in the streets. The Pelagian leaders, having lost nearly all their followers, agreed to confer with the bishops, so they met near St. Albans. Crowds came to look on. The heretics made a long discourse, which was more wordy than forcible; and when the bishops spoke afterwards the victory was undoubted, and the Pelagians were forced to escape from the fury of the crowd. At that time the Britons and Scots were in Britain, and Germanus placed himself at the head of the British army, which was completely victorious. Germanus then returned to Auxerre, where he remained till 447, when he again went to Britain for some time to preach against the Pelagians. As soon as he had returned to Auxerre the second time, a deputation came from the Armoricans, who inhabited what is now called Brittany. They had rebelled against the Emperor Valentinian III, upon which Actius, the commander of Gaul, sent the Alani into their country. Germanus went to Eochar, the King of the Alani, who, after many solicitations, promised to give up the enterprise if the Emperor was satisfied. Germanus went to Ravenna, and gained Valentinian's consent; but the Armoricans again rebelled, and all his labour was useless. Germanus fell ill at Ravenna, and died there July 31st, 448. He was buried at Auxerre.

Gerson, Jean Charlier de, one of the greatest scholars of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, was born at Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, in 1363, his real name being merely Jean Charlier. He studied at Paris under Peter d'Ailly. He showed great talent, rose to honour, and became Chancellor of the University, with the title of "Doctor Christianissimus," or "The most Christian Doctor," and Canon of Notre Dame. He was obliged to lie concealed for some time, having infuriated the Duke of Burgundy and his party by his attacks on the assassins of the Duke of Orleans, and on Jean Petit who defended them. Gerson was an active supporter of the proposal to put an end to the schism between the Popes by the resignation of both Gregory and Benedict. He took a leading part in the Councils of Pisa [1409] and Constance [1414], as ambassador of Charles VI., and representative of the Church of France and of the University of Paris. It was through his influence that the doctrine of the Supremacy of the Church over the Popes in matters of faith and discipline was established. He was in some ways far ahead of the times, and was very averse to the Flagellants [q.v.]. He was forced to remain in exile in consequence of the Duke of Burgundy. He went to Bavaria, where he remained for some years as an author. He then went to a convent of the Celestine monks at Lyons, where he died in 1429.

Gerson was the author of several works:
- De Unitate Ecclesiae is a treatise concerning the schism between the Popes. He also wrote against Papal Infallibility. His other works are: Contra Sectam Flagellatorum, de Probation Spirituum, and de Consolatione Theologiae. The Imitation of Christ has been sometimes ascribed to Gerson, because some old copies bear the name of John Gerson as the author while others believe that it was the work of John Gerson, Abbot of Vercelli in the thirteenth century. [Kempis, Thomas A.]

Gervasius and Protasius, Saints.—Two martyrs whose bodies were found at Milan while St. Ambrose was bishop. The legend of them is to be found in the writings of St. Ambrose and in letters sent by St. Augustin to his sister Marcellina. The Church of Milan was suffering much under the Empre-Gesenius, Friedrich Heinrich Wilhelm, one of the most distinguished of modern Oriental scholars, was born at Jœdhausen, in Prussian Saxony, in 1780. He was educated in his native town, and afterwards at Helmstadt and Göttingen. In 1806 he became Reptitor at Göttingen, and in 1809 Professor of Ancient Literature in the Gymnasium of Heiligenstadt on the recommendation of Johannes von Müller. After remaining there a year he became Professor of Theology at Halle, which post he retained till his death in 1842, with a short interval during the War of the Liberation, when the College was closed. He paid visits to Paris and England (1820 and 1835) to gain materials for his lexicons of the Semitic languages. The Hebrew Lexicon appeared first in 1810-12, and was followed by the Grammar [1813], History of the Hebrew Language and Writing [1815], and Thorough Grammatical Criticism of the Formation of the Hebrew Language [1817]. His Thesaurus was published till after his death. He also wrote a Commentary on Isaiah.

Gesta Romanorum.—A collection of anecdotes, generally with a moral attached, running them into parables. The title is from the fact that the greater part of the stories go with the words, "There was an Emperor of Rome," etc. These were used by mediaeval preachers in their sermons. The anecdotes are all fictions. We are told that there was an Emperor of Rome "named Rus," and many of these emperors did impossible things. Some of the stories are ruthless and even repulsive, but some are excellent, and are the germ of classical pieces modern literature, e.g. the story of the caskets, which Shakespeare has wrought into The Merchant of Venice. They probably date from the thirteenth century. They are reprinted by the Early English Text Society; an easily accessible edition is to be found in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, but nearly the whole of what is good in the collection will be found in Mr. Morley's shilling library.

Ghibellines. [Guelphs and Ghibellines.]

Gibson, Edmund [b. 1669, d. 1748], Bishop of Lincoln and of London [1723], is the author of the well-known book on Church law entitled The Statutes, Constitution, Canons, Rubries, and Articles of the Church of England. He is also the compiler of a work against Popery contributed by different writers.

Giffard, William, Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor, was probably a Frenchman. On the accession of Henry I., Pope Gregory VII., watchful for the interests of his Church, set up a claim in opposition to the King for the right of appointing to vacant sees by capular election, which Henry vigorously resisted. Accordingly, when the King appointed Giffard to the diocese of Winchester, Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury, refused to consecrate him, whereupon Henry applied to Girard, Archbishop of York, who consented; but such was Giffard's awe of the authority of Anselm and the Papal See, that he refused the proffered consecration. This deference to the Archbishop so much incensed the King that he banished Giffard in 1192. The matter, however, was at last arranged, the Pope consenting that Anselm should consecrate the bishops who had already been nominated, the King agreeing not to interfere in the future with canonical elections, and to waive all claims to the privileges of investiture. The King was to possess the right of recommending the future bishops; the Church, that of investing them with the spiritual insignia, but the bishop-elect was to do homage to the King for his temporalities and barony. Giffard, with several others, was consecrated in 1107. He was Bishop of Winchester for twenty-one years. He has left several monuments of his liberality and piety. He founded the monastery of St. Mary Overy [i.e. "St. Mary Over the Water"], at Southwark, now called S. Saviour's. In 1128 he established an abbey of Cistercian monks at Waverley, near Farnham, the first house which that Order possessed in England; and he also founded a priory of Black Canons at Taunton. But the most important work of a religious character that Giffard executed was the removal of St. Grimshald's Abbey, founded by Alfred, from the north side of the cathedral to Hyde Meadow in 1110, where, through his influence with Henry, he procured the foundation of a stately abbey. He also built the palace at Southwark called Winchester House, as a town residence for the prelates of his See. He died in 1128.

Gifts [Gr. charismata].—The New Testament uses this term to express powers and graces bestowed on Christians by the Holy Ghost. These gifts are described as of two kinds—ordinary and extraordinary. The ordinary are those shared by all Christians: wisdom, understanding, counsel, spiritual strength, knowledge, true godliness, holy fear; they are given abundantly or sparingly according to the faith of the recipient. With these may be classed the "fruits of the Spirit" enumerated in Gal. v. 22, 23, viz. "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." To these have been added by theologians three others, viz. patience, modesty, chastity. The extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were, for the most part, confined to the earliest ages of the Church. It would appear to have been a common thing in the Apostles' time for newly baptised converts to receive with the laying on of the Apostles' hands the power to speak in other tongues or to interpret them, the gift of prophecy, healing, and of the discerning of spirits. The Scripture teaching on these miraculous gifts will be found in the words of St. Paul in 1 Cor. xii. 14. He declares that all gifts come from the Spirit; that they are "given to every man to profit withal," and that the Spirit divideth "to every man severally as He will." Hence there is no ground for vanity or boasting on the part of the recipients. Moreover, he declares in 1 Corinthians xiii. that these miraculous gifts, although excellent in themselves, yet, without the gift of love, are of no account whatever. Love is the first and chief of the ordinary gifts of the Spirit, and is greater than all the extraordinary gifts. Of these latter St. Paul shows that prophesying is the greatest:—"Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy;" declaring at the same time how it is greater than the gift of "speaking with tongues." It is to be noted that the gift of tongues is "a sign not to them that believe, but to them that believe not;" while "prophesying serveth not for them that believe not, but for them which believe:" or, in other words, prophesying is for the "edification, exhortation, and comfort" of the Church. The notion that the gift of tongues was for the purpose of converting foreign nations is now held by few expositors. Rather we may suppose it was an overpowering influence of spiritual zeal intelligible to those who were filled with Divine love, and to them only. [See Farrar's St. Paul, chapter v.] It is a very difficult question to decide when the extraordinary gifts ceased to be bestowed on Christians. It is quite certain that they soon ceased to be bestowed on Christians as a rule; they gradually seemed to become more and more rare. Instances are mentioned in Eusebius v. 7, where he quotes Irenæus to prove that miraculous gifts, including even raising from the dead, existed in his day [A.D. 161-180]. Again, in Eusebius vi. 9 the historian records that many miracles were performed by Narcissus A.D. 211-217. But the mention of such an individual seems to show that the majority of Christians did not then possess this power. If all ages people have laid claim to a possession of miraculous power, but in such instances the evidence has not been sufficient to place the matter beyond doubt. In other cases gross deception has been practised. One test by which to try such claims to miraculous gift is mentioned by Irenæus in the above passage, and by Apollonius, a writer who lived a few years later, viz. —Is gain made by such manifestations of miraculous power? Apollonius, in Eusebius v. 18, accuses the Phrygian heretics of receiving presents of such occasions, and thereby convicts them of imposture, while Irenæus attests the genuineness of the miraculous powers exercised by the faithful from the fact that no gain was made; "As they had received freely from Christ, so," says he, "ought they to give freely." In conclusion, it may be remembered that it has only been in great crises of the history of God's people that miraculous gifts have been bestowed in any abundance e.g. in the deliverance from Egypt, in the troubled times of Elijah and Elisha, and the rise of Christ's Kingdom upon the earth; and it is also to be observed that in the passage above cited they are distinctly placed beneath gifts and graces which yet and permanently remain. For the alleged restorations of the Gift of Tongues in modern times, see Irvingism.

Gilbert, St., of Sempringham, founder the Order of Gilbertines in England, was born at Lincoln in 1084. Being from the first destined for the Church, he was sent to France for his education, and on returning to England was placed in the Bishop of Lincoln's seminary, and then kept a public school for children of both sexes. His father had good estate in Lincolnshire, to which belong the right of presentation to the livings of Sempringham and Tirrington, and, being provided with this title, Gilbert was ordained priest in 1123 by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln. He then founded an Order of nuns, whom he built a monastery adjoining Andrew's Church at Sempringham. Seven persons followed his example, and founded monasteries of this Order in other counties. Finding his charge thus increase, Gibjourned to France to consult St. Bernard on the matter, and by his advice applied to Pope Eugenius III., begging that his nuns might be put under the direction of the Cistercians; but they declined the task. Th still burdened with the care of his growing charge, he returned to England, and laboured with such success, that he had the satisfaction to see thirteen convents of the Order under his inspection, viz., four of regular canons, and nine of nuns, in which at his death he is said to have left 22,000 souls. The nuns were governed by St. Benedict's rule, and the canons by that of St. Augustine. St. Gilbert also founded several hospitals for the reception of the poor, the sick, widows, and orphans. The rule settled by him for the government of his monasteries was deemed too strict, and some of his lay brothers mutinied against him, and carried their complaints to Pope Alexander III., who at first believed their misrepresentations; but the bishops of England and King Henry II. undeceived him, and Gilbert was confirmed in the care of his Order, and several privileges and immunities were granted to it. He, however, afterwards had a share in the disgrace which fell upon Becket. Some little time before he died he resigned the government of his Order, and procured the election of one Roger in his room, and then obeyed him as his superior. St. Gilbert died Feb. 4th, 1189, being 106 years of age. According to the manuscript brought to light by Sir William Dugdale, he was canonised by Pope Innocent III. in 1202, and the day of his death was named as his festival.

Gilbert of Nogent [6. 1053, d. 1124], so-called from the abbey of St. Mary of Nogent, of which he was abbot. He was the author of a work on the Incarnation, addressed to Jews; of a treatise de Sermone, and of another on Rélices, in which he satirised the rage for them. But his greatest work was his Gesta Dei per Francos, a very valuable history of the First Crusade.

Gildas, surnamed "Sapiens," or "The Wise," is said to have been born in Wales early in the sixth century. He was a monk. The place of his education is uncertain. He spent seven years in France, and then went to Ireland, where he did much for the Church; he then returned to England, and became an earnest preacher of the Gospel. The monks of the old monastery of St. Gildas de Rays, in Brittany, say that he spent his last days there; but English writers aver that he died near Glastonbury in 570. So much difference of opinion exists about his history that one can determine nothing with certainty about him or his works. He wrote a history, de Calamitate, Excidio, et Conquestu Britanniae, which is valuable as being the only information we have of those times. It is divided into two periods, the one extending from the first Roman invasion to the close of the fourth century or revolt of Maximus, the other from that revolt to his own days.

Giles, Sr., abbot, was born in Athens in 640, and came to Gaul, thinking he could serve God more easily in retirement in a strange country. The reputation of Cesarius, Bishop of Arles, drew him to that town, where his merit was acknowledged, and he became head of a monastery in Languedoc. But his love of retirement returned, and he withdrew to a small, solitary place. Thence he removed towards the sea, and, finding in the diocese of Nismes a cave overgrown with woods, he spent the remainder of his days there in prayer and mortification. There is a legend that he was fed every day by a hind which had fled to him when pursued by the King of France, or, according to others, by Wamba, King of the Goths. This hind is often represented in pictures of St. Giles. The King, hearing much of the hermit's sanctity, invited him to Court; but he refused, and died and was buried in his cell. It is said that many miracles were worked there, and the spot became so revered that a monastery was built, which was named after him. The monastery was long in the hands of the Benedictines, and at last given up to the secular clergy. St. Giles is commemorated on Sept. 1st. He is reckoned as the patron saint of Edinburgh, where the cathedral is named after him.

Gill, John, D.D., an eminent Baptist minister, was born at Kettering, in Northamptonshire, in 1697. He attended a grammar-school in his native town till he was forced to leave on account of a rule excluding all Dissenters. Then he carried on his studies alone, and made great progress, especially in classics. In 1717 he began preaching at Higham Ferrers, and three years afterwards went up to London. He preached for some time at the Horselydown Baptist Chapel in Southwark, and in 1757 removed to Carter Lane, where he remained till his death in 1771. Dr. Gill was a strong Calvinist, inclining to Supralapsarianism, as his work, The Cause of God and Truth, shows. This work was an answer to Whitby's Five Points. His chief work was the exposition of the New and Old Testaments [1746-8, and 1763-76], a book of great value. He also wrote A Treatise on the Doctrine of the Trinity, A Body of Doctrinal Divinity, A Body of Practical Divinity, and A Dissertation on the Hebrew Language.

Gilpin, Bernard, a learned Englishman, was born at Kentmire, in Westmoreland, in 1517. At the age of sixteen he went to Queen's College, Oxford, where he became a Fellow, and was chosen by King Henry VIII. as one of the first masters of Christ Church College. In his youth he was a great adherent of the Papacy, and was singled out to dispute with the Reformers, and it is said that Peter Martyr was more afraid of him than of any other of his adversaries; but at last, by continual study of the Scriptures and the early Fathers, he became convinced of the truth. of the doctrines of Protestantism. He was ordained, and in 1552 became vicar of Norton. When Queen Mary ascended the throne he went abroad for three years, and on his return became Archdeacon of Durham and vicar of Houghton. Queen Elizabeth offered him the bishopric of Carlisle, but he refused it, saying that he had many friends in that diocese to whom he could not grant what they should desire of him without injuring his conscience, nor refuse without disgracing them. He died at Houghton in 1583. He was noted for his extreme liberality to the poor, and his eloquent preaching. He was much interested in education, and is said to have always had twenty-four scholars in his house, whom he entirely provided for, and six of whom he sent to the universities. He was known by the names of "Father of the Poor" and "Apostle of the North."

Giraldus Cambrensis (Gerald de Barry) [b. circa 1146, d. circa 1220], was the son of Giraldus of Windsor, a Norman noble who settled in Pembroke and married Nesta, the sister of Griffith ap Rhys ap Theodore, Prince of South Wales. He began his education under his uncle David, the Bishop of St. David's, and then went to the University at Paris. He took Holy Orders in 1172, and was appointed soon after to the Archdeaconries of Brecknock and St. David's. He spent ten years in the Court of Henry II., who had a great esteem for him, and employed him in several embassies. He was afterwards preceptor to the King's son John, whom he attended into Ireland. He wrote a description of that country as well as of England and Wales. The See of St. David's was offered to him three times; in the first place he gave it up because his election had not the royal sanction; in the second, because he could not get his nomination confirmed at Rome, and the third time he declined it. He spent his last years in study and retirement, and died at St. David's in his seventy-fourth year.

Girdle.—In the Romish Church, a cincture to keep the alb in its place. Formerly it was a narrow band of silk of all colours, now a plain white cord. Choristers generally use red girdles. The Pope wears a sash in addition.

Glanville, Joseph, an eminent preacher and writer, was born at Plymouth, in 1636. In 1652 he was admitted to Exeter College, Oxford, from whence, after four years, he removed to Lincoln College, in which he took the degree of M.A. It is said that he then became chaplain to Rouse, the Cromwellian Provost of Eton, without being ordained. Soon after the Restoration he received Holy Orders, and obtained the rectory of Wimbush, in Essex, and was made a member of the Royal Society. In 1662 he was presented to the living of Frome Selwood, and four years after to that of the Abbey Church, Bath; he was afterwards made Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II., and Prebendary of Worcester. He died at Bath on Nov. 4th, 1680. He was a writer of more than ordinary genius, and a great master of style. He was the author of several works, as Lux Orientalis, a treatise on the pre-existence of souls, published in 1662; Seepis Scientificæ, or Confessed Ignorance the Way to Schism; Considerations touching the Being of Witches and Witchcraft; Sadduciæmus Triumphans, a blow at modern Sadducism; Plus Ultra, or the Progress and Advancement of Knowledge since the Days of Aristotle; and several sermons.

Glastonbury.—A small town in Somerset, famous for the great abbey which formerly flourished there. Dr. E. A. Freeman has pointed out [English Towns and Districts, p. 77] that this abbey has an interest positively unique. After speaking of Netley and Tintern, of Westminster and Canterbury, he goes on:—"We know their beginnings; we know their founders; their history, their very legends, do not dare to trace up their foundations beyond the time of our own coming into this island. At Glastonbury alone, among the great churches of Britain, we feel instinctively that on this spot the name of England is out of place—we walk with easy steps from the realm of Arthur into the realm of Inc." Here, on this Isle of Avalon, as it was called, Joseph of Arimathea was said to have preached and died. (The famous Glastonbury Thorn, which was destroyed during the Civil Wars, was held to be the staff brought by Joseph of Arimathea from Palestine, and was popularly believed to blossom on Christmas Day. Gifts from it flourish in the neighbouring gardens.) Here was the shelter-place of the British Churches when they were persecuted and driven west by the pagan English. Here, too, King Arthur, their champion, is said to have been buried, and for ages his tomb was shown. It was held in high honour all through the troubled days of the "making of England," and its history is glorified by its connection with the great Dunstan. The story of its ruin at the hands of Henry VIII. is one of the most shameful passages in that King's annals. Its last abbot, Whiting, a man of holy life, was hanged on the top of Glastonbury Tor. [See Froude, iii. 247.]

Glebe [Lat. gleba, "turf, soil, or ground"].—The land possessed as part of the revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice. According to Sir R. Phillimore, "every church of common right is entitled to house and glebe." The assigning of these was of such absolute necessity that without them no church could be regularly consecrated. The house and glebe are both comprehended under the word "manse," of which the rule of the common law is sanctum est ut unicumque ecclesiae unus manus integra absque ullo servitio tributatu." In cases of united benefices, when the income is more than sufficient for the incumbent, the whole or part of the glebe lands may be excepted out of the union, and used to augment any poor adjoining benefice. Glebe lands in the hands of the parson do not pay tithe to the vicar, although endowed of all the tithes in the parish, nor vice versa, as it is a maxim of the canon law "that the Church shall not pay tithes to the Church; but if it be leased out, it shall pay tithes as other lands." When land is needed for the building of a house for the incumbent, glebe may be sold to purchase this land; and it is also enacted that glebe lands may be exchanged for other lands, either in or out of the parish. If the glebe of any incumbency does not exceed five statute acres, the incumbent may purchase land not exceeding twenty acres, which shall from that time belong to the living, and be freehold. When the land-tax on any glebe of any living belonging to colleges shall be redeemed, it may be provided for by the sale of any lands belonging to it, or grant of a rent-charge, but such colleges shall be entitled to a rent-charge out of the living.

Gloria in Excelsis.—The hymn at the end of the Communion Service, Gloria be to God on high. This is a hymn of unquestioned Greek origin—one, therefore, which we owe to the Eastern Church. It is still there, as it was in the fourth century, the usual morning hymn. The oldest copy which is known to exist is appended to the famous Alexandrine MS., now in the British Museum. The oldest MSS. of the hymn read thus:—

1. Glory to God on high, and on earth peace to men of good-will.
2. We hymn Thee, we bless Thee, we worship Thee, we praise Thee, we give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory.
3. O Lord God, heavenly King, Father Almighty. O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesu Christ, and Holy Ghost.
4. O Lord God, the Lamb of God, the Son of the Father, that takest away the sin of the world, have mercy upon us, Thou that takest away the sin of the world.
5. Receive our suppliant prayer, Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, and have mercy upon us.
6. For Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord, Jesu Christ, to the glory of God the Father.

The variations between this and the form familiar to us are owing to the Latin translator. It will be seen that he has transferred the name of the "Holy Ghost" from the third verse to the last, which is not without some injury, as it obscures the fact that the last verse is a quotation from Phil. ii. 11. It is probable, at least, that the hymn may belong to the first century. When it was adopted by the Western Church, it was, as in the East, at first used simply as a morning hymn: ad matut. Omnis dominica, says a direction at the beginning of the sixth century. Another, a few years later, orders it to be sung every day during the Easter season, every Sunday, and on the greater festivals. So in the Mozarabic and in the ancient Irish Churches. We cannot tell for certain when it became a eucharistic hymn in the West, but probably, as far as regards the liturgy of Rome, as early as the beginning of the sixth century; in the Gallican and Spanish Churches probably in the eighth century.

There are several variations of the hymn found in the different Churches of the West. The following is from the ancient Irish Church:—

1. Glory to God in the highest, and in earth peace to men of good-will.
2. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, we adore Thee, we magnify Thee.
3. We give thanks to Thee because of Thy great mercy, O Lord, Heavenly King, God the Father Almighty.
4. O Lord, the only-begotten Son, Jesu Christ; O Holy Spirit of God, and we all say Amen.
5. O Lord, the Son of God the Father. O Lamb of God, that takest away the sin of the world, have mercy upon us.
6. Receive our prayer, Thou that sittest at the right hand of God the Father; have mercy upon us.
7. For Thou only art holy, Thou only art the Lord, Thou only art glorious, with the Holy Ghost, in the glory of God the Father. Amen.

Another form has this addition in the middle:—

"Thou that sittest at the right hand of the Father, have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us, help us; guide us, preserve us; cleanse us, give us peace; deliver us from our enemies, from temptations, from heretics, from Arians, from schismatics, from barbarians."

[See a very full and exhaustive history of this hymn in the Church Quarterly Review, to which the writer of this article is indebted.]

Gloria Patri ["Glory be to the Father"].—The Latin title of one of the primitive doxologies of the Church, sometimes called the lesser doxology, to distinguish it from the "Gloria in excelsis." Glorifying the Father and the Son, together with the Holy Ghost, was, in St. Basil's judgment, practised and prescribed by the Apostles themselves. He believes this was one of the "ordinances" or "traditions" for which St. Paul praised the Corinthians—as they had been delivered to them by him. The earliest mention that we meet with of this hymn is found in the circular epistle of the Church of Smyrna concerning the martyrdom of their bishop, Polycarp, from whence we learn that he uttered a doxology nearly resembling Gloria Patri. Polycarp was conversant with the Apostles, and was consecrated Bishop of Smyrna by St. John the Evangelist. The most ancient form of this doxology was only a single sentence without a response—"Glory to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, world without end. Amen."
Part of the latter clause, "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be," was inserted some time after the first composition. The doxologies then in use were various in form, and the Arians took advantage of this diversity and wrested some of them so as to appear to favour their own views. They principally used one which ran in these words: "Glory be to the Father, by the Son, in the Holy Ghost." In the Fourth Council of Toledo [A.D. 633] the words "As it was in the beginning," etc., are omitted, but the word "honour" is added to "glory." The Western Church repeated it at the end of each psalm, and the Eastern Church at the end of the last psalm, the whole commonly running thus: "To Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, be all glory, worship, thanksgiving, honour, and adoration, now and for ever, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen."

Gloucester, Bishopric of.—The distinction of Gloucester as a cathedral city dates from the reign of Henry VIII. The cathedral is dedicated to the Holy and Undivided Trinity, but for many centuries preceding the Reformation there had existed the great Benedictine Abbey of St. Peter. Tradition speaks of a bishop and Christian king at Gloucester in the second century, but it is not probable that Christianity had any recognised hold in Britain till the beginning of the fourth century. The battle of Deorham in 577 swept away Christianity from the Severn valley, and for many years the Romano-British town of Caer Glonw, or Glou-easter, lay waste. Fifty years later, the counties of Gloucester and Worcester fell under the sway of the Mercian King Penda, and his grandson and successor Ethelred, who was a Christian, made a large grant of land to the under-king Osric in 681, on condition that he should build a nunnery at Gloucester and make his sister Kyneburg the first abbess. In 676 the nuns were driven from their abbey, and for fifty years St. Peter's lay in ruins. Beornulf, who was slain in 825, is said to have rebuilt the abbey, but, instead of nuns, he filled it with secular canons or preachers. Cainute is said to have driven out these secular canons and to have substituted for them the Benedictine Order of monks in 1021. The first abbot was Edric, one of the secular canons, who became a monk in order that he might have this post. This abbey was destroyed by the Danes. In the reign of Edward the Confessor, Aldred, Bishop of the Hwiccas, commenced a new abbey in the Norman style. About 1067 Gloucester fell into the hands of the Norman invaders, and the abbey was seriously injured by fire. In 1072 William's chaplain, Serlo, was installed as abbot, and found the monastery very deficient in funds; but the Norman knights who had seized the neighbouring Welsh territories quieted their consciences by donations of land to Serlo and his successors. Serlo then commenced the work of restoration, and in 1100 the church and monastery were rededicated; two years later it was again damaged by fire. In 1134 Robert, Duke of Normandy, was buried here. In 1216 Henry III. was crowned at Gloucester, and in 1218 the great central tower was commenced; it was completed in 1239, and once more the abbey church was dedicated by Walter de Cantilupe, Bishop of Worcester. Very little work of this period is now to be found in the cathedral. The burial of the murdered King Edward II. did more than anything else for the welfare of the monastery. Thousands of pilgrims laden with offerings came to his shrine, and between 1329 and 1337 was built the south aisle, the earliest specimen of the work which renders the choir and cloisters so unique with their roofing of fan tracery. The choir was built between 1351 and 1412.

The chronicles of St. Peter's terminate with the fourteenth century, and from that time to the Reformation we are dependent on Leland for any account of the additions and alterations in its structure. Between 1421 and 1457 Abbot Morwent rebuilt the western part; in 1460 the great eastern tower was begun, and finished in 1482, and in the latter part of the fifteenth century the present Lady Chapel was built. On Jan. 4th, 1540, the monastery was called upon to surrender to the spoilers, with Thomas Cromwell at their head; the next year the abbey church was converted into a cathedral, and John Wakeman, the last abbot of Tewkesbury, became Bishop of the new See. In 1836 the Sees of Gloucester and Bristol were united under Bishop Monk. The cathedral has been restored of late years by Sir Gilbert Scott.

Gnosimachi [Gr. gnōsis, "knowledge," and machi, "fighters"].—A sect opposed to knowledge, that is to the science of Christianity, pronouncing good works all that was necessary. They were formed from a reaction against the Gnostic, Antiochian, and Alexandrian schools of theologians. Another name for them is the Rhetorians, so called from their... leader, Rhetorius of Alexandria, whom St. Athanasius speaks of as holding the opinion that doctrines are of no consequence, and that all heretics are right in their own way.

Gnostics derived their name from the extraordinary religious knowledge (gnōsis) which they claimed to possess. The term is not the name of any one particular sect, but rather of a number of sects who all accepted certain main principles, but differed from one another on particular points, each sect following its own founder. Said to have been originally propagated by Simon Magus, Gnosticism spread through the greater part of Christendom, rising to its greatest height about the middle of the second century, and lasting almost to the end of the fourth century. It was more a distinct religious system than a heresy, but its acceptance of some of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity made it a source of great trouble to the Church. It had some good effects, however, in causing the Faith to be more carefully examined and more clearly defined.

St. Paul is supposed to refer to Gnosticism when he speaks, in his Epistle to Timothy, of "the opposition of science (gnōsis) falsely so-called" [1 Tim. vi. 20], and of "fables and endless genealogies" [1 Tim. i. 4]; and again, in the Epistle to the Colossians, of "philosophy and vain deceit" [Col. ii. 8].

Our knowledge of the system is derived from the works of its opponents, as no Gnostic writings have come down to us. It may be described as a combination of the notions of ancient philosophy, Magian theories, Judaism, and Christianity. In it the Oriental hypotheses concerning the origin of evil, and the speculations of Plato and of Philo of Alexandria, were blended with the Christian doctrine of Redemption, and the resulting systems became very popular with those who had become weary of philosophy, but who yet could not bring themselves to receive the Christian faith.

The great home of Gnosticism was Egypt, particularly Alexandria. The founders of its numerous sects were almost all either Africans or Asiatics. The most renowned were:

I. Asiatics:

1. Saturninus, who flourished at the beginning of the second century.
2. Bardeanes, under Marcus Aurelius.
5. Cerinthus, at the end of the second century.

II. Africans:

1. Basilides, under Hadrian and Antoninus Pius.

The Ebionites, a Judaizing sect, and the Marcionites were also usually included amongst the Gnostics. [Ebionites.] The main points of the Gnostic system were substantially as follows:

1. Affecting the Doctrine of the Trinity
   - That there was one Eternal and Supreme Deity, from whom emanated a graduated series of existences called Æons; which Æons were to be regarded as manifestations of particular attributes of the Deity, and together constituted the Pleroma, or Fulness of the Godhead. Their number was variously given, Valentinus fixing it at thirty, Basilides at 365.

2. Affecting the Doctrine of the Resurrection
   - That matter was essentially evil, the world and all material things having been created by a fallen Æon (or, according to some, by an evil power who had existed from all eternity). As a deduction from this, they denied the resurrection of the body, considering the body as a prison formed by the Demiurge, or fallen creator, for the confinement of the soul.

3. Affecting the Doctrine of the Incarnation
   - The above also led to erroneous views concerning our Lord Jesus Christ. They could not believe that a divine nature could unite with a material (and therefore evil) body. Accordingly two solutions of the difficulty were proposed:

   a. That Christ was human, but not divine, that He was merely a man, on whom the divinity descended at His baptism in the form of a dove, leaving Him before the Crucifixion. This view was held by the Ebionites, Basilidians, Carpocratians, and Cerinthians.

   b. That Christ was divine, but not human; that His Body was not material, but—

   [1] An unsubstantial phantom, which only seemed to be human.

   This was the view of Saturninus, the Encratites, and Marcionites, and they were hence called Docete, from a Greek word meaning "to seem."

   [2] Formed of heavenly elements, like those of the angels who appeared to men. This was the opinion of Bardesanes and Valentinus.

4. Affecting the Doctrine of the Redemption
   - That Christ's mission was not to die for sin, but to impart to man a knowledge of His heavenly origin, and to instruct him how to regain his lost condition. Those who attained this knowledge were saved. Salvation was the result, not of a sacrifice, but of gnōsis.

   The rules of life deduced from the foregoing principles were of two opposite kinds:

   a. The followers of Bardesanes and Saturninus, and the Ebionites, Encratites, and Marcionites considered it their duty to resist the influence of the Demiurge by mortifying the body. They condemned marriage, and practised the greatest austerities.

   b. The Basilidians, Valentinians, Carpocratians, and Cerinthians, on the other hand, regarding themselves as possessing saving "gnosis," held that all actions were indifferent. They therefore indulged in all kinds of vicious practices and disgusting immoralities, which were doubtless the cause of many of the charges brought against the early Christians.

The Cerinthians also taught the doctrine of a millennium to be passed in sensual pleasures.

The Gnostics, as a rule, rejected the Old Testament, as given under the influence of the Demiurge. They usually accepted the New Testament, excepting, in some cases, the Epistles of St. Paul. They all made use of apocryphal books and spurious gospels which supported their views.

God.—It is a self-evident proposition that a belief in the existence of a Superior Being or Beings must be the basis of all religion, properly so called. Any movement of the soul after improvement, after that which satisfies its longings, must have its basis in such a belief in some form. The two great principles of religious belief which have prevailed in the world are Polytheism and Monotheism—i.e. the belief in "gods many and lords many," which characterised heathenism; and that in One Supreme Self-existent Being, which is at the very foundation of every form of Christianity. Outside these we have the negation which, it cannot be denied, has, and always has had, its professors, which declares "There is no God," or else which says, "We have no knowledge of such a one." [AGNOSTIC.]

When we come to examine into the grounds of belief in Deity, we first of all have a right to say that this belief is in possession of the field. However one account for it, it is unquestionably the fact that all over the world, as far as history takes us back, mankind have always believed in God, and have entered into speculations to know more of Him. Hindoos, and Chinese philosophers, Egyptians, Greeks, Latins, gave themselves with eagerness to the inquiry. The epoch of the coming of Christ found one people—the Jews—strenuously asserting that there is only one God, and that worship of other gods is a hateful superstition. The religion which Christ preached affirmed this doctrine, and the civilised world has accepted it; and thus, as we have said, the belief in God is in possession. Man is naturally a religious being—a God-worshipper—however he came to be so; and the fact is of tremendous significance, that the existence of God should thus belong, as it were, to the consciousness of humanity at large.

Christianity, however, came into direct conflict with many of the popular religious beliefs current at its birth, and thus when its doctrine of one God was called in question, it became necessary to offer reasons for such belief. In this controversy the strongest point was, there can be little doubt, the Christian doctrine of sin and of God's attitude in regard to it. It seems so natural to us now to believe that, if there be a God, He must be a just and moral Being, that we are in danger of forgetting that this conception is almost, if not entirely, confined to the line of Jewish and Christian revelation. To an ancient heathen the matter by no means appeared in this light: his gods, as represented to him, were swayed far more by vindictive, selfish, and other personal feelings than by moral motives. No man could be certain that he was not innocently offending some deity, even in striving to propitiate some other, and thereby entailing misery and misfortune on himself for the rest of his life and the awful problem which for a while held on Job powerless in its grasp, of reconciling the justice of God with the misfortunes of a righteous man, could never have confronted a pagan at all, for the simple reason that any necessity that his deities should act righteously would not have entered his conceptions. Only a few of the rarest spirits of antiquity had made any approach to ideas clearly taught in the Hebrew Bible. But when the truth was once clearly stated, as it was by the early Christians, it appealed at once to the conscience of men. The Christians gave their arguments against the old gods; heathenism strove, under the form of Neo-Platonism, to reconstruct a new basis on which to rest itself, but it failed, and gave place to disbelief. Thenceforth the warfare of Christianity was not with Polytheism, but with Negation and Unbelief.

The earliest argument adduced by Christian apologists was that of the conscience—"Belief in God is an opinion implanted in the nature of men." Cardinal Newman says that this belief in God presents more intellectual difficulties than any other belief, and yet is certain to him as the certainty of his own existence. This is, in fact, making a belief in God a part of the moral consciousness and probably this may be regarded as a view accepted by the general voice of mankind. The conviction is in man. His conscience of himself involves the consciousness of a power which is not himself, which has an objective existence. The very consciousness of imperfection involves belief in perfection which must exist, above and beyond all things. We can conceive the existence of a perfect Being; and such conception could not be if there were no ground for it. This is known as the Ontological argument—the cognisance of an existence outside of ourselves. The arguments of the great Schoolmen come to the same thing: "My reason had beginning, therefore it must have had an external Author"; "I feel myself to be accountable being, therefore there must be One superior to me who can reward or punish, otherwise my existence would be contradiction."
Akin to this is the Cosmological argument—that which starts from the sequences and effects in the universe. Whatever is must either have a cause or be self-existent. The world is every hour showing signs that it is not self-existent; change follows change, producing fresh phenomena. This argument has been lately much strengthened by the modern discovery of what is called the "dissipation of energy," which involves as a necessary consequence the fact that the present constitution of things cannot have lasted from eternity, but must have had a beginning in time. Otherwise "the great clock must have run down" an eternity ago. Hence we are led back step by step to an ultimate cause of all things, whose self-existence is thus demonstrated. Paley carried this principle another step. The order, he contended, and arrangement of the universe, and the adaptation of means to ends, all prove that a wise and benevolent Intelligence created the world. This is the substance of his Natural Theology—the teleological "argument from design." Of late, however, with increased knowledge and greater development of moral sensibility, this has been objected to, on the ground of the multiplicity of circumstances which mar the happiness of the creation. Not only earthquakes, famines, pestilences, recur again and again, but animals prey on and torture each other. "I think the watch argument unanswerable," said a late celebrated divine, alluding to the opening passage in Paley, where he supposes a man seeing a watch for the first time and tracing out the design of the maker. "But the watch keeps bad time," was the retort of a pupil of the speaker. "Wouldn't it be easy to prove that the devil made the world on Paley's lines?" The retort is not a sound one, and yet there is a measure of truth in it. There is little doubt that the sterner and apparently cruel facts of Nature do press with awful force upon many minds, which are thereby deterred from believing in a benevolent Creator: and even Mr. Mill, who held that there were many apparent tokens of design, adaptation, and even benevolence, was himself brought to the conclusion that the power of a Being who had given such proofs of goodwill, must be limited by conditions over which he had insufficient control, to account for the phenomena. There can be no doubt that Paley's view of Nature was a very imperfect and partial one; and the difficulty is not removed by modern ideas respecting the work of general laws," as is sometimes maintained. It would rather appear that, as regards the Christian Revelation and its view of these problems, the difficulty has mainly arisen from an altogether partial and imperfect view of its field and its scope, which has been so much, in popular teaching, confined to man himself. It is said that the contradictions and difficulties of which we have spoken find their explanation in this Revelation, which declares that through certain causes mankind has become alienated from its Creator, and thereby has become subject to sorrow and pain. [Sin.] But the Christian believes that God has restored mankind to a knowledge of Himself through Christ, who came into the world for the very purpose of revealing the nature and character of God. He revealed God as the Father, which involves the great truth of the theologian—"God is Love." This is true. But it is too commonly taught as if man alone required such a remedial and elevating agency: it has been proclaimed in thousands of pulpits that "man alone is out of joint" with the purposes of Creation, and that all other creatures "fulfill the end of their being." If this were so, there would be no reply to the argument of Mill and others; for the moral difficulty arises precisely from our being unable to see any moral cause for, or end in, so much physical suffering as prevails in the animal world around us. But such is not the teaching of the Revelation itself. This tells us plainly that the whole Creation also does grow and travail in pain together—the fact is not blinked; and that it also waits for the adoption and redemption—the promise to it also is not withheld. However such words are understood, their weight is obvious; and in a far wider and fuller recognition of them than has been usual must be found the Christian answer to such difficulties as these.

Thus we have seen that, as the ages rolled on, it became a necessity of the case, and must still remain so, for current conceptions of God to be modified and perfected according to the needs of the time. The fulness of perfection cannot be seen by any finite being; each one will see that which presents itself to his eye. Imperfect conceptions are not imperfect because they are partial, but because they ignore or deny the perfect. Agnosticism and Manichaeism were distortions of Christian truths. The half-awakened mind of mediævalism, peopling the unknown world with imaginary dangers, multiplied mediators and intercession, until God seemed too far removed to be within the hearing of His creatures. The Reformation was in very truth a restoration of the one God to His place as the centre of all true theology. But the popular views of earthly government then in vogue showed themselves in a notion of God, which, in declaring His Sovereignty, ignored His Fatherhood and compassion. This was the basis of Calvinism. In revolt from it came the Socinian theory that our knowledge of God is imperfect, but sufficient for practical purposes, and that morality is the way of salvation. The inquiries and speculations set on foot by the sixteenth century revolt against traditional opinion will probably last until the end of time.
God

PANTEISM.]. There can be little doubt that the crude language of many theological authorities, of more than one school, seemed to present God as if separate and apart from His own creation; as if, having once made it and "ordained" laws for it, it might henceforth go on in a fashion without Him, really Divine power and authority being only henceforth to be seen in miracle or other special intervention. This subtle practical atheism was entirely foreign to the Hebrew, to whose mind God spoke in the thunder and whispered in the wind; but how far it had permeated much of very "orthodox" theology it would be easy to show. The reaction to the Pantheistic view, that God and the Universe were one and the same—God the All, of which every man or thing was but a part—was natural. But, on the whole, Christian theology has probably gained from it, in learning to see everywhere and in everything the manifestation of Divine energy, acting in the present, and bringing the Infinite presence home to the very next neighbourhood of men—as close to their actual bodies, as the Divine and Holy Spirit could draw nigh to their inmost souls.

It should further be pointed out that even the Agnosticism of modern days has also helped to correct current conceptions of God, and to give to them in some respects more worthy forms. As an argument against any real knowledge of God, the Agnostic argument is very simply answered. The great leader of this school (Mr. Spencer) has himself shown, and it has been shown by physicists again and again, that the Unknowable confronts us finally, at every point of investigation, in the physical world itself. The Energy that surrounds us, the simplest piece of Matter we take in our hands, alike absolutely baffle our comprehension at the last; we not only cannot know what they really are, but cannot even grasp any conception of their ultimate reality. Mr. Spencer himself [First Principles] very fairly demonstrates this, and the demonstration can be carried much farther. But we nevertheless can know and do know very much about the physical universe, and this knowledge is real and true knowledge so far as it goes. We know very much, and may learn yet much more, of the modes and manifestations and finite relations of the Unknowable, in their various forms. Precisely in the same way, therefore, an Agnostic is bound in consistency to admit, that though in essence or ultimate Reality we cannot find Him out, yet we may know much about the Infinite God, provided only there be such an one to know, as Mr. Spencer practically admits, and that He chooses to be known of us. Yet there is much in the Agnostic argument that is of service, and is indeed little more than grave and just rebuke to a coarse familiarity of detail and precision of statement which a truer reverence for God could never have tolerated. Divines have written pages about what God "could" or "could not" or "must" do, and what He "must be," as freely as if the Divine Being were altogether such an one as ourselves. Some protest against this was needful; and even in less gross matters than these, it may be hoped that Agnostic criticism has already produced a tone of more reverent caution and humility. To take but one instance: Mr. Spencer himself has protested in strong terms against certain affirmations made respecting the "personality" of God, a doctrine essential to the very heart of a Christian, or to the Christian life. But in a recent article he has explained this protest in a somewhat unexpected way; stating that whereas he had been understood to mean that the Inscrutable Power (the term which he prefers to use) was a Being in some sense "below" Personality, his meaning rather was that what attributes such a Being possessed must be infinitely "above" all that we know as such, as much so as the Infinite is above the Finite in all other things. In such language there is something to learn from, which in the end may bring real gains to Christian theology.

Finally, it should be observed in regard to those means by which God may be known, that those who most profoundly study in the comparative manner the progressive advances of the idea of God in history, will also be most profoundly struck with the amazingly distinct and advanced standpoint, at all times, of the Hebrew and Christian revelation. Even at a time when the other deities recognised in the world were themselves conceived of as sunk in sensuality and selfishness, the Hebrew was taught of one God, who loved righteousness and hated iniquity, and who would judge the deeds of sinful men; he was even so penetrated with that idea, that the misfortunes of good men, instead of being to him a fate to be borne in sullenness or stoicism, as by a heathen, were an awful moral problem, to be faced somehow, and wrestled out in anguish of spirit as a fundamental one. It is needless to trace the same amazing superiority in further detail; but it should be noted that, since the Scriptures have been collectively in possession of the Church, they have ever stood far above such historical advances as have been above briefly reviewed. They have never affirmed the irreverently familiar declarations of some theologians concerning the Divine essence and attributes; they have borne continuous testimony against the banishment of God from His own "common" world, which to them is ever full of His holy presence; they have witnessed for ages of His long-suffering love and all that is true in Agnosticism has stood "written" in them for centuries; they first taught man the limitations to his knowledge imposed upon him by the conditions of his own intellect. It can hardly be doubt that our children will know even more of God than we do, and will form yet more worthy conceptions of Him, and will find more in the Scriptures themselves than we are able to find. But when it is so, they will, like ourselves, find that it is all in these Scriptures, plainly written for them; as we in our time have found, according to the capacity given to us. Qualities like these are absolutely unique; but they are simple and everyday facts concerning the Christian Scriptures. Such facts will be weighty to every really thoughtful and impartial man, and will dispose him at least to examine with interest, and care, and respect, on its own merits, what those Scriptures affirm concerning "what may be known" of Him, whom they nevertheless clearly allege will ever be best finding out. [See, further, TRINITY; HOLY GHOST; CREDITS.]

God of God.—This and the expressions by which it is followed in the Nicene Creed are designed to assert in the most decisive form the essential Divinity of the Second Person of the Trinity. Being the Son of God, the only-begotten of the Father, the partaker of Divine nature, He is therefore God, "as one man is the son of another, though after a spiritual manner, and purely propagated as one light is generated of another, without diminution of substance, generated from the Eternal Essence, and not made as creatures are; being of one Essence with the Eternal Father," and therefore "very God of very God."

It is scarcely necessary to remind the reader that the above expression is not to be understood as implying simply that Christ is God over all other Gods; for though He is truly "King of kings and Lord of lords," yet the Christian faith recognises no God but one, and the very design of this portion of the Creed was to set forth the Redeemer of mankind as a partaker in the one "Divine Essence."

Godard, Sr., Archbishop of Rouen, was born at Salency, a village in Picardy, in the diocesan Mere. A belief prevailed in the middle Ages that he and St. Medard were twin brothers, were ordained on the same day, and died on the same day; but no mention of Godard occurs in the earliest Lives of St. Medard, and Godard attended the first council of Orleans in 511, while St. Medard was not consecrated till 530. Godard was ordained priest by the Bishop of Vermand, and one year after, towards the end of the fifth century, was elected Archbishop of Rouen. He and many heathen in his diocese, but by his great zeal converted most of them. There are three actions in his life which have principally contributed to make him famous in ecclesiastical history. First, his share with Remigius, St. Vaast, and St. Medard in the conversion of Clovis. Secondly, his assistant Godend, Anthony, Bishop of Grasse and of Venice, was born at Dreux in 1605. He entered the Church, and Cardinal Richelieu, attracted by his preaching, recommended him to the French King for the bishopric of Grasse, to which he was consecrated at the end of 1636. The towns of Grasse and Venice being only three leagues distant from each other, and the bishopric's worth only 10,000 francs a year, Godend procured a Bull from Innocent X. for uniting them; but the clergy and laity appealed against the union, so he contented himself with the See of Venice. He died of apoplexy, at Venice, in 1672. Godend wrote a great many poems on religious subjects, beginning with The Hymn of the Three Children; but his principal work is his Ecclesiastical History, containing a history of the first eight centuries. He was also the author of commentaries on St. Paul's Epistles, and on the lives of St. Paul, St. Augustine, St. Charles Borromeo, etc.

Godfrey of Bouillon, called the "Christian Hercules," Prince of Lorraine; the exact date of his birth is uncertain, but his parents were married in 1659. He gave such proofs of an invincible courage under the Emperor Henry IV., whom he served with great success in Germany and Italy, that he was chosen general of the expedition which the Christians undertook for the recovery of the Holy Land, and 80,000 foot and 10,000 horsemen were placed under his command. He sold his hereditary dukedom of Liège to Othbert, bishop of the diocese, and laid out the money in prepreations for the war. He assembled his forces on the banks of the Meuse and the Moselle, and thence marched through Germany, Bohemia, and Hungary. The Greeks opposed his march, but he at length constrained the Emperor Alexius Comnenus to allow him a free passage. In 1097 he vanquished Solyman, Sultán of the Turks, and took Nicæa after a month's siege, then Antioch and Edessa, but not till after much delay and frightful losses; in four years' time he had subdued Lycaonia, Cilicia, Syria, and Mesopotamia, which struck such terror into the Saracens that the Caliph of Egypt sued for peace by his ambassadors. In May, 1099, Godfrey reached Jerusalem, having then only 40,000 men, and many of those unfit to fight, and after a struggle of five weeks' duration, he took the city by storm. By general consent of the chief- tains of his army, he was chosen King of Jerusalem, but he refused either to bear that title or be crowned with a diadem of gold in the place where his Saviour had been treated with ignominy and crowned with thorns. In August of the same year, the Sultan, seeing how Godfrey’s army was weakened, sent against him 100,000 horse and a proportionate number of infantry; but they were defeated with terrible slaughter at the battle of Ascalon, and that victory gained Godfrey the quiet possession of the Holy Land. He enjoyed his conquests but a very short time, for he died in 1100. His exploits and virtues have been immortalised by Tasso in his Gerusalemme Liberata.

Godwin, Francis, son of Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells, was born at Haddington, in Northamptonshire, in 1561. He was admitted student of Christ Church in 1578, and after taking his degrees, was ordained priest, and presented to the rectory of Sanford Orcais, in Somersetshire. He then became successively vicar of Weston-in-Zoyland, sub-dean of Exeter, rector of Bishop’s Lidiard in 1601, and Bishop of Llandaff. King James, in 1617, translated him to the bishopric of Hereford, where he died in 1633. His chief work was A Catalogue of the Bishops of England, which was published in 1601, and dedicated to Lord Buckhurst, who was in Queen Elizabeth’s favour, and who caused him to be preferred to Llandaff. He also wrote Nuncius Inanimatus, or the Mysterious Messenger, and The Man in the Moon, from which work Bishop Wilkins is supposed to have taken some hints for his Discovery of a New World in the Moon.

Gomarists or Anti-Remonstrants. —The opponents of the Arminians. They take their name from their leader, Francis Gomar, who was born at Bruges in 1563. He commenced his studies at Strasburg and Heidelberg, and in 1582 came to England, and went first to Oxford and then to Cambridge, where he took his B.D. in 1584. In 1594 he was elected Professor of Divinity at Leyden, and he is chiefly known for his violent opposition to the doctrines of his colleague Arminius. He was present at the Synod of Dort, in 1618, and was the main instrument in getting the Arminians expelled from the Reformed Church. He then became Professor of Hebrew and Divinity at Groningen, and died there in 1641. He was a man of great learning, and very bigoted in his views. His works were published in Amsterdam in 1645.

Good Friday.—The Friday in Holy Week received its name from the good things which our Saviour gained for us by His sufferings and death. Among the Saxons it was called Long Friday—probably on account of the long fasts and offices used on this day.

The commemoration of Christ’s sufferings has been kept from the very first age of Christianity as a day of the strictest fasting and humiliation. At the Fourth Council of Toledo, in 633, all those who only fasted up to 3 p.m. were severely censured, and were forbidden to partake of the Paschal Eucharist. Special thanksgivings for the Atonement, and intercessions for all men, were made on this day; and later, the singing of the Reproaches and the Adoration of the Cross were added.

The three collects for Good Friday are taken from the Sarum Use from the sacramental of Gelasio. The first is for the Church as "the family of God;" the second for "all estates of men in God’s holy Church;" and the third for all "Jews, Turks, infidels, and heretics," following Christ’s example in praying for His enemies. The Epistle [Heb. xi.] brings forward the ancient sacrifices as a type of Christ’s death, and showing that through His intercession there is a "new and living way to the Father." The Gospel is St. John’s account of the Examination before Pilate and of the Crucifixion [John xix.]. The Proper Lessons are [Gen. xxii. 1–20] the history of the typical sacrifice of Isaac: and [Isaiah lii. 13, liii. 12] the prophecy of the sufferings of Christ. The Second Lessons are [John xviii., which, formerly, together with John xix., formed the Gospel] St. John’s account of the Betrayal, the Examination before Annas, and the Denial of St. Peter; and [1 Peter ii.] St Peter’s exhortation to all good works on the foundation of Christ, and to the bearing of sufferings as Hbore them.

In the Roman Church the officiating clergy appear in black garments, the altar is stripped the candles are not lighted. After a short pause the altar is covered with white cloth and passages from the Old and New Testaments are read. Eighteen prayers are recited, on which our three collects are based. Those for the Jews are forbidden to be said kneeling. Then follows “the Adoration of the Cross,” which is now divested of the black with which it had been covered, and is kissed by the clergy and people while four hymns are sung. Then comes the Communion and the Presanctified. It is forbidden to consecrate the Mass on this day, but the priests receive a Host previously consecrated. According to a Roman Ordo about the year 80 the ceremony ended with the silent Communion of the faithful; but at present this forbidden, except in the case of sickness.

Good Works.—The Twelfth Article the Church of England expresses the doctri which the Church accepted from Luther, at which may be taken as an expression Protestant theology on this subject. The following exposition of this doctrine is taken from Canon Heartley, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Oxford:—"Such works are inseparable from our union with Christ, and then as effects of that union, not as causes or instruments. 'We are created in Christ Jesus unto good works.' 'He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; or without me—separate from me—ye can do nothing.' While, however, we regard good works as effects of our union with Christ, we must remember that they are an end also, say, the end for which we have been united to Him; and, if so, a condition of the continuance of our union. 'The branch cannot, tis true, bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine;' but yet its fruitfulness is the object of the care and pains which the vine-risser bestows upon it, and therefore a condition on which it is suffered to remain. And s fruitfulness in good works is a condition on which we are suffered to continue in Christ, and also is it the measure according to which fresh supplies of grace are given; every branch that beareth fruit, he purchaseth it, that may bring forth more fruit.' And yet another, which indeed follows upon the foregoing, our works are the rule by which God ill judge us at the last day. These will de-1 not in all controversy how far we have answered the end of our new creation; how far we have improved the talents entrusted to us; how far we are qualified and prepared for at kingdom into which 'there shall in noise enter anything that defileth,' where 'the people shall be all righteous,' where the merciful 'shall receive mercy,' where the pure heart shall see God,' where the servant ho has so improved the pound entrusted to him to have gained five pounds, shall be appointed to reign over five cities, and he who s gained ten pounds shall have authority over ten cities.'"

In distinction from this, the Roman Church, the Council of Trent, declares that a sin, "if already justified through such works as he does by the grace of God merit of Christ, whose living member is, truly merits increase of grace, eternal life, and the actual attainment of eternal glory, if he dies in grace." Man being a free and responsible agent (say the commentators on this), his good works are worthy of reward. But the rewards promised by God out of all proportion to the work of the soul, it follows that they are of His free giving-kindness, not of His justice. We cannot profit God by our good works, therefore have no claim upon Him (Luke xvii, 7), if of His own free will He has promised it which we have no right to ask (Luke xii., 36). Namely, to reward good works with life eternal [2 Tim. iv. 8; Rom. ii. 6; Heb. vi. 10]. But such good works can only be done the grace of God. God moves man, not because of merit which He sees in him, but because of His own free love. But having received that love, and thus passed from death to life, the works of the Christian man, being the fruit of Christ's Passion, each and all merit God's reward. He "walks worthily with all pleasing."

Goodwin, Charles W [b. 1817, d. 1878].—A learned layman, author of some brilliant essays on philological and Eastern antiquarian (especially Egyptian) subjects, but better known generally to the world as the writer of the essay on The Mosaic Cosmogony in the Essays and Reviews. In that essay he advanced little or nothing that would be questioned by Biblical students of the present day.

Goodwin, John [b. 1593, d. 1665].—A learned controversialist on the Arminian side. He gained much favour with Cromwell for writing two pamphlets in defence of the High Court of Justice in the condemnation of Charles I. At the Restoration he was deprived of his living, which was in London, and his writings were publicly burned. Wesley held his theological opinions in such respect that he has been called the "Wielder of Methodism." His works are on the subject of Justification, in which he contested the doctrine of Final Perseverance.

Goodwin, Thomas [b. 1600, d. 1679].—A learned divine among the Independents, educated at Cambridge, and a Fellow of Christ's College, but disagreeing with Laud's views he went to Holland and became pastor of a Puritan congregation there. On the breaking out of the Rebellion he came to England, and was made president of Magdalen College, Oxford, and was one of the Westminster divines. He is said to be the Puritan president depicted by Addison in the Spectator, No. 494. His works were reprinted among Nichols's Puritan Divines in 12 vols. in 1861. They are learned and pious, but diffuse, and probably but little read.

Gorham Case.—In 1847 the Rev. G. C. Gorham was presented by the Lord Chancellor to the living of Bumpford Speke, in Devon: but the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, then almost the only decided High Churchman on the bench, refused to institute him, on the ground that he was unsound in doctrine in denying that regeneration is in all cases wrought by baptism. Mr. Gorham appealed to the law, and in 1849 Sir Herbert J. Fust, Dean of the Court of Arches, decided against him, on the ground that Baptistical Regeneration is undoubtedly the doctrine of the Church of England. Mr. Gorham then appealed to the Privy Council, and the case having been again argued, judgment was given on March 5th, 1850, reversing the decision of the court below, on the ground that a difference of opinion had existed among the Reformers, and ever since among English Gospel.—This is the Anglo-Saxon literal translation of the word evangelium, which again is only a Latinised form of the Greek εὐαγγέλιον, and signifies "good tidings." [1] In its widest sense it signifies the revelation of the mercy of God to sinful man through a Mediator. [2] It was also applied from the beginning of Christian literature to the histories of the life, actions, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ. When delivered orally by the first preachers it was called the Gospel of His Grace, because it flows from His free love [Acts xx. 24]; the Gospel of the Kingdom, as it treats of the kingdoms of grace and glory; the Gospel of Christ, because He is the author and subject of it [Rom. i. 16]; the Gospel of peace and salvation, as it promotes our present comfort, and leads to eternal glory [Eph. i. 13; vi. 15]; the glorious Gospel, as in it the glorious perfections of Jehovah are displayed [2 Cor. iv. 4]; the everlasting Gospel, as it was designed from eternity, is permanent in time, and the effects of it are eternal [Rev. xiv. 6].

In the ritual of the Anglican Church the term Gospel is also used for the portion of Scripture taken from the writings of the Evangelists, which is read after the Epistle in the Ante-Communion Service. Formerly candles were used during the reading of the Gospels, termed "Gospel-lights." The custom of singing "Glory be to Thee, O Lord," before, and "Thanks be to Thee, O Lord," after the Gospel, is purely traditional. The first mention of it is to be found in Edward VI.'s first Prayer Book.

Gospel Side.—That side of the altar at which the Gospel is read, viz. the north side, it being understood that the chancel is at the east end of the church.

Gospeller.—The clergyman who is appointed to read the Gospel for the day. In some cathedrals a clergyman is assigned always to perform this duty. It has become customary for only two clergymen to take part in the Ante-Communion Service, the principal reading the Gospel, though the deacons when ordained are authorised to "read the Gospel in the Church of Christ."

Gospellers.—[1] A term of ridicule applied to the Reformers, because they stated that their mission was to preach and spread the Gospel. [2] The name was assumed by the early Puritans, as "Evangelicals" was afterwards by a party in the Church, signifying that they represented better than their brethren the life and truth of the New Testament. Bishop Latimer in one of his sermons speaks sneeringly of them: "A Gospeller, one of the new brethren, worse than a rank Papist." Archbishop Cranmer also describes them as "the cause of disobedience, sedition, and carnal liberty."

Gossip [A.-S. God-sib or "God's kin."]—One who stands sponsor at baptism. The relationship between a person and his sponsor was called gossipred. Formerly marriage was forbidden between those who stood in such relationship, but the law is now abolished.

Gothic Architecture.—This name was given in contempt to the style so designated by partisans of the Classical style of architecture, who meant it to signify "barbarous," but it has been universally adopted to express the whole range of medieval architecture. There was an attempt made to get rid of the implied slur by using the word "Pointed" instead, but this never gains ground, and is repudiated by the best authorities. Mr. J. H. Parker, in fact, declares it misnomer, inasmuch as he includes round headed arches. He gives the following a convenient epochs of the successive Gothic styles:—

<thead>
<tr>
<th>Early English</th>
<th>1090-1160</th>
<th>Decorated ...</th>
<th>1300-1375</th>
</tr>

<td>Late or Debased, etc.</td>

<tr>

It will be seen in the above that in some cases the styles are made to overlap, so that the Transition period continues in some cases while the succeeding style has already begun. Mr. Parker's volume, The A B C of Gothic Architecture, gives very full informative respecting the changes, one of its great merits being that it teaches the reader how to discern the changes for himself. "It only real way," he says, "of thorough understanding architectural history is to ... about and see the buildings themselves."

Gottschalk.—A German monk of the thirteenth century, much esteemed for his learning and the penetration of his genius, but afterwards accused of heresy for teaching th doctrine of Predestination. He was an ardent student of Augustine and his pupil Fulgentius, and he taught—[1] That God predestinates people to damnation; [2] that it was not our Saviour's intention to save all mankind; that He did not die for all, but only for the elect; [3] he denied the liberty of man's will. The divines of that time were divided on the question, some (amongst them Braduinus, Bishop of Troyes, and Ratramnus, a monk of Corbi) maintaining that his sentiments, well understood, were the same with St. Augustine's on those heads; but Tabanus, Archbishop of Mayence, believing him guilty of heresy, sent him to his Metropolitan, Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who summoned a council at Quierzy, by whom the doctrines were condemned, and Tottschalk was deprived of his priesthood, cruelly beaten, and thrown into prison, where he died 568, persisting to the last in his opinions. He was refused the last sacraments of the Church and denied Christian burial. Hincmar had for an ally in this persecution the famous Duns Scotus.

Goudimel, Claude, one of the best musicians of the sixteenth century, was born in ranche-Comté in 1510, went to Italy as a music teacher in 1540, returned to Paris in 1555, and in 1562 joined the Reformed Church, in which he was massacred at Lyons in 1572. e is noted as the composer of tunes to Zaz's and Marot's translations of the hymns.

Gough, John B. [b. 1817, d. 1886], an advocate of total abstinence, of great power of story, was a native of Sandgate, Kent, but died in America. He emigrated to the United States at the age of twelve, and became a ɒ końber at New York. Here he became temperate in his habits, but having, in 1842, a temperance lecture, he was so moved that he threw himself eagerly into the isu, became a lecturer, and speedily gained wide reputation as an orator. In 1853 he was invited to England by the National Temperance League, and stayed two years, turing at Exeter Hall and elsewhere to husiastic audiences. Returning to America with enhanced reputation, he travelled on his mission through the States, and twice more visited England. Many of his lectures have been published, and other works on the subject, and he has also written an obituary [1842].

Gown is derived from the Celtic gwen, "a robe," and in old English was applied to the ordinary dress of both men and women. The fifteenth century it became the distinctive dress of women, but it was retained by who were scholars and ecclesiastics. The particular habit of the Benedictines, once it passed to our universities. It was first a coat, reaching a little below the hips, with sleeves, but without gatherings on the shoulders. When degrees came to be conferred, changes were made in the gown for distinction's sake, colours and facings were introduced, and hoods (originally that part of the gown which was drawn over the head out of doors) were also made distinctive. [Hoods.]

Some persons again contended that inasmuch as the sermon was part of the Communion Service, the preacher should then wear his surplice, but at afternoon and evening service, there is no mention of the sermon, the gown should be worn. This was a custom which prevailed in "High Church" services a few years ago. Formerly it was used in church as the preaching dress, and the substitution of the surplice for it was a subject of controversy, which has now almost died out. The signal for this controversy was given by Bishop Blomfield's Charge in 1842, when he expressed the opinion that the surplice was the proper preaching dress. The discussion turns upon the question whether the sermon is a part of Divine worship: if it be, the surplice is clearly the proper dress. But many contended that it was not so; that the preacher, who once was frequently an itinerant monk, was not an officiant in Divine worship. And to this it was replied again, that this was only because of the ignorance of the clergy; that when, by reason of better education, they were able to preach themselves, the sermon took its rightful place as part of their ministration. The question has never been authoritatively settled, but of late years the surplice has become the usual garment at all services.

Grabe, John Ernest, D.D., was born at Königsberg in 1666. His father being Professor of Divinity and History at the university in this town, John received his education there. He diligently studied the writings of the Fathers, and was led to doubt the orthodoxy of the corporation of Lutheran ministers, so he resolved to become a Roman Catholic, but on making his doubts known the Elector of Brandenbourg sent three Lutherans to dissuade him. These, failing to convince him, advised him to go to England, and he arrived here during the reign of William and Mary. He studied at Oxford, was ordained, and was made a D.D. in 1706. Five years after he died in London, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Though Grabe joined the Church of England, he was still inclined towards some of the Romish practices, as prayers for the souls of the dead, anointing with oil, confession and sacerdotal absolution, etc. He was the author of several works, the chief of which was an edition of the Septuagint, which he copied from the Alexandrian manuscript. He also edited Irenaeus, parts of Origem, Spielegium of the writings of the Fathers and heretics of the first three centuries, and other works.

the general idea of it, as it relates to God, is His free favour and love. As it respects men, it implies the happy state of reconciliation and favour with God wherein they stand, and the holy endowments, qualities, or habits of faith, hope, love, etc., which they possess. Divines have distinguished grace into common or general, special or particular. Common grace, if it may be so called, is what all men have, as the light of nature and reason, convictions of conscience, etc. [Rom. ii. 4, 1 Tim. iv. 18]. Special grace is that which is peculiar to Christians. They are by God’s favour chosen out of the world, redeemed, pardoned, justified [Rom. viii. 28-30]. This grace so bestowed becomes the principle of life, and brings forth good works in those to whom it is given. Consequently the Apostle exhorts to “growth in grace”—that is, to progress in the Divine life. Such growth discovers itself by an increase of spiritual light and knowledge; by the renunciation of self, and dependence on Christ; by growing more spiritual in duties; by being more humble, submissive, and thankful; by rising superior to the corruptions of our nature, and finding the power of sin more weakened in us; by being less attached to the world, and possessing more of a heavenly disposition.

Grace at Meals [Lat. gratias, “thanks”].

—From the earliest times Christians have followed the example of Christ, who blessed the food before partaking, and they offer a short prayer before and after meals, praising and thanking God for His goodness in supplying their wants.

Grace, Pilgrimage of, was the name given to an insurrection in 1536, on account of its religious character. A dangerous feeling caused by the introduction of the Reformation into England, which was looked on as heresy in the north, had long been growing up in Yorkshire, and when, in the autumn of 1536, two commissioners, Legh and Layton, were appointed to carry out the Act of Suppression in Yorkshire, while others were appointed in Lincolnshire, Cheshire, and Lancashire, the excitement rose to a head. The rebellion began in Louth, in Lincolnshire, and spread all over the north. The insurgents drew up six petitions to the Crown:—That the religious houses should be restored, the subsidy remitted, the clergy should pay no more tithes or first-fruits to the Crown, the Statute of Uses should be repealed, the villein blood should be removed from the Privy Council, and that several of the bishops who were heretics, should be deprived. The King refused to grant them, and the Lincolnshire rebels subsided. But those in Yorkshire increased daily. They were headed by a barrister, Robert Aske, who seems to have been a good leader, as well as a kind and benevolent man. Lord Darcy, much trusted by the King, and other nobles joined the insurgents, who marched against and took Hull and York. Henry began to see the danger, and an army was sent to the north. The rebels marched on Doncaster, but when there found Norfolk with the troops ready to oppose them. They were disinclined to fight, so a council was held on the bridge leading into the town, and the rebels dictated their terms. These were carried up to London, and the King sent back an answer of general pardon, and the promise of a parliament to be held at York. They dispersed, but again rose, and, when they were quelled, Henry, saying they had broken their treaty, executed Aske, Lord Darcy, and several monks and abbots. When the commissioners visited the abbeys in the following year, the insurrection became an excuse for great cruelty.

Gradual.—An antiphon or sentence sung in the Communion Office after the Epistle as the deacon ascends the steps of the altar to read the Gospel. It comes from the Latin gradus “a step.” But the term in a wider sense is applied to other parts of the Eucharistic Service such as the Introit, Creed, Gloria in Excelsis, Agnus Dei, etc., because these are chanted from the steps of the chancel ciborium. It is also called Gradale or Greyel.

Grail, or Graal. The Holy.—There are many explanations of the word, some deriving it from the old French great, Provence, grajal; Latin, gradalis, a kind of dish; others affirm it to be a corruption of sanquis regalis, “royal blood,” which term we corrupted into sangreal. The name was given to the chalice, said to have been brought from heaven by angels, which Christ used at the Last Supper. During the Middle Ages many legends, probably originated by Waltham in the twelfth century, were circulated all over Europe. It was said that Joseph of Arimathea took it out of the upper room, and used it to catch the blood as it flowed from Christ’s body when it was taken down from the cross. He brought it with him to England, where it gained miraculous qualities. King Arthur’s knights endeavoured to find but none were successful except Sir Galahad, who was the only truly pure seeker. This is the subject of one of Tennyson’s idylls. Sir Galahad held it to be a parable of the Eucharist, signifying that the bread and wine at the sacrament have been changed into the true body and blood of Christ, and the search after the Holy Grail is explained as an attempt to see Christ in the sacrament; but there exists a foundation for this conceit.

Gratian, born at Chiusi, in Tuscan, lived in the twelfth century, and was a Benedictine monk in the monastery of St.-footer at Bononia. There he wrote his book, called the Decretum, or Concordia Discordantium Canonum, wherein he endeavours to reconcile the seeming contradiction of the canons, to this purpose he makes use of the H scriptures, the authority of the Fathers, decrees of councils, epistles of popes, and the laws of emperors and princes. Gratian in his collection ranges the canons more with respect to the matter than he order of time. He divides his work into three parts. The first contains one hundred and one distinctions, wherein he treats of ecclesiastics; the second takes in thirty-six cases, where both the case and the method of proceeding in giving judgment are treated; the third handles sacred matters, consisting of ve distinctions, which he calls de Conserva-

Graces, Richard, D.D. [b. 1763, d. 1829], can of Ardagh, and Regius Professor of divinity in Trinity College, Dublin, author several theological books, of which that on the Pontifices is still regarded as a valuable undark work.

Greek Church. —A branch of the East-

Greek Church, Pope, called "the Great," born about 550, the son of a Roman senator. He distinguished himself greatly in logic and rhetoric, and in 573 was made Prefect of Rome, and in 581 Governor of that city. His ascetic turn of mind led him, however, to embrace the monastic life, and he retired into the monastery of St. Andrew, which he had founded, of which he became abbot, and made his monastery very famous by the austerities which he practised. It was while he was still a monk that the incident of the Anglo-Saxon slaves in the market-place of Rome occurred; and Gregory had obtained permission from the Pope to become a missionary to our island, and had actually started, when the people of Rome insisted that he should be recalled. All his patrimony he spent in founding monasteries. In 582 Pope Pelagius II. dragged him from his retirement, ordained him deacon, and sent him to Constantinople as Nuncio to the Emperor Tiberius. He acquitted himself well in this employment, and while there disputed with the Patriarch Eutychius concerning the nature of glorified bodies, Gregory maintaining that they were not \textit{aerial} vehicles, but palpable and solid, though supernaturally spiritualised and refined. While there he wrote the greater part of his \textit{Magna Moralia}, or exposition of the Book of Job. On his return to Rome, he became secretary to Pope Pelagius, and upon the death of this Pope was unanimously chosen as his successor, Sept. 4th, 590. He wished to decline the honour, but was forced to accept it, but he retained his love of monasticism to the end of his days. During his pontifical he convened many synods, and endeavoured to restore the discipline of the Church, and was very zealous in checking the progress of heresy and delusion. John, Patriarch of Constantinople, having taken on himself the title of \textit{Ecumenical or Universal Bishop}, Gregory renounced with him on his presumption. For his own title he took that which has since been retained by the popes, \textit{Servus Servorum Domini}, \textit{i.e.} Servant of the servants of the Lord. He was very energetic in the propagation of Christianity, and in 596, in pursuance of his former desire, he sent Augustine, Mellitus, and a band of monks, to England to convert the Anglo-Saxons. He reclaimed the Spanish Church from Arianism to orthodoxy, which was proclaimed at the Council of Toledo in 589. In Africa he opposed the Donatists. He was humane to the heathen and the Jews, and laboured, though not very successfully, to check the European slave-trade. He was the first Pope to assume temporal power, his title to which was gained by his beneficent government. He found Rome in a hopeless state of continual warfare, and he procured peace for her. By his influence with Theodore, Queen of Lombardy, he effected the conversion of that country. One blot upon the fair fame of Gregory is that in 603, on the death of the Emperor Maurice, he sent congratulatory letters to his murderer, the tyrant Phocas. His able administration and care of his flock at Rome deservedly earned him the title of "Great." He lived in a very frugal manner, and gave the revenues of his See to the poor. His skill in music led him to remodel the whole system of sacred music, and that which he adopted was named after him, "Gregorian." He died in 604. There are several editions of his works: he wrote many homilies: those on Ezekiel and the Gospels are extant. His \textit{Dialogues} were written during his retirement. His twelve books of Epistles, written during the time when he was pope, furnish rules and prudent decisions on many points of discipline. His accounts of miracles show too much credulity on that point.

\textbf{Gregory VII., of Hildebrand, was born about 1020, at Saona, in Tuscany, and supposed to be of low origin. He spent the first part of his life in Rome, and then became a monk in the abbey of Cluny. On his return to Rome, Gregory VI. made him his chaplain, but on the Pope's death he once more retired to Cluny, and there remained until Bruno, Bishop of Toul, who was nominated pope by Henry III., passing through France, took him back to Rome, imagining that he might have a serviceable interest for him in that city. Under this pope (Leo IX.) Hildebrand exercised great influence, and also during the short pontificates of his successors, Victor II., Stephen IX., Benedict X., and Alexander II. In a word, he supported the popes' interest and having taken upon himself the character of Chancellor of the Holy See, he had the absolute administration of all affairs, both ecclesiastical and civil, as well as the entail disposal of the revenues of the Church in Rome. Immediately on the death of Alexander II., Hildebrand was unanimous chosen Pope, without waiting the Imperial sanction. Hildebrand pretended that he had been elected against his will, and sent messengers to the Emperor Henry IV. to know whether the election had his approval. The German bishops endeavoured to dissuade Henry from giving his consent, but the Emperor perceiving that his refusal would signify nothing, Hildebrand having a stronger interest in Rome than himself, yielded to the point, and he was crowned July 10th, 1077, under the title of Gregory VII.

No sooner had he become Pope than he set about effecting a total reform of the Church, which, indeed, was greatly needed. For the were indeed the dark ages, and the Pope had been for some years a synonym for that was corrupt. Gregory strove to enforce a strict discipline and residence of the clergy, and to repress simony and pluralism, determined to remove those latter evils, depriving the secular princes of the right which they assumed of disposing of bishoprics in their dominions. In 1075 summoned a council at Rome, and forbade, pain of excommunication, that kings and princes should give the investiture of sees and abbeys by conferring the ring and crozier and thus began the long quarrel between Popedom and European princes about right of investiture. [Investiture.] Her IV. disregarded these threats, and proceed to appoint as before to bishoprics. On Gregory summoned him to Rome to ans for this conduct, and for charges brought against him by some of his disaffected subjects in Saxony and other countries. Henry, dignant at this assumption of temporal as well as spiritual power, sent the Pope a haughty defiance, and called together a Diet of Empire at Worms, in 1076, which was tended by many bishops and abbots, declared Gregory to be deposed. Gregory once summoned a council at the Lateran, solemnly excommunicated Henry. By the of the Empire, this sentence, if not reme within twelve months, involved the forfeiture the throne and of all civil rights. His son subjects were only too ready to avail themselves of the Papal sanction, and proceeded to elect a new emperor. Henry, therefore, had to yield, and started off in mid-inter to the Castle of Canossa, in Lombardy, supplie the Pope's pardon. Here Gregory spent him waiting for three days in the courtyard in the snow before he would give him an interview, and then he absolved him and sent in away. Henry's submission did not last long. He fought and defeated Rudolf of Suabia, who had been elected Emperor in his room;
and then recommenced hostilities with the popes. He called together another Diet, who ain deposed Hildebrand, and chose in his the anti-pope Guibert, Archbishop of venna, who took on him the name of ment III. Hildebrand had a supporter in bert Guiscard, the Norman conqueror of ulia, who could not, indeed, prevent Henry m getting with his army to the walls of me, but who successfully defended the city thst him. After a three years' siege, hower, Henry got possession of Rome in 1084, 1 Gregory took refuge in the Castle of St.
gelo. Robert delivered him from thence,
he then withdrew to Salerno, where he ed in the following year, 1085. His last ords were: "I have loved justice and hated quity, therefore I die an exile."

The character of Gregory VII. has been differently judged by different religious ools, but all agree that his reforms ecessary for the Church. The princes many bishops of his time naturally looked him as a dangerous enemy; but his own ny represent him as a very religious and out man, unblamable in his life and con-sation, a learned canonist, and a good or, zealous for the welfare of the Church
over of discipline, and an enemy to vice.
Pin thus writes of him:—"It must be ed that the Pope had a great genius and acity, that he was constant and undaunted he execution of his designs, well skilled in stitutions of his predecessors, zealous the interest of the Holy See, an enemy to ony and libertinism, full of Christian ights and zeal for the reformation of the ners of the clergy, and there is not the reason to think that he was tainted in own morals; but it must likewise be con-ed that he was promoted to the chair a too hastily, that his zeal to advance the eur of the Holy See made him overstrain authority, and undertake indefensible ions; that he was the cause of great distances, both in the Church and Empire,
he assumed to himself a power over ks and States which he had no right to, apushed the ecclesiastical authority beyond use bounds." Dean Milman, in his Latin Christianity, vol. iii., speaks very highly of character and aims.

Gregory, St., surnamed Thaumaturgus
[i.e. "Wonder-worker"], was born at Neo-Cesarea about 210. He studied under Origen for five years, learning logic, physics, mathematics, ethics, etc., and he also attended the Alexandrian schools for three years. He achieved great fame for his rhetorical powers.
On leaving Origen he pronounced a "Paegyric" on him which gives a very good account of the way in which studies were borne. Gregory returned to Neo-Cesarea in 238. Origen wrote to him exhorting him to employ all his talents for the service of God, and to study the Scriptures; so he shut himself up in a solitary place in the country. He heard that he was being sought for to receive consecration as Bishop of Neo-Cesarea, so fled from one place to another, but at last yielded on condition that he should be allowed some time to prepare himself. Cesarea was a very wealthy, populous town, but full of idolatry and vice; and, according to account, it only contained seventeen Christians. It is from his supposed miracles after his consecration that Gregory gained the name of Thau-maturgus. According to St. Basil, he turned the course of rivers by giving them orders in the name of Christ; he dried up a lake which was the cause of strife to two brothers;
and his predictions of the future made him equal to the Bible prophets. There are innumerable stories of the miracles worked by him. When the Decian persecution broke out, it is gravely related that he and his deacon were pursued, but that his enemies found only two trees in their place. Gregory returned to Neo-Cesarea on the death of Decius, and again busied himself with the conversion of the heathen. A great many were converted by a plague, which, it is said, was stopped, and as some say also brought about, by Gregory as a means of bringing them to renounce their idols. Gregory died probably about 270, leaving, according to tradition, only seventeen infidels in Cesarea, where he had found only seventeen Christians. He is commemorated Nov. 17th.

Gregory is the author of some "canons" directed against the impiety and disloyalty of those whom he had converted. These and his Paeangyric on Origen are his only works, though others have been attributed to him.

Gregory of Betica, St., Bishop of Elberi, Elvira, or Granada, in Spain, lived in the fourt century, and he became bishop about 357. There are three writers who give very different accounts of Gregory. One is Eusebius of Vercellae, who praises him for the way in which he fulfills his duties, and specially commends his zeal against all sects, shown at the Council of Ariminum, and against Hosius, who was inclined to Arianism. Another is Gams, the German writer, who states that he fell into heresy at Ariminum, and with Restitutus of Carthage and others signed an Arian formula of belief in 359, while we also hear that he was one of the followers of Lucifer of Cagliari, and was the author of a Luciferian treatise, de Trinitate, which is now found to have been written by Faustinus. Gregory died probably about 384, and is commemorated on April 24th.

Gregory Nazianzen, Sr., was born in a little town of Nazianzus, in Cappadocia, at the beginning of the fourth century. His father, also named Gregory, originally belonged to the sect of the Hypsaiatarii, but was converted by his wife Nonna. He became Bishop of Nazianzus in 329, and died in 374. Gregory, the son, was from childhood impressed by a desire to devote himself to the Church. He studied with his brother Caesarius, first at Caesarea, in Cappadocia, under Carterius, where he formed a friendship with St. Basil [q.v.], and then in Palestine. Here he remained for some time, and then removed to Alexandria. In 344 he set out for Athens. On the way the ship was overtaken by a violent storm, which was the cause of great terror to our saint, as he had not been baptised, and he vowed that if he reached land he would again dedicate himself to God. He studied oratory and rhetoric there for ten years. Soon after his arrival he was joined by Basil, and the friends studied together. Basil left in 355, and in the following year Gregory returned home. It is stated by some that it was at this time that the saint received his baptism, while others place it at his arrival in Athens. He for some time resisted his wish to join Basil's hermit life, feeling that his duty was to remain with his father and mother; but at length he broke with the world, and went to his friend at Pontus. Here he remained for some time, until in 362 he was forced to be ordained priest, and assist his father, then over eighty, in the government of his church. On Easter Day of the next year he preached his first sermon. There were very few present, the reason being that the inhabitants of the town disapproved of his unwillingness to receive Holy Orders. He wrote a long apology for himself, in which he gave four reasons for his reluctance:—[1] Because he was unprepared; [2] because he was attracted by the monastic life; [3] because he was ashamed of some of the clergy; and [4] he knew himself to be unfit to teach others. He then considered the duties of a priest, and concluded with the reasons for his compliance with his father's will:—[1] He longed for the people, and knew they wished for him; [2] his parents were growing old; and [3] because of the example of the prophet Jonah. In 370 the Emperor Valens divided Cappadocia into two provinces. Basil was now Bishop of Caesarea, which till that time had been the only metropolis in all Cappadocia; but upon the division, Tyana was made the capital of what was called the second Cappadocia. Anthimus, bishop that city, called himself the second Metropolitan, and claimed equal rights with St. Basil. The latter took this opportunity of forming new sees, among them a small town name Sasina, on the boundary between the two provinces, of which Gregory was chosen his bishop. He for some time refused to accept and when he was at last persuaded he was very reluctant to visit his bishopric. On his attempt to take possession, Anthimus opposes him, and refused to allow him to perform an episcopal functions unless he acknowledged him as his Metropolitan. This Gregory refused to do, and returned to Nazianzus, where he became coadjutor bishop. Early in 374 his father died, and he waited on till another bishop should be confirmed. At last, after nearly two years, he, fearing he should be elected, fled to Selencia, in Isauria, where he spent three years in solitude. While Gregory was here, St. Basil died.

And now came a great change in his life. The city of Constantinople had for forty years been entirely given up to the Arians but at the accession of Theodosius the Great the hopes of the orthodox rose, and it looked for some pastor who could restore order and help them. Their eyes fell on Gregory, whose virtue, sound doctrine, and power of eloquence had already made him famous and they invited him to be their bishop. He withheld for some time, but was length prevailed upon, and arrived in Constantinople early in 379. He took session of the church of Anastasia, then only one saved from the Arians, and by his preaching. He had many difficulties to cope with, as the heretics joined together to denounce him, and sometimes a mob would enter the church where he was holding service. One of the great abuses he found in Constantinople was the disputes that went between different sects, and he made discourses, the first on this subject, and other four on the Being and attributes of God and the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. It is from these that he is supposed to have gained the surname of the Divine. In Gregory had done so good a work that many disciples, among whom was St. Jeremi, flocked to him. The name of one was Maximus, an Alexandrian, in whom Gregory wisely placed great trust, as this man was to supplant his master and gain the bishop himself. To effect this he wrote to Pope St. Zeno, Bishop of Alexandria, bringing false charges against Gregory. Peter had the year before written to our saint in warm terms of praise but now he believed the calumnies, deplored Gregory, and sent seven bishops to consecrate Maximus. The clergy rose up in their disfavour, and exposed Maximus's real character. Soon after, Theodosius came to Constantinople, expelled the Arians, and made Gregory bishop of the chief church. He made several Attempts to gain permission to again retire to solitude, but did not succeed till the end 381. He then returned to Nazianzus, and died in 389 or 390. He is commemorated in the Greek Church on Jan. 25th, and in the man on May 9th.

His works chiefly consist of sermons or discourses, funeral orations, letters, and poems. Gregory, Sr., Bishop of Nyssa, was the other of Basil the Great. He was born in Carea, probably about 336, as he is known to have been several years younger than his other, whose birth took place in 329 or 330. Gregory received very little education, and was merely to have attended the schools in native place. He was made a reader in the church, but soon quitted that office and became dessor of rhetoric. This step was greatly approved of by his friends, and especially his sister Macrina, a recluse, and by his at friend Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote a letter on the subject, which was probably the cause of our bishop's return to the service of the Church. He retired to a monastery in Pontus, where he passed several years. While here he tried to mediate between Basil his uncle Gregory, a bishop in Cappadocia, who had become estranged. Finding other plans of any avail, he attempted to a his object by writing letters from Bishop Gregory, desiring reconciliation, but they served to make the breach wider. Basil made Bishop of Caresa in Cappadocia, soon after, in 372, he raised his brother to see of Nyssa, a small town near. A friend onstrated that so great a man should be tied in so small a place, but Basil answered the did not wish that his brother should be le famous from his bishopric, but the n from his bishop. Gregory was very Hil to accept the office, but was com ed. His troubles soon began. The Emperor Valens was an Arian, and was disposed islike Gregory. Demosthenes, the chief of heretics, had once been checked by Basil, tried to revenge himself on Gregory. In a council was called at Ani to examine some charges of embezzlement brought against the bishop. Though he knew him innocent, he thought it prudent to d against an heretical council, so did not fear. Valens banished him, and another top was chosen to fill his place. In 378 tian succeeded Valens, and all the deposed op, Gregory among them, were recalled their sees, and Gregory was received with rejoicings; but his happiness did not long. A series of troubles fell upon him, first being the death of Basil in 379. Gregory had always looked on his brother director and support, so the loss was g. At the end of three years his sister MACRINA [q.v.] died. In 380 he was appointed the Council of Antioch to reform the discipline of the churches in Arabia and Palestine, which had become very bad, and it is said that at Jerusalem it was quite scandalous. In 381 Gregory was present at the Council of Constantinople, and he made funeral orations on Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, and on Pulcheria and Flaccilla, wife and daughter of the Emperor Theodosius. He was again at Constantinople in 394, to decide between the claims of Bagadius and Agapius to the See of Bosa. He died probably about the end of 395.

Gregory was the author of a work on the Creation, some treatises against current heresies, Commentaries, Lives of the Saints, tracts, sermons, etc. A great many of his letters are still extant, as well as some of his funeral orations. Gregory, Sr., Bishop of Langres, was born in the fifth century, probably in 449. He was the son of one of the principal senators of Autun, and was when young preferred to the dignity of Count or Governor of the town. On the death of his wife Armentaria, he gave up this employment, retired from the world, and was ordained Bishop of Langres [506]. He was noted for his abstinence and devotion. He attended the Councils of Epaon [507] and Clermont [535]. At the beginning of 539 he caught a fever and died, and was buried in a church at Dijon, in which town he had lived.

Gregory, Bishop of Tours, was born of noble parents at Anvergne. Nothing certain is known of his life before he became bishop, which event took place in 573. At this time a civil war was raging between Sigebert and Chilperic, sons of Clothaire I., and it was owing partly to the former, partly to the unanimous wish of all the people of Tours, that Gregory gained his bishopric, as he was on Sigebert's side. In 575 Chilperic assassinated his brother and obtained Tours, which he kept till his death. He behaved with great cruelty, plundering the country and destroying the churches. Gregory had an enemy, Leudastes, who, on failing to bring any charge against him, leagued himself with Riculfus, a declared enemy to Gregory. They charged him with spreading false reports against Queen Fredegund. He indignantly denied this, and his accuser was condemned to death. Leudastes fled, but was afterwards again taken and killed. Gregory died in 594.

His first work was Miracles of the Saints, in which he relates many fabulous stories. His History was written soon after. The first division, containing Books 1–4 and half of 5, was written about 577; the second to the middle of the eighth, in 584 and 585, and the remainder in 591. It is a history from the Creation down to his own time. It has often been criticised on the ground of partiality, but has always been greatly used as a textbook for the events of the sixth century.
Gregory of Utrecht.—When going on his missionary journeys, Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, was always looking out for men whom he thought would prove useful to him in his work. In the year 719 he happened to visit a nunnery in Thuringia, and during the meal a young boy, nephew of the abbot, read aloud to them. Boniface was so struck by the earnestness of his manner, that he asked to be allowed to speak to him. The result was that Gregory, fired by the tales of adventure, and also by the desire of being a disciple of such a man, determined to accompany him. He was most faithful to his master, and went with him on all his expeditions. It was his work to instruct the young people who were desirous of being baptised, and at last he was made abbot of a monastery in Utrecht, which soon became famous under his rule as a missionary college. His patience and zeal in training those under him was wonderful, and several of his pupils did good work afterwards in the missionary field. He laboured on diligently, till in his seventieth year he was seized by paralysis. He lived for three years more, and although unable to carry on his active work, his patient good life taught his disciples many a silent lesson. He died at Utrecht in 781.

Gregorian Tones.—Ancient melodies which derive their name from Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome in the seventh century, who reformed Church music so thoroughly that almost all the ancient music has been called by his name.

St. Ambrose [384] introduced into his church at Milan four modes from Antioch, derived, as it was believed, from Ignatius. This tradition is very probable, as the modes have a strong resemblance to what remains of the great melodies. The name given by St. Ambrose was Authentic, and they are severally called Doric, Phyrgian, Lydian and Mixo-Lydian. They consisted merely of diatonic intervals, and were formed by taking DEF G, in the common scale of C major, with the seven diatonic intervals above each respectively. Thus the Doric scale or mode would consist of DEF G A B C D; the Phyrgian of E F G A B C D E, and so on, without sharps or flats. The peculiarity to modern ears is that the place of the semitones varies in each.

St. Gregory enlarged the system by adding four other tones, called plagals, and severally hypo-Doric, hypo-Phyrgian, hypo-Lydian, and hypo-Mixo-Lydian. These were formed by taking the lowest five notes of each of the four original scales, and adding three other notes below. Thus the hypo-Doric would be ABC D E F G A. Still later, two more Authentic tones and their corresponding plagals were added, making twelve in all.

The term dominant had not the same meaning in the ancient scales that it has now. It meant the note which was most frequently used, and which was taken as the reciting note in the psalms and canticles. Each tone had also a final note, on which the melody was written in that tone ought to terminate.

On these tones all Church music of the early Western, and probably also of the Eastern Churches, is founded, and in some modern churches Gregorians are used as part of the medieval revival.

Gresley, William, one of the writers of the Tractarian party who exerted much influence by the use of fiction as a means of teaching his views. He was born in 1816 at Kenilworth, and went at an early age to Westminster School, whence he was elected to a studentship at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1822 he took a second class in Lit. Hum. and was ordained in 1825 by the Bishop of Oxford. His first curacy was at Drayton Bassett, near Tamworth, but he soon became assistant-curate at Stowe, Morning Lectu at St. Mary's, Lichfield, and Prebendary of the Cathedral. He afterwards went to Brighton for his health's sake, and in 1857 ceased the incumbency of All Saints', Bo' Hill, where he remained till his death in 1880.

A biography of him in the Guardian by a personal friend stated:—"He was a churchman to the backbone in all his feelings, as well as in theology. He had formed his opinions in the school of Andrew and Bull, and remained to the last a consistent Anglican, firmly opposed to all that seemed to him to have a tendency to Romish as distinguished from Catholic views. He was one of the original members of the England and Church Union, and for many years vice-president, but not feeling satisfied with the list of names which were taking, withdrew from the council though still allowing his name to remain on the list of members."

The first work which brought him to the world was the Portrait of an Eng. Churchman, published in 1838. He also wrote:—The Siege of Lichfield, Ecclesiastes Anglicus. The Duties of a Christian, Charles Lever, For Arden Clement Walton, Bernard Leslie, Charles Clavering, and the Ordinance of Confession.

Greswell, Edward [b. 1797, d. 1872], born at Denton, near Manchester, died at Oxford. A very learned writer on Chronology and on Gospel Harmony. He was Vice-Principal of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He wrote several disputations on the Principle and Arrangement of the Harmony of the Gospels, an exposition of the Parables, an essay on the Threefold Law. Dean Stanley pronounced this the best of all the replies which Colenso's book called forth.

Gretzer, James, a Jesuit, born at Mindorf, twenty-five years professor at Ingolstadt, an eminent controversialist and student of antiquity. He died at Ingolstadt in aged sixty-three. He was a very voluminous writer.
writer, editing many of the Greek and Latin classics; but his learning did not make him a keen-sighted critic, and he mistook many spurious works for genuine. His most valuable work was a folio volume, de Sancta Cruce, published in 1616. But his chief fame in his lay rested on his uncompromising hostility to the Reformed doctrines.

Grey Friars. [Franciscans.]

Griesbach, Johann Jakob [b. at Darmstadt, 1745; d. at Jena, 1812].—A learned textual critic of the New Testament. He may be called the first critical editor of the New Testament in Germany; the impulse, as Canon Westcott shows, proceeding originally from English scholars—Fell, Walton, and Mill. Griesbach's principle, though sound in his classification of texts on existing documents, was defective for want of evidence which he had not, but which succeeding investigations have laid open. He took the text of Erasmus, and revised cautiously from it. But he hardly realised how all existing manuscripts had been altered in the course of ages, and did not the means of grouping kindred documents and observing the nature of the variations between them. Hence Canon Westcott, while he shows that his text of the New Testament is of inferior worth, declares that its name should be "venerated above that of every other textual critic of the New Testament." [vol. ii., p. 185], and that if its endeavours to obtain a secure historical foundation for the text had been faithfully followed up in his spirit, most of the difficulties would by this time have been removed.

In taking up his investigations afresh, we, we trust, found a way not only to make somewhat nearer approximation to the postolic text than our immediate predecessors, but also to strengthen the critical bases on which their own texts are for the most part founded." It will be seen that Griesbach, though a bold critic, was also cautious and thoughtful, a wise exemplar of all who undertake work like his.

Grimshaw, William.—This devoted and hard-working minister was born on Sept. rd, 1708, at Brindle, near Preston, being educated at the schools of Blackburn and Leskin, in Lancashire. When eighteen years of age he became a member of Christ's College, Cambridge, where all the serious expressions of religion he had had in his younger days were dispelled by the evil influence and impiety of those with whom he associated. On his ordination, some revival of his former higher aspirations took place, at it was merely a passing emotion, and for many years he mingled with all those companions who were known as worldly and evil-minded men, even when he was minister at Todmorden, in Lancashire, at the age of twenty-six a wonderful change took place in his heart, and from that time he laboured incessantly among his people to draw their hearts upwards. He frequently preached thirty times in a week, walking many miles from village to village, so that all might hear the sound of the Gospel. He had been greatly influenced by Dr. Owen's book on Justification, about 1742, and although he never had the advantage of the friendship of any of the earnest men associated with the revival of religion, yet his own preaching about this time became more and more effective, influencing all who heard him. When he was at Haworth, near Bradford, his earnest efforts there seemed marvellously successful in awakening the rough and ignorant people amongst whom he then laboured. His lively, powerful way of impressing the truths of the Bible was so talked about, that for nearly twenty years people flocked to Haworth from long distances, just to hear Mr. Grimshaw. He instituted evening lectures on Sunday, although preaching morning and afternoon. For sixteen years, although enduring an immense amount of fatigue constantly, he enjoyed splendid health, only having one illness in that time. He was truly beloved by his people and family, and when he died, April 7th, 1763, from a fever caught in visiting assiduously the poor who were ill with it, there was a universal mourning. His daily habit was to rise at five, and on awaking he always said the doxology. Another custom he had was to address his family and servants after morning and evening prayer as if they might never meet again, commending them all most earnestly into God's care and keeping. He died at the early age of fifty-five, rejoicing that he had no wealth to leave behind him, having refused all worldly advancement, and making a point of giving away in his lifetime everything that he could possibly do without. His religious biographies were deservedly popular.

Grindal, Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at St. Bees in 1519. He studied at Oxford under Bishop Ridley, to whom he became chaplain in 1552. The reign of Queen Mary he spent in exile at Strasburg and Frankfort. On his return to England he became Master of Pembroke College, and soon after Bishop of London. He showed himself a warm partisan of the Reformation, but was anxious to bring peace to the Church. Nicholas Gallais, a French writer, in a letter to Grindal, speaks of him as working against the Anabaptists, and states that he "kept the rash and innovating within bounds, repressed the insolent and refractory, humbled the proud, protected the innocent, appeased quarrels and disputes, and made himself a veritable Irenaeus and peace-maker." Grindal was preferred to the archbishopric of York, and in 1575 succeeded Parker at Canterbury. He found the diocese in a very unsatisfactory state. A good account of it may be found in the notes of a visitation held a year and a half before Grindal's translation to the primacy. Parker says that about sixty parishes had little or no religious teaching. Grindal accordingly exerted himself to encourage the revival of preaching, and to restore to the Church a learned and faithful ministry. Queen Elizabeth ordered him to stop the meetings for "prophesying." He refused, and was suspended. She even contemplated his deposition. He died in 1583. His writings, which are unimportant, are published by the Parker Society.

Grossetête, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln, was born at Stratbroke, in Suffolk, in 1175, and educated at Oxford and Paris. He surpassed all his contemporaries as a scholar. From the time of his elevation to the bishopric of Lincoln in 1233, he set himself to reform the abuses of the Church, and in this work displayed a fearless love of justice without respect of persons. He began by visiting the religious houses, and insisting that they should provide fit clergy to labour in the parishes whence they drew their tithes. He had, at one time, been a loyal supporter of Papal authority against the King, and several times prevented Henry III. from giving bishoprics to unfit persons; but at last the conduct of Innocent IV., in filling the best benefices in England with Italians who did not even come into the country, but contented themselves with drawing the revenues, opened his eyes as to the unworthy yoke to which he had hitherto submitted. He had gone to Rome to try to get a greater control exercised over the monasteries, which were exempted from the jurisdiction of their bishops, and while there saw how the worldliness of the Papal See hindered the Church reform for which he was labouring, and in 1250, at a Council held at Lyons, he caused a sermon to be read before the Pope and Cardinals, charging them as the authors of the abuses of the Church. In 1253 Innocent commanded Grossetête to appoint his nephew, Frederick de Lavagna, to the first canonry that should be vacant at Lincoln; this the Bishop refused to do, and the Pope, in a fury, threatened him with excommunication. Some say that this threat was carried out, but that Grossetête did not trouble himself about it, and quietly continued his episcopal functions; others aver that his having died under a sentence of excommunication rests on very doubtful authority. He died in 1253, aged seventy-eight, and was venerated by the nation as a saint. Pilgrimages were made to his tomb in Lincoln Cathedral, but he was never canonised, though Edward I. requested that he might be.

Grotius, Hugo, commonly called De Groote, was a native of Delft, in Holland [b. 1583, d. 1645]. He came of a good family, and from his earliest youth displayed a remarkable capacity for learning; at the age of eleven he entered the University of Leyden, and took his degree while only in his fifteenth year. In 1598 he accompanied the celebrated Remonstrant Barneveldt on an embassy to Paris, where he was received with much favour by Henry IV. He began even at this early age to publish some valuable works. He remained in France one year, and on his return to Holland was called to the bar. In 1607 he was made Advocate-General for the Treasury of Holland, and in 1613 Council-Pensionary of Rotterdam. In 1615 he was sent to England to negotiate about the whale fisheries of Greenland, from which the English wanted to exclude the Dutch. King James received him very well. Soon after this he became very intimate with Olden Barneveldt, whom he supported both with his writings and his favour; the disputes between the Remonstrants and Gomarists were at their height in Holland, and Grotius became involved in the misfortunes of his friend. In 1619 he was doomed to perpetual imprisonment in the castle of Loevestein; his wife Mary Reggersburg, shared his captivity, and by a stratagem she contrived his escape; she persuaded her husband to get into a large chest which was used for the conveyance of books and linen for his use in the castle, and thus he passed the guards, and made his way through the Spanish Netherlands into France, where he was kindly received by Louis XIII. Prince Frederic of Orange invited him to return to Holland in 1631, but he had been there but little while before his enemies contrived that he should be banished. In 1632 he went to Hamburg, where he remained till 1635, and was then appointed by the Chancellor Oxenstern, Councillor to Queen Christine of Sweden, and her Ambassador to France. The post he held till 1645, in spite of many difficulties with Richelieu and Mazarin; he then went to Stockholm, but the climate did not agree with him, and he tendered his resignation of office to the Queen. On his way towards Lübeck, he was seized with illness, and died at Rostock, Aug. 28th, 1645. Grotius was, without doubt, one of the greatest men of his time. His works are very numerous, treating of divinity, jurisprudence, history, literature, and poetry. Amongst them are: Veritate Religionis Christiana; de Satisfactione Christi, written to prove that the Remonstrants were not Socinians; Annales et Histori de Rebus Belgicis; many poems in Dutch, Latin, and Greek. His most celebrated work, however, is de Jure Belli et Pacis which has been translated into all the European languages, and may be considered the basis of international law.

Gudule, Sr., daughter of Theodric, Dal of Lorraine, died 712. Her life was severe, ascetic, and she was canonised on account the alleged miracles wrought at her tomb. She is regarded as the patron saint of Brussels, and the beautiful cathedral there is dedicated to her.

Guelphs and Ghibellines.—The names of the two great parties in the famous faction which distracted the "Holy Roman Empire" in the Middle Ages. There was a constant conflict going on from the eleventh to the fourteenth centuries between the Emperors of Germany and the Popes. To the Roman Catholic this is the struggle of the Church against the World, whilst to the opposite party it is the struggle of liberty against spiritual tyranny. The Ghibellines were the supporters of the Imperial authority in Italy, the Guelphs the adherents of the Papal power. The Ghibellines represented the great house of Hohenstaufen, and their name is supposed to be an Italian corruption of Weiblings, so called from their castle of Weibling on the Ems. The Guelphs derived their name from the Pope's ally, the Duke of Bavaria. The assumption of these party names is said to have been at the great battle of Weinsberg, in Saxia, fought in 1140, when the battle-cry on either side was "Hier Guelfe," and "Hier hibellines." [HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE.]

Guido of Arezzo.—A Benedictine monk, celebrated for the improved methods which he introduced of teaching church music. He wrote two books on this subject about the year 1028, and is said to have named the six notes of the gamut from the hymn—

UT queant laxis, RE-loneare fibia, MI-ra gestorum, FA-muit tuorum, SOL-ve polluti, LA-bii realum.

Guides [A.-S. gildan, "to pay"] were originally associations in towns intended to promote the common weal, and resembling "Friendly Societies." They were real germs of municipal corporations. En arose religious guilds, of which there were several in the Middle Ages for the performance of works of mercy, and carrying on religious services. The revenues of these guilds were seized by Henry VIII. at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries. A revival of religious guilds in our own time was one of the results of the High Church movement. The first was established in 1851, Guild of St. Alban of Birmingham, which assisted entirely of communicants of the Church of England, and may be regarded as type of such institutions. The official report says of it:—

The Objects of the Guild are—[1] To assist clergy in maintaining the Catholic faith, [2] to spread a knowledge of the true origins of the Church, especially those being reference to the Holy Trinity, the Institution and Atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the graces conferred in and by the Sacraments. [3] To oppose latitudinarianism, rationalism, and infidelity. [4] To support the independence in spiritual matters of the Church of England, and all Churches in communion with her. [5] To revive and maintain a religious observance of all the Offices of the Church, by promoting the public administration of Holy Baptism, Confirmation, frequent Communion, regular attendance at daily prayer, and a proper observance of fasts, festivals, and commemorations. [6] To support the clergy in the promotion of decency, order, and reverence in public worship. [7] To aid in the building, endowment, and decoration of churches, the foundation and maintenance of religious schools, and in other beneficent designs. [8] To encourage the practice of piety, virtue, and charity; to teach the ignorant, assist the weak, succour the distressed, console the afflicted, relieve the poor, visit the sick, and help to bury the dead. [9] To promote unity in the Church.

The honorary works carried on by the different branches and members are chiefly the following: A home for destitute or orphan boys; schools of various kinds, especially night and Sunday classes; clubs, guilds, and institutes for the young; visiting the sick and distressed; choirs, choir-training, and the formation of church-music societies; special services in churches; lay missions; the Christian burial of the dead, burial societies, etc.; the development of the guild life.

The Kalendar of the English Church Union has a list of many of these guilds, e.g., "St. Alphege," for supplying church furniture and vestments to poor churches; "St. Matthew," to remove the existing prejudices of Secularists; "St. Luke," to promote the Catholic Faith among the medical profession; the "Confraternity of the Most Holy Trinity," for mutual encouragement in theological study; "Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament," to bear witness to the doctrine of the Real Presence, etc., etc. There is a "Railway Guild," a "Church and Stage Guild," an "Army Guild," etc., etc. Many belong to special districts. There are fifty-six enumerated in the Kalendar. In 1873 was founded the Church Guilds Union, by which all may gather together in an annual meeting. It may be noticed that nearly all these are lay societies.

Guizot, François Pierre Guillaume, a French statesman and Protestant, was born at Nismes, in 1787. His father was guillotined in 1794, and the widow went to Geneva with her children. François went to Paris in 1805 to study. In 1812 he assisted M. de Montanes, Professor of History, and soon after himself became Professor of Modern History, which post he filled with great distinction. Upon the restoration of Louis XVIII. his political career began, and he became Councillor of State; but on the return of Napoleon resumed his professorship. In 1820, after the assassination of the Duc de Berri, he and the other Royalists were expelled. His lectures at the Sorbonne were crowded, but he was forced to discontinue them, his outspoken opinions giving offence. They were renewed in 1828. In 1830 he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and he did a great deal towards the Revolution of that year, in consequence of which he became Minister of Public Instruction and Minister of the Interior. In the Revolution of 1848 Guizot made his escape, but was allowed to return to France in the next year, and devoted himself to theological and historical studies. He died at Val Richer in 1874. Guizot's early works are all political, but later on he wrote some religious books, all tinged with Calvinism, as The Church and Christian Society, Meditations on the Essence of the Christian Religion. He was the founder of three societies—the Biblical, Primary Protestant Instruction, and Protestant History Societies.

Gundulph, one of the chief earlier English architects, was one of the most distinguished monks of the Abbey of Bec. When Lanfranc was made by William the Conqueror first Abbot of Caen, and then Archbishop of Canterbury, Gundulph accompanied him to both places. In 1077, through his patron's influence, he was made Bishop of Rochester, and shortly afterwards rebuilt his cathedral. [Rochester.] He also built an episcopal residence at Malling, near Maidstone. This residence still exists, and is pronounced by the late Mr. J. H. Parker to be the oldest Norman keep in the world. [When Mr. Parker expressed this opinion, the present writer pointed out to him that in the keep at Falaise is shown the room in which the Conqueror was born. He replied with proofs that that keep could not have been built until after the Conqueror's death.] Other churches in Kent have remains of his work in them, but the most famous is the White Tower, or keep of the Tower of London. Gundulph held the post of Father Confessor to the Queen, and died in 1107.

Gunning, Peter [b. 1613, d. 1684], Bishop, first of Chichester [1669], then of Ely [1674], was the son of Peter Gunning, minister of How, in Kent. He was educated at Cambridge, and soon won a name for industry and learning. When the rebellion broke out against King Charles, he proposed with great vehemence that the University should publish a protestation against the Solemn League, which was afterwards done. Not long after, upon his refusal to subscribe the Covenant, he was turned out of his Fellowship, and when the University fell under the power of the Parliament forces, he removed to Oxford. On the fall of the King, Gunning settled in London and had a constant congregation in the chapel at Exeter House, in the Sirand, having sometimes conferences with Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, Quakers, Independents, etc., in defence of the Church of England. Upon the Restoration he was made Prebendary of Canterbury, and Master of St. John College, Cambridge. He was first Margaree Professor, and soon after Regius Professor of Divinity, and upon the death of Bishop King was promoted to the See of Chichester, and from thence translated to the bishopric of Ely, where he died in 1684. He possessed an almost universal knowledge, was a profound divine, and had a wonderfully retentive memory; he was very charitable to the poor, and by his last will left the remainder of his estate for the Augmentation of poor Vicars.

His works are:—A Contention for the Truth, defence of Infant Baptism; Schism Unmasked or a late conference between Mr. Peter Gunning and Mr. John Pearson on the one part and two disputants of the Roman persuasion on the other (this book was first printed Paris, in 1658, by the Roman Catholics, afterwards twice by the members of the Church of England); The Paeanchal or Last Apostolical and Perpetual, etc.

Gurnall, William [b. 1616, d. 1674] was Rector of Lavenham, Suffolk. He is the author of The Christian in Complete Armour or a Treatise on the Saints' War with the Devil which was first published in 1655.

Gurney, Joseph John, a philanthropic Quaker, was born at Earlham Hall, nr. Norwich, in 1788. He studied privately at Oxford, and in 1818 became a minister of the Society of Friends, in which his preaching became very famous. In the same year accompanied his sister, Mrs. Fry [Fry, Elizabeth], to Scotland and Ireland to visit prisons there. From 1837 to 1840 he spent the United States and Canada, and on return to Europe went to Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, France, and Germany. His object was to improve prison discipline, and endeavoured to induce Louis Philippe to abolish the slave trade in the French colony. He was also prominent as a total abstainer. He died in 1847.

Gurney took a prominent part in founding and organising several societies. He was author of several works, as Notes on Piety Discipline; Observations on the Religious Liviaries of the Society of Friends; A Winter in the West Indies; Essays on the Evidences of Doctrines, and Practical Operations of Christianity; Puseyism traced to its Root. His The Water is Best, is well known among tectateurs.

Gustavus Adolphus. [Thirty Years' War.]
Guthlac, St. Presbyter and hermit of Crowland, was born in 674. His father, Pen-wall, was descended from the Ielings, a race of Mercia, and belonged to the tribe of the Guthlacings, after whom the son was called. He was baptised in infancy. He was very fierce against the Britons, and fought against them at the head of a band of men. After twenty years' warfare he determined to give up military life, and to retire from the world, so went to the monastery of Repton. Here he heard accounts of the early hermits, and was stirred to follow their example. He started in search of a fitting place, and found a swampy, uninhabited island, named Crowland, said to be haunted by devils, which lay to the south of Lincolnshire. Here he lived for some time in solitude, and many stories are told of his struggles with demons. He is represented in mediæval art in the form of a monk wielding a scourge, with a dragon, or evil spirit, at his feet. His fame soon spread, and many people looked to him. Gradually the swamp became cultivated and drained by Guthlac, and his companions Cissa, his successor Beccel, and Egbert his chief friend. Guthlac was ordained priest by Hedda, Bishop of Lichfield. He died after a week's illness, on April 11th, 14. King Ethelbald erected a monastery on the site of the cell and oratory, and dedicated it to St. Bartholomew, Guthlac's patron saint.

Guyon, Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Fôtre, was born in April, 1648, at Montargis, France. Her parents were well-to-do, and pious life. They both had been married before, and each had a family; and one of her half-sisters, a nun in the Ursuline convent at Montargis, was the cause of her being placed in education there. She early formed the solution to give herself to God, and refused to become maid-of-honour to the widowed English Queen, Henrietta Maria. In 1663 her father removed with his family to Paris, and the following year she was married to a gentleman of the court, M. Guyon. Her island was often cold and harsh with her, she turned more and more towards religion, and sought for counsel from a Franciscan who had spent five years in solitude, who said to her, "Accustom yourself to seek God in your art, and you will not fail to find Him." On the day of this speech, July 22nd, 1668, she always dated her conversion. Her increased vour met with little favour from her husband. Her only worldly joy was in her two children, two sons and a daughter, but a youngest boy died of small-pox. About the same time she became acquainted with Francis de la Combe, an eloquent Barnabite friar, whom she inspired with her views, and became the foremost preacher of conventism" [q.v.] as it was called in France. After a few years he was seized by a lettre-buchet, and sent to the Bastille for heresy.

He was afterwards placed in another prison, and a prisoner he remained until his death, twenty-two years after his first arrest. In 1672 another heavy blow fell upon her: her father and little daughter died nearly together. Convinced that it was God's will to perfect her by afflictions, she marked the fourth anniversary of her conversion by drawing up what she called a "marriage covenant with the Saviour!" Soon after came on what she calls a "state of deprivation," i.e. a deprivation of the consolation of religion, which lasted six years. Her husband died in 1676, and she devoted herself to works of love and charity in different parts of France and Italy, being forced to move constantly, in consequence of the persecution of the Bishop of Geneva, whose request that she would go into a convent was refused. In 1686 she returned to Paris, and soon after she was seized, and confined for eight months, when she regained her liberty through an application to Madame de Maint-enon. She carried on a correspondence with Abbé Fénélon [q.v.], who led Bossuet to suspect her, and commissioners were appointed to examine her writings. After the trial she spent a short time in a convent at Meaux. On her return to Paris she was imprisoned at Vincennes. She was removed to the Bastille in 1698, and remained there till 1702, when she was released, but banished to Blois, where she died in 1717.

The poems of Madame Guyon are well known to English readers through the charming translation of Cowper. See a full account of them in the notes to the Globe Edition.

Gymnosophists [Gr. gymnos, "naked;" and sophos, "wise").—Hermit philosophers who lived in lonely places, all but naked. They were originally a Hindoo sect, and are mentioned by Strabo, but found imitators among Christians when monasticism rose. There were many on the Upper Nile, who were much resorted to by persons wanting counsel.

Gyro-vagi, or "circuit-wanderers," was the name given to certain monks in the early Christian Church, who were without piety, and who led a wandering, unprofitable life. St. Benedict mentioned them when drawing up his rule, and describes them as being worse than the Sarabaites [q.v.]. Augustine and Cassianus wrote against them, and several synods of Gaul condemned them, also the synod of Trullo (691), which tried to suppress them by ordering that every monk should spend three years in the same monastery, and that the vagabonds calling themselves hermits—evidently the Gyro-vagi—should be driven into the desert. They seem to have disappeared when the Benedictine rule was generally adopted.
Hacket, John, Bishop of Lichfield. was born in London in 1592. He was educated at Westminster, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was ordained in 1618, and became chaplain to James I., and incumbent of St. Andrew's, Holborn, where he was famed for his preaching. In 1631 he was made Archdeacon of Bedford. At the proposal, during the Civil War, to disestablish the bishops, Hacket was chosen to speak in the House of Commons in favour of the bishops. He gained his point, but shortly after the question was raised again and carried. Hacket was imprisoned for a short time, but at the Restoration became Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry. The Puritans had desecrated and pillaged the cathedral, but Hacket, during the eight years of his episcopacy, had it re-built, spending twenty thousand pounds on it, mostly at his own expense. He was very generous, and among his public donations he left twelve hundred pounds to Trinity College, and his books, worth fifteen hundred pounds, to the library. He was a great philologer and divine, and possessed a wonderful memory. He is the author of a Life of Archbishop Williams, and of several sermons. He died in 1670, in his seventy-eighth year.

Haddan, Arthur West, B.D. [b. 1816, d. 1873], a learned and industrious writer of the Church of England. After a distinguished career at Trinity College, Oxford, he took an active part in the Oxford movement, being an intimate friend of Isaac Williams. In the Convocation House he was a keen and indefatigable worker, and preceded Canon Liddon as Bampton Lecturer. His chief work was wrought in connection with the Bishop of Chester, Dr. Stubbs, viz. Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland. He edited the works of Archbishop Bramhall, and of Thorndike, for the Anglo-Catholic Library, and wrote, in the Replies to Essays and Reviews, on the religious aspect of England in the eighteenth century—perhaps the only article in the volume of permanent value. He also wrote several articles in Smith's religious dictionaries. The last sixteen years of his life were spent as rector of Barton-on-the-Heath, in Warwickshire, where he died.

Hades. [Hell.]

Hadrian, Persecution of.—The Emperor Hadrian reigned from A.D. 117–138. He seems to have had no special feeling against the Christians, considering Jews, Samaritans, and Christians alike as mountebanks and impostors, only worthy of contempt. But his great attachment to pagan superstitions indirectly encouraged the popular hatred, and persecution was rife in his reign. The sufferings of the Christians stirred them up to make some representations to the Emperor and during a visit to Athens in the sixth year of his reign he was presented with two apologies, one written by Quadratus, Bishop of Athens, and the other by Aristides, whom before his conversion, had been an Athenian philosopher. The apologies probably influenced Hadrian's reply to a letter from the proconsul of Asia, Serenus Granianus, which drew his attention to the unreasonableness of putting Christians to death for a mere name-unnamed, connected with any crime, in order to satisfy the prejudice of the people. The Emperor addressed a rescript to the successors of Granianus, Minucius Fundanus, instructing him [1] that Christians were to be granted a fair and open trial, in which they might answer their accusers; [2] that they were not to be punished only for actual breach of laws; [3] that the authors of calumnious charges against them were themselves to be punished, as they deserved.

It has been said that Hadrian came to look upon Christianity so favourably, that he tended to have enrolled Christ amongst his gods, and to this end ordered temples with images to be built in all cities. The temple, however, were probably intended for the worship of himself, and the other part of his story has no foundation in fact; but the fact of its currency shows that Hadrian was regarded as an active persecutor.

Hæresimachæ. [Gr. θηρεσία, "a heresy and machoai, "I fight"]:—Those who wrote controverted works against heresies. Of the earlier of these writings among Christians, directed chiefly against Marcion, Basileides, and the Montanists, little remains. The first complete treatise was against Gnostics, written by Irenæus.

Hæretico Comburendo, De.—An act passed in the reign of Henry IV. against Lollards, by which bishops were allowed to arrest and imprison all preachers of heresy, owners of heretical books; and a refusal to swear, or a relapse after abjuration, enabled them to hand over the heretic to the secular power, to be committed to the flames with waiting for the consent of the Crown. The first victim was a Lollard named William Sawtre, a Norfolk clergyman; and a lawyer named Badric, also suffered for denying the substantialization. In Queen Elizabeth's reign, two Anabaptists, and in James I.'s reign, Arians, suffered under this statute; it was repealed in the time of Charles II.

Hagenbach, Karl Rudolf, a German theologian. was born at Basle, in 1801, studied at the universities of Bonn and Bonn, where he became acquainted with Schlachter, whose theological opinions he adopted. On his return to Basle in 1823 he met Wette, who also influenced him, and to whom owed a professorship there, which he held for fifty-one years. In later life he gradually parted from Schleiermacher's views. He presented a school in theology occupying an intermediate line between supernaturalists and rationalists. He gained a wide influence as a preacher. He wrote many historical works, among them Histories of the Reformation, of the Ancient Church, of the Middle Ages. These were reconstructed into a History of the Church from the earliest time to the nineteenth century.

Hagiographa [from two Greek words meaning "holy" and "writings"].—It was ed by the Jews for that division of the Old Testament which contained the Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Ezra, the Song of Solomon, Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, the Books of Chronicles, Lamentations, Ezra, and Nehemiah. These writings were also called Ketubim.

Hagioscope.—An oblique opening merely made in the wall of a church to allow persons to see the altar, who, from their position in the transepts or aisles, could otherwise do so. They are mostly found in the side of the chancel arch. By some it have been supposed to be made for the use of the sacristan, that he might be able to bless the sanctorus bell at the moment of the veneration of the Host. A popular name for such openings is Squint.

Haldane, James Alexander [b. 1761, d. 1811], a noted Scotchman, studied at the High School and University of Edinburgh, in his elder brother Robert. He entered navy, but adopting strong religious views, went to Scotland and began preaching, worked at Edinburgh for nearly fifty years. In 1808 he declared himself to be a minister.

Haldane, Robert [b. 1764, d. 1842], brother of the above, was also a deeply pious man. Having a large property, he devoted it to philanthropic plans: among others, to building a large chapel, Tabernacle, at Edinburgh, where James had. Robert went to Switzerland, where he lectured to the theological students. There, with the help of others, he adopted Evangelical views. He returned to Scotland and died at Edinburgh. The name is the author of several works: Theistle to the Romans; Evidence and Author of Revelation; The Inspiration of Scripture, etc.

Hale, Sir Matthew [b. 1609, d. 1676], a Chief Justice of England in the reign of Charles II. He was intended for the bar, and sent to Oxford as a commoner. He studied at Magdalen Hall in 1626, where he remained two years, laying a foundation for his great learning and knowledge. But having occasion to visit London to see Sergeant Glanvil, an obviated lawyer, about his patrimonial estate, he was induced by him to turn his attention to law, and accordingly, in 1629, he was admitted a student in Lincoln's Inn, and in course of time was called to the bar. He had gained considerable reputation by the time the Long Parliament began its sittings, but cautiously refrained from attaching himself to either party: when, however, the Parliament gained the day, Hale signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and sat in the Assembly of Divines. In 1653 he was by writ made serjeant-at-law, and soon after one of the justices of the Common Pleas, in which position he acted with great justice and integrity, though not always to the satisfaction of the Protector. On the Restoration he was made Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer and knighted; and in 1671 Lord Chief Justice of England, which post he held till his death. Besides his knowledge of the law, he was esteemed a great divine and a profound philosopher. During his career as a judge he leaned to the side of the Puritans, and lived an austere life. Richard Baxter and Stillingsfleet were among his friends. John Bunyan was summoned before him for frequenting conventicles. He firmly believed in witchcraft. His works are Contemplations, Moral and Divine, and other religious books. He also wrote some valuable legal books, still of great use; the MSS. he bequeathed to Lincoln's Inn, in whose library they are still preserved.

Hales, Alexander of. [School Men.]

Half-way Covenant.—The name given to a compromise in the Congregationalist body in America in the seventeenth century, after a controversy on terms of membership. The early Congregationalists recognised baptism as the first condition only of membership, and held that as each person came to years of discretion, proof should be given of repentance from sin and faith in Christ. But as membership involved a large measure of civil rights and political privileges, there were those who called for relaxation as to such qualifications. In the disputes to which this demand gave rise two councils were held at Boston. At the first the stricter rule was agreed upon, but at the second it was relaxed thus far, that all baptised persons were to be looked on as members of the Church, and to be admitted to all privileges of membership except Holy Communion, provided they were not openly of bad life. This was the compromise known as the Half-way Covenant. But there were those who regarded this compromise as opening the way to licence in thought and deed, and Congregationalist writers attribute to it largely the undeniable fact that many of the Congregationalists of Eastern Massachusetts became Unitarians. The preaching of Whitfield was largely instrumental in kindling a warmer enthusiasm, and in consequence of it the Half-way
Hal

Covenant was in course of time tacitly abandoned.

Hall, Joseph [b. 1574; Bishop of Exeter 1627, and of Norwich 1640; d. 1656], was the son of a brave soldier, the Governor of Ashby-de-la Zouch, and of a very devout mother—

one who never failed to retire daily to her chamber for prayer and meditation, and whose good words and deeds sank deeply into the heart of her son. Under her influence he seems to have had an uncommon belief in God's interference in the events of human life. When he was about fifteen years old he was most anxious to go to Cambridge, but his father having a very large family, could not see how to send him there, and he was just about to sign a bond which would have certainly deprived the youth of all university advantages, and might possibly have robbed the Church of one of her brightest ornaments, when, in the nick of time, a brother, who had returned from a journey by Cambridge, brought home such glowing accounts of the University, that Mr. Hall yielded to Joseph's strong desire, and sent him to Emmanuel. That college was strict, well-ordered, and austere, and there Joseph prospered and became a scholar. He was useful to his college and to the University in divers ways; but all throughout he sighed for another sphere—a country parish. He felt that pastoral care was the occupation most worthy of his powers, and a call to it seemed to come from God. The well-endowed Grammar School at Tiverton needed a master, and the head of Emmanuel urged Hall to accept the post. Hall consented so far as to go and see the Lord Chief Justice, who had the appointment. The Chief Justice had seen Hall and had appointed him to the school, when, as he was in the street, someone plucked him by the sleeve; turning round, he saw a man with a letter in his hand; he broke the seal, and found inside the offer of the living of Halstead, near Bury St. Edmunds. Hall thereupon resigned the school and accepted the living. At Halstead he spent some happy years. The old parsonage being ruinous, he repaired it, and when it was repaired its "uncouth solitariness" seemed unbearable. On Whitsun Monday there had been a wedding, and Hall and a clerical neighbour were repairing from the church to the house where the marriage-feast was spread; at the door of that house stood "a comely, modest gentlewoman," and Hall asked his friend who she was. "She is one," replied he, "whom I have bespoken for your wife." When Hall wished for further information, he was told how well she was endowed with all good qualities, and how Hall's fitness as a husband had been pointed out to her parents. The end of the courtship thus strangely begun was another wedding, and the young woman became, as he says, "his meet help, whose comfortable society he enjoyed for forty-eight years." During his abode at Halstead he went abroad, where he carefully examined the Roman system in its unchecked luxuriance. He came home more than ever satisfied with the Church of England. He also noticed the great dangers which environed young and thoughtless Englishmen in their travels; guard against which he wrote his tract Quod Vadis? An important event in Hal's life was his being called to preach, and considering (though much against his will), before Prince Henry, the eldest son of James I. The prince liked Hall's sermon so much that he wished to hear him a second time. His favourable impressions were confirmed, as he made Hall one of his chaplains, procuring for him also a small canony in the College Church of Wolverhampton. The proceeds of this, however, Hall resigned soon after one who took the spiritual oversight of a much neglected place. The living of Waltham being offered to Hall, he joyfully accepted it. He speaks with great satisfaction of its ample revenues (it was £100 a year with some other accommodations). At Halstead and Waltham he preached sermons on the sacred stories, which were afterwards condensed into the famous Contemplation body of excellent reflections on the life of Christ, narrated in the Old and New Testaments. He says he was engaged on work twenty years, and it remains an during monument of his piety and abilities. King James selected him as one of the eleven English divines to attend the Synod of Dort [q.v.], but, feeling useless, he retired from the assembly, not, however, before he earned the regard of the phlegmatic Dutchmen, who gave him a handsome gold medal with a picture of the Synod upon it, which Hall wore afterwards suspended on his breast. King James, on meeting him, made him Dean of Worcester in 1616, two years before the Synod, in 1624 offered him the bishopric of Gloucester. This honour a sense of unworthiness obliged him to decline. Three years after another bishopric, that of Exeter, was tendered to him, and this time he yielded to pressure. Hall seems to have been suspected by Laud and the High Churchmen of Episcopacy. He complained of being watched, cat-like eyes wherever he went, and his piety and good sense prevented good from being evil spoken of, and he was on his way toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing, nineteen years, during which was gradually gathering force, the mighty tempest of the Revolution. Hal was one of the bishops who framed the oath containing the famous Exeter oath, the sight of his faithfulness to the Court so impressed those who knew him that when many discontented people's petitions to Parliament against epi government, eight thousand persons in fall’s diocese signed in its favour; and then Hall left Exeter (being translated to Norwich in the tempestuous year of the Long Parliament), he left behind him many who paid truly thank God that a bishop indeed had been among them. Being in London at year [1640], and doing his duty as a lawyer in the House of Lords, he and several other bishops were in peril of death, violent mob surrounded the building, and owed they would murder the bishops. Hall and his brethren contrived to save their lives, it were imprisoned on the charge of high treason. Their treason consisted in a protest ado by them against the legality of measures passing the Houses, as long as they, the shops, were forcibly prevented from pursuing their legislative duties. This protest as regarded at first as treason, but afterwards it assumed the less serious name of sedition. Hall was detained in prison until the spring of 1641, when, the bishops being liberated, he was allowed to go to Norwich, and take such scanty oversight of new See as the times allowed. But the ys did not favour bishops, and Hall was object to insults, violence, and wrong. He was besieged by a mob in his palace, his houses were alienated, his books and furniure sold, and rescued only by the kind rethought of some generous persons. The shop has left a very sad account, written his own peculiar style, of the havoc made Norwich Cathedral by the madness of the people, and of the “hard measure” dealt out himself. He was now approaching his centenial year, and was thankful to obtain portion of his revenues, however moderate, any home, however humble. He found place of refuge at Higham, a hamlet near Norwich, and here he spent the close of his life, not idly, but in prayer, study, writing, and in the composition of those spiritual and devout works, which re in to comfort the afflicted. His wife, the faithful partner of his joys and sorrows during ty-eight years, died in 1652, and two sons went before him to the grave. At length, he entered his rest, after having passed through changes such as few men are destined experience.

Hal, Robert, a celebrated English Baptist minister, was born at Arnside, near Lancaster, in 1764. He was the son of a Baptist minister, the author of Zion’s Travels. He early showed a great love of reading and study. At the age of fifteen he left to the Baptist seminary at Bristol, and 1781 entered King’s College, Aberdeen, where he became acquainted with Mackinnon, whose friendship was of great service to him. He remained at Aberdeen four years, after which he became assistant pastor to Mr. Evans, and classical tutor at the seminary. After five years he had a misunderstanding with his colleague and removed to Cambridge, where he was minister for fifteen years. He had early shown himself to be an orator, though he at first failed through nervousness. He was a fluent, rapid, and impressive speaker, and was liberal but not rationalistic in his religious views. But the chief attraction of his preaching was the evident earnestness and fulness of thought which his sermons showed, and which made a great impression on his audience. In 1804 he was visited by an attack of insanity, which made it necessary for him to give up his post at Cambridge; but in 1807 he went to Leicester, where he remained till 1826, when he returned to his former post at Bristol, and died there in 1831.

Hall suffered the most excruciating physical agony during the greater part of many years; and the manner in which, notwithstanding this, he performed his work and preserved a cheerful temperament, has always been considered one of the most striking examples of Christian submission, courage, and fortitude. He published many of his sermons and other works, as an Apology for the Freedom of the Press; tracts on Terms of Communion, Modern Infidelity, The Essential Difference between Christian Baptism and the Baptism of St. John, etc. His sermons contain some of the very finest passages in English oratory.

Hallel [signifying “Praise”].—Psalms sung at the great Jewish feasts; they all begin with praise. The Greater Hallel is Psalm cxxxi., and the Lesser Hallel the Psalms consecutive from cxlii. to cvii. It was part of this song of praise which our Lord and His disciples sang at the Mount of Olives.

Hallelujah [i.e. “Praise the Lord”].—A Hebrew expression frequently used in the Psalms and Jewish hymns, from whence it came into the Christian Church. It is still sung at funerals in the Greek Church, but the Western leaves it out in the Burial Service, as not being agreeable to so melancholy an occasion. For this reason Pope Alexander II. ordered it to be omitted from Septuagint to Easter Eve. When it is omitted in the service of the Church of Rome, it is called “Hallelujah Clausum,” i.e. closed; and where the antiphon or responses have Hallelujah at the end, “In aeternum” is pronounced instead of it. By a decree of a Council of Toledo it was not sung upon the 1st day of January, because then the Church used to fast and read the Litany, in contrast to the heathen, whose custom it was to indulge themselves in luxury and diversion upon that day; and for this reason also it was not repeated by the Greeks in the Bacchanalian Week. The reason why all Churches, notwithstanding the diversity of their language and offices, have always retained this Hebrew word “hallelujah,” is thus stated by Bede: “That by such a conformity of devotion, every Church may be put in mind to persist in an agreement with the rest of Christendom, both in respect to faith and charity, and press forward to the Church Triumphant, when the language for devotion will be the same."

Halley, Robert [1796–1876], an eminent Congregationalist minister, first at Huntingdon [1822], and afterwards at Manchester [1839], finally Principal of New College, London, and Professor of Theology [1857]. He retired from it in 1872. He was author of some learned Congregational lectures, and of a History of Puritanism in Lancashire.

Halloween.—Eve of All Saints' Day.

Hamel, John Baptist [1624–1706].—A distinguished French writer, the son of an advocate of Vire, in Normandy. At the age of twenty-nine he became curé of Neulliy. His earlier writings were mathematical treatises of great depth, and he also wrote with great weight on some metaphysical questions, and his books were much valued by the missionaries to China and Japan, as means by which to enable the learned heathens of those countries to understand the principles of Christian Europe. In 1691 he printed a course of divinity in 7 vols., entitled Theologia Speculatrix et Practica juxta S.S. Patrum Dogmata Pertractata, et ad Usum Scholae accommodata. Being desired to abridge this work, he published an epistle entitled Theologica Clericorum Seminaris accommodata summarium. It is in 5 vols. In 1698 he published a learned book on divinity, Institutiones Biblicae, seu Scripturae Sacrae Prolegomena, una cum selectis Annotationibus in Penteuchum. In 1701 he published the Psalms; in 1703 the Proverbs of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, and the Book of Wisdom, with notes; and in 1705 he published the whole Bible, with annotations upon all the passages which seemed to require them. All this while he had not forgotten his old scientific pursuits, and wrote a considerable portion of the history of the French Academy, of which he had been secretary. He died peaceably in 1706. Old age had compelled him to resign his cure at Neulliy, but he went every year to see his old parishioners, who kept the day of his coming as a festival.

Hamilton, James [b. 1814, d. 1867], was an eminent Presbyterian preacher and writer. He was born and educated in Scotland, and in 1841 came to London as minister of the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square. His chief books are:—Life in Earnest, The Mount of Olives, The Royal Preacher, The Lamp and the Lantern, and The Prodigal Son.

Hamilton, Patrick, one of the most prominent precursors of the Scottish Reformation, was born in 1504, the son of Sir Patrick Hamilton and of Catharine Stewart, daughter of Alexander, Duke of Albany, second son of James II. He was carefully educated, and in 1518 was made abbot of Forne, in Ross-shire, in order to obtain sufficient means to gain knowledge abroad. He went to Paris, where he took his degree of M.A. in 1520, and went on to Louvain, where he became acquainted with and adopted the views of Erasmus. He removed to Basle in 1521, and shortly after returned home. In 1523 he settled at St. Andrews, bringing with him his new notions and tastes. He pursued his theological studies, and came gradually to agree with Luther more than with Erasmus. In 1526 some copies of Tyndall's translation of the New Testament were brought into Scotland, and Hamilton at once recommended his scholars to read it. John Beaton, the Primate, heard of it, and finding that Hamilton was "infamed with being disputing, holding and maintaining divers heresies of Martin Luther and his followers," desired him to be formally summoned and put to trial. Hamilton, at the advice of his friends, fled to Germany. He had intended to visit Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg, but the plague was raging there, so he went to Marburg University, where he discoursed with Tyndall and Lambert. They wished him to remain there; but he refused and returned to Scotland in the autumn 1527, having been absent six months. He remained for some time in retirement at the family mansion of Kincal, near Linlithgow, where he openly preached the Gospel, but in January, 1528, Beaton summoned him to St. Andrews to a conference. He disputed with Alexander Alone or Alesso and with Alexander Campbell, who feigned a conciliatory spirit; but after a month's mask was thrown aside, and he was summoned before the Archbishop on a charge of heresy. The trial took place on the last day of February, the result being that he was condemned for divers heresies and detestable opinions, and delivered over to the secular power to be punished. The chief charge against him was that he had stated "a man is not justified by works but by faith that it is not lawful to worship images nor pray to the saints, and that it is lawful to men that have souls to read the Word God." He was burnt in front of the gate of St. Salvador's College on the day of his trial, Feb. 29th, 1528. His death probably did much to extend the Reformation in Scotland though his life could have done more. The "reel Mr. Patrick Hamilton," said one of Beaton's own retainers, "has infected as many as it blow upon."

Hamilton, Sir William [b. 1788, 1856], the most eminent philosopher of Scotland, was the son of a professor in the University of Glasgow, and was there educated until he went as a Snell exhibitioner to Balliol College, Oxford. Here he amply fulfilled the high hopes which his friends had formed of him, and went out in first-class honours in 1812. Next year he became a member of the Scottish bar, but seems to have had little practice. In 1821 he was appointed to the professorship of Modern History in the University of Edinburgh, and having but little work arising out of that post, he gave himself diligently to his studies and speculations. It was not, however, until 1829 that he was induced to publish any results of these. On the pressing invitation of the editor of the Edinburgh Review, he wrote a critique on Cousin's Cours de Philosophie, published the previous year, in which that writer had developed his theory of the Infinite. The review made Hamilton well known, not only in England, but on the Continent, and from that time he became a regular contributor to the Edinburgh. In 1836 he found his right place, being elected to the professorship of Logic and Metaphysics in his university. His lectures from this chair were taken down in shorthand, at least the later ones, by admiring students, and were published after his death, under the editorship of Professors Mansel and Veitch, in 4 vols. His reputation was now at its height, and his influence upon those who sat at his feet was unbounded. In 1843 his health began to fail, and this hindered him in the work in which he was engaged, of preparing his writings for the press. Consequently death found this task uncompleted. His position in the history of philosophy is still a matter of keen controversy. The late Dean Mansel, one of his editors, in his famous Hampton Lectures of 1858, brought into great prominence Hamilton's doctrine concerning the limitation of positive thought. This thought, he contended, lay between the contradictory poles of the infinite and the absolute, and was therefore in a conditioned sphere, beyond which the mind is not capable of moving. He repudiated all the German pursuers of the absolute, treated with contempt Coleridge's doctrine of the reason, and recommended Nescience as the starting point of philosophy. The philosopher has a legitimate sphere, he said, in examining what are the limits of the human intellect, but the infinite prohibits all further advances. Unhappily, most of the vast questions arising out of this problem are only hinted at by him, and only a fragment was produced of the great treatise which he had planned. But it has been said that he leaves no room for any ethical conception of the Infinite Being. The nescience for which Sir William Hamilton contended, was the nescience which the opponents of Socrates contended for when they accused him of bringing in new gods, because he said that there is a Divine teacher who speaks to the souls of men. When he declared that if the gods did wrong and encouraged wrong they were no true gods, he was contending for fellowship with the Absolute, and striving to get beyond the "Conditions" of the understanding, into the domains of a Reason which is higher than it. The Aristotelians of the Middle Ages further declared that nothing can be known of God but what is revealed by an infallible authority. Hume and Voltaire, accepting that doctrine, had rejected the authority; and had logically, therefore, pronounced themselves atheists. And there are many who, professing to accept Hamilton's theory of the unconditioned, declare that any knowledge of God is hopeless, and on that ground rest their doctrine of Agnosticism. [AGNOSTIC: GOD.] We have here the greatest question of our times, and the controversy is ever now being earnestly pursued.

Hammond, Henry, D.D. [b. 1605, d. 1660], was born at Chertsey, educated at Eton, from whence he went to Oxford, where he became Fellow of Magdalen College, Canon of Christ Church, and Orator of the university. His father was Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, and physician to Prince Henry, the elder son of James I., who showed his regard to the father by becoming sponsor to the son and giving him his own name. On first going to Eton the sweetness of his disposition, and his love of retirement for prayer and meditation, caused Mr. Bush, the Provost of Eton, to augur that the boy would prove stupid; but his fears were unfounded, as at the age of thirteen he was pronounced fit for the university. It is probable that while at Oxford his friendship with Jeremy Taylor and Sanderson commenced. He was ordained in 1629, and in 1633 was appointed by the President of Magdalen, Dr. Frewen (afterwards Archbishop of York), to supply his place as King's Chaplain and preacher before the Court. The Earl of Leicester, who was one of his auditors, was so struck with his powers that he offered him the living of Penshurst, in Kent, which was then vacant; here he became an active parish priest, visiting the poor, and having a daily public worship. He sometimes left his retirement, at the request of the Bishop of London, to preach at Paul's Cross. He was summoned to the memorable convocation which met before the Long Parliament, and he was also nominated by the Parliament a member of the Assembly of Divines; but his loyalty and orthodoxy forbade him to appear. In 1643 he was appointed by Brian, Bishop of Chichester, to the archdeaconry of Chichester. But the rebellion was now begun in earnest, and reached quiet Penshurst, driving away its rector. He was on the way with a friend to take refuge in Winchester garrison, when the news was brought him of the death of the President of Magdalen College, and his own appointment to the post. He therefore returned to Oxford. While here he published anonymously, in 1644, his first work, The Practical Catechism, and also treatises on Conscience, Scandal, Willworship, and Superstition. In December, 1644, he went as chaplain to the Duke of Bedford and Earl of Southampton, who were sent by the King from Oxford with a message of peace to the Parliament; but nothing was done beyond appointing a meeting between the commissioners of the King and the Parliament, which took place at Uxbridge in the following February, and where Hammond took a leading part in the discussion. Meanwhile, a canonry at Christ Church falling vacant, the King gave it to Hammond, and he was soon after chosen Public Orator of the university. In 1645 he wrote A View of the New Directory; and a Vindication of the Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England. [DIRECTORY.] Soon after he wrote his Treatise of the Power of the Keys, or of Bunding and Loosing. He was permitted, with other chaplains, to attend King Charles during part of his imprisonment; but this was disallowed after 1647. Hammond returned to Oxford just as Dr. Fell, the Dean of Christ Church, had been imprisoned and deprived for defending the university, and as sub-dean the duties fell on him; but he stoutly refused to affix to the doors of the schools the order for the expulsion of Dr. Fell. News of this being sent to London, orders for his own expulsion from his canonry and oratorship quickly followed, and on March 30th, 1648, the Vigil of Easter Day, an armed guard marched into the hall of Christ Church and seized Dr. Hammond. He was kept a prisoner for nearly three months. During this restraint he formed the design of preparing his Annotations on the New Testament. When he regained his liberty he took up his abode with Sir John Pakington at Westwood, in Warwickshire, fulfilling the office of tutor to his children.

On the Restoration, in 1660, Hammond was designated to succeed Prideaux in the bishopric of Worcester, but he was seized with severe illness, and died at Westwood soon after Easter, 1660. His writings are some of the most valuable in our theology for their learning and their vigour of thought. One of his biographers, in speaking of the service he rendered to the Church of England, says: "He adhered to her when her condition was most deplorable, defended her doctrine and discipline by his learned and judicious pen, and adorned them by a conversation strictly virtuous and pious."

Hamden, Renn Dickson, Bishop of Hereford [b. at Barbadoes, 1793; d. in London, 1868].—He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, of which he became a Fellow; he took Orders, and in 1828 became Tutor of Oriel, and in 1833 Principal of St. Mary's Hall. In that year the Tracts for the Times began, and Hamden was one of the leaders on the other side, in what Dr. Newman calls "the attack upon the university." He wrote Observations on Religious Dissent, with particular Reference to the Use of Religious Tests in the University, maintaining that religion was distinct from theological opinion; that under theological opinion are to be placed the Trinitarian doctrine and the Unitarian; and that the Church of England is not dogmatic in spirit. Dr. Newman tells us that he wrote to him that such principles, in his opinion, tend to make shipwreck of Christian faith; and that Dr. Hampden had taken the first step towards interrupting that peace and good understanding which had prevailed so long in the university. Hampden, therefore, was regarded by the rising party at Oxford with feelings of aversion; and when he published his Hampton Lectures the same year, on The Scholastic Philosophy Considered in its Relation to Christian Theology, the cry was raised against him of Ariasism. When the Whig Government in 1836 appointed him Regius Professor of Divinity, a fierce outcry was made, and a censure of his book in Convocation was procured; but the objectors could not overthrow the appointment, and Arnold wrote in the Edinburgh Review a powerful article in his favour, entitled The Oxford Malignants. At the end of 1847 Lord John Russell nominated him to the bishopric of Hereford. Then the clamour was renewed. Thirteen bishops, including the Evangelical Sumner, of Winchester, signed a remonstrance; a swarm of pamphlets came out on both sides, legal objections were taken and tried in the courts, but the bishop was consecrated in 1848. From that time little more was heard of him, but the general opinion is that Hampden, though his style was confused and awkward, was not open to the charge of heresy.

Hampton Court Conference.—A meeting held early in the reign of James I. at this palace "for the determining of things held to be amiss in the Church." It took place on the 14th, 16th, and 18th of January, 1604, and was presided over by the King in person. Archbishop Whitgift, eight bishops, and other dignitaries, represented the Episcopalian side; while the Puritan advocates were Dr. Rainolds, Dr. Sparkes, Mr. Knewstubbs, Mr. Chatterton, and Mr. Patrick Galloway. The origin of this conference was a request on the part of the Puritans for a reformation in the enforcement of certain ceremonies, and this was called the Millenary Petition, because it was signed by nearly one thousand ministers. With regard to the Prayer Book, they asked for these alterations:—"that the cross in baptism, interrogatories ministered to infants, confirmation, as superfluous, may be taken away; baptism not to be ministered by women, and so explained; the cap and surplice not urged; that examination may go before the communion; that it be ministered with a sermon; that divers terms of priests, and absolution, and some other used, with the ring in marriage, and other such like in the book, may be corrected; the longsomeness of service abridged; church songs and music moderated to better edification; that the Lord's Day be not profaned; the rest upon holidays not so strictly urged; that there may be uniformity of doctrine prescribed; no Popish opinion to be any more taught or defended; no ministers charged to teach their people to bow at the name of Jesus; that the canonical Scriptures only be read in the church."

On the first day the Episcopalians alone were admitted to the presence of the King, and the subjects of the general absolution, the confirmation of children, and the private baptism by women were discussed. The two former were allowed, but it was determined that baptism should only be administered by ministers, but that, if occasion so required, it might take place in private houses. Other matters of discussion were the jurisdiction of bishops and the civilisation of Ireland.

On the second day the Puritans were sum- moned to the royal presence, and some of the Episcopalians with them. They put forward three points:—Purity of doctrine; the means to maintain it; the 'bishops' courts; and denounced to many ceremonies of the Common Prayer Book, to subscription to the Articles, and to the reading of the Apocrypha. It was decided that there should be a uniform translation of the Bible; that the Apocrypha might be read, but not as Scripture, and that anything doubtful in the Articles should be removed.

On the third day both parties were called in, with certain civilians, and the royal judgment intimated, which was adverse to the Puritans, who, however, promised obedience now that the King's mind was made known to them. The wearing of the surplice and use of the sign of the cross in baptism were ordered; the words, "remission of sins," were inserted after the words "general absolution." Alterations were made in the lessons in the calendar, and some prayers and thanksgivings for particular occasions were added. The chief alterations made were in the rubrics for the office of private baptism. Confirmation was explained as the laying on of hands upon children baptised and able to render an account of their faith according to the Catechism following, and the portion of the Catechism relating to the Sacrament was added, and is attributed to Overal, the Proctor of Convocation. [Procter on the Common Prayer.]

Haphtaroth.—The name given to a roll used in the Jewish synagogue, consisting of selections from the Prophets.

Harding, Thomas, was born at Beconton, in Devonshire, in 1512, and educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, where he was elected Fellow, and in 1542 chosen Hebrew Professor, through the influence of Henry VIII. In the next reign he became a Protestant, and tutor to Lady Jane Grey, whom he instructed in the Reformed faith; but on Mary's accession he turned Papist, took his Doctor's degree, and was made Treasurer of Salisbury. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, Harding stood true to his faith, was deprived of his office, left England and settled at Louvain, entered the Society of Jesuits, and became a zealous champion of his communion. His great polemical controversy was with Bishop Jewel, and his chief works are answers to the bishop. Harding died in 1572.

Hardouin, John, was born at Quimper, in Brittany, in 1647. He was educated by the Jesuits, at an early age entered that Order, and devoted himself to the study of philology and divinity. Hardouin acquired great notoriety by maintaining that the greater part of the classical and early Christian writings were forged by monks in the thirteenth century; he also rejected as spurious all the remains of ancient art; but the Society of Jesuits at last interfered, and he was obliged to retract his strange opinions. In spite of these extravagances he was undoubtedly a great scholar, and his works are very valuable. Among them are an edition of Pliny, Colloquium, De Minima Hermeneutum, and a Commentary on the New Testament. Hardouin died in 1729.

Hardwick, Charles [b. 1821, d. 1859].—A native of Yorkshire, who "rose from the ranks," and by hard labour secured himself a good education, and graduated at Cambridge in 1842. He was ordained as Fellow, and laboured hard at theological and historical work, was appointed Preacher at Whitehall by Bishop Blomfield in 1851, and two years later Professor of Theology in Birmingham, Divinity Lecturer at King's College, Cambridge, and Christian Advocate, and a few years later Archdeacon of Ely. What promised, however, to be a brilliant career was cut short suddenly by a fall from an Alpine precipice. Among his most important works we find A History of the Articles of Religion, A History of the Christian Church, and Christ and Other Masters. The last he left unfinished.

Hare, Francis, D.D. [d. 1740].—He was born in London, and entered at King's College, Cambridge, in 1688, where he afterwards became Tutor. He was appointed in 1708 to the deanship of Worcester, to that of St. Paul's in 1726, whence he was transferred in the following year to the bishopric of St. Asaph, and in 1731 to Chichester. He earned his chief distinction by his classical and theological criticism, and took an important part in the controversies of the day. Hare published, in 1726, editions of Terence and Theodore, but their sale was ruined by the publication of the same works by Richard Bentley, the second of which appeared just before his own, and has been described as the most careless work that Bentley ever published. Hare expressed his indignation in his Epistolæ Critica. He was much interested in the Anglican Controversy, in which he took part against Hoadly. His other works are Difficulties and Discoveries which attend the Study of the Scriptures in the Way of Private Judgment, and Psalms Liber in Versiculis Metricis divisivs.

Hare, Augustus William [b. 1794, d. at Rome, 1831], grandson of the foregoing, was chiefly noted for his Sermons to a Country Congregation [2 vols.], and for being joint author with his brother Julius of Guesses at Truth. He became a Fellow of New College, Oxford, in 1818, and in 1829 Rector of Alton Barnes, which living he held to the end of his life. A very interesting account of the Hares and their friends will be found in Memorials of a Quiet Life, by A. Hare.

Hare, Julius Charles [b. 1795, d. 1855], one of the most learned and influential divines of this century, was a brother of the foregoing. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, taking his degree in 1816, and becoming a Fellow of his college three years later. In 1832 he succeeded his father as rector of Hurstmonceux, and was appointed Archdeacon of Lewes by Bishop Otter in 1840, and nominated one of her Majesty's chaplains in 1853. Seldom has there been a more original or profound thinker. Even when taking an active part in the questions of the day he appeared to regard events with the calm impartiality of an historian treating of some bygone age, or, rather, of a philosopher considering the policy of a foreign country. In the Church of England he was regarded by many, and was named in a celebrated article on "Church Parties" in the Edinburgh Review, as one of the leaders of the "Broad Church party." It was a title which Hare would have been the first to repudiate. It was always his wish to belong to no party, but to join with all parties in the Church of England in every good work. Amongst his latest labours was a hearty cooperation in promoting the revival of Convocation. In the Lower House he was a frequent speaker, and he was indefatigable, so long as health allowed, in the committees. The tolerant character of his Biography of John Sterling must have been invaluable in appeasing that odium theologicum which many regard as inseparable from an assembly of the clergy. It would be beyond our bounds to attempt an estimate of Archdeacon Hare's merits as a writer, or an analysis of his works; but we cannot pass over in silence his Archdiocesan Charges, so lofty in thought and eloquent in expression, which, it has been truly said, might well have been delivered from the episcopal seat. Collected, they will form a review of the leading events of their day with special reference to the Church of England.

The name of Julius Charles Hare was first distinguished in the literary world as one of the translators, in conjunction with Bishop Thirlwall, of Niebuhr's History of Rome, which was first published in the year 1828. He had previously published, in 1827, the first series of Guesses at Truth, by Two Brothers, a volume of miscellaneous thoughts and reflections, the joint production of himself and his brother. He was also the author of several sermons and charges, and in 1848 edited the Essays and Tales of John Sterling, with a memoir of his life. "It will be very long indeed," said the Guardian newspaper, "before we see a man of greater disinterestedness; of kindlier, more genuine, or more universal charity; or of more active goodness or a more earnest love of truth."

Harmonists or Rappists. [See Harmony Society.]

Harmony of the Gospels.—The four Gospels differ in style, in order of arrangement, and in some degree also in the circumstances narrated. But there is running through them the great unity of spirit, which represents the Saviour as the tender, loving Guide of His disciples, sympathising with their sorrows and with the sorrows of mankind. The Gospels are portraits of the One Person from different points of view, but have so much in common that we recognise the unity. This is the Harmony of the Gospels to which it is evident that all real importance attaches. But it is also natural that Christian writers from early times should have endeavoured to construct a life of Christ in chronological sequence. They have only in part succeeded. Two only of the four Evangelists give the history of our Lord's childhood, and they select different incidents of it. The one gives the visit of the Wise Men and the flight into Egypt, the other the announcement to the shepherds and the presentation in the Temple. The closer the details are studied, the more it seems probable that the materials needed for an absolute chronological order have been purposely withheld. But an approximation has been arrived at, and the course of the Saviour's life year by year can be traced with considerable accuracy. The first attempt which we know of to construct a Harmony was made in the third century by Ammonius, who divided the Gospel into sections for the purpose. The numbers which mark these Ammonian sections are found in the margin of many of the ancient MSS. of the New Testament. In the next century Eusebius, the historian, drew up his "Canons," in which the Ammonian sections are so distributed as to show in a tabular form what portions of the other Evangelists correspond to that Gospel which stands first in order in each section. [See Bishop Wordsworth's Greek Testament, vol. i., pp. 27-35.] Among modern writers the best harmonists are Griesbach, De Wette, Rödiger, Clausen, Creswell, Isaac
Williams, Tischendorf. [See Archbishop Thomson's masterly Essay on The Gospels in Smith's Bible Dictionary.]

Harmony Society.—The founder of this community was George Rapp, a weaver of Württemberg. He was born in 1757, and at the age of twenty-five seceded from the Lutheran body, on the ground that he felt himself called to regenerate society. With this aim in view he gathered a few followers together, who were to live together and have all things in common, in imitation of the first Christians [cf. Acts iv. 34, 35]. His action, however, met with disfavour in his own country; so he, with three friends, emigrated to America in 1803. There they made a settlement in Butler County, Pennsylvania, and called their village Harmony. So well did they prosper that in two years' time no less than 125 families are said to have cast in their lot with them. An association, known as the Harmony Society, was then formed [1805], based on the principles held by George Rapp. In 1815 the community sold their lands and migrated to a much larger estate in Posey County, Indiana. Their stay lasted only two years in their new settlement, at the end of which time they sold their property,
and chose a new home in Beaver County, Pennsylvania, where they built the town of Economy, and where they still maintain themselves by praiseworthy industry. They number now about 4,000. In religious principles and practices they do not differ from the Lutherans from whom they seceded.
Their founder and pastor, George Rapp, died in 1847, and was succeeded by Jacob Henrici.
The government of the society is vested in a body of nine elders.

Harsnet, Samuel, was born at Colchester,
in the sixteenth century. He entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he became a Fellow and Master. His ability attracted attention, and he was promoted to the See of Chichester, and from there to Norwich, and finally was made Archbishop of York and a Privy Councillor to James I. He was a strong High Churchman, and vigorously attacked Bishop Davenant for preaching upon Prede-station. Harsnet died in 1631, and was buried at Chigwell, in Essex, where he had built and endowed a grammar school; his library he gave to the Corporation of Colchester for the benefit of the clergy of the neighbourhood.

Harvest Festival.—This is an institution which has come into almost universal use within our own generation. No fixed day is arranged for such a festival in the Enlish Church; in the American Church it is the first Thursday in November. Though there is no special service in the Prayer Book, the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act enables the Bishop to sanction any service in church which consists of readings from Scripture, prayers from the Liturgy, and hymns. Accordingly, Convocation has drawn up a service which is now very generally used. The Proper Psalms, two or more of which are to be used at the discretion of the minister, are: lxxv., lxxvi.,...
Lord Hatherley. After four years he was obliged to give up his post through loss of eyesight. He died at Westminster, in July, 1881. Lord Hatherley, though an extreme Radical in politics, was a great supporter of the Church as an Establishment and of Church education for the poor, etc. He attended the Westminster Abbey services daily, and for many years was a most regular teacher in one of the Westminster Sunday-schools. He is the author of an able work on The Continuity of Scripture, but the beautiful piety of his character is the best memorial of him in the minds of all who knew him.

Havergal, Frances Ridley [b. 1836, d. 1879], author of many beautiful hymns, was the daughter of the Rev. W. H. Havergal, a clergyman skilled in sacred music. Her poems were published under the titles of Ministry of Song, Under the Surface, and Under His Shadow. She also wrote some prose works, among which are My King, Swiss Letters, Morning Bells, Little Pillows, etc.

Havernick, Heinrich Andreas Christoph [b. 1805, d. 1846].—An eminent German theologian. He wrote commentaries on Daniel, Ezekiel, and a critical introduction to the Pentateuch and to the Old Testament. His views are of the "orthodox Evangelical" school represented by Hengstenberg and Olsenhausen. Translations of some of his books are published in Clarke's Theological Library.

Hawker, Robert, D.D. [b. 1753, d. 1827], was vicar of the church of Charles the Martyr, Plymouth, for fifty years. His Commentary on the Bible, in 10 vols., was very popular for many years, and his Morning and Evening Portions still circulates.

Hawker, Robert Stephen, grandson of the above [b. 1804, d. 1875], was vicar of Morwenstow, in Devon, and will be long remembered there for his kindly ways, and also for his eccentricities. He was a poet of no mean powers. On his death-bed he was received into the Church of Rome. Some assert that this took place without conscious cooperation on his part, and considerable controversy arose on this question. Two Lives of him were written, one by Mr. Baring-Gould, the other by Dr. F. G. Lee, and they are both full of the quaintest interest.

Healing, Service for.—A religious ceremony was used from the time of Henry VII. to that of Queen Anne, for the supposed cure of scrofula, or, as it was formerly called, the King's Evil, by the royal touch; the tradition being that the Kings of England and France had this power, derived from Edward the Confessor. The earliest form on record is that used by Henry VII., in Latin. This was used by Henry VIII., omitting mention of the saints and the Virgin Mary. In the reign of Charles I. the service was altogether in English, and in the shape in which it was republished, with slight alterations, in the reign of Queen Anne. The efficacy of this mode of cure was believed by such men as Heylin, Collier, and Carter; but it was never formally sanctioned by the Church, though the service was printed in some Prayer Books between 1661 and 1715. Dr. Johnson's earliest recollection was that of being "touched" by Queen Anne. The form, as it stands in the Prayer Books of Queen Anne, is as follows:

At the Healing.
Prevent us, O Lord, etc.
The Gospel (for Ascension Day), Mark xvi. 14-20.
Let us pray.
Lord, have mercy upon us, etc.
Our Father, etc.

Then shall the inferior persons, one by one, be presented to the Queen upon their knees, and as every one is presented, and while the Queen is laying her hands upon them, and putting the gold about their necks, the chaplain that officiates, turning himself to Her Majesty, shall say these words following:

God give a blessing to this work, and grant that these sick persons on whom the Queen lays her hands, may recover, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

After all have been presented, the chaplain shall say:
O Lord, save thy servants, etc. (the Versicles from the Communion Service).

Let us pray.
O Almighty God, who art the giver of all health, and the aid of them that seek to thee for succour, we call upon thee for thy help and goodness mercifully to be showed upon these thy servants, that they, being healed of their infirmities, may give thanks unto thee in thy holy Church, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Then the chaplain, standing with his face towards them that come to be healed, shall say:
The Almighty Lord, who is a most strong, etc. (from the Visitation of the Sick).
The grace of our Lord, etc. —Proctor on the Common Prayer.

Heart of Jesus. [Sacred Heart.]

Heath, Nicholas, Archbishop of York, born in London, educated in Christ's College, and Fellow of Clare Hall, Cambridge. He was Almoner to Henry VIII., who made him, first, Bishop of Rochester, then of Worcester. Being deprived by Edward VI., he was restored by Mary, who advanced him to be Archbishop of York and Lord High Chancellor. He was a man of great integrity, and free from violent extremes. In the dispute between Papists and Protestants at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, he was chosen one of the Moderators. He, however, refused to take the Oath of Supremacy, and was again deprived, and retired to his own estate at Cobham, in Surrey, where he received frequent visits from the Queen. He died about 1566.

Heathen. [Paganism.]

Heaven.—The primary meaning of the word in Scriptural language is the sky overhead, and this is the meaning both of the Hebrew shamaim, from shawii, "the high," and of the English word—that which is heaved, lifted up. Hence the word came to mean, not only the vast space overhead, but the unseen, mysterious world whence the glory of the Creator proceeds, the glory of life and light. So the prophet calls heaven God's throne, and our Lord repeats the phrase [Matt. v. 34]. Hence the bow in the cloud, and the pillar of cloud and fire were known as symbols of the watchfulness and care of God. And Christ at His Incarnation "came down from heaven." The Christian Revelation gave a fuller and more complete idea. Heaven means, in St. Paul's writings, "where Christ is," let that place be where it may. Even when His presence is realised amongst us, we are in heaven, we are its citizens [Phil. iii. 20]. "Heaven lies about us in our infancy," says the poet [Wordsworth's Ode on Immortality], and so far as we carry about with us the hearts of little children, pure and simple and trustful, we are encompassed with heaven. But such faith and purity rest upon the knowledge that Christ lives incarnate, therefore heaven is a place no less than a state. The fullest heaven is the place where He is seen and adored by saints and angels, where He is ever making intercession [See Eph. i. 23; Heb. iv. 14; ix. 24]. While St. Paul believed himself to be already a citizen of heaven, he none the less looked forward to that perfect consummation and bliss when he should be with Christ and look upon Him. Hence we cannot resolve the Scriptural heaven into a mere idea, which, under the name of "spiritual," becomes an unreality. Such works as Beyond the Gate, however fanciful, and therefore needing the greatest caution in reading, do not go beyond the truth in holding a close relation between the natural and spiritual body. In that eternal and everlasting glory the soul will find its true home and rest, and not lose its identity, even when former things are passed away.

Hebdomadarius.—A priest whose week it was to officiate in the choir, rehearse the anthems and prayers, etc., in cathedrals and colleges. In monasteries the Hebdomadarius waited at table, directed the cook, etc., for a week. In Scotch universities the name was given to one of the superior members whose weekly turn it was to superintend the discipline of the students.

Heber, Reginald [b. 1783, d. 1826], 2nd Bishop of Calcutta. He was born at Malpas, in Cheshire, educated at Hawkhurst Grammar School, and in London, until 1800, when he entered Brasenose College, Oxford; in his first year he gained the prize for Latin verse, and in 1803 wrote his prize poem, Palestine. In 1804 he became a Fellow of All Souls. In 1807 he took Orders, and was instituted by his brother Richard to the family living of Hodnet, where he thoroughly discharged his parochial duties. In 1812 he published a volume of Hymns, written with a view to improving the devotional poetry sung in churches. In 1815 he was Bampton Lecturer, and in 1817 a canon in St. Asaph's cathedral. In 1819 he edited the works of Jeremy Taylor, and in 1822 was chosen Preacher to Lincoln's Inn. Having twice declined the See of Calcutta on account of his wife and child, he at length accepted it, January, 1823. The See at that time embraced the whole of India, Ceylon, the Mauritius, and Australasia. Bishop Heber set to work to try and visit throughout his enormous diocese; but he died in his forty-third year, being found dead in a cold bath, which he had taken after holding a confirmation at Trichinopoly. He was deeply mourned, monuments by Chantrey were erected to his memory at Calcutta and Madras, and scholarships bearing his name were founded in Bishop's College, Bombay. The journal of his visitation tour was published in Murray's Home and Colonial Library. His Life was written by his widow in 1830. Among his hymns may be mentioned those so well known: From Greenland's icy mountains, Jesus shall reign where'er the sun, and Hark! the glad sound, the Saviour comes.

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich [b. 1770, d. 1831].—A famous German metaphysician. He was born at Stuttgart, studied theology at Tübingen, and became Lecturer on Philosophy at the University of Jena in 1801. Here he was associated with Schelling as co-editor of the Critical Journal of Philosophy, and the two men naturally began to interchange their philosophical ideas. The first to write the views with which their names are associated was Schelling, but probably Hegel was the primary author. The philosophy of Hegel is a deep pantheism. Its source must be sought in the sadness of the discovery that the theories of the preceding generation had broken down. Kant had destroyed old opinions, and had attempted reconstruction. But the absolute negation of Fichte seemed to declare that such reconstruction was of no worth, hence Hegel's was a fresh departure. He began with laying down the doctrine that all truth is dual. Life can convey no idea to us unless we can contrast it with death; light is only appreciated when we experience darkness; freedom must be opposed to slavery to be understood; goodness is mere innocence until it struggles with evil, then it becomes a positive virtue. Hence Truth is the mediation between opposites. From this position he passed on to maintain a Trinity, the third element being that which unites and reconciles the two opposites. "I," he said, when realised involves an existence which is not I, and the recognition of the two elements involves their union. Therefore complete man is in himself a Trinity. The body without a soul is a corpse. The soul without the body is unimaginable. The union makes the living man. The next step was, what is true of the spirit of man is true of the Spirit of God. Hence Hegel professed to evolve the doctrine of a Divine Trinity. The following eloquent summary by Dr. Matheson is that of a warm admirer of Hegel, and it must be confessed that it may be called Hegel "evangelically interpreted." Many Hegelianists would repudiate it. But the fact remains that Hegel always declared himself a Christian, and to the end of his life was a communicant in the Lutheran Church. "That Divine Spirit which we call the Third Person of the Trinity is in one sense the first, for it is the very personality of God. A human spirit or person is the union of a soul and a body. It must embrace within itself both the Father and the Son—the Father corresponding to the universal soul, the Son being that body, or house, which constitutes the dwelling-place of that soul. The Father could never at any time have been alone. To suppose that at any period the Father dwelt alone, would be to imagine a God unconscious of His own existence, because, without an object of thought, it would be a soul without a body. Therefore, from all eternity, the Infinite Being must have possessed a dwelling-place, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; and that house must have been another self, an image of His own glory, a mirror in which the Father could behold Himself reflected—in a word, it must have been at once separate from the Father, and yet a part of His very being, just as the human body is separate from the soul, and yet a part of its being. Christ is the house of God. He is the image of the Infinite Spirit, the glass by which He sees Himself, the body which forms the outward side of His personality. As the Son was afterwards incarnate in the human soul, so it may be said that from all eternity the Father was incarnate in the Son; for He was the place of His habitation, the home of His rest, the embodiment of His thought, the realisation of His existence—in a word, what the sacred writer calls Him, the brightness of His glory, and the express image of His person." The same able writer goes on to give a clear and lucid view of Hegel's theory of the evolution of the Trinity in Time. The Infinite Soul seeking a body, manifested itself in Creation. But the created world was too small to express the mind of the Infinite Soul, hence arose trouble. Man longed to rise to the greatness of which he conceived the possibility; Christ came and fulfilled that longing, and in His perfect Spirit man reached His true dwelling-place. And, again, in the Church comes a fresh evolution. First came the external organisation, the Judaism of Christianity extending to the Reformation; this Hegel called the age of Peter. The next was the age of reaction against bondage to the letter. As the first age had exhibited the attempt of the body to exist without the soul, so in the second the soul tried to be independent of the body. This was the age of Rationalism, the revolt from legalism, the age of Paul. The age of John, which shall reconcile these, bringing harmony out of discord, is yet to come. Hegel hoped that he was inaugurating it. His followers divided themselves into two branches, and the hope that in him faith and science were to be reconciled melted away. One of his followers on the Conservative side is a prominent member of the bench of English bishops. Bishop Martensen was another Hegelian, accepting the Christian creed ex animo, but interpreting it in a spirit of ecstatic mysticism. But there was also a development in the direction of blank materialism, the most prominent representative of this being D. F. Strauss.

Hegesippus, commonly called the "Father of Church History," was born early in the second century. Having become a convert to Christianity, he travelled to Rome in the pontificate of Anicetus, and stayed there till that of Eleutherus—i.e. from 165 to 180, or thereabouts. He was the first author who wrote an ecclesiastical history of the events from our Saviour's Passion till his own time. It was written, St. Jerome says, in a plain, unornamental style, because he desired to imitate the style of those whose life he described. We have nothing of Hegesippus remaining but some fragments preserved by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History. The most remarkable of these fragments are:—An Account of the Martyrdom of St. James, first Bishop of Jerusalem; Of our Saviour's Relations being called for by the Emperor Domitian; A Narrative of the Martyrdom of St. Simeon, son of Cleophas, Bishop of Jerusalem (this happened in the reign of Trajan); The foul Antinous being Defied by the Emperor Hadrian; An Account of the Author's Voyage to Rome; of the Election of St. Simeon to James's See; and Concerning Thebutis, the first Schismatic. Other works have been ascribed to him, but it is now generally agreed that they were written by a man of the same name who lived after Constantine the Great.

Hegira [Arab, "flight"].—The year 622, from which the Mahometans reckon time, because in that year Mahomet fled from Mecca to Medina. [MAHOMET.]

Heidelberg Catechism.—This was a form of instruction drawn up in 1562 by order of Frederick III., Elector of the Palatine, for the use of the Reformed Church in his dominions. The authors of it were Caspar Ollivianus, Court Preacher at Heidelberg, and Zacharias Ursinus, Professor of Systematic Theology in the University. They took as the basis of their work the catechisms of Calvin, Mosheim, Lasky, and Bullinger; the draft was laid before the Heidelberg Convention, and unanimously accepted and adopted throughout the Palatinate, though beyond that it had many adversaries. It contains 129 questions, and is divided into three parts: the first of which concerns the misery of man consequent on sin; the second, redemption from that state; the third, gratitude for that redemption. The Count Palatine, the Duke of Wurttemberg and Baden, severely criticised it, and, after several refusals, Frederick III. met them at a theological conference at Maulbronn, in 1564. The catechism was again fiercely attacked at Augsburg, in 1566, and the Elector even threatened with deposition; but he nobly defended it, and the matter was dropped. In 1568 it was also adopted in the Netherlands, and is still the recognised standard of the Dutch Reformed Church, both in Holland and America, where a tercentenary festival was held in its memory in 1863. This catechism was the model on which the Westminster Divines framed the Shorter Presbyterian Catechism. It has been translated into almost all European and some Eastern languages.

Helena, Sr.— The first wife of Constantius, one of the colleagues of the Emperor Maximian, and mother of Constantine the Great. Next to nothing is known for certain of the details of her life. As she was, according to Eusebius, nearly eighty years of age when she took her pilgrimage to the Holy Land (generally assigned to the year 326), she must have been born not later than the year 250; but when, is again uncertain. The tradition which makes her the daughter of a British prince named Coel (the supposed original of the “King Cole” of the nursery ballad) is probably due to the desire which afterwards gained ground to connect her famous son with this country. There is a better-founded story that she was the daughter of an inn-keeper, either in Gaul or Bithynia. In any case she was probably of humble parentage, and not at first admitted to the status of a full wife by the young and noble soldier Constantius; though there is no doubt, from the fact of her subsequent divorce, when her husband was raised to the purple and married to Maximian’s step-daughter, Theodora, that she did eventually become so, perhaps upon the birth of her first and only son, the future emperor. This took place probably in 274, at Naissos, in Dardania. It was about eighteen years afterwards, in 292, that the promotion and remarriage of Constantius, already alluded to, necessitated Helena’s divorce, and nothing further is known of her till her son’s succession in 306 to the Empire, when it is probable that she was invested with all the dignity befitting the Emperor’s mother. At all events, there is the direct evidence of coins, still found, to support the statement of Eusebius, that she received the title of Augusta from him, together with other honours. The same historian speaks of her as converted to the Christian faith by means of her son. In the unhappy quarrels between the Emperor’s two families of children, it would seem that Helena not unnaturally took the part of her elder grandchildren against the family of her old rival, Theodora’s half-sister, Fausta; and it is thought that it was partly at her instigation that Fausta was put to death. [Constantine.] If this is so, it may have also been partly in penitence for the foul deed that in extreme old age, though still retaining the vigour of a young woman, she made her famous visit to Palestine and Jerusalem, which did so much to revive men’s interest in and reverence for those sacred localities, and their remains and associations. The well-known story of her discovery of the true Cross is problematical, not having grown up into a circumstantial and detailed statement, apparently, till seventy years after her death, which probably took place somewhere on the return journey from her pilgrimage. Her memory was perpetuated in the name of two cities, Helenopolis and Helenopontus, and eventually, in 1164, she received the honour of canonisation by Pope Alexander III. in consideration of the many miracles attributed to her.

Hell.— In the Greek Testament there are two words rendered by this English one, namely Hades [Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke x. 15, xvi. 23; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14], and Gehenna [Matt. v. 22, 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15-33; Mark ix. 43, 45, 47; Luke xii. 6; Jas. iii. 6]. In 2 Pet. ii. 4, a participle is used (tartarōs) signifying literally “to cast down to Tartarus,” but the meaning does not occur in Scripture. Hades signifies “the lower world,” and is probably derived from ἄπλω, “not,” and ἵδειν, “to see,” but it is somewhat doubtful (Liddell and Scott’s Lexicon). It is the equivalent of the Hebrew Sheol, translated in the Authorised Version variously “hell,” “the pit,” “the grave,” but in the Revised Version left in the original form. The central thought of the word is not Punishment, though it often includes that, but it is Death. Gehenna, on the other hand, always stands for the punishment of the wicked, and Tartarus may be taken as an equivalent for the same word. Hades, therefore, means that unknown world into which the dead depart, that which hides them from our eyes, and leaves us with the blank feeling of sorrow. Into Hades Christ descended at His death. No one may domestise beyond what is written. He went into the unknown, and wherever He went He carried light. Bishop Heber has expressed the
The dark those all the Hades ance. be down "tures.
and of translators words Lord death prison-house bound, now buried, which art these words is found in St. Paul's Epistles. Of the twelve uses of Gehenna, eleven are in our Lord's own speeches. The confusion of the translators in rendering both words by "Hell" is probably owing to the Protestant rejection of the doctrine of Purgatory, with all its abuses. In the first days of the Reformed doctrine a too rash dogmatism pronounced that there is no middle state, and so Hades was confounded with Gehenna. But the words of the Lord to the dying robber seem to dispose of this. We cannot regard His death as being immediately followed by His entrance into Heaven. Consequently we are bound to hold the belief in a middle state, of hope for the faithful, and of fear for the wicked. But beyond this we are in ignorance. To those who die in faith and trust there is the certainty that their hope must be now fulfilled, for the unknown land is brightened by the presence of Christ.

Hell, Descent into.—The Third Article of Religion says: "As Christ died for us, and was buried, so also it is believed that He went down into hell." Also we have in the Creed "He descended into hell," and this doctrine is carried out by several passages in the Scriptures. But there have been many differences of opinion on the subject, partly on account of the two renderings of "hell" [see above] and also because of the doubtful interpretation of 1 Peter iii. 19. Thus this Article has been interpreted in five different ways:—

[1] First, that descended is only meant metaphorically, implying the efficacy of Christ's death as to the souls departed.

[2] Secondly, that the descent into hell signifies the suffering and torments of the wicked, in the place of those who otherwise must have endured them.

[3] Thirdly, that hell here means the grave; and the passage "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" signifies "Thou wilt not leave my body in the grave."

[4] Fourthly, that by the word "soul" we may understand the nobler part distinguished from the body, or the whole person, both soul and body, or the living soul distinguished from the immortal spirit. And that "hell" signifies merely the condition of men in death, and thus it is a mere repetition of the preceding clause, that He died. [5] Fifthly, it is generally believed in the Christian Church that the soul was the spirit or rational part of Christ—that which the Jews could not kill—and hell the place of departed spirits. This view was held by many of the Fathers. Others say that He went there to deliver some of the suffering souls, and translate them to a place of happiness.

Hellenists, The, included [1] those who, though Greeks (Hellenes), or foreigners by birth, had become proselytes of the Jewish religion; [2] Jews, who, retaining the true Hebrew spirit and mode of thought, adopted the speech and all outward manners and customs of the cosmopolitan and all-pervading Greek nations, through residence in foreign countries, consequent upon the Dispersion and other causes. Thus the body of Hellenists stood as the connecting link between the exclusive and self-centred Hebrews in Palestine and the, outer world of civilised heathendom, and in so far were the means of educating the former in higher literary and artistic tastes, in broader and more generous sympathies, and generally in that idea of a Universal Church which was eventually to spring from their midst. The particular dialect of the Greek language in which the Hellenists spoke and wrote was called the Hellenistic (or common) dialect; as embodying Eastern thought and expression in a Western dress, and in consequence of the widespread influence (especially through the Septuagint and New Testament) that it had upon the subsequent history of Christendom, the study of its literature, its grammatical forms, and other phenomena, though still in a very imperfect and backward state, is one of quite unique interest and importance.

Helvetic Confessions. — There were two of these. The first was drawn up at Basle by delegates from Zürich, Berne, Basle Schaffhausen, and other Swiss cantons, in 1536. It embodied the general articles of the Reformed faith, and especially on the Eucharist. It was in Latin, and translated afterwards into German. A more elaborated work was drawn up by Bullinger at the request of the Elector Palatine. It was begun in 1564, and was translated into German and published two years after. The first Confession had been considered too short, and had inclined towards Lutheranism, but this one was deemed wholly satisfactory. It was adopted not only in Switzerland, but also in Germany, Scotland, Poland, Hungary, and France. It was translated into French by Theodore Beza.

Helvidians, The, were the followers of Helvidius, who lived in Rome in the fourth century, and who denied the perpetual virginity of the Virgin Mary. He wrote a book in support of his views, quoting two Fathers of the Church, Tertullian an Victorinus. He was answered by St. Jerome’s De perpetua Virginitate Beatae Mariae adversus Helvidium [383], in which he states that Helvidius was iliterate and obscure. His tenets were condemned at Milan and Thessaly, and in the seventh century Hildesfonus, Archbishop of Toledo, wrote against some who in Spain tried to revive the Helvidian opinion. No part of Helvidius’s book is extant, except the passages quoted by St. Jerome. The sect was also known by the name of Antidice-marianites [q.v.].

Hemero-Baptists [Gr. “daily baptists”].—A sect of the Jews, so called from their daily ablutions, supposed to be a sign of spiritual cleansing from sin. They seem to have been a sect of the Pharisees, from whom they only differed in disbelieving the Resurrection, with the Sadducees. We only know of the sect from Hegesippus and Justin Martyr. This name is also given to the Mendenians or Christians of St. John. [MENDEZANS.]

Henderson, Alexander [b. 1583, d. 1646].—One of the most learned ecclesiastics of the Scottish Church. He was brought up as an Episcopalian, but became a Presbyterian, and on the attempt of Archbishop Laud to establish the Liturgy in Scotland, was one of its most strenuous opponents. When the King yielded and came to Scotland to accept the Covenant and to preside at the Parliament, Henderson was made a Royal Chaplain and Dean of the Chapel Royal. In 1643 he went to London to join the Westminster Assembly, and was one of its most prominent members. When King Charles, bailed in warfare with the English Parliament, resolved to throw himself on the Scotch, he sent for Henderson to Newcastle. The latter was in feeble health, but went, in hope of being a reconciler. They had much discussion, but Henderson saw that Charles would never consent to abolish Episcopacy in England, and as his health grew rapidly worse he returned to his church of the Grey Friars, in Edinburgh. Here eight days later he died.

Henderson, Ebenezer, D.D. [b. 1784, d. 1858].—An eminent Biblical scholar, the son of the United Presbyterian Church, but himself a Baptist. He became, though an active minister, a brilliant linguist, and travelled as a preacher through northern Europe, always eager to publish new versions of the Bible in languages in which it had hitherto been sealed up. Many of his publications were on behalf of the Bible Society. His English versions of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Jeremiah, and the Minor Prophets, and his commentaries, are highly valued. In the last portion of his active life he held the theological lectureship at Highbury College.

Hengstenberg, Ernst Wilhelm.—A celebrated German theologian, was born in 1802 at Frenzberg, in Westphalia, where his father was a clergyman. He was educated at home till he went, in his seventeenth year, to the University of Bonn. He devoted himself chiefly to Oriental and philosophical subjects, studying Aristotle and Freytag. In his early years he had adopted rationalistic views, but on going to Basle in 1823 he came under influence which overcame this. He found that the Augsburg Confession expressed his views, and joined the Lutheran Church. In the next year he went to Berlin and became Privat-Docent, and put himself at the head of a party against rationalism. In 1826 he was made Extraordinary, and 1828 Ordinary Doctor of Theology, which post he continued to hold till his death in 1869, exerting an influence over his pupils second only to that of Tholuck. Among his writings, that which had probably the greatest influence on the opinions of the day is the Evangelical Church Journal, which had been planned by Le Coq, and which Hengstenberg edited for forty-two years. Its motto was “God’s Word and the Confession of the Church.” He was the author of two treatises:—Concerning the Relation of the Inner Word to the Outer, and Concerning Pietism, Mysticism, and Separatism. Among his exegetical works are Christology of the Old Testament, and Commentaries on the Psalms, Song of Solomon, Ecclesiastes, Ezekiel, Job, Revelation, and St. John’s Gospel, history of Balaam and his prophecies, lectures on the Passion, contributions to the introduction to the Old Testament, the Books of Moses and Egypt. Of all these latter works there are English translations in Clark’s Theological Library.

Henoticon [i.e. “bond of union”].—A document put forth in a.p. 482 by the Emperor Zeno, with the assistance of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in a well-meant but futile attempt to effect a rapprochement between the various parties and half-heresies that then divided the Church. This it aimed at doing by ignoring the minor difficulties and differences, especially of the Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monophysites, and asserting only the fundamental and more comprehensive points on the faith on the lines already laid down at the Nicene and subsequent Councils. It was, however, satisfactory neither to the orthodox and semi-orthodox nor to the heretics, being condemned by Pope Felix II., and failing everywhere, through sheer feebleness and want of practicability, leaving as it did almost every point still open for disagreement.

Henricians.—A sect in the twelfth century, followers of the monk Henry of Cluny. He preached chiefly against the corruptions of the Romish Church. Lausanne was the first scene of his labours, and from here he went to France, where he formed a band of men into a sort of apostolic society, who went about
Henry IV., King of France and Navarre, was born in Pau, in March, Dec. 15th, 1553. He was the son of Antoine de Bourbon and Jeanne d’Albret, daughter and heiress of the King of Navarre, after whose death, in 1555, Antoine succeeded to the throne. Henry was brought up in his native place, after which he was sent to the French Court till 1566, when his mother recalled him to Pau, where she instructed him in the Calvinistic doctrines. In 1569 he joined the Huguenot party at La Rochelle, and from that time he played a conspicuous part in their ranks, on account both of his high rank and military abilities. In 1572, his mother dying (it is said of poison), Henry became King of Navarre. In the same year he married Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX. At the massacre of St. Bartholomew it was at first intended that Henry should be one of the victims, but his life was spared on condition that he professed Catholicism. He remained a prisoner in Paris till 1576, when he escaped to the Huguenots at Alençon and put himself at the head of the army, and gained many advantages. In 1589 he was reconciled to Henry III., who on his death-bed named him his successor. Half his subjects were opposed to him on account of his faith, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Savoy, and Philip II. of Spain, all claimed the throne. Henry gained advantages at Ivry and Arques, and at last, in 1589, it was settled he should reign, on condition that he for a second time should renounce his faith. This he did formally at St. Denis. It was not, however, till 1598 that all France submitted to him. Henry at once began to promote the commerce and industry of the kingdom, which had so long been disturbed by civil wars. He established new manufactures, introducing mulberry trees into the country, and so promoting the silk trade. He beautified Paris, improved the French roads, and encouraged men of learning. It is said that in the course of ten years the national debt was reduced from 330 millions to fifty millions of livres. With regard to religion, his conversion was evidently insincere. In his internal policy he was totally impartial, and proclaimed the Edict of Nantes to redress the wrongs that the Protestants had suffered. [Nantes, Edict or.] In his foreign policy his views were more plainly shown. He was an ally of England, supported the independence of Holland, took part with the German Protestants against Rudolph II., and was opposed to Rome and Spain. This was plainly seen by his Catholic subjects. His life was frequently attempted, and he was at last killed by a Jesuit named Ravaillac on May 14th, 1610. He was deeply regretted all over France. His brilliant qualities, his taste, his humanity, and benevolence, made him much beloved, and his memory is still popular in France.

Henry, Matthew.—An eminent Nonconformist divine, born in 1602, at a farm-house called Broad Oak, in Flintshire, died of apoplexy on the way from Chester to London, in 1714. He was educated in London, and began the study of the law at Gray’s Inn in 1685; but, being desirous of entering the ministry, was ordained in 1687, and settled in Chester as a Dissenting minister. In 1712 he accepted a call to Hackney, but died two years after. The work by which he is principally known is his Exposition of the Old and New Testament, which, however, he did not live to finish; it is useful rather as a devotional than a critical commentary. For homiletical purposes it still holds its ground among the best. It has been much used and praised by three great Nonconformist preachers, Robert Hall, Whitfield, and Spurgeon. Among his other works we may mention, Inquiry into the Nature of Schism; Scripture Catechism; Communicant’s Companion; and some Sermons.

Henry, Philip [b. 1631, d. 1666], father of the preceding, was born at Whitehall (his father holding an office at Court), and received his early education at Westminster, whence, in 1648, he proceeded to Christ Church Oxford. He was present with his father at the beheading of Charles I. He took his B.A. in 1651, his M.A. in 1652, preached his first sermon the following January, and in 1659 became vicar of Wortonbury, in Flintshire. At the Restoration he refused to assent to the Act of Uniformity, and in consequence gave up his living, and after that lived chiefly at Broad Oak. In 1669, when the violent operation of the Five-Mile Act began to abate, he occasionally preached. He was a man of remarkable purity of life and consistent conduct, of piety and humility. At Worthenbury, where he was much esteemed by the neighbouring ministers, he obtained the epithet of Heavenly Henry.

Heracleonites.—A branch of the Gnostic heretics, who took their name and heterodoxy from Heracleon, of whom Origen gives a long account in his commentary on St. John. He is represented by Epiphanius as a person who refined in many points upon the Gnostic divinity; but this was not done without reservation and keeping close to the main articles. To make himself the head of a sect, he went off from the usual exposition of many texts of Scripture, and sometimes altered the reading to make it comply with his notions. Thus he taught that by the words in St. John, "All things were made by Him" we are not to understand the World. The World, which he calls Άιόν, was not made, he says, by the Word, but that He was only the occasional cause of its being created by Demiurgus. The Old Testament prophets, he said, were not inspired; St. John the Baptist was really a voice which directed to the Messiah or Saviour; and the former prophets were nothing but random sounds in the air without any meaning. These Gnostics, in confidence of their superiority of knowledge, advanced strange paradoxes under pretence of explaining the Scriptures in a more spiritual and sublime manner.

Herbert, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, a celebrated deistical writer, was born at Montgomery, in 1581. He was educated at University College, Oxford, and went abroad in 1600, merely with the design of sight-seeing, but joined the English then serving in the Netherlands, and distinguished himself by his bravery. On the accession of James I. he was made a Knight of the Bath. After this he spent some years abroad, and at one time fought under Maurice of Orange. At length he returned to England, intending to devote himself to study and philosophical inquiry; but he was made a Privy Councillor and sent in 1618 as Ambassador to France to promote an alliance with England. He was recalled on account of a quarrel with the Conne&egrave;ble de Luynes, but on his death became once more Ambassador at Paris, where he remained some time, and published his first work, Tractatus de Veritate, etc., in 1624. The next year he was created a Baron of the Kingdom of Ireland, and in 1631 a peer of England. On the outbreak of the Civil War he came at first to have sided with the Parliament, and then to have returned to his allegiance to Charles I. He died in 1648. Two posthumous works were published of his, Expositio Buckinghani et Duae in Regum Insulam, and the Life and Reign of Henry VIII. He wrote his own biography, which was printed by Horace Walpole in 1784. He has left us the result of his speculations in two treatises, de Veritate and de Religione Gentilium. He was far from being a sceptic in the modern sense of the word. His speculations are philosophical rather than critical; he offers solutions rather than starts difficulties; he says religion is founded on an immediate consciousness of God and of Divine things, not on revelation or historical tradition; he makes his own religion of reasoning rest on the following grounds:—"There is a God whom man ought to honour and reverence; a life of holiness is the most acceptable worship that can be offered Him; sinners must repent of their sins and strive to become better; and after death everyone must expect the rewards or penalties befitting the acts of this life." He was the contemporary of Hobbes of Malmesbury [q.v.], to whose principles he was directly opposed, though they not infrequently arrived at the same results.

Herbert, George, one of the saintliest characters which the English Church has produced since the Reformation, was born at Montgomery, in 1593. On the side of his father, who died when he was four years old, he was connected with the noble house of the Earls of Pembroke, to which connection he owed what little of worldly advancement his short life enjoyed; while to his mother, the daughter of Sir Richard Newport, of High Arch, county Salop, as to a second St. Monica, he was indebted for much of his personal holiness and spirituality. His eldest brother Edward was the above famous philosopher and historian, Lord Herbert of Cherbury. George, with two other brothers, was educated at home by a resident chaplain, under his mother's eye, till the age of twelve, when he was sent to the school at Westminster. There he remained for three years, and from thence was transplanted to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his studies with sufficient diligence to be elected Fellow of that society in 1614, and five years after, when Sir Francis Nethersole was called abroad on the King's business, he was appointed Public Orator to the University—a post which he held for the next eight years. At this period of his life he seems to have looked forward to a political career by preference, and did in fact make such progress in the King's favour at Court as to be rewarded with a sinecure appointment which secured him an income of £120 a year; but the death both of the King and of his two patrons, the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton, put an end to all such hopes, and, his mother's earnest desires at length prevailing with him, he resolved to take Holy Orders. The exact date of his ordination as deacon is unrecorded, but in 1626 he received the prebend of Layton Ecclesia, county Huntingdon—a preferment, however, which did not involve the cure of souls. Nevertheless, he spent a considerable portion of the prebendal estate, which lay in the parish, in restoring its dilapidated church. Next year, to his inexpressible grief, he lost his mother, after a period of great suffering; almost immediately upon which he resigned his post at Cambridge, and in 1629, becoming himself weak in health, went for change of air, first to stay with his brother, Sir Henry, at Woodford, in Essex, and then for a visit to the Earl of Danby, at Dauntsey, in Wiltshire, who was the brother of his mother's second husband. There, by dint of careful dieting and rest from study, he contrived in great measure to recruit his strength. About this time he resolved upon two important steps, viz. marriage and taking priest’s Orders. The first he effected in a way somewhat curious for its summariness. A kinsman of Lord Danby’s who lived not far away, had frequently before his death (which occurred before Herbert came to Dauntsey), expressed his willingness and even desire that Mr. George Herbert should marry one of the nine daughters with whom Heaven had blessed him; “but rather his daughter Jane than any other, because Jane was his beloved daughter,” says Walton in his life. And Jane it was to be; for thus as by invisible bonds they were drawn to one another, even before actual acquaintance, and three days after their first interview (“at which a mutual affection entered into both their hearts, as a conqueror enters into a surprised city”), the lady “changed her name into Herbert.” His second resolution was not much longer deferred for its fulfilment. For about three months after his marriage the promotion of Dr. Curle to the bishopric of Bath and Wells rendered vacant the rectory of Bemerton in Wiltshire, which, though pro hae vice in the gift of the Crown, was ordinarily under the patronage of his kinsman, the Earl of Pembroke. Accordingly the Earl asked that the living might be offered to George Herbert, and his request was granted. Herbert hesitated for a while, from his sense of the great responsibility incurred. There seems also to have been a feeling among his friends that the life and duties of a country clergyman (then much degraded) were beneath the dignity of his birth. This idea, though generally rife at the time, was quite foreign to Herbert’s pure and lofty conception of the sacred office; and after an interview with Laud, then Bishop of London, his scruples were at length overcome, he assumed the distinctive canonical dress then worn by the beneficed clergy, was inducted with the usual formalities into his living, and at the next Ember-tide received priest’s Orders. Here, in this tiny country village, he spent the remaining two years and a few months of his life. A full and exquisitely touching description of his labours as a parish priest during this period is to be found, and should be read by everyone, in the pages of his biographer and friend, Izaak Walton. At Bemerton he died in 1632 (or 3), and was buried under the altar in his own church. As a writer and a poet, George Herbert had close affinities with and shared the faults and graces of those many literary men whom he also numbered among his best friends and admirers. Such were Dr. Donne, Dean of St. Paul’s, Sir Henry Wotton, Bishop Andrews, and Nicholas Ferrar, of Little Gidding. The word-conceits and fantastic wit, often leading to obscurity and frigidity, which characterise the whole of this school and period, are compensated for, perhaps more abundantly in George Herbert than in others, by a real beauty and the finest poetic feeling, and by an air of intense holiness and sincerity which breathes in almost every line that he wrote. Of his prose writings, which are on the whole less strained and purer in style than his poetry, A Priest to the Temple is as exquisite and as fascinating a work as was ever produced, and has without doubt helped many a clergyman to model his life more conformably to the Master’s pattern. His chief poetical work is a collection of lyrics, suggested by the Christian seasons, or descriptive of the Christian virtues and aspirations, entitled The Temple, which is stuffed throughout with the choicest gems of thought and phrase. Besides these, there survive a great number of his effusions in Greek and Latin verse, English and Latin letters, and the Jaucula Prudentum, this latter a collection of oracular sayings, partly no doubt original, and partly drawn from various sources.

Herbert, William, lived in the eleventh century, and had a great reputation for learning. He was born at Oxford, became prior of Fécamp, in Normandy, but removed to England on the invitation of William Rufus, at whose court he lived. He is said to have purchased the bishopric of Thetford, for which simoniacal act he was commanded by Pope Paschal II., by way of penance, to build several churches and monasteries. He translated the See from Thetford to Norwich, and built the cathedral there at his own cost; he also built the episcopal palace, two churches at Norwich, one at Elmham, one at Lynn, and one at Yarmouth. He died 1119.

Herder, Johann Gottfried.—A German theologian and metaphysician [b. 1744, d. 1803]. He was a friend of Kant, and afterwards of Goethe, and first became known as a teacher in the cathedral school of Halle, and a powerful preacher there. He was afterwards appointed Court Preacher at Bückberg. By the charm of his writing he was able to impress his views on the popular mind, and was one of the writers who established that principle of Biblical exegesis which has now become as a commonplace, that the Bible is not one dogmatical system, but a collection of literature of many ages, countries, and minds, each portion of which has to be interpreted by the light of its historical and mental surroundings. He is one of the most conspicuous Humanists of the nineteenth century. [HUMAN-ISTS.] In the preface to his Ideas on the Philosophy of the History of Mankind, he touchingly expresses the craving of an author for the sympathy of his readers, for a mutual sense of communion, and then continues as follows:
"In the history of mankind, the philosophy of human history, such a humanity on the part of the reader is, I think, an agreeable and primary duty. He who wrote this was a man, and thou art a man who readest. He might err, and perhaps has erred. Thou hast kinds of knowledge which he has not, and might have; use; then, what thou canst, and recognise his good purpose. Instead of blaming him, improve what he has done, raise his building higher. With feeble hand he laid some of the first stones of a building which it will require centuries to complete; happy when these stones are covered with earth and are forgotten, like him who brought them, if on them or on some other ground, that more beautiful building shall be raised."
His Christian Schriften gave the first impulse to that great mass of literature which has so wonderfully marked the nineteenth century, known as the various Lives of Christ. There can be no question that he had a warm affection for Christianity, though it may be matter of doctrine as to what is his dogmatic position.
To some he has appeared a Pantheist, expressing a passionate admiration for the discourses of Christ as the most perfect utterance of humanity that the world has seen. This opinion, however, appears due to an undue dread of the Pantheistic element in religion, and it seems nearly certain that Herder had attained to a personal faith in Christ as the Saviour of the world.

Hereford, Bishopric of.—It is very uncertain at what date this See was founded, but it is recorded that there were bishops of the early British Church here in the sixteenth century. Archbishop Usher says that in 544
there was a See of Hereford. About 676 Putta, who had previously been Bishop of Rochester, was transferred to Hereford by Archbishop Theodore. The first record of a cathedral there is that, about 830, a stone church was built for this purpose by Milfrid, ruler of Mercia; this Anglo-Saxon church lasted for about two centuries. The church was rebuilt in the time of Edward the Confessor by Bishop Ethelbert, but was very shortly afterwards burnt by the Welsh under Algar, Earl of Chester, and Griffith, Prince of Wales. Then Robert of Lorraine, or de Losinga, consecrated Bishop of Hereford in 1079, began to reconstruct the cathedral. Bishop Raynclm (1107-15) continued the work, and it was completed by Robert de Betun (1131-48). It was dedicated to St. Mary and St. Ethelbert, and was in the form of a Latin cross, with tree bays for the choir, an eastern apse, a central tower, and eight bays for the nave.
Bishop de Vere (1186-90) commenced the eastern transepts. The Lady Chapel was built between 1226 and 1246; the clerestory of the choir in 1250. The north transept was begun in the time of Bishop Acquablanca, and completed by Swinfield about 1288, who also built the north porch, the aisles of the nave,
the presbytery aisles, and the north-east transept. The central tower was commenced about 1320. Succeeding bishops made additions, and it was completed about 1530 by Bishop Booth, who erected the northern outer porch. The building of the cathedral thus extended over 440 years. On Easter Monday, 1756, the west end fell, and its restoration was unhappily confided to Wyatt, who destroyed
the Norman work of the triforium and clerestory, and replaced it with bastard Early English. Wyatt's work at Hereford is probably the ugliest disfigurement which any English cathedral has ever undergone. More alterations were carried out between 1841 and 1852 by Mr. Cottingham, but in 1858
the final work was happily entrusted to Sir Gilbert
Scott, and completed in 1863.

King Ethelbert, who was murdered by Offa, is said to have been interred in the first Saxon church on this spot. Hereford cathedral contains many fine monuments; the chief is the shrine of Bishop Cantilupe [1275-82],
the great saint of Hereford, and the last Englishman canonised before the Reformation.
In the cathedral is preserved a most remarkable Map of the World, the work of Richard de Haldingham and Lafford, in Lincolnshire;
he was prebendary of Hereford in 1305.

III.—REGARDING THE PERSON OF CHRIST. [See Ath., Creed, v. 29—48.]

This denied that Christ was begotten of His Father before all Worlds; that He is Very God of Very God, of one substance with the Father; that the Godhead of the Son and of the Holy Ghost are one, their glory equal, their majesty co-eternal, with the Godhead, the Glory and the Majesty of the Father; and that the Son and Holy Ghost are uncreate, eternal, and almighty. He affirmed that Christ was made out of nothing by the Father, and was only the highest of created beings. [Council of Nicea, A.D. 325.]

The Semi-Arians also denied the co-equal and co-eternal Godhead of Christ; but they allowed that He is, in a sense, of one nature with the Father, affirming that "the Son is like the Father in all things according to the Scriptures." [Synod of Hiunni, A.D. 330.]

The Arians went beyond Arians, and affirmed that "the Nature of Christ is different from that of the Father."

The Aetians went beyond the Arians, and affirmed that "Christ is unlike the Father both in Nature and Will." [Synod of Antioch, A.D. 301.]

The Paelastophist Monarchians, with the Ebionites themselves, denied that Christ was anything more than man.

Valentins denied that Christ partook of the Nature of the Virgin, i.e. that He was Incarnate of the Virgin Mary and Man of the substance of His mother. He then denied that Christ was Perfect Man, affirming that His body was of peculiar, heavenly texture and not a real human body.

And all others who were Docetists, in like manner denied that Christ is Perfect Man, differing from this the Monophysites, who affirmed that the Nature of Christ is that of the same nature with Christ. [Synod of Chalcedon, A.D. 451.]

The Monophysites, who said that Christ had but one nature, and the Monothelites, who said that He has but one will, though they admitted the original perfection of Christ's human nature, denied its present perfection.

[c] The Union of the Two Natures.

Cerinthus and Basilius denied the perfect union, affirming that Christ the Son of the Father dwelt in the Man Jesus only from the Baptist till the Crucifixion.

Nestorius (or his followers in his name) denied the Unity of Person in Christ, and made Him one, not one Christ. He not only distinguished the natures, but divided them. [Council of Ephesus, A.D. 430.]

Eutyches, and his followers, the Monophysites and Jacobites, denied that Christ now exists in two whole and perfect natures, though they admitted that He was originally of them, in which they differed from Apollinaris. They regarded Christ as one altogether in composition of substance, and did not distinguish the natures. [Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451.]

Nestorius divided the natures, Eutyches confounded them; whereas Chalcedon states that we ought to distinguish not to divide them.

IV.—REGARDING THE HOLY GHOST.

This had, by implication, denied that the Holy Ghost is Lord, when he denied that the Son is Lord.

The Monochelians denied the Godhead of the Holy Ghost, so that He is the Lord, and Giver of Life; but some of them also denied His Personality, affirming that the name Holy Ghost denotes no more than an influence proceeding from the Father. [Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381.]

Hermann, Archibishop of Cologne [1477—1482].—A conspicuous character in history of the Reformation. Recognising the truth which underlay the Reform movement, and especially the teaching of Luther respecting the justification of man, he introduced many reforms into his diocese, whilst he was anxious not to separate entirely from the Church of Rome, but to preserve the unity with the past. In 1543 he met with such opposition from his chapter, as resulted in the interference of Charles V., and the deposition of the Archbishop. In 1543 he invited Melancthon and Bucer to draw up a Scriptural form of doctrine and worship for his subjects. This book was called the Consultation of Hermann, Prince- Archbishop of Cologne, and contained directions for the public services and administration of the sacraments, with forms of prayer and a litany, and also expositions of several points of faith and duty. It was published in German in 1543, in Latin in 1545, and in English in 1547. We are indebted to this Consultation for parts of our Communion Service, viz. the General Confession, the Absolution, the Comfortable Words; for the Reformed Service of Baptism, which was copied from Luther; and largely for the Litany, especially the part which pleads for mercy by the Passion of Christ.

Hermas.—An early Christian writer, one of those included under the title of "the Apostolical Fathers." Origen, Eusebius, and Jerome declare him to be the same that St. Paul salutes at the end of his Epistle to the Romans. Some call him Hermes, which gavo occasion to some modern authors to attribute his book to a certain Hermes, Pope Pius I.'s brother; but all the ancients name him constantly Hermas, and Jerome observes that the author of that book was a Grecian, and consequently more known to the Grecians than to the Latins, which could not be if Pope Pius's brother were author of it. The work of Hermas, which is found among the Apostolical Fathers, is called by the general name of The Shepherd, and is divided into three parts. The first, entitled Eclesia, contains four visions which the author saw. In the first two a lady appears to him, warns him against evil thoughts and against his neglect of his children. In the third he sees six young men building a palace, and the lady explains that it represents the building of the Church Triumphant. The fourth reveals the trial and tribulation which is about to come upon men. The second part relates twelve Instructions or commands, delivered by a guardian angel in the shape of a grave pastor. They comprise such subjects as that we must believe in one God, must avoid detraction, lying, dissimulation, that the heart must be sober and patient, that prayer must be continual, unceasing, earnest, and that the commands of God are not impossible. The third part contains ten similitudes, by which the author was instructed in the precepts of happiness and Christianity. The Great Tribulation, mentioned in his fourth vision, is by Dr. Hammond and Dodwell supposed to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, in which case it must have been written before the year 70, in which that city was sacked and demolished by Titus. Archbishop Wake, however, thinks the reference is to the persecution under Domitian. The book was received formerly in some churches as canonical, and Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian, quote it as a book of the Holy Scripture, but it was looked upon by other Churches only as a useful and edifying book. The voice of the Church decided against its canonicity, and some writers have treated it with unmeasured contempt. Wake, as was his wont, gives his judgment dispassionately. He says: "That there are many useful things in it, especially in the second, and as I think, the best part of it, cannot be denied. And for the other two it must be considered that though such visions as we there read of, being no longer continued to these latter ages, may warrantably be despised by the pretenders of the present day, yet we cannot doubt but that at the time this book was written, the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were very frequent, and we need not question but that such revelations too, among the rest, were communicated to holy men for the benefit of the Church."

Hermenætes [Gr. "interpreters"].—They were officers in the Church who had to render one language into another, as there was occasion, both in reading the Scriptures and in the homilies that were made to the people; this office would be chiefly in Churches where the people spoke different languages, as in the Churches of Palestine, where probably some spoke Syriac and others Greek, and in the African Churches, where some spoke Latin and others Punic.

Hermonias.—An heretical sect, who, with the Seleucians, refused the use of baptism by water, on the ground that it was not instituted by Christ. Their authority was the words of St. John, "I baptize you with water, but He that cometh after me shall baptise you with the Holy Ghost and with fire;" the very same text which is cited centuries after in Barclay's Apology for the rejection of water baptism by the Friends. They thought that the souls of men consisted of fire and spirit, and therefore a baptism of fire was more suitable to their nature, but what kind of baptism that was, none of the ancient writers tell, unless Clement of Alexandria, who tells of some who, when they had baptised men in water, made a mark on their ears by fire.

Hermits, formerly often called Eremites [Gr. ἔρημος, "a desert"]).—The beginning of the solitary or hermit life in the Christian Church is to be traced to the frightful condition of the Roman Empire in its last days. Christianity had reformed individual souls, but the Empire was as a dead carcase, which could not be revivified, and must be taken away. Men who discerned the signs of the times, and who expected the fiery judgment of God to fall, fled from the world, to pray and fast and watch alone. They had, indeed, seen Eastern pagans, as well as Jews, doing so before them. Buddha and his followers in India, and the Essenes among the Jews, had retired from the world into solitude; and in Egypt, apparently, first, Christian men and women in the terrible fourth century swarmed out into the desert. Soon news came into the cities of their holiness, their labours, and the wondrous miracles which they wrought, and the life which they led came for a while to be the ideal Christian life, supported, preached, practised by all the great men of the time—men like Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine. Of the hermits proper, those whose whole religious life was spent in this form, and who are not otherwise known than as hermits, the most celebrated were St. Antony, his pupil Hilarion, Paul, Arsenius, and Simeon Stylites. The best account of them is to be found in Montalembert's Monks of the West, and there is a very charming volume of biographies of the Hermits among the works of Charles Kingsley. Short notices of the principal hermits will be found under their respective names.

Hermogenes.—A noted heretic who lived about the end of the second century. He was a painter by profession, and is generally supposed to have been born at Carthage. Being unable to reconcile the goodness of God with the existence of evil in His creatures, he held and taught that matter, in itself evil, was eternal; thus he would be styled in our day a materialist. His teaching was the exact opposite to the teaching of the Gnostics on this subject. Hermogenes held that there must be a complete correspondence between the moral character of the Creator and that of the creature, and as this does not exist, his theory of the eternity of matter was put forward to solve the difficulty, and to manifest that God is good, in spite of the evil existing in His world. Tertullian wrote a treatise against Hermogenes. Other writers also opposed this heresy, including Theodoret, Origen, Theophilus of Antioch, and Hippolytus. In all other respects, both Tertullian and Hippolytus acknowledge that Hermogenes was sound in faith, acknowledging Christ as God and man. The late Mr. John Stuart Mill met the same moral difficulty in nearly the same way.

Hernhutter. [Moravians.]

Herrick, Robert, a sacred poet, was born in London, in 1591, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, with the intention of studying for the law. Eventually he decided upon entering the Church, and through the Earl of Exeter he received the living of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, where most of his poems were written. In 1647 he was ejected by the Parliament from Dean Prior, and he then settled at Westminster, being supported by the Royalists. He was able to return to his living at the Restoration. The date of his death is unknown.

Hertford, Council of.—An important Anglo-Saxon Council, held in 673, under the presidency of Archbishop Theodore [q.v.]

The following canons were passed:—

1. That Easter should be kept upon the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the moon of the first month.

2. That no bishop should encroach upon the diocese of another, but content himself with the people under his own jurisdiction.

3. That the monks should not stroll from one monastery to another, nor remove without the leave of their abbot; but pay that submission which he promised at the taking the Order upon them.

4. That no clergyman should quit the diocese of his own bishop, sail ramble at pleasure; neither should he be received into a foreign diocese without letters of recommendation from his bishop, and if he happens to be entertained, and refuses to retire upon his diocesan's invitation, then both himself and those that receive him shall be liable to excomunication.

5. That bishops and clerks who are strangers must be contented with the civilities of an entertainment and that it shall be lawful for none of them to enter any part of their function without the leave of the bishop of the diocese.

6. That it is convenient a synod should be called twice a year; but because there are several reasons why this cannot be effected without trouble, all the Fathers agree that a council should be held on every year at Clofeshooe upon the 1st of August.

7. That no bishop should have the ambition to prefer himself to another, but that in the case of preendency all the prelates shall be governed by the regards of time, and the order of their consecration.

8. It was proposed that the number of bishop should be increased in proportion to the conversion of the laity; but upon this point they came to no resolution for the present, etc.

Hervey, James, was born in 1714, Hardinglestone, near Northampton, and was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he became acquainted with Wesley and Whitfield. He was, for a while, curate of Dummer in Hampshire, and afterwards of Bideford where the congregation were so appreciative of him that they voluntarily collected enough every year to raise his stipend to £60. At his father's death he succeeded him as rector of Weston Favell, where he died of decline in 1758, having devoted his whole life to the advancement of benevolence. He belonged to the strong Calvinistic school. His name is famous as the author of a work entitled Meditatio among the Tombs, which was formerly more read, but is now almost forgotten.

Hesychasts [Gr. ἡσυχία, "stillness"]—A sect of Greek Quietists, or mystics, who lived in the monastery of Mount Athos in the fourteenth century. They were also called Palamites, from the name of their leader.
Gregory Palamas, Archbishop of Thessalonica. They believed that all perfection lay in contemplation, and in the elevation and abstraction which were the result. They also held that there is Divine light hidden in the soul, the same as that which encircled the Saviour on Mount Tabor, and capable of being communicated, and, therefore, retiring into a dark cell, fixed their eyes on their navels, until, as they imagined, the light beamed forth. For this idea they were attacked by Barlaam, a monk of another monastery, who carried on a controversy with Gregory Palamas for four years. Finally, in 1341, a Council was held at Constantinople, which decided in favour of the Hesychasts, and Barlaam went to Italy. Underneath the controversy was the hotly disputed question of reunion with Rome, which Barlaam was supposed to be seeking. In 1351 the controversy was revived by Acindynus, a monk of Constantinople, who wrote de Essentia et Operatione Dei, which was responded to by Nicolas Cabasilas in his Life of Christ. The Hesychasts were again triumphant, but died out soon after. The question of the "Thaboritic Light" is still discussed in the Greek Church.

Hesychius.—A reviser of the Septuagint and Greek Testament, mentioned by Eusebius; martyred by Maximin in the third century.

Heterodoxy [Gr. heteros, "another" and deza, "opinion"].—Opinion contrary to established doctrine.

Hexapla. [ORIGEN.]

Hexham, BISHOPRIC OF.—This See lasted for a hundred and forty-three years, in the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries. It was formed out of the northern part of the great diocese of York, by Egfrid, King of Northumbria, its first bishop, Eata, being consecrated by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, in A.D. 678. The last bishop of Hexham died in A.D. 821, when the diocese was absorbed into that of Lindisfarne. The title has been revived in modern times for bishops of the Roman Catholic population of Northumberland. The following are the names of the ancient bishops of the Church of England taking their title from Hexham. The ancient See continued to form part of the diocese of Durham until 1882, when it was revived in the modern one of Newcastle. [NEWCASTLE, BISHOPRIC OF.]

Heylyn, Peter, D.D., Church historian, born at Burford, near Oxford, in 1600. He studied at Oxford, and gave lectures on history and cosmography in that University. Through the interest of Archbishop Laud, in whose theory of Church and King he believed, he was, in 1629, appointed Chaplain to Charles I., who made him Prebendary and Sub-dean of Westminster, and gave him several livings. The Long Parliament deprived him of these livings, and also confiscated his property. At the Restoration he again became Sub-dean of Westminster, and died in 1662. He was a voluminous writer, and his controversial works, directed chiefly against the Presbyterianists, are very bitter. The most important of these are Aedus Redivivus and History of the Presbyterians [from 1536 to 1647]. Among his other works are:—Microcosmus [1625]; History of St. George [1631]; Examen Historicus, an attack on Fuller’s Church History; Historia Quiquaversalis, a defence of Arminianism; Ecclesia Restaurata; Cyprianus Anglicus, or a Life of Bishop Laud; Theologia Veterum; various works against Calvinism, etc.

Hicksites.—An American branch of Friends or Quakers, who took their name from their leader, Elias Hicks. They separated from the old body of Friends in 1828, by whom they were accused of lapsing into deism. Hicks taught that God gave to every man at his birth light and grace sufficient, if obeyed, to save him, without either the help of the Word of Christ, or Christ Himself. He denied the doctrines of the Trinity and Satisfaction, and also of Original Sin. His teaching spread through the United States, and especially in Pennsylvania, and it is doubtful whether the Hicksites do not still form a majority in the Society of Friends throughout America. [FRIENDS.]

Hierome. [JEROME, ST.]

Hieronymites. [JERONYMITES.]

High Church.—A term used to designate that party in the Church which followed the principles of Laud and Andrewes, claiming union with the ancient Church, and attaching essential importance to the Episcopal succession. At the Restoration of the Church and the throne after the Protectorate, this party was in the ascendant in Parliament and in the country. The folly of James II. produced the Revolution, and this was followed by the Nonjurors Schism, the result of which was that the body of the clergy were High Church, while the bishops, being appointed by the Whig Government, were Low. In the days of Queen Anne the High Church party was again in the ascendant, but the time of the first two Georges was entirely Whiggish. The reign of George III. saw a turn of the tide. In that reign the "orthodox," or High Church party, was by far the most numerous, but, as a whole, it was a lifeless body; the other side showed great activity and zeal in promulgating their own doctrines [Evangelical Party], preferring extemporary prayer and preaching, while the High Churchmen professed unbounded zeal for the Prayer Book. But it would be a mistake to identify their views with those of the High Churchmen either of the days of Queen Anne or of Queen Victoria. Though they inherited the traditions of the dominant party of the reigns of the Stuarts, they rested their claim to ascendency, not on the Divine mission of the Church, but on the fact that it was "by law established." They said nothing, and cared nothing about the apostolic succession, which had been the cardinal doctrine of the Nonjurors. From their security they were rudely shaken by William Cobbett, whose History of the Reformation was written with the intention of destroying the Church of England. It must be confessed that he had too good grounds for casting away his respect for the Church as it then was. The clergy, as the literature of the time displays them, were self-indulgent and slothful, bishoprics were conferred on relatives of Prime Ministers, or simoniacally bought; the investment being a profitable one, inasmuch as the buyers not only enriched themselves, but loaded their children with prebendary in a shameless way. No wonder that Cobbett succeeded in making the Church unpopular; and there were many who thought that her days were numbered. But a better spirit arose. The Evangelical party kept alive the spiritual principle that seemed ready to die, until a new power arose, appealing not to the emotional and religious sentiment, but to the great historical traditions of the past. [Tracts for the Times.] Under the leadership of Newman and his friends the High Church movement took new shape. Amongst the names of the High Church party of the present century we have to place not only the Oxford Tract writers and their immediate followers, but also men who were partly influenced by them, as well as some who worked on independent lines. Such were Archbishop Howley, Bishops Marsh, Blomfield, and Lonsdale, Drs. Mill and Molesworth, and Hugh James Rose. Notices of each of these divines will be found under their names. The High Church party, in spite of much discouragement, and many attempts to suppress it, steadily made way, until it became a very prominent party in the Church of England. Some of its members have desired to express its opinions by means of outward symbols, and are known as Ritualists. [Ritualism.] But the old-fashioned members of the party stand aloof from this, and refuse to be identified with anything which appears to the world in general to approximate to the teaching of the Church of Rome.

High Mass. [Mass.]

Hilarion, St.—A hermit of the fourth century, born near Gaza. St. Jerome, who wrote his life, reports him as working miraculous cures by calling on the name of Jesus, and so making many disciples.

Hilary, Sr., born at Poitiers, was converted, with his wife and daughter, to Christianity. He was consecrated Bishop of his native place about 354. He was a great champion for the Catholic doctrine against the Arians, and Saturninus, the Arian Bishop of Arles, procured his banishment into Phrygia. In 359 he was called to the Council of Salonica, where he bravely upheld his belief, and he also pressed for a public conference with the Arians in presence of the Emperor, but they persuaded him to send their enemy back to Gaul. Upon his arrival at Poitiers, in 360, he convened several Councils for restoring the ancient belief, and in his zeal for the Catholic faith went to Italy in 364 and denounced Auxentius, Bishop of Milan, as an Arian to the Emperor Valentinian, who ordered a conference between Hilary and Auxentius, in presence of ten other bishops; but this Auxentius, after much demurring, was obliged to agree, and, thus pressed, he declared his belief in the Divinity of our Lord. Hilary suggested to the Emperor that his profession was without sincerity; but he, tired of the dispute, would listen no longer, and ordered Hilary to leave Milan. He returned home and died in 367. His festival is kept on Jan. 14th. His works are: Twelve Books on the Trinity, begun in 346, and finished in his exile; a Treatise on Synods, written during his banishment in 359; Three Discourses Constantius on Arianism; and commentaries on St. Matthew and part of the Psalms; but these are mostly copied from Origens and Augustine. The best edition of his works is that published by the Benedictines in 1693. They claim for him the authorship of the Te Deum, and Mr. Procter [p. 222] says "there seems little reason to dispute it."

Hilary, Sr., Bishop of Arles [b. 401, 449].—The place of his birth is unknown. He was well educated, and while still very young he followed the example of a friend and relative, Honoratus, and retired to the monastery of Lerins. In 426 Honoratus was made Bishop of Arles, and after much persuasion Hilary was induced to accompany him. Honoratus died in 429, and Hilary was unanimously chosen his successor. He was an eloquent and impressive preacher. Hilary was involved in a contest with Pope Leo I. about bishop named Chelidonius [q.v.]. The Pope's resentment was implaceable, and he deprived Hilary of his rights as a Metropolita Hilary, having in vain tried to bring the Pope to a friendly temper, spent the rest of his days in prayer and study. Though treated Hilary roughly in his lifetime, I paid a tribute to his piety after his death. To only genuine writings of his extant are his Life of St. Honoratus, his predecessor; and his Letter to Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons. Other are ascribed to him, but without proof, and many writers suppose him to be the author of the Athanasian Creed.

Hilda, Sr., Abbess of Whitby, was the daughter of Hereric, nephew of Edwin, King of Northumbria. She was born in 614 at Elne, in Yorkshire. She received baptism with her grand-uncle in 627. Twenty years later she determined to adopt the monastic life, and after passing a year under the Benedictine rule, became the abbess of a small convent at Hartlepool. In 637 she moved to Whitby. The conference under King Osur concerning Easter was held in her monastery in 664. Hilda was an enemy to the increase of Papal rule, and opposed the tonsure of priests and the celebration of Easter according to the Roman ritual; but the question was decided against her, and she yielded. Under her the monastery at Whitby became very famous, and five of the monks became bishops. Her influence was spread very wide, and she was called “The Mother.” She died Nov. 17th, 680, after an illness of seven years.

Hildebert de Lavardin [b. 1055, d. 1134], Bishop of Le Mans, and afterwards Archbishop of Tours. He studied first under Berenger, and then under St. Hugo, of Cluny, who made him a monk of his own Order. In 1098 he succeeded Hoel in the See of Le Mans, having first been Archdeacon there. He was at first disturbed by a war between Helie, Count of Le Mans, and William Rufus, King of England; the Count fell into the hands of the King, and Hildebert, who sided with his lawful ruler, was instrumental in getting him re-established. He was also troubled by the revival preacher, Henry of Lausanne, and went to Rome to beg Pope Paschal II. to release him from his duties; but this was refused. On his return home he was made a prisoner at Nogent, and on his release he consecrated the cathedral of Le Mans, then newly built, and remained there undisturbed till 1115, when, on the death of Guillebert, he was translated to the archbishopric of Tours. Here, at first, he had a contest with Louis le Gros, who had seized his temporalities; but he soon gained favour with that prince, and all went smoothly till his death. This Bishop left many letters to Bernard of Clairvaux, Anselm, etc., on subjects of morality, discipline, and history. He wrote also some poetry, and the lives of some saints, as well as many sermons. All contemporary writers speak of him with commendation.

Hildebrand. [Gregory VII.]

Hildegarde, Sr.—An abbess of the Benedictine Order in the eleventh century, so eminent for her learning and piety that she was consulted almost as an oracle by the great men of her time, particularly by the Patriarch of Jerusalem and St. Bernard. She received visions which were approved by Pope Eugenius III. She died in 1181 in the monastery she had founded at Rupertsberg, being eighty-two years of age. She wrote several treatises against the Cathari, a comment on the Rule of St. Benedict, etc. A collection of her Letters was printed at Cologne in 1566.

Hill, Rowland, born at Hawkestone, in Shropshire, 1744; died in London, 1833. He was educated at Shrewsbury and Eton, and in 1764 entered St. John’s College, Cambridge. While yet an undergraduate he commenced expounding the Scriptures and preaching in the surrounding villages, which roused against him the wrath of the college authorities. In 1766 he made the acquaintance of Whitfield, which strengthened his determination to preach. In 1769 he took his B.A., and looked forward to his ordination; but this was refused him by no less than six bishops, solely on the ground of his “irregular” proceedings at Cambridge. He then visited London and preached in Whitfield’s Tabernacle in the Tottenham Court Road, and then wandered about the country in great poverty, preaching in the open air. At length, in 1773, he was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Bath and Wells, and became curate of Kingston, in Somersetshire; but as he continued his open-air preaching, the Bishop refused to admit him to priest’s Orders. He became very prominent by the frequent addresses he made to large crowds of people in St. George’s Fields during the Gordon riots in June, 1780, and in 1782 a meeting of his friends and admirers assembled to found a chapel for his permanent ministry. This resulted in the building of the Surrey Chapel, where he preached almost to the time of his death, going away, however, all the summer on itinerary preaching. In 1771 he had built a chapel at Wotton-under-Edge, in Gloucestershire, and now he styled himself “Rector of Surrey Chapel, Vicar of Wotton-under-Edge, and Curate of the fields, commons, etc., throughout England and Wales.” The service in the Surrey Chapel was conducted according to the ritual of the Church of England, but his pulpit was open to many famous Nonconformist preachers. Rowland Hill was a very eccentric man, full of wit and drollery, which he did not scruple to introduce into his preaching. His chief literary work was his Village Dialogues, published in 1801, a racy book, which showed how closely Mr. Hill observed all classes of society. In 1803, on the passing of the Clergy Residence Act, he published a satirical pamphlet called Spiritual Characteristics. In 1790 he wrote A Warning to Professors, containing Aphoristic Observations on the Nature and Tendency of Public Amusements. He took a warm interest in the British and Foreign Bible Society from the time of its foundation in 1803.
Hillel.—A famous Jewish doctor, born about 112 B.C., of poor parents, and called "the Babylonian" from his birthplace. He left Babylonia at the age of forty, and came to Palestine to study the Law; he distinguished himself so greatly that at the age of eighty he was chosen Patriarch of the nation, and head of the Sanhedrin. He was the pupil of Shammai and Abtalion, but, differing from the former, he set up a rival school, and there was so much opposition between the disciples of these two masters that blows were struck and lives lost in their quarrels. The Jews decided in favour of the school of Hillel, as he was able to quote better authorities on his side than Shammai. He was greatly esteemed as a teacher, and is said to have lived to the age of 120.

Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims in 845, famous for his learning among his contemporaries. He was born about 806, and educated in the monastery of St. Denis, and became very intimate with Charles the Bald. He ruled his diocese with great firmness, and is noted for vindicating the rights of the Gallican Church; in doing which he acted very bitterly against his nephew, Hincmar, Bishop of Laon. He was strenuous and firm in maintaining that the "decretals of Isidore" were spurious, but on the other hand he upheld the doctrine of Paschasius Radbert on Transubstantiation. He was also violent in the persecution of Gottschalk [q.v.]. He was driven from Rheims by the Normans not long before his death, which took place at Epernay in 882. An edition of his works was published at Paris, in 1645, by Sirmond. One of his best books is Annals of Rheims.

Hincmar, Bishop of Laon in the ninth century. He took the Pope's part against the Gallican Church and his King, and for this was deposed at the Synod of Douai [871], presided over by his uncle, the Archbishop of Rheims. He was sent to prison, and his eyes were put out; but Pope John VIII. re-established him in the Council of Troyes in 878, and gave him half of the bishopric's revenue. A few of his letters are extant in Sirmond's edition of Hincmar of Rheims.

Hindooism.—The religion professed by some 150 to 190 millions in India. Its origin is lost in antiquity. Its earliest books are the Vedas, which probably are taken from still earlier history, and it was originally simple in form, but gradually multiplied gods and advanced in sacerdotalism and complexity of forms. The philosophical speculations of Brahminism were followed by the Buddhist reaction against sacerdotal tyranny. [BRAHMINISM; BUDDHISM.] The most prominent and characteristic institution of Hindooism is caste. The touch, even the shadow, of a low caste man pollutes. Thus Hindooism separates man from man. Woman is treated tyrannically and unjustly. The effect upon Hindooism of the contact with Christianity has been profound, and it is impossible to forecast the result. The Hindoo admires and acknowledges the beauty of their faith, whilst they still hold their own. The Brahma-Samaj ("Church of God") is an attempted reconstruction of Hindooism, traceable to the work of Rammohun Roy, who, in 1820, wrote a book in praise of the precepts of Jesus, while he denied His Divinity. He died in England in 1833, but the Samaj still progressed, and in 1850 passed a resolution denouncing the infallibility of the Vedas. In 1853 Keshub Chunder Sen, full of ideas which he had derived from the Bible and from the writings of Chalmers, put forth yet more advanced views, the effect of which was seen in the startling and unheard-of circumstance of the marriage of two Hindoos of different castes in 1864. He has committed many eccentries since then, all of them indicating an intensely eager and active spirit, and a desire to find a new standing ground, since he and his followers have lost all faith in the old. In his last lecture [Jan., 1883] he advocates the amalgamation of Christianity with the other religions of the East, and added, "I have not said my last word about Christ." He died soon afterwards. He would seem to have reached the level of Unitarianism. Probably the body which he founded will break up, and the future of Hindooism is still dark. [See admirable pamphlet on this subject published by the Religious Tract Society, Present Day Truth, No. 33.]

Hinds, Samuel [b. 1793, d. 1872], was educated at Oxford, and went as missionary to the West Indies, and on his return received several preferments, most of them through the influence of Whately, with whose views he warmly sympathised. In 1848, Lord John Russell made him Dean of Carlisle, and Bishop of Norwich in the following year. He resigned this bishopric in 1858. He was the author of several works, of which the chief are:—The History of the Early Rise and Progress of Christianity, and An Enquiry into the Proof, Nature, and Extent of Inspiration and into the Authority of the Scriptures.

Hinton, John Howard [b. 1791, d. 1873], was a famous Baptist preacher, and was called the "Student's Preacher." He wrote among other works, The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason, and TREATISE ON MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY. His son, James Hinton, was a very remarkable man, the author of Man and His Dwelling-place, The Mystery of Pain, etc., etc. He died in 1875, and his life and letters were published three years later.

Hippolytus [d. about A.D. 240].—A very learned writer of the Roman Church of the second and third centuries. So few records of his life have been preserved that almost nothing was known of him, until comparatively recent discoveries threw some light upon his history. Eusebius speaks of his works, but has nothing to tell of the man himself. Other early writers vaguely mention him as a bishop, and also as a martyr. In the Eastern Church he appears as the Bishop of Rome, but the Roman Church denies this. In 1551 a fine marble statue was found during some excavations, on the pedestal of which was engraved a list of works, which were found to be those of Hippolytus, and there is no doubt that the figure is that of the Bishop himself. In this list is found the name of a work which had hitherto been regarded as Origen's, the Philosophumena, a treatise against heresies, and the unanimous consent of critics in our time gives it to Hippolytus. And it proves that he lived at Rome, and took an active part in the doings of the Church in the times of Popes Zephyrinus and Callistus. He seems to have brought a charge against the latter of Sabellianism, and further to have denied his right to the See. Dr. Dollinger upon this concludes that Hippolytus himself claimed it, and this theory seems best to fit with all the facts which have been discovered, though the difficulties, any way, are great. Dr. Stokes, the author of the exhaustive biography in Dr. Smith's Dictionary, thinks it possible he may have been the bishop in charge of the Greek-speaking congregation at Rome, and have been dissatisfied with Callistus for his want of learning. That for some reason he opposed him and wrote against him is quite clear.

"That the arrogance and intemperance which he displayed did not deprive him of permanent honour in the Roman Church is to be accounted for by the leniency with which men treat the faults of one who has real claims to respect. Hippolytus was a man of whose learning the whole Roman Church must have been proud; he was of undoubted piety, and of courage which he proved in the good confession which he afterwards witnessed." [Smith's Bioi. Diet.: Hippolytus, p. 91.]

He is said by Prudentius to have been martyred by being torn asunder by wild horses, but this is doubtful, for there is no other record of any such punishment among the Romans.

The extant works of Hippolytus are partly chronological (a cycle for determining the dates of all paschal full moons, post and to come, and a chronicle), partly against heresies, of which he enumerates thirty-two. In 1842 a more complete MS. of the Philosophumena than any which had yet been found was discovered in the monastery of Mount Athos. It was published in 1851, and gave rise to a warm controversy, in consequence of its charging a bishop of Rome with heresy. Bunsen, the late Bishop Wordsworth, and Dollinger, all wrote valuable treatises on the subject, and the authorship was conclusively proved. The rest of the works of Hippolytus, except fragments, are lost.

Hobbes, Thomas, the founder of the English Deists, was born at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, on April 5th, 1688. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, became a B.A. in 1607, and became tutor to Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. On his return to England he mixed much in the society of literary men, and became acquainted with Bacon, Lord Herbert, Ben Jonson, etc. He delighted much in the Greek and Latin poets and historians, particularly Thucydides, whose works he translated with the help of Bacon, to expose the Athenian democracy. He went abroad with Sir Gervase Clifton, but in 1631 was recalled to be tutor of the young Earl of Devon. He travelled in France and Italy with his pupil, becoming acquainted with Galileo [q.v.]. He returned for a short time to England in 1637, but again left on seeing that things were tending to a civil war. He withdrew to Paris, where he wrote de Gue and The Leviathan. In 1647 he became mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. This Prince took a great delight in his company, but on the publication of The Leviathan, hearing that it contained principles contrary to religion and civil government, forbad him his presence, but still continued to favour him, and at the Restoration gave him a pension of £100 a year. Hobbes's books were condemned by the Parliament in their Bill against atheism and profaneness in 1666, and he became notorious all over England. He retired to the Earl of Devonshire’s seat, Hardwick Hall, in Derbyshire, where he continued to write until his death, which took place in 1679, in his ninety-second year.

Hobbes was the originator of the modern school of Necessitarians, and an advocate of Erastianism. His works are very numerous. Besides those we have mentioned, he wrote Human Nature and de Corpore Politico, a letter upon liberty and necessity, which led to a dispute with Bishop Bramhall: Decameron Physiologicum; Behemoth, or a History of the Civil Wars from 1640 to 1660, etc. He translated the Iliad and Odyssey, but, the work, though popular at the time, is never read now, its style being bald and vulgar.

Hody, Humphrey, an eminent divine, was born at Oldecombe, in Somersetshire, on Jan. 1st, 1659. He was educated at Oxford, became M.A. in 1682, and was elected Fellow of Wadham College in 1684. He was appointed domestic chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson, which office he also held under his successor, and was presented to a living in London, and appointed Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford in 1698, and Archdeacon of Oxford in 1704. He died Jan. 20th, 1706. Hody is chiefly noted for his works against the Nonjurors. The first was the translation of a Greek treatise, supposed to have been by Nicephorus, and which was published in 1691. Among the replies to this was A Vindication of the Deprived Bishops, by Dodwell. Hody answered his opponents in the following year by The Case of Sees Vacant by Uneconanical Deprivation. Hody also wrote a work on the Septuagint, The Resurrection of the Body Asserted, etc.

Hohenlohe-Waldenburg, Alexander, Prince of [b. 1794, d. 1849].—A priest of the Roman Church [1816], of desultory education and somewhat eccentric character. After his ordination he laboured hard and conscientiously in Bavaria, and falling in with a peasant who professed to heal the sick by faith and prayers, the prince-priest also began to work miraculous cures. He made an immense sensation, but the authorities were incredulous, and the Pope, being appealed to by him, dared not recognise the miracles. He retired to Hungary and was made bishop in partibus infidelium in 1814, but was expelled by the revolutionists in 1848. His alleged miraculous powers formed the subject of much discussion after his death.

Hohenstaufen.—The House of Swabia furnished to the "Holy Roman Empire" the powerful line of emperors which succeeded the House of Franconia [q.v.]. It took its name from the castle of Staufen, in Swabia. On the death of the last Emperor of the Franconian line, his son-in-law, Frederick of Staufen, aimed to succeed him, but was opposed by Lothar of Saxony, and this Prince being supported by Henry, Duke of Bavaria of the House of Guelph, succeeded in reigning. Under Lothar, German influence greatly increased, the fierce Wends were converted to Christianity, and Brandenburg was added to the Empire. After him came Conrad III., of Hohenstaufen [1138–52], and the war of the Welfs, or Guelphs, and Ghibellines began [GUELPHS AND GHI BELLINES]. After Conrad his nephew reigned, Frederick Barbarossa [1152–90], one of the most heroic figures of the Middle Ages. He made fierce war upon Northern Italy, with a view of restoring the Imperial power there, but did not succeed. He was drowned in Asia Minor on his way to the Third Crusade. Philip of Swabia [1198–1208], his son, was succeeded by Otto IV. of Brunswick, who was supported against the Hohenstaufen by Pope Innocent III. Frederick II. [1212–50], also King of the Two Sicilies, was a prince of great gifts, but passionate and headstrong. The war between him and the spiritual powers was fiercer than any that had been before, and it ended in the ruin of the House. The tragedy of the remaining members of the family is a sad and touching chapter of history. After the fall of the House of Hohenstaufen there was for a while anarchy in Germany. It was ended by the accession of the House of Hapsburg in 1273, under entirely altered conditions. Italy was lost to the Empire, and the German nobles had made themselves independent princes. [HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE; POPES.]

Holiness. [SANCTIFICATION.]

Holy Cross Day.—A black-letter day in the Calendar, Sept. 14th. [Cross.]

Holy Ghost.—The Third Person in the Trinity. The Holy Ghost is declared by the Creeds to be a real and distinct Person in the Godhead; "the Lord (i.e. Jehovah) and Giver of life, Who proceedeth from the Father and the Son, Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, Who spake by the Prophets." He is that Spirit of God which "moved upon the face of the waters" [Gen. i. 2] and caused them to bring forth living creatures. It is His office to sanctify or make us holy. The Church Catechism says, He "sanctifieth me and all the elect people of God," and the second collect for Good Friday, "by whose Spirit the whole body of the Church is governed and sanctified." When God created Adam, He breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; but Adam sinned, and then it needed an extraordinary means to carry on the influence of the Holy Spirit within sinful men. This means was found in the Incarnation of the Son of God, miraculously born of the Virgin Mary by the power of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit of God came to us through the Son made flesh, the Son sanctifying our sinful flesh by bearing that

Holy Roman Empire. — The title given to the Western Empire which was revived by Charlemagne [Charles], the first adjective being given to differentiate it from the ancient Empire under the heathen Cæsars. Thus was formed a government which had its historical basis in the memories of the great and mighty Empire of the past, but with which was linked the expressed devotion to the invisible and Catholic Church. This Empire lasted, though with strange and vast modifications, until it was overthrown by Napoleon in 1806. We can but indicate here its successive epochs. The mutual relations of the Popes and the Emperors were left vague at the beginning of the Empire, and probably, had the controversy been definitely raised whether the supreme authority lay in the Crown or the Tiara, opinion would at once have been divided. Circumstances afterwards brought the question to the front, and more than one most bitter struggle resulted. Under the descendants of Charles, known as the Carolingians, or Karlings, the Empire was divided into three portions—the East or German, the West or Frankish, and the Italian. The Franks became permanently separated, and formed a new and powerful monarchy. Italy was re-united and again separated, and some of the fiercest wars of the Empire arose from the endeavours of the Emperors to conquer and retain the Italian States. During the Karling dynasty in Germany there was a growth of the powers of great princes, which became Feudalism, the result of which was the disintegration of the unity of the Empire. France, which at the end of the Karling rule was broken into a number of independent States, was brought by succeeding monarchs into a close unity; but with Germany it was altogether the opposite. The German Karlings were succeeded in turn by the Saxon, the Franconian, and the Swabian dynasties [see under each], and all the while the disintegration went on. The Emperors and Popes were often in deadly conflict. [Gueulefs and Ghibellines.] Italy was lost to the Empire, and when the House of Hapsburg succeeded, at the end of the thirteenth century, all the old conditions were changed. The Reformation still further upset the mediaeval theory of the Empire. The dissolution of the League of Smalkald seemed to lay the whole country prostrate before Charles V., but suddenly the news came that North Germany was in revolt, and it soon became evident that Germany was divided into two strong parties which no force could weld into one, and that the Emperor was no longer a recognised centre for judicial purposes. And thus the old Germanic State system vanished away. The Emperor sought to further his own ends by alliance with the Jesuits, and the Protestants retaliated by making alliance with France. The dissensions of Germany culminated in the Thirty Years' War [q.v.], and the Empire declined rapidly. Large territories were lost, some to France, some to Sweden, while Holland and Switzerland were declared independent. But within the Empire also the States had won a far larger independence than they had ever had. Thus the Empire grew to be as feeble as had been the Byzantine in its last days, until at length Napoleon crumbled it.

Holy Rood.—The term “rood” [from the Saxon rōd, or rod] anciently signified a cross. [For Holy Rood Day, see Cross.]

Holy Thursday. [Ascension Day.]

Holy Water.—The use of holy water by the Roman Catholics probably takes its origin from the ancient ceremonial of washing the hands, which was an ordinance among the Jews, and also among the heathen a natural symbol of spiritual purification. The priests exercise water and salt with the idea that all creation has been corrupted by the Fall, and then mix them in the name of the Trinity. Holy water is placed in vessels near the doors of the churches, that people may sprinkle themselves on entering and retiring. It is used at almost every ordinance.

Holy Week, called also the “Great Week,” and the “Indulgence Week” [from the great absolution at Easter], is the last week in Lent, in which the Church commemorates Christ’s Death and Burial. Its observance is of very early date, and is mentioned by Irenæus in the second century. In the English Church special lessons, epistles, and gospels are appointed for every day in the week, and are taken from the accounts of our Lord’s Passion, or from the Old Testament prophecies of it. In the Roman Church the matins and lauds sung on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Holy Week are called Tenebrae [q.v.], because of the extinction of candles during the singing of the Benediclus. The Thursday in Holy Week is called Maundy Thursday, a rendering of the old name...
Dies Mandati, which commemorated the "new commandment," or mandate given by our Lord in connection with the washing of the disciples' feet. It is the custom in the Romish Church for the Pope to wash the feet of thirteen poor priests on this day. This is accompanied by the giving of alms, which custom is carried on in the English Church by the Queen's "Maundy Money." Before the sixth century there used to be an evening Communion on this day in memory of the first institution, and penitents and excommunicated persons were reconciled in preparation for the evening Communion. [GOOD FRIDAY.]

Holzhauser, Bartholomew [b. in Germany, 1618].—He made good progress in philosophy and divinity at the University of Ingolstadt. In 1640 he went to Salzburg, where he formed a society of secular priests called after him Bartholomites. The Elector of Mainz invited him to bring his Order into his diocese, and made him Dean of Bingen, near Mainz, where he remained till his death in 1658. Pope Innocent XI. confirmed the constitution of this Order in 1680. One peculiarity of it was that the brethren never worked singly, but always in pairs. They spread through many German towns, and also in Spain and Poland, but they did not last beyond the eighteenth century. They had under them three sorts of houses; seminaries for the instruction of young priests; houses for beneficed and other priests; and houses for aged people who were past work.

Homilies [lit. "intercourse"].—A very early name for the free and conversational discourses by the bishop, or, less frequently, by his presbyters, for the instruction, or exhortation, of the faithful. [See also SERMON.] From one cause or another (e.g. want of time for preparation, or the like) the practice very soon grew up, and was fully recognised by the authorities, of delivering the already published homilies of the Fathers instead of freshly written or extemporary addresses, especially, it would seem, in the Gallican Church. Hence the term "homily" in English has gradually come almost always to signify only such collections of discourses set forth under authority for the clergy's use. At the Reformation such volumes were promulgated in England, one in 1547 and the other in 1559, and the Prayer Book rubric still authorises their use. Of late years a commendable attempt has been made to revive the practice of occasionally reading written sermons for young or over-worked clergy, the principal impulse in this direction having been given by an express direction of the Bishop of Lichfield in 1884 to this effect.

Homologoumena [i.e. "those which are generally accepted"].—An expression used by Eusebius in distinction from ANTILEGOMENAE [q.v.] [i.e. "those which are spoken against"], and applied by him to the book of the New Testament. He makes the homologoumena to be the Gospels, the Acts, the Epistles of St. Paul, 1 Peter and 1 John.

Homogusian.—A Greek term translated in the Nicene Creed "Of one substance with," and used by the orthodox in the Arian controversy to express the essential oneness of nature (not person) that exists between God the Father and God the Son. This very same term had previously been condemned as tending to support the identity of the First and Second Persons in the Blessed Trinity. In the ante-Nicene period much of the difficulty arises from the free and indiscriminate use of the two phrases, OUSIA and HYPOSTASIS [q.v.], and in post-Nicene times from the very attempts that were made at a close logical definition of so subtle a point. In process of time a compromise was sought to be effected by the proposal to substitute the term homogusion, "of like nature," and even homœon, "like," simply, which might be either the Catholic or the Arian interpretation. But these attempts at conciliation only met with the usual reward of increased strife and bitterness. [ARIANISM.]

Homoion. [HOMOGUSION.]

Homoiosion. [HOMOGUSION.]

Hone, William [b. 1779, d. 1842], was an enterprising printer, author of some entertaining works, which are still valued, viz.
Every-Day Book, Year Book, Table Book.
Unhappily he professed early in life atheistic opinions, in consequence of an antipathy to the Bible, brought on, as he declared, having to learn by heart chapters of the Bible for childish faults. On one occasion he threw the volume down-stairs, exclaiming, "When am my own master I will never open you And he kept his word for thirty years.

He came to London early, and after man ups and downs became a poor bookseller. I first came prominently before the world the author of three parodies on portions of the Prayer Book, in consequence of which he was indicted for blasphemy, and was tried and found guilty of three separate indictments, in 1817. Thou a shy and timid man, he defended himself with wonderful skill and intrepidity again the legal talent employed against him, and against the hot partisanship of two judges. The jury, rightly believing that the prosecution was solely for his political opinions, acquitted him, and Hone from that time suppressed his parodies, in spite of a tempting offer of money, lest he should open to the charge of ridiculing religio One day, stopping as usual at an old boos stall, he took up Jones on the Canon of Scripture, and found the stories of the "Apocryphal Gospels." He discovered that they illustrate old prints in his possession, and he ma
a collection of them, which he published under the title of The Apocryphal New Testament. It consists of certain "Gospels," forgeries of the early heretics, such as "the Gospel of Nicodemus," "the Gospel of the Infancy," and of the epistles of Clement, Ignatius, and Polycarp, and the Shepherd of Hermas. Again an outcry was raised against his atheism, and this drove him to break through the neglect of thirty years, and to recommence the reading of the Bible. The result was that, to use his own expression, "a flood of light burst in upon him," and he turned away from his atheism for ever. Some time afterwards he was told that his Apocryphal New Testament had done service to the cause of religion by showing on what good ground the Church had proceeded in framing the canon. He replied with the humility of true repentance, "It is true, but I did not so intend it." After some time of study and prayer he joined the congregation of the Weigh-House Chapel, and on New Year's Day, 1835, received the Lord's Supper there. The rest of his life was spent in quiet work. He had always been, and continued to the end, a poor student, bright and cheerful with his books, and apparently unfit for any other occupation. But his doubts were at an end, and his last days were peaceful and happy until his death, which took place quietly at Tottenham, with the expression of his humble but unfailing hope in the propitiation of Christ.

Honorary Canons. [Canons, Honorary.]

Honoris. [Popes.]

Honoris.—A Roman monk, nominated Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Gregory the Great, and consecrated at Lincoln by Paulinus, Archbishop of York, A.D. 627. On this occasion it was arranged that upon his death the Archbishop, either of Canterbury or of York, the surviving prelate should be authorised to consecrate the Metropolitan of the other See, that so, for the future, the fatigue of travelling to Rome might be prevented. Honorious consecrated Felix, a Burgundian, as Bishop of the East Angles. Archbishop Honorious was the first who divided his province into parishes, the care of which he committed to priests or clergy of the second Order. He died about the year 653.

Hood.—The hood as worn in England is partly derived from the monastic caputianum, and partly from the Amice [q.v.]. It is an ornament of silk or stuff worn by the graduates of universities to mark their degrees. It was formerly, as the name implies, attached to the cope or some other vestment, and could be drawn over the head in case of rain or cold. In the universities the hoods of the graduates were made to signify their degrees by varying the colours and materials.

The following are the theological and learned hoods of the principal Universities:

B.A.—Black stuff trimmed with (Oxford, Cambridge, Durham, Dublin) white fur; (Lampeter) white fur with black spots.

M.A.—Black silk, lined with silk; (Oxford) crimson; (Cambridge, Aberdeen, Edinburgh) white; (London) russet brown; (Dublin) dark blue; (St. Andrews and Glasgow) red.

B.D.—Black silk lined with (Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham) glossy black silk; (St. Andrews) violet purple silk lined with white satin; (Edinburgh) black lined with purple silk, bordered with white fur; (Glasgow) black silk, bordered with velvet, lined with red silk; (Lampeter) lining of pure silk.

D.D.—Scarlet cloth lined with (Oxford) black silk; (Cambridge) pink silk; (Dublin) scarlet cloth, lined with black silk; (Edinburgh) black, lined with purple silk; (St. Andrews) violet cloth, lined with white satin; (Durham) scarlet cashmere, lined with purple silk; (Glasgow) black velvet, lined with red purple silk; (Aberdeen) purple cloth, lined with white silk.

D.C.L.—(Oxford) scarlet cloth, lined with pink silk; (Durham) as D.D., only lined with white silk.

LL.D.—(Cambridge and Dublin) scarlet cloth, lined with pink silk; (London) lining of blue silk; (St. Andrews) lining of white satin; (Glasgow) black velvet, lined with Venetian red silk; (Edinburgh) black cloth, lined with blue silk.

The theological colleges have also assumed distinctive hoods, some apparently of their own motion, others by assignment from the Bishops.

By the fifty-eighth canon it is stated that every minister saying the public prayers or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the Church, if a graduate, shall wear upon his surplice at such times such hood as by the order of the university is agreeable to his degree.

Hood, E. Paxton, an eminent Congregational minister, began his ministerial life in 1852 at North Nibley, Gloucestershire, supporting himself (for his congregation was very poor) by lecturing and authorship. His Lamps of the Temple has passed through several editions. In 1855 he was invited to the pastorate of Offord Road, Barnbury, and subsequently he had a brief ministry at Manchester, and also at Brighton, last of all settling at Falcon Square Chapel, in the City. On Sunday, June 7th, 1885, he took leave of his congregation, preaching from the text, "Ready to depart on the morrow," and next day started for the Continent in search of rest, but on the following Friday he died in Switzerland.

Hook, Walter Farquhar, Dean of Chichester, was born at Worcester in 1798, his father being Dean there. The brilliant but unprincipled journalist, Theodore Hook, was his father's brother. He was educated at Winchester, and became a student at Christ Church, Oxford. He was ordained in 1821, and was at his father's church of Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight, till 1825, when he became Lecturer to St. Philip's, Birmingham. In 1827 he was appointed Chaplain to George IV., a post which he continued to hold under William IV. and her present Majesty. He remained at St. Philip's for three years, and then went to Coventry, becoming vicar of Holy Trinity. Ten years after he was promoted to the vicarage of Leeds. He at once began to rebuild the parish church at a cost of £30,000, and in 1841 obtained an Act of Parliament to enable him to sub-divide the parish. In the course of twenty-two years he built twenty-one churches, increased the number of clergy from twenty-five to seventy, and displayed a like vigour of organisation in every direction. In 1838 he preached a sermon before the Queen from the text "Hear the Church," which passed through twenty-eight editions, but which is said to have given great offence to her Majesty, as it argued that the power to minister in holy things came from God, and not from the State. In 1859 he was appointed by Lord Derby to the Deanery of Chichester, where he remained till his death, in October, 1875. In views he was a High Churchman of the old school. He was a prolific writer, and many of his books are forgotten, but there are some that will live—his Ecclesiastical Biography, Church Dictionary, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury from Augustine to Juxon, Christian Taught by the Church Services.

Hooker, Richard, one of the most powerful and valued writers of the Church of England, was born at Heavitree, near Exeter, according to Walton in 1553, but according to Wood about Easter-tide, 1554. His parents were not rich, and he was destined for a trade; but his schoolmaster discerned more than ordinary talent in the boy, and his uncle, John Hooker, then Chamberlain of Exeter, brought him under the notice of Jewell, Bishop of Salisbury, who got him admitted in 1567 to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, where he settled on him a pension, which, with a subsidy from his uncle, enabled him to live comfortably. In 1571 he lost both his patron, Bishop Jewell, and his pension; but two other friends were raised up for him in Dr. Cole, the President of his college, and Dr. Sandys, Bishop of London, who sent his son Edwin to him as a pupil at Oxford. In 1577 he was elected a Fellow of his college, and two years later Deputy Professor of Hebrew. In 1581 he was ordained, and was appointed to preach at Paul's Cross. The next year he made an imprudent marriage with Joan, the daughter of Mr. John Churchman, with whom he lodged on first coming to London; Wood says "she was a clownish, silly woman, and withal a mere Xantippæ." His marriage forced him to give up his Fellowship, and he maintained himself as well as he could till the end of 1584, when he was presented to the rectory of Drayton-Beanchamp, in Buckinghamshire. The way in which he submitted himself to the ordering of his wife was both amusing and pathetic. He seems, indeed, to have had no will of his own, either in the choice of a spouse or in the management of his household. He tended the sheep in his paddock whilst his servant dined or helped his wife in household duties, or he diligently rocked his little one's cradle at her bidding when his friends desired his company to enter into philosophical disputation.

Still it may be questioned whether the good man's meekness and patience were natural to him. They seem rather to have been acquired by a hard struggle with a really impetuous disposition. He was certainly not as childishly ignorant of human nature and of the ordinary business of life as his biographers appear to have imagined him. Judging from his works, he must have been quick to observe and shrewd to judge, although it is quite possible for a man to have one character as an author, and another as a man of the world.

At Drayton-Beanchamp he was visited by his old pupil, Edwin Sandys, who represents Hooker's poverty to his father, now becomes Archbishop of York, and through his influence he was made Master of the Temple in 1586. At this time Walter Travers was Afternoon Lecturer at the Temple, and he having been ordained by the Presbytery at Antwerp, was warmly attached to the Geneva divinity; this, he wanted to introduce into the Temple, and it brought him into frequent collision with Hooker, whom he often opposed in his sermons, and who naturally retaliated, so that it was said, "The forenoon sermon spak Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva. Archbishop Whitgift at length caused Travers to be silenced by the High Commission. He appealed to the Privy Council without effect and then brought the matter before the public. Hooker published an answer, which was inscribed to the Archbishop, and procure him as much reverence and respect from son as it did neglect and hatred from others. In order, therefore, to undeceive and win the latter, he entered upon his famous work, T. Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, and laid the foundation and plan of it while he was the Temple. But he found this no fit place to carry out his design, and he therefore treated the Archbishop to remove him to a quieter post. In 1591 he was presented the living of Boscombe, in Wiltshire, and the same year made Prebendary of Netheraven, in Salisbury Cathedral, and also Su Dean. While at Boscombe he finished his books, which were printed in 1594. In 1595 Queen Elizabeth presented him to the recto of Bishopsbourne, near Canterbury, where spent the remainder of his life. Here the nobleness and sanctity of his life were so remarkable that many turned out of their ro

o see him; he lived a life of study, attending diligently to his duties as parish priest. He died in 1600, in the forty-sixth year of his age. He published the fifth volume of his great work in 1597. The remaining three did not appear till after his death. These are thought to be imperfect, but there can be no doubt of their authenticity.

His writings are characterised by a "quiet and sustained majesty of style; and more, perhaps, than all, by the deep awe with which sacred things are approached." He introduces abrupt historical sketches into the body of his argument, the manipulation of which he manages with great skill, and his earlier writings are not wanting in a humorous layfulness that bespeaks the kindliness of his nature as well as the wit of the controversialist. Judicious is indeed the term by which it works and himself may be best described. Brought up in a Puritan atmosphere, and always inspired with a sincere dread of what he regarded as the errors of Rome, he could not find himself to the mistakes of Puritanism, or undervalue the Catholic opinions and practices which were associated with Romanism. He refused to throw away the true, He was bold in his confidence in the doctrine of Catholicism because it had been mingled with the alloy of superstition, nor did he allow his prejudices to overcome his sense of what was right.

His Life by Walton is one of the English classics. At Bishopsbourne is still shown the study in which he died, and round the garden of the beautiful parsonage is a yew hedge which he is said to have planted. In the register he is called, according to the custom of that time, "Master Richard Hooker." A memorial to him was set up a few years ago, on which occasion Dean Stanley preached one of his happiest sermons.

Hooper, John, Bishop of Gloucester, one of the martyrs in Queen Mary's reign, was born in Somersetshire about 1495, and educated at Oxford. Here he was converted to the opinions of Luther, and in 1540, being a danger of apprehension on this account, he fled in disguise first to Ireland and thence to Switzerland, where he became acquainted with Bullinger, the pupil and successor of Zwingli. On the accession of Edward VI. he returned to England in 1547, and in 1550 was elected Bishop of Gloucester, but for some time Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Ridley, Bishop of London, refused to consecrate him, as he would not conform to the established ritual, and he was even sent to the Fleet for denouncing those who used vestments as "superstitious." But at length, on the part of Warwick's intercession with Cranmer, and the King's desiring him to dispense with those matters as ceremonie, he yielded, the consecration took place, and he was settled in hissee. In 1552 the bishopric of Worcester was given him in commendam, its Bishop, Heath, being then a prisoner in the Fleet. He preached often, visited his diocese, was hospitable to the poor, and much beloved. As Soon as Mary came to the throne, he was sent for to London and committed to the Fleet, where he remained some months, was at length examined several times, and called on to recant his opinions in favour of clerical marriage and of divorce, and against the Mass. Refusing to do so, he was condemned to be burnt, and accordingly conducted back to Gloucester, where he suffered with great courage, on Feb. 9th, 1555. His works have been published both by the Parker Society and also by the Religious Tract Society.

Hopkins, John Henry, D.D. [b. 1792, d. 1865], Bishop of Vermont, in the United States. He was a zealous High Churchman, and the leader of that party in the American Church, as Bishop McIlvaine was of the Low Church. He is the author of Reformation of Miller's "End of Controversy," letters written to the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Baltimore. It is a work not known in England as much as it deserves to be, for it has great merit. Bishop Hopkins was the presiding Bishop of the American Church at the time of the Pan-Anglican Synod which met at Lambeth in 1867, and he took a leading part in its discussions.

Horne, George, D.D., Bishop of Norwich [b. at Oatham, near Maidstone, 1731; d. 1792]. He gained a scholarship at University College, Oxford, took his B.A. in 1749, and in the following year was chosen Fellow of Magdalen College. He took his M.A. in 1752, and was ordained the next year. He had great powers of preaching, being eagerly listened to, and his sermons are still largely read. In 1758 he was made Junior Proctor of the University, in 1768 President of Magdalen College, 1771 Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the King, 1776 Vice-Chancellor of the University, 1781 Dean of Canterbury, 1791 Bishop of Norwich. In 1760 he entered into a controversy with Dr. Kennicott on the Text of the Hebrew Bible, which the latter wished to collate with a view to a new English version. Horne opposed this on the ground that sceptics and heretics, who were ever busy in finding imaginary corruptions in the Text of Scripture, would be yet more emboldened to cavil and criticise. Horne belonged to the sect of the Hutchinsonians [q.v.]. In 1776 he published a Commentary on the Psalms, a work which had been under his consideration for twenty years. His plan was to give—[1] An analysis of the Psalm, by way of argument; [2] a paraphrase on each verse; [3] the substance digested into a prayer. The style is accomplished, and shows great vigour of mind. His Letters on Infidelity were written to confute David Hume. His Works were edited and his Life written by Jones of Nayland.
Horne, Thomas Hartwell, D.D. (1780–1862), received his education at Christ's Hospital, and then became a barrister's clerk. He took Holy Orders in 1819, and for several years was Assistant Librarian at the British Museum. By Archbishop Howley he was ordained, and became a Prebendary of St. Paul's in 1831, and two years later Rector of St. Edmund the King and St. Nicholas Acons, in Lombard Street. His literary talent was great, and he is to be specially remembered as the author of An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, a very valuable work, which helped greatly to further the study of the Bible in its day, but has now been superseded by such works as Kitto's and Smith's Cyclopaedias, and the Biblical works of Dean Stanley. The Bibliographical Appendix is particularly useful.

Horsley, Samuel, an English bishop, was born in London in 1733, and educated at Westminster, and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1758 he became curate to his father at Newington Butts, and soon after succeeded to the rectory, which he held, together with other preferments, for thirty-four years. In 1767 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society, to which body he was made secretary in 1773. He wrote many scientific books, and brought out, in 1776, a complete edition of Sir Isaac Newton's works. In 1781 he was appointed Archdeacon of St. Albans. A few years before he had started a controversy with Dr. Priestley, attacking his History of the Corruptions of Christianity, and renewed the contest in a Charge delivered in 1783. Dr. Priestley replied, which led to a rejoinder from Dr. Horsley, in Seventeen Letters to Dr. Priestley, which gained for him a great reputation. He was presented with a prebendal stall in Gloucester, and in 1788 he was made Bishop of St. David's. He was translated to Rochester in 1793, and to St. Asaph in 1803. He died in 1806. He was reckoned the most brilliant preacher of his day. Dr. Houghton describes a remarkable scene, on the occasion of his preaching on the 30th of January ("King Charles the Martyr"), 1783, nine days after the death of Louis XVI., in which, after an impassioned description of the scenes through which that hapless King had passed, he went on to say that his own country had set the frightful example, and the whole congregation sprang to their feet in uncontrollable emotion.

Among his religious works we may mention a Commentary on Hosea, Psalms Translated from the Hebrew, Biblical Criticism of Fourteen Historical Books of the Old Testament, and several sermons.

Hosanna.—A Hebrew word signifying "Save now," or "Save, I beseech thee." The Jews call the feast of Tabernacles "Hosanna Rabba," or the "Great Hosanna," because they pray for the forgiveness of all the sins of the people on that day. The willow branches used at the feast are also so named.

Hospital.—A place where the poor are entertained and supported. In the earliest age of Christianity the bishop had the care of the poor, and directed the provision for the widows, strangers, orphans, and the sick. Afterwards, when the Church had settled revenues, a fourth part was assigned to the poor, and houses, now called hospitals, were built on purpose to receive them. Priests and deacons had the management of the estate and the government of the place, but had render an account of their trust to their bishop. The founders of some of these hospitals gave the government of them to monks and nun and exempted them from the jurisdiction of their bishops, and thus, as the force of religion decayed, and discipline was relaxed, some of the clergy who had the government of the hospitals converted them into benefices, and declared no account to their diocesan, and kept the greater part of the income for their own use, so that the design of the founders was defeated. For this reason the Council of Vienne forbade the giving of hospitals and the title of benefices to secular clerks, as deemed that the management of them should be put in the hands of trustworthy laymen who should be bound to render an account of their respective Ordinaries; but there was a clause protecting the rights of the militia Orders and other hospitals. This decree was confirmed by the Council of Trent.

The first complete hospital of which we have record was built by Basil the Great, near Caesarea, mostly for lepers. St. Chrysostom also spoke much on the maintenance of a hospital at Constantinople, and it is evident that in the middle of the fifth century there was an organised system for providing for the poor. One of the so-called Arabic canons of Nice provides that the bishop, by virtue of his office, shall institute hospitals. Paulinus Nola founded a hospital, and St. Jerome built one for the reception of the sick and strangers at Bethlehem, and his friend Fabiola, according to him, the founder of the hospital in Rome. Hospitals existed in Gaul at the time of St. Remi, i.e. the fifth century. The establishment of many of the hospitals in the northern countries of Europe was due to the Irish missionsaries, who for this reason were called Hospitalia Scotorum (Scotti meaning at this time the Irish); they were usually closely connected with the monasteries.

Hospitalier. [Military Orders.]

Host [Lat. hostia, "a victim"].—The bread used by the Roman Catholic Church in the celebration of the Eucharist. It is unleavened, thin, and of circular form, and has certain mystic signs imprinted on it.

Hot Cross Buns.—Buns with the figure of the cross impressed upon them, common used in England for breakfast on Good Friday. These buns are said to be derived from the ecclesiastical Eulogie, or consecrated bread, formerly bestowed as a token of amity, or sent to those who were hindered from receiving the Host, and which were marked with a cross.

Hours, Canonical. [Canonical Hours.]

Housel.—An old Saxon name of the Holy Eucharist.

Howe, John [b. 1630, d. 1705].—He was born at Loughborough, in Leicestershire. His father had been instituted to this parish by Archbishop Laud, but was afterwards thrust out by him for siding with the Puritans, and fled to Ireland, taking his son with him. Being driven thence by the Irish Rebellion, they returned to England and settled at Lancaster, where young Howe received his early education. He then went to Christ's College, Cambridge, and having taken his B.A., removed to Brasenose, Oxford. He then became Fellow of Magdalen College while the famous Dr. Thomas Goodwin was President. He was ordained at Winwick by Charles Herle, in the days of the Presbyterian dominance. In 1652 he was called to minister at Great Torrington, in Devonshire. His biographer, Edmund Calamy, goes at length into the description of the services he would hold, one after another, without any help, on the public fast days, "a sort of service that few would have gone through without inexpressible weariness to themselves and their auditories." While on a visit to London, Howe went one day as a hearer to Whitehall Chapel; Cromwell, whose eyes were everywhere, first noticed him on account of his country dress, and then discerning something more than ordinary in his face, sent a messenger desiring him to remain and speak with him after the service. Cromwell then desired him to preach before him the following Sunday; Howe pleaded as an excuse the inconvenience which his absence would occasion his people; but Cromwell would take no denial, and after hearing him preach three or four sermons, insisted, much against Howe's inclination, that he should become his domestic chaplain. He was also made Lecturer of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and there was hardly any man who was in an eminent public station in those critical times, and who was admitted to the knowledge of so many secrets as he, who was so free from censure in the changes which afterwards succeeded. He was very generous towards those whose religious opinions differed from his own, especially towards Dr. Seth Ward, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, and the celebrated Dr. Thomas Fuller. At the Restoration he returned to Torrington, but under the Act of Uniformity had to give up his post. The Bishop of Exeter pressed him to be re-ordained, but he would not. In 1671 he became domestic chaplain to Lord Massereene in Ireland, where his great learning and Christian temper procured him the friendship of the Bishop of Antrim, who allowed him to preach, without demanding any conformity, in the Public church every Sunday afternoon. In 1675 he was called to minister to a Dissenting congregation in Silver Street, London. In 1685 the prospects of the Dissenters being most gloomy, Howe accepted an invitation to travel with Lord Wharton, and after a time he settled himself with his family in Utrecht; here he was visited by Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, and he was honoured with several interviews with William, Prince of Orange. In 1687 he was induced by the "Declaration of Liberty of Conscience" to return to England, and at the Revolution in the following year, he, with other Dissenting ministers, brought an address to the Throne, which was most graciously received. Howe took warm interest in the debates which arose among the Dissenting ministers after the Revolution, especially in the controversies upon the doctrine of the Trinity, and about Occasional Conformity. He died April 2nd, 1705, and was buried in Allhallows Church, Bread Street. His published works are very numerous; the greatest is The Good Man the Living Temple of God. His Life was written and his Complete Works published in 1724 by Calamy.

Howley, William, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1763, d. 1848], the son of the vicar of Ropley, Hants, was educated at Winchester and Oxford. He became Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford in 1809, and in 1813 Bishop of London. Next year he published his first charge, in which he spoke strongly against the Unitarians, and was angrily answered by Belsham, who accused him of "enforcing the slavish doctrines of Popery rather than the free and inquiring spirit of Protestantism." His reply was calm and moderate, and the more telling on that account. "The first duty of a Christian," he said, "is to approach the oracles of Divine truth with humble docility, with prostration of the intellect and the will." In 1828 he was nominated by the Duke of Wellington, who was then Prime Minister, to the Primacy, and proved his independence by opposing the Duke on Roman Catholic Emancipation. He afterwards opposed Parliamentary Reform. He was a faltering and hesitating speaker, and, moreover, wrote very little, yet his primacy was an important one. He was a good scholar, and, moreover, a good administrator, and is said to have largely influenced the Court against lax notions of Sunday observance. He was most careful to support the dignity of his office with the outward signs of it, and exercised a hospitality which probably has never been surpassed. Like the munificent prelates of old, he was a great builder. His palaces at Fulham, Lambeth, and Addington were enlarged by him, and great portions rebuilt; so were several parish churches. But better even than these things was his method of distributing the vast patronage which then belonged to his see. He surrounded himself in a way that few of his predecessors had done with the ablest and most learned theologians, men like Hugh J. Rose, John Lonsdale, Drs. Mill and Molesworth, Hartwell Horne. Though a strong Conservative, he co-operated with the Whig Government in the foundation of the Ecclesiastical Commission. In its primary the Oxford movement began, and all the Tracts for the Times were published; he watched the progress of the movement keenly, and one of his chaplains, Rose, was one of the early writers. But his calm judgment co-operated with the timidity engendered by age, and he took little part in the controversy which arose. Towards the end of his life, however, he issued a pastoral intended as a Eirenicon.

Howson, John Saul, Dean of Chester [b. 1816, d. 1886]. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took a double first-class as B.A. in 1837; M.A. in 1841, and D.D. in 1861. He took Orders in 1845, and in 1849 became Principal of the Liverpool College. In 1866 he was appointed vicar of Wisbech, and in the following year Dean of Chester, which post he held till his death. He was the author of many books, among them The Life and Epistles of St. Paul, which he wrote in conjunction with the Rev. W. J. Conybeare; Hulsean Lectures for 1862; Scenes from the Life of St. Paul; Metaphors of St. Paul; Companions of St. Paul, etc. He edited the Hera Paulina, and was a contributor to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible and The Speaker's Commentary. One of his best books came out the very week of his death, a work on the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels. But probably the work for which he will be most remembered hereafter will be his energetic and successful exertions in establishing the Order of Deaconesses in England. [DEACONNESSES.]

Hubert, Sr., made Bishop of Maestricht in 703, transferred the See to Liége in 721. He afterwards went as a missionary into the forest of Ardennes, where he made many converts. He died in 727. In the eleventh century prayers were particularly addressed to St. Hubert against madness. He is commemorated on Nov. 3rd. Roman Catholic writers say that in his youth he had a great passion for hunting, which caused him to neglect Divine Service, and that he was converted by the appearance in the forest of a stag bearing a crucifix between his horns, and warning him to escape eternal damnation.

Hubert Fitz-Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury from 1193—1207, was born at West Dereham, in Norfolk, in the twelfth century. His first considerable preferment was the Deanery of York, from whence he was promoted to the Bishopric of Salisbury in the first year of Richard I., who took him with him to the Holy Land, made him his executor, and, upon the death of Archbishop Baldwin, gave him the direction of the campaign. The King being taken prisoner by the Duke of Austria, Queen Anne procured the election of Hubert to the See of Canterbury, then vacant by the death of Richard Fitz-Jocelyn, and Hubert, in return, raised 130,000 marks for the King's ransom, upon the payment of which King Richard returned to England. In 1194, Hubert being furnished with legatine power, had the whole administration, both of spiritual and temporal affairs, in his hands; for, besides his archiepiscopal jurisdiction, he was Lord Chancellor and Chief Justice of England. Never (as the old historians report) have these posts been better filled than by Hubert Fitz-Walter, for he was a man of capacity, temper, and piety, and knew how to please the King without disabling the people. He was likewise sufficiently furnished with spirit to terrify evil men, and to crush faction and sedition. His suppression of the riots raised by Longbeard was an evidence of his ability; another was shown in his discovering and defeating the conspiracy of Earl John against his brother Richard. Upon King John's coming to the throne, Hubert was at first under disfavour, but afterwards, perceiving that he had great occasion for Hubert's advice and interest, John admitted him to favour, and put the administration of the kingdom into his hands at his going into Normandy. Hubert died at his manor of Teynham in 1207.

Hugh, Sr. [b. 1140, d. 1200], Bishop of Lincoln. He was born at Avalon, near Grenoble, and at an early age entered a priory of Regular Canons. At the age of eighteen he was ordained deacon, and some years later entered the Grande Chartreuse, at Grenoble, and here, after ten years' labour as a Carthusian monk, he gained the high office of Procurator. Henry II. of England, who was founding a monastery at Witham, in Somersetshire (the first Carthusian convent in this country), having heard of the fame of Hugh, with difficulty induced him to come over and become its Prior. In 1186, sorely against his will, he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and he then set himself with great earnestness and energy to the duties of his station. The year before his consecration Lincoln Cathedral had been destroyed by an earthquake, and Hugh rebuilt a great part of it. There was never a more zealous and indefatigable prelate; he is famous for his holiness, ability, and munificence. He died in London, and was buried at Lincoln Cathedral in a shrine behind the high altar.
The Kings of England and Scotland (John and William) met at his funeral, and there were also three archbishops, nine bishops, and other dignitaries present. He was canonised by Honorius III. in 1220.

Hugo d'Amiens.—So called from his birthplace. He entered the monastery of Cluny in 1113, and at one time came to England and was made Abbot of Reading; in 1130 he became Archbishop of Rouen, where he died in 1164. He made a great figure in his See, and wrote three books, Contra Haereticos, by way of pastoral instruction to fortify his clergy against the heterodoxies of that time.

Hugo de St. Victor.—A famous divine, Canon Regular and Prior of St. Victor. Some say that he was born near Ypres, in Flanders, others give Saxony as his birthplace. He was so learned in divinity that he was called the “Second St. Augustine.” He was very intimate with Bernard of Clairvaux; indeed, it was from him that latter learned the essential features of his mystical speculations. Hugo died in 1142, aged forty-four.

Huguenots.—The name given to the Protestant party in France in the sixteenth century. The word is supposed to have been derived from the German Eidgenossen, which means “confederates.” When first it was adopted by the French it had the form of Eguenots, and was changed later into that of Huguenots. The Huguenots first became conspicuous in France in the reign of Henry II., when a church was established for them in Paris. The acquisition to their party of Antoine of Bourbon, who afterwards became King of Navarre, gave them fresh influence; but, at the same time, the Cardinal of Lorraine was plotting persecution with which to root them out of the country. The Pope issued a Bull against the heretics; but so powerful had their party become that they dared to refuse to recognise it. Henry was very angry, and by the most severe measures tried to carry out the Pope’s orders. The Huguenots, however, appealed for help to the Protestants of Germany, and thus began that long, fierce religious struggle, of terrible persecution on the one hand and self-defence on the other, which for years desolated France, and had a terrible ending in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572. With the accession of Henry IV., and the publication of the Edict of Nantes, however, the fortunes of the Protestants improved. Though terribly lessened by the massacre, they rallied again under the toleration they received at the Court. But about the year 1619, in the reign of Louis XIII., fresh quarrels arose between the Huguenots and the Catholics. The former took up the cause of the Protestants of Béarn, who were suppressed and deprived of political rights by the Court party, and, as punishment, the Catholic party besieged the town of Rochelle, which in the last reign had been granted, with some others, to the Protestants. The Catholics were defeated, and were obliged to sign the Peace of Montpellier in 1622, in which the Edict of Nantes was confirmed, and the Protestants were allowed to assemble in religious, but not political, meetings. As on previous occasions, however, these engagements were practically ignored by the Catholic monarch. The head of the Catholic party at this time was Du Plessis, who soon after obtained a cardinal’s hat and took the name of Richelieu. From that time he proved a most powerful enemy to the Huguenots, and in 1627 planned a siege of Rochelle, still the Huguenot stronghold. James I. sent a small army to their aid, under the Duke of Buckingham; but it returned without accomplishing anything. In 1628 Richelieu led siege to Rochelle, and another expedition was on the point of leaving England when the Duke of Buckingham, commander of the troops, was assassinated at Portsmouth. They went across the Channel, fired a few ineffectual shots, and returned. At the end of a year the town yielded, on account of the ravages that famine had made among the inhabitants and defenders. In 1629 De Rohan, the head of the Huguenot party, who had led and governed them with great wisdom, was forced to yield, and from that time they ceased to have any military or political power in the State. To the end of the reign of Louis XIII., and through much of that of Louis XIV., they were allowed considerable liberty of conscience, and were accordingly peaceable and submissive to the Government. But Louis XIV. from the beginning of his reign regarded them with dislike, and towards the end of his reign attempted their final and total subjugation. Their clergy were forbidden to wear the ecclesiastical habit, or to attend the sick; their professors were not allowed to teach either philosophy or languages; and in 1685, by command of the King, the Edict of Nantes was revoked. This act proved the death-blow of the Huguenots in France. Vast numbers of them, probably nearly a million, including some of the most industrious and skilful of the population, left the country, many settling in London. [NANTES, EDICT OF.] The rest worshipped in lonely places, but they were subject to the most frightful persecutions, and capture exposed their ministers to the fate of being broken on the wheel. In 1787 an Edict of Toleration allowed the registry of Protestant births, marriages, and deaths, and forbade the disturbance of their worship. But the mischief had been done, and it is the opinion of all the best historians that France has never recovered, in national character and other ways, the loss of so many of the most serious, devout, and industrious of her citizens. In 1802 the Reformed Church was recognised by law.
Hulsean Professor and Lecturer, The.—The Rev. John Hulse, a graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge, who died in 1789, left by will, in trust for that university, a considerable property in Cheshire, which at the present time yields an income of about £1,000 a year. The original distribution, since considerably modified, was fourfold, and ran as follows:—[1] for two scholarships at his own college; [2] for a dissertation prize (now abolished); [3] for founding and supporting the office, once called that of Christian Advocate, but in 1860 altered to Hulsean Professor, who now receives eight-tenths of the whole income; and [4] for founding and supporting a similar office with a similar name, viz. Christian Preacher. This also has been altered into the Hulsean Lecturer, who has to deliver and publish not less than four sermons, nor more than six, during his year of office, upon Christian evidences, or some difficulty of Holy Scripture.

Humanitarians.—Those who acknowledge only the humanity of Christ, and deny His Divinity. This view of the nature of Christ is held by the modern school of Socinians in England.

Humanity, Religion of. [Positivism.]

Hume, David [b. 1711, d. 1776], philosopher and historian, received his education in his native town of Edinburgh, and was intended for the law, but found it un congenial to his tastes, as he had from earliest childhood conceived a passion for literature. He was then sent to a mercantile house in Bristol, but this he also disliked, and in 1754 he went over to France for three years, and here he began his literary career by writing his Treatise of Human Nature, published in London in 1738. This was a failure, but his Essays, the first portion of which was published in 1742, were favourably received. In 1747 he accompanied General St. Clair, as secretary, in an expedition to the coast of France, and in the next year in an embassy to Vienna and Turin. On his return to Scotland he published his Political Discourses and Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals. He became manager of the Advocates' Library, which gave him an excellent opportunity of consulting books for his History of England. The first volume, containing the reigns of James I. and Charles I., appeared in 1754; and the second, bringing the work down to the Revolution, followed. Then he went backwards through the Tudor period, and completed the work from the Roman period downwards in 1762. In 1763 he went to France as secretary to Lord Hertford's Embassy, and became acquainted with the Parisian wits and scholars. On his return home, in 1766, he became Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department. In 1775 his health began to fail, and he soon learned that his disorder must end fatally. So he made his will, and wrote My Own Life, a dignified farewell to the world. It is prefixed to his History of England. Hume was a clear thinker, laying all his investigations upon what he called the "experimental method," testing everything, as far as he knew how, by facts. In the first part of his Enquiry he condemns excessive scepticism, but in the third part he adopts what he calls "mitigated scepticism," on the ground that human understanding is limited in its capacity, and therefore we are not safe in establishing conclusions on bases which transcend common life. In thus conceiving the object and the limitations of philosophy, he showed himself the disciple of Locke. And no less, as Professor Huxley remarks, he is the protagonist of what is now called Agnosticism. His history is throughout a plea for Absolutism, and in this, again, he showed himself the disciple of Voltaire. That writer had made it his aim to pour ridicule on old chivalry and enthusiasm. The mingled faith and love of freedom which filled Joan of Arc was an offence to him, and he found it and wantonly slandered her memory; but in order to compensate for this, he truckled to the national admiration of great monarchs by glorifying Louis XIV. Hume wrote English history in the same spirit. As a moralist, his key-word is Utility. He writes agreeably and clearly always, but never deeply. When he comes upon questions transcending the worldliness on which his spirit is nurtured, he tosses them away contemptuously, laughs at the trouble and thought which his subject demands, and turns away to enjoy himself. He was so fond of France that he says he had often thought of settling there for life, and it is this predilection which explains his mental attitude. Hume was a man of the world, a lover of light literature, impatient of deep, perplexing questions, anxious to find a platform on which philosophy might stand along with easy, polite life and manners. A real belief in any interference of God with the affairs of men was an obstacle in the way of such a scheme, and he therefore endeavoured to get rid of it. There is little sign of any deeper reason or feeling—such as undoubtedly lies at the root of much of the scepticism of to-day—in Hume's Agnostic philosophy.

Humeral Veil.—An oblong scarf of the same material as the vestments, muffled round the hands of the acolyte when he holds the paten between the offertory and paternoster (as he may not touch it with bare hands), in the Roman Catholic service of the Mass. It is also worn by the priest when he gives benediction of the sacrament, and by the priests and deacons when they remove the sacrament from one place to another, or carry it in procession.
Humphry, William Gilson [b. 1815, d. 1886], was educated at Shrewsbury, under Dr. Butler, and then went to Cambridge. He gained the Pitt scholarship in 1835, and became Senior in the-Fields in 1839, and for a time was Assistant-Tutor, and then became Examining Chaplain to Bishop Blomfield. He was appointed to the vicarage of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields in 1855, and held it till his death. His reputation as a theologian was great. His chief publications are:—Commentary on the Acts, Huskian and Boyle Lectures, editions of Theophilus of Antioch and Theophylact on St. Matthew, a Commentary on the Prayer Book, and a volume on the Revised Version of the New Testament. Mr. Humphry was a member of the Clerical Subscription Commission and of the Ritual Commission, and was one of the revisers of the New Testament.

Hunnius, Giles [b. at Winnenden, in Württemberg, in 1550; d. at Wittenburg in 1603], was one of the most eminent divines of the Augsburg Confession. His reputation amongst his party was so great that when only twenty-six years old he was made Professor of Divinity at Marburg. In 1584 he printed a book against the Calvinists, and gained so much credit for it, that in 1592 he was sent for to Saxony to reform that electorate, and was here made Divinity Professor at Wittenburg, and a member of their ecclesiastical senate or consistory. He was ever on the watch to discover those who did not exactly come up to the terms of the Lutheran communion. Any person who refused to sign the form tendered him by Hunnius and his colleagues was reckoned a Calvinist, and had little mercy shown him. In 1595 Hunnius was made Superintendent of the Church at Wittenburg, in which year he had a great dispute with Huber about Election and Predestination. He was likewise one of the chief opponents of the Jesuits at the conference held at Ratisbon in 1602. He wrote many books: Calvinus Judaeana, De Persona Christi, etc.

Huntingdon, Selina, Countess of, one of the mainsprings of the Methodist movement of the last century, was the daughter of the 2nd Earl Ferrers, being born in 1707. When quite young she became the wife of Theophilus, 9th Earl of Huntingdon. The death of her husband took place in 1746, and this event, combined with the influence of the Methodist leaders under which she was soon brought, seems to have put the finishing stroke to the resolution that had gradually been growing up in her, to devote herself and her resources to the furtherance of that wonderful revival. Thenceforward she gradually withdrew from the gaieties and frivolities of fashionable society, and gathered around her at her various houses and chapels at Chelsea, Bath, and elsewhere, the most intellectual and distinguished men and women of the day, among whom such names as Lord Bolingbroke, Lord Chesterfield, and Horace Walpole may be mentioned. From 1748 onwards she had the support and help in this great but not always successful work, of that moving preacher, George Whitfield, who accepted her chaplain's scar. It was her custom to set up chapels under her own direct patronage and management in various parts of the kingdom, and she stretched her right as a peeress of the realm to multiply the number of her chaplains far beyond the proper limit, in order to keep these places of worship supplied with ministers. In this way there sprang up what is still known as Lady Huntingdon's Connexion. In 1768 she still further organised this movement by establishing at her own expense a seminary for the training of young men for the ministry at Trevecca, in Breconshire, where a gentleman of like views with herself, named Howell Harris, had some years before set up what he called a "family, of love," which proceeded on the Apostolic principle of community of goods; and here she spent the most of her remaining days. It was not till 1781 that the "Connexion" was finally cut adrift from its moorings under the shelter of the Established Church. Then at last a dispute about the status of her chapels and her chaplains compelled her to take refuge under the Toleration Act, and accept the privileges, if not the name, of Dissent—a step which, though inevitable, was much against her inclination. She continued to feel the strongest attachment to the Church of England, and, indeed, to the present day it is often difficult to detect in the dress of the ministers or in the services any divergence from those of an ordinary Evangelical Church congregation. In 1791 Lady Huntingdon ended her pious and active, though rather imperious, career, amid general sorrow. Her chapels and the College were left in charge of trustees. This latter was almost immediately removed to Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, where it is still in existence, though the college at Trevecca has since been revived by the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Connexion in Howell Harris's old house. Many of her chapels have since wholly adopted the Congregational system, and even those that retain her name are maintained on Congregational principles.

Huntington, William, a wonderfully popular preacher in his day, the leader of an Antinomian sect, was born in 1744, in the Weald of Kent, between Goudhurst and Cranbrook. He was the son of Barnabas Russel by the wife of a day-labourer named Hunt. He was sent to school by Russel, and then was adopted by Hunt, whose name he bore. He became a servant at Battle Abbey and at Fritenden, where he seduced a tradesman's daughter; and he changed his name to Huntington that he might elude inquiry after him. Somewhat later he added the initials "S.S.," or "Sinner Saved," after his name. He married and settled at Mortlake, and began to attend church. He gives an account of several visions which he saw at this time, in which he was told that he was saved, and all his temptations and sins left him. He now perceived, as he says, that church services were a mockery, and began to preach, and, according to his own account, found fish dead, in his master's pond and partridges in the garden, which enabled him to live well. On his dismissal he moved to Thames Ditton, where he gained his living by carrying coals and preaching, and so gained the name of the "Preaching Coalheaver." At last he determined to give up all employment and live by preaching alone. He at first encountered a little opposition, of which he gives an account in the Naked Bow of God, stating that all his enemies were punished by breaking their legs, losing their wits, etc. In another treatise, God the Guardian of the Poor, and The Bank of Faith, he relates how when he wanted any of the necessities of life they were always most opportunely brought him. One day the fact of his having left a child to the parish at Cranbrook became known, but he satisfied his followers by stating that many good men—as Abraham, David, St. Paul, etc.—had sinned, and yet were received of God. At last he resolved to come to London, and soon after built Providence Chapel, all the funds and fittings for which were given by his followers. He then gave up all the arts which he had before used to draw money from his flock, feeling that his pew-rents were enough to live handsomely on. He was attacked by Rowland Hill and also by Timothy Priestley, a zealous Calvinist, who opposed Antinomianism in a treatise called The Christian's Looking-glass, or the Timorous Soul's Guide, to which Huntington responded by The Barber, or Timothy Priestley Shaved, as Reflected from his own Looking-glass, which was full of coarse, bold invective. On the death of his wife Huntington married Lady Saunderson, the widow of a Lord Mayor, and rode about in a carriage, though he had formerly mocked at bishops for doing so. He died at Tunbridge Wells in 1813. His epitaph, which he wrote himself, ran thus:—

Here lies the Coalheaver
Beloved of his God, but abhorred of men.

The Omniscient Judge
At the Grand Assize shall ratify and Confirm this to the Confusion of many thousands;
For England and its Metropolis shall know
That there hath been a prophet
Among them.

Huntington's works were published in 20 vols. That he was a worthless rascal is clear from the details we have given, but that he had also a large command of vigorous English is equally plain. A very interesting essay upon him by Southey will be found in the Quarterly Review, vol. xxiv.

Hupfeld, Hermann, a great commentator on the Old Testament, was born at Marburg in 1796, and was appointed Professor of Theology there in 1825. He remained there for eighteen years, and then succeeded Gesenius at Halle, where he died in 1866. Though not belonging to the strictly orthodox school of Hengstenberg, he was pious and reverent in his treatment of the Bible, and his funeral oration was preached by Tholuck. His chief work is a commentary on the Psalms, and he also wrote on the sources of Genesis, which he regarded as the work of an original Elohist, edited and added to by a Jehovah editor.

Hurd, Richard, D.D., an English bishop, was born in Staffordshire in 1720, and died in 1808. He became Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and lived there till 1757, when he was presented to the rectory of Thurcaston, in Leicestershire. In 1765 he was made Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and in 1767 Archdeacon of Gloucester, by his friend Bishop Warburton. Hurd is best known through his connection with Warburton, whose Life he wrote as an introduction to an edition of his works. He was, however, a very polished scholar. In 1775 he was made Bishop of Lichfield, and in 1781 translated to Worcester. The Archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to him in 1783, but he declined it.

Huss, John [b. 1373, d. 1415].—His surname came from his native village Husseinetz, and was also the alias of goose, which caused frequent puns to be made on his name. He was the child of poverty, but his good-nature and intelligence gained for him the favour of the monks in an adjoining monastery, and by their advice his mother, who had been early left a widow, resolved to make an effort to bring him up to the Church. In this she had the aid of the feudal lord of the village, Nicholas of Hussenetz, who gave him his education. Very scanty details have been preserved of his college life in the then brilliant University of Prague; in 1401 he became Dean of the Faculty of Theology. In 1400 he was chosen Preacher at the University Chapel of Bethlehem, which had been endowed by two liberal Bohemians for the preaching of the Gospel in their native tongue. Huss embraced the opinions of Wycliffe, and proceeded to preach so plainly against the abuses of the Church that the clergy, headed by the Archbishop of Prague, appealed to King Wenceslaus to silence him. The King was too indolent to interfere, and, besides this, Huss had a friend in Sophia, the King's second wife, to whom he was confessor. In 1403 Pope Boniface IX. sent his officers to Bohemia to dispose of some indulgences, and Huss, in a bold sermon, condemned this outrageous abuse of ecclesiastical power, and thus commenced his career as a Reformer. Huss was next mixed up in a disturbance in the University, consequent on jealousy regarding the preference shown by the King for Germans over the native students. The University students were divided into four parties—Bohemians, Bavarians, Saxons, and Poles; so that foreign influence preponderated in the proportion of three to one, and the native students were usually excluded from all the higher academical offices. The struggle at last came on. Huss was one of their foremost leaders, and in 1406 they came to blows in the marketplace of Prague. It is thought that Huss did not intend this violence; he was not a violent man, but had violent followers, the chief of whom was Jerome of Prague [q.v.]. After a protracted contest, the triumph of the Bohemian party was complete. They obtained a decree from Wenceslaus in 1409, ordering that for the future the natives should have three votes in all academical matters, and the foreigners only one; the consequence was that several thousand students seceded from Prague and betook themselves to Leipzig and Erfurt. Huss now became the chief man in the University, and soon after the secession was made Rector, and proceeded to inculcate the doctrines of Wycliffe. The Papal Schism had at this period wearied out the patience of Christendom, and a vigorous effort was made to bring it to an end. It was hopeless to get any arrangement between the rival Popes—Benedict XIII. and Gregory XIII., and at last the King of France and the Paris University urged the Cardinals of both "obediences" to abandon the Pontiffs. They consented, and a General Council was convened, which met at Pisa in the spring of 1409, and held twenty-four sessions; both Popes were deposed, and a new Pontiff chosen under the name of Alexander V. The Schism, however, was not over. Huss took the part of the seceding Cardinals, and endeavoured to persuade the Bohemians to do likewise. This drew down on him the wrath of Shinko, Archbishop of Prague, who interdicted him from preaching; but, after the Council of Pisa, withdrew his opposition for a time. But in December, 1409, the Pope sent a Bull to the Archbishop, ordering him to proceed against heretics who should preach or teach the doctrines of Wycliffe. Huss was not named, but the prohibition was evidently levelled at him. The Archbishop publicly burned some 200 of Wycliffe's books, and he interdicted Huss from his sacerdotal functions. He appealed to the Pope (now John XXIII.), who referred the case to a cardinal, who cited the appellant to attend the Papal Court at Bologna. The King and Queen interfered to prevent so dangerous a journey, and delegates were appointed to try the matter in Prague. Huss's agents were imprisoned, and in due time he was excommunicated, and the city of Prague laid under an interdict, which was to continue so long as he remained there. The persecution of Huss had now begun in earnest. Frequent tumults occurred in the streets between his partisans and those who upheld Papal authority, and, being satisfied that the cause of peace required his departure, he at length retired to his native village, and placed himself under the protection of its feudal lord. Then we find him preaching from village to village, and sparing neither Pope nor Cardinal. At length, on the death of Shinko, he returned to Prague; his followers were falsely charged with having poisoned the Archbishop, which of course aggravated the hostilities between the parties. Huss next publicly opposed a Bull of Pope John, which had excommunicated Ladislaus of Hungary (one of the claimants to the throne of Naples), and called on all Christians to join a crusade against him. Huss refused, and then proceeded to attack indulgences, and to say that if the Pope abused his power, it became his duty to resist him. With the people Huss lost nothing by this declaration of disobedience, but his interest at Court was considerably damaged. Wenceslaus happened to be just then on ill terms with Ladislaus, and was willing to be backed by the power of Rome. The magistrates anxious to secure public peace, the clergy with a budget of old grievances against him, and even the heads of the University, took part with the Court. Huss next appointed a public discussion of two theses on the crusade, and on June 7th, 1412, a great concourse assembled, and a stormy scene followed. Huss's conduct is said to have been marked with moderation, but his friend Jerome was more violent; a furious tumult arose, and some of the Hussites having interfered with the Papal preachers, were imprisoned and put to death. Huss was absent from the city at the time of the execution, but the tragic affair produced the greatest excitement in Bohemia, and from this time Huss's attacks on the Popes and priests increased in violence; the kingdom became more than ever impregnated with his doctrines, and the opposition of the clergy grew more obstinate. Huss once more withdrew to the country, and while in retirement wrote his work on The Church, which is an epitome of his peculiar views and doctrines. At this time the meeting of the Council of Constance drew nigh, and Huss was summoned to appear before it. The object of this Council was to accomplish what the Council of Pisa had failed to do—the extinction of the schism and the reform of the clergy; but it was also bent on the suppression of heresy, and the alleged heresies of Huss were bruited all over Europe, and so it was deemed necessary that he should be summoned to answer for them. Huss was confined to bed by illness when the summons came, but he rose at once, full of joy at the prospect; and it seems afterwards from his letters that he was fully alive to the possible dangers which his friends immediately foreseen for him. In October, 1414, he took leave of his flock, having received from Wenceslaus a safe-conduct through his dominions; on his way he was met by a safe-conduct also from the Emperor Sigismund. The journey occupied twenty-three days, and was made on horseback, and in his progress he delivered addresses in Latin or German in the towns through which he passed. Arrived at Constance, Huss and his friends took up their abode in the great square near the Pope's residence, at the house of a widow named Fida, who is compared by Huss to the widow of Sarepta. For nearly a month he seems to have been unmolested, and then was summoned before the Pope and Cardinals. By them he was given over to a band of soldiers and placed in confinement near the Cathedral. His friend, John de Chlum, who had accompanied him, hurried off to Sigismund to tell him how his safe-conduct had been violated, and he sent orders to have Huss liberated on the instant; but the order was disobeyed, and instead he was removed on Dec. 5th to a damp vault in the prison of the Dominican monastery. From here he wrote from time to time to his friends in Bohemia, but at length his health gave way; and then the Pope sent commissioners to the prison to examine him on the charges brought against him by his enemies, and he was not allowed to employ any advocate in his defence. He was next removed to the Franciscan prison. His letters at this time are full of sweet resignation, abiding affection, and heroic firmness. His enemies succeeded in convincing Sigismund that he need not keep faith with a heretic, and absolved him from his promise of a safe-conduct. The Pope meantime had fled, and in March, 1415, his officers gave up the custody of Huss, and he was transferred to the Castle of Gotloben, on the Rhine, and placed in chains. His friend Jerome imprudently ventured to Constance, and he also was arrested and thrown into prison. The 8th of June was appointed for the public examination of Huss, though not till after an attempt had been made to get him condemned without a hearing. He was brought back to Constance, his books were shown him and acknowledged to be his; the reading of articles against him was commenced, and when he began to reply, his voice was drowned by an uproar. An attempt was made to induce him to confess and abjure his errors, and to swear never to teach them; but this he refused, and he was remanded to prison. On June 24th it was resolved to burn his books, in the hope of thus inducing him to yield; but it produced no effect. Feeling that his condemnation might come at any moment, Huss employed his time in writing letters of affectionate farewell and exhortation to his friends. On July 6th, the day he completed his forty-second year, he was condemned and burned at the stake. The ceremony of his degradation from the priesthood was first gone through; on his way to the stake he recited some of the Penitential Psalms, and prayed for the pardon of his enemies. Three times while the flames encircled him he was heard to exclaim, "Jesus, Son of the living God, have pity on me!" His ashes were thrown into the Rhine. Jerome of Prague suffered not long after his master, and the two martyrs became saints in the eyes of their countrymen. Their death created a revolt in Bohemia, the Hussites beginning a furious war against the Roman Catholics. Their leader, the terrible one-eyed Ziska, got possession of Prague, and Sigismund, who had succeeded his brother Wenceslaus, was forced to make them some religious concessions. Ziska died, but the war was carried on till the convocation of the Council of Basle, in 1431. More concessions followed, and the Emperor at last agreed to tolerate the Hussite priests. Peace was established in 1437. The Hussites are now merged in the Moravians, Calvinists, and Lutherans. [BOHEMIA.]

Hutchinsonians.—A school of English divines early in the eighteenth century, who took their name from John Hutchinson, a layman [5. in Yorkshire, 1654], who held peculiar philosophical and philological opinions. In 1724 he published the first part of his book called Moses's Principia, in which he attacked the doctrine of gravitation established in Newton's Principia. In 1727 he published the second part, containing the principles of his Scripture philosophy. The substance of the Hutchinsonian theory is that all our ideas of divinity are formed from the ideas in nature, that nature is a standing picture, and Scripture an application of the several parts of the picture to draw out the great things of God in order to reform our mental conceptions. To prove this they quote Rom. i. 20 and Ps. lxxix. 5. We cannot have any idea of invisible things till they are pointed out to us by revelation, and for this reason Scripture is found to have a language of its own, which does not consist in words, but of signs or figures taken from visible things. Of the great mystery of the Trinity, the Hutchinsonians say that the created substance of the air, or heaven, in its threefold agency of fire, light, and spirit, is the enigma of the one Essence or one Jehovah in three Persons. The unity of essence is exhibited by its unity of substance; the trinity of conditions, fire, light, and spirit. For proof of this they quote Deut. iv. 24, Heb. xii. 29, John i. 9, Mal. iv. 2, Matt. ii. 1. The philosophic system of the Hutchinsonians claims to rest upon the Hebrew language, which, they say, contains in its construction and radical terms certain concealed truths which are to be interpreted in a typical sense. Thus the Hebrew name of God, Elohim, they considered as a plural noun, indicating a plurality of Persons in the Godhead; and its connection with a singular verb as indicating the unity of the Divine Essence under a plurality of persons. The word cherubim was explained to be a hieroglyphic of Divine construction, or a sacred image, to describe, as far as figures could go, the humanity united to the Deity. The Hutchinsonians have had amongst them many honoured names—Bishops Horne and Horsley, Parkhurst, Romaine, etc. Their chief opponent was Archdeacon Sharp.

Hutten, Ulrich von, famous in the history of the Reformation, was born in Stockelberg Castle, in Hesse-Cassel, in April, 1488. When ten years old he was placed at the monastery of Fulda, but, disliking this life, he escaped to Erfurt in 1504. For the next eight years he visited several university towns, and in 1517 became Doctor of Law at Pavia. The Duke of Würtemberg assassinated the head of the Hutten family, which stirred up Ulrich to revenge, and he issued a series of satirical pamphlets against the tyrant. He also edited Laurentius Vallis’s treatise on the forged “Donations of Constantine.” He was present at the Diet of Augsburg in 1518, and afterwards setting up a printing-press, wrote pamphlets against the Roman clergy. He joined Franz von Sickingen, who was carrying on a struggle with the Elector of Trier; but on their plan failing Hutten fled to Switzerland, and died in the Isle of Uffnau, in the Lake of Zürich, in 1523. His best known work is his Epistola Obseruorum Vironum.

Hutter, Leonard [b. 1563, d. 1616].—Professor of Divinity at Wittenberg, the most celebrated Lutheran university; a voluminous author of the non-critical school, a representative author, therefore, of the old-fashioned orthodoxy. Among his works are:—Concordia Concorae, sive de Originis et Progressis Formulæ Concordiae Ecclesiarum Augustanae Confessionis, Libri duo; Rudolpho Hospiniano opposita, in folio [Wittenberg, 1614]; Disputatio pro Formuli Concordia; Collegium Theologicum de Articulis Confirmationis Augustanae, Irenicum vere Christianum, sive de Synodo et Unione Evangelicorum non facuta concilia, Tractatus Theologici; Sedel Elencohemens, hoc est, Tractatio pro Magistate humanae Nature Christi. Some are against the Church of Rome, others against Calvinism.

Hymns, as distinct from the Hebrew Psalms and Canticles, are probably as old as Christianity itself. From the first their use seems not to have been restricted to public or liturgical purposes, but to have extended to private and social purposes also. Hymns may be taken to include anything sung or recited by way of praise to God, whether in a metrical or simply rhythmic shape. The Te Deum, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Gloria Patria, and the Tersanctus may be instanced, among others, as specimens which have come down to us, and are still in use, of the earlier non-metrical Christian hymns. Metrical hymns are a later development. This kind seems to have sprung into existence in the East during the fourth century—first in Syria, through the instrumentality of St. Ephraim, and then a little later at Constantinople, under St. Chrysostom. The latter employed them as convenient antidotes to the Arianism which was then rife, thinking that they would impress the orthodox doctrines firmly on the minds of the faithful. Very similar was the reason of their introduction into the Western Churches, first by St. Augustine, and soon afterwards more effectively by St. Ambrose at Milan. Since that time the singing of metrical hymns has always formed a more or less prominent part of Christian worship. A considerable number of hymns by Ambrose and his school are still extant; and, besides him, Hilary of Poitiers, Prudentius, and Mamertus of Vienna, may be mentioned as early hymn-writers. At the Reformation Cranmer seems at one time to have meditated a translation of some of the grand old Latin hymns for the use of the English Church, and in King Henry’s Primer [1545] seven hymns appear, one for each of the hours of prayer, in accordance with the ancient custom; but in King Edward’s Primer, as also subsequently in the Reformed Prayer Book, they were discarded, with the single exception of the Veni Creator, which is still retained in the Memorial. The Methodist movement of the eighteenth century was extraordinarily prolific in the production of hymns for both public and private use. It is needless to do more than mention such names as those of Toplady, Wesley, Newton, and Cowper, these two last the joint compilers of the well-known collection of Olney Hymns. Till comparatively recent times, the only substitutes for hymns at all generally recognised in the English Church were two successive metrical versions of the Psalms, one by Sternhold and Hopkins [1562], the other by Tate and Brady [1696], and metrical versions of the Canticles, the Lord’s Prayer, the Ten Commandments, etc., which were allowed by Queen Elizabeth [1559]. The religious revival of the nineteenth century has gradually restored the primitive custom, till at the present time the singing of hymns forms one of the most striking features in most services. In the Scotch Presbyterian churches, a quaint and rugged metrical psalter, together with a small collection of versified paraphrases of Holy Scripture, are still the only forms of hymnody countenanced.

From a volume entitled Anglican Hymnology,
by the Rev. James King, we take some interesting facts concerning hymns current in the Anglican Church. He collected 52 representative hymns in present use in the Church of England, Ritualistic, High, Broad, and Evangelical, and treated these “as a committee, each member of which could give one vote for each hymn which it used.” He thus found that Ken’s Evening Hymn received 51 suffrages, and heads the list of what he calls “First-class Hymns,” as thus judged by popular suffrage. He places all in the first class which are found in thirty hymnals, and finds 105 of such. The first ten in this order of merit are Ken’s Evening Hymn, Hark! the herald, Lo He comes, Rock of Ages, Abide with me, Awake my soul, Jerusalem the golden, Jesu, Lover of my soul, Sun of my soul, When I survey. Of second-rank hymns, i.e. those found in 20 hymnals, he finds 110, and of third-rank, found in 15, he reckons also 110. But, as he points out, many of the hymns have not yet arrived at this full popularity simply because they are new and as yet but slightly known, e.g. Day of wrath, O day of mourning. Dr. Irons’ magnificent translation of the Dies Irae, which heads the second rank, but was only published in 1848. or Weary of earth, in the middle of the third rank, not published until 1865. Of the first-rank hymns he found no less than ten to be the work of Charles Wesley, eight by Watts, seven each by Heber and J. M. Neale, four each by Doddridge and Montgomery, three each by Cowper, Grant, Milman, and Tate and Brady. Of the three ranks taken together, Charles Wesley still takes the lead as writer, contributing 22, Watts comes next with 21, and J. M. Neale third with 17. Mr. King finds 28 authors contribute to first-rank hymns only, 25 to second-rank only, 27 to third-rank only, while 14 contribute to all three ranks. These 14 are Mrs. Alexander, 4 hymns, Caswall 6, Cowper 7, Miss Elliott 6, Heber 12, Keble 7, Kelly 5, Lyte 6, Montgomery 16, Neale 17, Newton 8, Tate and Brady 11, Watts 21, C. Wesley 22.

Hypatia.—A learned lady in the fourth century, daughter of the celebrated mathematician Theon of Alexandria, who gave lectures in Athens and Alexandria, in the Platonic school. She is said to have been very beautiful, and virtuous of character; but her correspondence with the Prefect Orestes made some of the Christians suspect her of doing them ill offices by keeping up the misunderstanding between Orestes and the Archbishop Cyril. Accordingly, one day on her road home from a lecture, a fanatical mob, instigated by Cyril, set upon her, pulled her from her chariot, and dragged her to Cæsar’s church, where they barbarously murdered her. She is the subject of one of Charles Kingsley’s best novels.

Hyperdulia. [DULIA.]

Hypostasis [Gr. hypo, “under,” and stasis, “standing”].—Substance or subsistence, that which stands under another thing and is its foundation or ground. Thus, in Heb. xi. 1, “Faith is the hypostasis of things hoped for;” in 2 Cor. i. 4 it signifies confidence, firmness, stability. In Heb. i. 3 it is used for person. The word occasioned great discussion between the Latin and Greek Churches. The Greek Church took it for the Person, saying that there were three hypostases in one essence; and the Latin, that there was but one hypostasis—that is, as they said, but one substance in three persons. St. Athanasius reconciled them by showing that they held the same view, but put it in different words. There are three Persons in the Godhead, three different modes of existence; there is but one Essence, because the nature of the Son and Holy Ghost is not different from that of the Father.

Hypostatical Union.—The union in Christ of the human and Divine natures, constituting two natures in one Person.

Hypothetical.—The form of words, “If thou art not already baptised, N., I baptise thee in the name. . . .” It is called hypothetical or conditional, because the rubric states that it is to be used, “if they who bring the infant to the church do make such uncertain answers to the priest’s questions as that it cannot appear that the child was baptised with water in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.”

Hypsistarians.—Heretics in the fourth century who, according to St. Gregory Nazianzen, made a mixture of Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity in their worship. They revered fire with the Pagans, observed the Sabbath and legal abstinence from certain meats with the Jews, while they professed to adore the Most High God with the Christians. Their doctrines were closely allied to those of the Euchites and Messalians.

Iberians, or the Georgian Church.—A very ancient and interesting religious body on the southern slope of the Caucasus. Before the conversion of that country to Christianity, some form of the ancient Persian system was the national religion; but in the days of Constantine a Christian woman, perhaps a nun, being carried thither captive, attracted all hearts by the piety and devotion of her life. A sick child being brought to her notice, she declared that, though human help was unavailing, Christ, in whom she believed, was able to heal it; she prayed earnestly, and the child recovered. The Queen was soon after taken ill, and sent for her. She declared that she was no miracle-worker, and refused to go, but promised to pray for the Queen, who also recovered. The King in gratitude wished to send her a rich present, but was assured that all that he could do to reward her was to believe in her God. Some time afterwards it is related that the King himself was lost in a forest, and vowed that if he should be restored to his friends he would believe in the Christians' God. He kept his vow, and the Church which he thus founded has lasted till now. In the sixth century the Iberians joined the Armenian Church [q.v.] in separating from the Greek, but, after fifty years, returned to their former condition, and so remained, maintaining the doctrines and adhering to the practices of the "Orthodox Eastern Church." When Georgia was conquered from the Persians by Russia in 1801, and became a province of the latter empire, the Iberian Church was placed under the ecclesiastical authority of the Archbishop of Tiflis, and is subject to the Holy Legislative Synod of the Russo-Greek Church. The only peculiarity which distinguishes it from the other branches of the Greek Church is that the baptism of children is delayed until the eighth year. Monasteries are numerous, the rule of St. Basil being followed.

Ichthus. [Fisb.]

Iconoclasts.—A large party which existed in the Church of the East during the seventh and eighth centuries, who were known by the name of Image-breakers, (Greek, icon, "image"; klaster, a "breaker"). In the early ages of Christianity sensitive minds were often in dread that the use of statuary in churches would lead Christians into imitation of heathen usages, for there was hardly a statue among the heathen to which incense was not offered and libations of wine poured out. Hence sculpture was regarded with an unfavourable eye by many Christians of those early days, who felt that the Church (like the Jewish system) was surrounded on all sides by idolatry. While the Church was thus situated, there was probably only a minority of Christians who held the opinion on this subject which is common in our own day, that sculpture may be innocently used in churches, wrong and foolish as it would be to worship it. The same feeling operated towards the decline of classical learning. Gregory the Great [A.D. 600] is accused of destroying the last remains of the imperial library at Rome; and whether the accusation is true or not, it is certain that he had a great aversion to heathen writings, and forbade the reading of anything connected with mythology.) The horror of sculpture decoration among the early Christians was thus partly caused by the sight of idolatry going on all around them; and partly also no doubt by that lingering of Judaism by which the Eastern Churches especially were so long influenced. It also seems to have been combined with a reverent fear of debasimg our ideas of the object of worship, by what must necessarily be an imperfect representation of it. So the Council of Elvira, in Spain, decreed, A.D. 306, "That no images should be in the church, lest that which is worshipped and adored should be painted on the walls;" and hence the representation of our Lord in the paintings which decorate the walls of the Catacombs under the figure of a lamb, a shepherd, or by some Christian version of a heathen myth, as in the figure of Apollo. Yet, very early, paintings and statues did exist, which show that this feeling was not universal. Irenæus speaks of statues of our Lord (which he supposed to have been executed by order of Pontius Pilate) without any reprobation. Eusebius speaks of bronze statues of our Lord and the Syrophenician woman, which he had seen standing at Cesarea Philippi; and, though he had some doubt as to their identity, does not even hint that the use of such figures was reprehensible. He also says that he had seen paintings of St. Peter, St. Paul, and our Lord; and the tradition that St. Luke was a painter, and that he had painted portraits of our Lord and of the Blessed Virgin, is as old as the fifth century. In the same century also Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, caused the walls of his cathedral to be decorated with paintings of Scripture subjects, and Prudentius, the great Christian poet of that age, refers in one of his hymns to similar paintings. There was, however, sufficient ground for opposition to the religious use of sculpture in the opinions of Christians of early ages, to form a large basis for party-quarrelling and fanaticism after the first causes which had influenced these opinions had passed away. Here and there a bishop was found whose personal feelings on the subject overcame his official discretion. Epiphanius, the Bishop of Salamis, in Cyprus, tore down the chancel door-curtain of a church because it was embroidered with "the figure of Christ, or some other saint," he did not observe which, and he thought it was "contrary to the authority of the Scriptures to have the figure of a man hanging in the Church of Christ;" though how he made out his Scriptural justification for his conduct the bishop has not left on record. This was about the end of the fifth century. In the beginning of the seventh we find Severus, Bishop of Marseilles, destroying all the images which came within reach, much to the disgust of his flock; on which Gregory the Great shrewdly told him that to worship images was undoubtedly wrong, and he hoped none of his people would do so; "but," he added, with a touch of gentle sarcasm, "you should have kept the images, brother, and prevented the people from worshipping them."
Party spirit and fanaticism on both sides reached their height, however, in the eighth century. Since the breaking up of the Roman Empire in the West, the Lower, or Greek Empire had been maintained in the East, over which the Emperor Leo III., surnamed "the Isaurian," was reigning in the year 730. This Emperor was so infatuated against the use of images, or was so under the influence of others who were, that his conduct caused Italy, Venice, and Ravenna to relinquish the nominal allegiance which they had hitherto acknowledged to the Greek emperors, and they refused to pay tribute any longer. Even the Patriarch of Constantinople and his clergy remonstrated against his violent edict for the removal of images. Leo, who had been a common soldier, was also very ignorant, and, in consequence of his ignorance, very obstinate; he deposed the Patriarch, slaughtered the people when they tried to preserve the sculptured decorations of their churches, was defeated before Ravenna in his endeavour to recover Italy, and ended by leaving a legacy of bitterness to his family and the Church.

The son of Leo, Constantine Copronymus, was as furious an iconoclast as his father. He assembled a council of Eastern bishops, 338 in number, at Constantinople, which ordered that all images and paintings were to be destroyed; every bishop or clergyman thereafter possessing any was to be deposed, and lay offenders, after being excommunicated, were to be handed over to the civil power for further punishment.

This destructive spirit was fostered by several successive emperors, till at last a recoil took place, when thirty-two years afterwards, in 786, a council on the subject met at Nicea, which is known as the Second (or Deutero-) Nicene Council. At this council the proceedings of its iconoclast predecessor were reversed, and the defence of images was carried to so extravagant a length as to secure for the Deutero-Nicene Council the unenviable fame of having officially introduced and sanctioned the practice of image-worship. Probably it was carried to this extreme by the desire to avoid the Judaism which so influenced the Eastern Churches, and the Mahometanism which was beginning to overrun them; both Jews and Mahometans exhibiting their bitter hostility to Christ by a special hatred of His image and the images of His saints. The extravagant recoil of the image defenders was resisted by many in the Western world, who wished to maintain that medium course of keeping the images without worshipping them, which had been recommended by St. Gregory. The bishops and nobles of England protested against image worship. Alcuin, the greatest scholar of his age (a Yorkshireman), wrote against it, and influenced his pupil, Charlemagne, to oppose Rome on the subject, and to hold provincial councils at Paris, Frankfort, Mayence, and other places, in which image-worship was condemned. There is some room for doubting whether the dispute between the Deutero-Nicene Council and those who wished sculpture to be retained in churches was really more than a contest of words, as it seems incredible that hundreds of bishops should agree together in encouraging a usage so distinctly forbidden as the actual worship of that which is not God. The obscurity which hangs about our own English word "worship" (as in the marriage service, "With my body I thee worship," where certainly no idolatry is intended), seems to indicate that there may be room for charity in respect to this council; and the singular passion which multitudes of otherwise good Christians have shown for the use of images and paintings in acts of worship may, perhaps, bear a charitable construction on some analogous ground, if it cannot be explained to our entire satisfaction, as it certainly seems impossible to explain it.

The iconoclast controversy was one of the means by which the last link whereby Rome had been politically bound to the East was broken; and very little eclesiastical intercourse was maintained afterwards. It remained for another controversy, that respecting the "double procession of the Holy Ghost," to raise smouldering fire into flame, and to break asunder Eastern and Western Christendom, so that they never again have been wedded together in outward union.

Iconolatre or Iconolaters.—Those who worship images. A name applied by the Iconoclasts. From icon, "an image," and latro, "I worship."

Iconostasis.—A screen used in Greek churches corresponding in position to our altar-rails, but so formed as to conceal the altar from the congregation. Only the clergy are permitted to enter within the space thus hidden, in accordance with the Jewish custom of keeping the Holy of Holies so sacred as only to be entered by the high priest. The iconostasis is so called because it is adorned with sacred pictures (Ieons). [See Greek Church.]

Idealists.—That class of thinkers who place the first beginnings of all knowledge in self-consciousness. The dictum of Des Cartes, "Cogito, ergo sum," is the foundation of idealism, superior to all sensation or recognition of the material world. The deduction derived from this principle were many and various. In some cases it led to the belief in an infinite Being in whom all intelligence is centred, man and nature are absorbed in this Being, human freedom is lost in an absolute fate, God Himself loses His personality and becomes synonymous with the universe.
[SPINOZA]. Against this philosophy of self-consciousness Locke [q.v.] put forth his theory, which rested all knowledge in sensation—a theory which seemed to put out of view any doctrine of absolute goodness and lowered morality to mere expediency. The revolt from it had much to do with the scepticism of Hume [q.v.] and called forth the keen criticism of LEIBNITZ [q.v.]. The greatest of all the Idealists was KANT [q.v.], who investigated with wonderful insight, honesty, and courage, the phenomena of consciousness and the value of a priori notions. His principles again were pushed to atheistic conclusions by Fichte [q.v.], from whose system not only God, but Nature seemed to disappear, landing him in sheer negation, but driving him by the very absurdity of it to reaction, which bade fair to restore him to Christian belief. [The Idealistic views of HEGEL [q.v.] as of the others, will be found under their names.]

Idealistic theories still prevail in Germany, and seem to vary between Atheism and Pantheism; the objective reality of Christianity is set aside, and while one class substitutes for it Ideological theories of a Christianity which is purely spiritual, free from the trammels of historical detail, another arrives at the conviction that God is one with the universe, lost in a vague abstraction which attracts no love and awakens no fears, which clothes with its flimsy veil the nakedness of infidelity. There is, however, also a better side of Idealism, the consciousness which cannot, any more than in any other system of thought, always find its knowledge complete in every particular, but is a consciousness still, that God speaks to the soul of man. "I will hearken what the Lord God will say unto me" may be called Idealism, and it is a very deep and true faith, one not to be broken.

Identity.—This word has several applications in theological language. [1]. It is used by some of the German philosophers, as Fichte and Schelling, to express the sameness of God with the universe. [2]. It is applied in a totally different sense by orthodox writers, e.g. Bishop Butler, to express the continuity of the individual man in all stages, whether in this world or the next. The particles of the human body change every hour, yet the man remains conscious that he is the same person that he was in childhood, and Butler founds his argument upon this, that in spite of all changes which death shall bring, the conscious identity will remain. [3]. A third use, which perhaps may be hardly considered worth mentioning, is made by a small sect of our day, which holds that the English race are the descendants of the ten tribes of Israel, and this opinion is known by them as "The Identity."

Ideology is a term applied to the endeavours to reconcile belief in the spiritual truths of Christianity, with rejection of all the miraculous narratives, and the greater portion of the rest. The writer who first presented this theory in a complete and systematic form was DAVID STRAUSS [q.v.], who professed to subject the New Testament to an analysis which should precipitate all erroneous matter, and leave the true essence of Christianity in a pure state. Such a method started from the assumption that all miracles are incredible, as contrary both to philosophical principles and to experience. But this assumption being made, the belief in miracles had to be accounted for, and this the Ideologist professed to do. He would rip in pieces the forms in which they were presented, and explain the real significance of the narratives. He had no misgiving that he would not be able to show that the narratives were myths as regards the letter, but were nevertheless to be treated with respect as symbols of true ideas. The facts did not occur, save in inner human consciousness, but were in fact aspirations after, and presentiments of, eternal realities. Now this was a very remarkable contrast to the older sceptical method, which denied the miracles on the very ground that the doctrines which they were declared to attest were repulsive to the moral consciousness. Thus the sceptic denied the doctrine of the Atonement on the ground that it is at variance with the true notion of God; whereas the Ideologist declared that there is in the breast of man such a need felt of atonement, that the death of Christ was invested by human imagination with the attributes of a Divine sacrifice. It was the need felt within the soul of men everywhere which led them to take one noble and beautiful hero, such as Strauss always declared Christ to be, and to attach to him a mythic Incarnation, representing union with God, and in fact all the cardinal beliefs of religion.

Such an admission, that Christian principles are in union with the instincts of human nature, was at least a blow delivered at the very centre of the old scepticism. But it was retorted that there are, and always have been, men who reject Christian doctrines, and therefore they cannot be the invention of the human mind. The very existence of Scepticism is an argument against the first principles of the Ideologist. The Christian doctrine teaches that there is no such thing as chance, that all facts are, as the Materialist contends, the concrete results of some absolute principle, some unseen and general law which cannot be broken. Every event is "a link in a chain, which, according to Materialists, had no beginning, and will have no end; which, according to Theists, is fastened by each extremity to the throne of God." But all men confess that the application of this law is so mysterious that, so far from our being able to foretell the course of events, we are utterly confounded with the sequence of them in secular history, and in personal life. "Nothing is so probable as the unlikely," is a paradox.
Idolatry.—The word _idol_ in Greek signified originally an "image" or "phantom," and had no connection with the idea of worship. It was a fancy of the mind, as opposed to a reality [Plato, _Phædo_]. Lord Bacon uses the word in the same sense in his famous enumeration of the four classes of idols. Secondly, the Greeks used the word to represent a likeness, whether by picture, or sculpture, or stage representation. The Old Testament Septuagint is the first book to take the word in a bad sense—that of an image used as an object of worship. The Second Commandment forbade such worship, and even the making of any image [Deut. iv. 12, 15-18].

The idolatry into which the Jews fell through following the example of the surrounding nations is chronicled for us in the Old Testament. It came utterly to an end after the Babylonish captivity. The word _idolatry_, which is a Christian, not a classical, word [1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; Col. iii. 5; 1 Pet. iv. 3], conveyed to a Jew of the Christian era an idea as hateful as to a Christian. A few centuries elapsed before Christians would have tolerated any images in their places of worship. Then appeared symbols, such as the Dove, the Good Shepherd, as found in the Roman catacombs. Probably the cross was in use from the first, but the crucifix came much later. Whether the use of images in churches leads to idolatry, is a question in dispute between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The use of figures in sculpture and stained glass windows is declared by some to be not compatible with the letter of the Second Commandment, but a Protestant as decided as Dr. Arnold declared that the Incarnation set aside that letter, for God came "in the likeness of sinful flesh." Protestants hold that there is still a great danger in setting up images in churches of superstitious use, and of confusing a symbol, harmless in the abstract, until it becomes a fetish. [ICONOCLASTS.]

_Ignatius_, Sr. [b. 27, d. 107].—One of the Apostolic Fathers, and a martyr early in the second century. He was Bishop of Antioch for forty years [A.D. 67-107]. An ancient tradition declared him to be the child whom our Lord took into His arms [Matt. xviii. 2]. About the year 107, soon after the death of St. John, the Emperor Trajan visited Antioch on his way to Armenia. As soon as he arrived in the city there seems to have been either a sudden alarm or an actual commencement of persecution; and, the aged Bishop practically interpreted the saying of our Lord, "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep," by appearing before the Emperor, and endeavouring, by his own submission to martyrdom, to draw off attention from his flock, and so save their lives. Trajan himself examined the aged saint, accusing him of wickedness in professing a religion contrary to the commands of Caesar, and in persuading others to do so to their destruction. The old man claimed the name of Theophorus, or God-bearer, and said that since he bore Christ within him—doubtless referring to the words, "Stronger is He that is in you than he that is in the world"—wicked spirits had departed from him, and he ought not to be called after such a manner for refusing to worship those falsegods which were nothing else than wicked spirits. When Trajan asked for an explanation of "bearing Christ," Ignatius replied, "There is but one God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that are in them; and one Jesus Christ, His only-be-gotten Son, whose kingdom may I enjoy," Trajan knew the story of our Lord, and asked, "His kingdom, do you say, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate?" "Dost thou carry, then, Him who was crucified within thee?" And when Ignatius answered, "I do, for it is written, I will dwell in them, and walk in them," the Emperor pronounced his condemnation, as having confessed himself a disciple of the Crucified, and commanded that he should be taken to Rome, there to be thrown to the beasts for the entertainment of the people. The holy man heard his sentence, and cried out, "I thank thee, O Lord, that Thou hast vouch-safed thus to honour me." It was a weary journey for an old man. How long it took we are not told, but Ignatius was so old and harmless, that the ten soldiers who had charge of him were constrained to make it as easy as they could, and rested for some time at towns on their way. When at Smyrna the old Bishop wrote letters to the Roman and five other Churches, who had sent to give him all they could—their loving sympathy—and whom he especially exhorted not to make any attempt to rescue him. At Smyrna he met Polycarp, and after he had rested enough to gain strength for another stage, the soldiers led him on to Troas, where he was comforted with the good news that no further persecution had taken place at Antioch since he had left, and that therefore the purpose of his surrender had been answered. In spite of dangers which open sympathy with a condemned Christian must have entailed, journey of the well-known old Bishop was almost a triumph the whole way. And neither the warmth of friends, nor this prolongation of the pain and expectation of martyrdom daunted him. "Whether fire, or the cross, or the assault of wild beasts await me, let all come," said he, "so that I may gain Christ."

There must have been a very short time to wait after he came to Rome. On Dec.
20th, 107, the people were collected in the Flavian Amphitheatre (now called the Coliseum) to witness the athletic sports, races, and gladiatorial fights, in which the Romans so delighted. It was made known that the Emperor had sent them a prisoner for higher sport, and there arose an impatient ergy of "Christians to the Lions," as a signal for him to be brought out. Then this white-haired and harmless old man of eighty or more was led into the midst of the arena,
and torn to pieces by the uncaged beasts
before the eyes of all the ladies and gentlemen of Rome. As he had prayed that it might be, Ignatius died almost instantly, and when his friends came in the evening, after the "sport" was over, and the amphitheatre was cleared of its spectators, they found only two or three gnawed bones to gather up and carry back to Antioch.

The writings of this Father have been a subject of keen controversy. The translation published by Archbishop Wake, and which is easily accessible through Hone's Apocryphal
New Testament, comprised seven Epistles, viz., to the Ephesians, the Magnesians, the Tra-lans, the Romans, the Philadelphians, the Smyrneans, and to Polycarp. To these have been added six others, and this augmented collection is called by critics "The Epistles of the Long Recension;" they were
"Mary to Ignatius, "Ignatius to Mary,"
"To the Tarsians, "Philippians, "Antiochenes, ""Hero. It has, however, been demonstrated that these were forgeries of the end of the fourth century. But a challenge was also raised against the other seven, on the ground that the view of episcopacy which the writer of them holds belongs to a later date than the second century. This attack was greatly strengthened by the discovery of a Syriac copy, now in the British Museum, which only contains three of the Epistles, viz., to Polycarp, to the Ephesians, and the Romans, and which was edited and published by the late Canon Cureton in 1845.
This is known as The Short Recension. It was eagerly taken up by some scholars, and as eagerly repudiated by others, who maintained that Cureton's was merely a maimed edition. In consequence, the present learned Bishop of Durham, Dr. Lightfoot, who had been engaged in a Commentary on

St. Paul's Epistles, turned aside, and gave many years to "the Apostolic Fathers." In 1885 he published the result of his labours on Ignatius and Polycarp in three goodly volumes, and it is probably the most learned and exhaustive critical treatise which has appeared in this century. No mystery is left unsolved, and the genuineness of the seven Epistles, or The Middle Recension, is established beyond controversy.

The central idea of the Epistles of Ignatius
may be expressed in the words "One Faith."
And that with him is the historical Christianity of the Gospel in continual activity in the lives of men. He quotes the New Testament as of equal authority with the Old, prefacing his quotations with "it is written." The Eucharist is with him the centre of Christian worship.
He is the first writer to use the expression
"Catholic Church."

In the Anglo-Saxon Calendar, St. Ignatius was commemorated on Dec. 17th; in the Roman it is Feb. 1st.

Ignatius Loyola. [LOYOLA.]

Ignorance, in theological language, is the want of knowledge in one who might have acquired it, and is thus distinguished from "Nescience," which merely implies absence of knowledge. Ignorance is distinguished by writers on casuistry into many grades. Thus a man may hold altogether false opinions through his bad education or through circumstances which are none of his own making. He errs, not because he intends or wishes to do so, but because he knows no better. He does not sin against light. This is defined as "invincible ignorance." But it is clear that in matters so all-important as the soul's health, it is incumbent on every man to learn, as far as he has opportunity, the principles of faith and practice, and therefore he who holds false opinions or possesses evil habits, because he shuts his eyes to facts and arguments which press themselves upon him, is culpable, and hence we have distinctions of
"simply vincible," of "crass," of "affected" ignorance. By the latter is to be understood the willful state of blindness to truth in which a man remains for the very purpose of sin-ing the more freely, "loving darkness rather than light because his deeds are evil." Such ignorance, far from exculpating, aggravates sin. It is clear that the various kinds of ignorance here named do not all spring from the same root. In some cases it is an intellectual shortcoming. "Want of ideas," or failure to discover the connection of the ideas which we have, or again, of following them out to their conclusions— these are the cases to which Locke traces ignorance, and all these are clearly errors of the intellect; but when the will enters in, and we do not believe because belief would interfere with our pleasure or convenience, that is a sin of the heart. And it is this which men need to be Ignorantines was the name given to a community formed in France at the beginning of the eighteenth century by an Abbot, Baptiste de la Salle. The object was to give free instruction to the poor, both on secular and religious subjects. When the Jesuits were expelled from France in 1764, the Ignorantines, having adopted their views, continued to teach them till they themselves were expelled twenty-six years afterwards. They did not remain long in exile, but were recalled by Napoleon. It is said that they now number about ten thousand.

I.H.S.—One of the commonest and oldest symbols used in Christian worship. Three explanations have been given of the meaning of the three letters: [1] That they are the initials of the Latin In hoc signo (vivae), the writing which the Roman Emperor Constantine is said to have seen on the cross of light that appeared to him in the heavens. This interpretation may be dismissed at once as unlikely. [2] That they are the initials of Jesus, Hominem Salvator; (“Jesus, the Saviour of men”). This is perhaps the idea generally current, and it may be taken as at least the prevalent interpretation now; but its historical accuracy is not so certain. [3] That they are the first three letters of the Greek ΙΗϹΟΥϹ [Jesus], in which case it will be seen that the middle letter H is really the Greek capital letter eta (long e). The consideration that the other chief monogram, which was what Constantine had inscribed on the labarum (or standard of the cross), viz. Τ was in Greek characters, and was taken from our Lord’s other most usual name, viz. Christ, perhaps favours this third view. I.H.S. within a circle of rays, is the favourite device of the Order of Jesuits.

Ildefonsus, Sr., Bishop of Toledo, was born there in 607. He escaped from home to the Monastery of Agi, in 632 was ordained Deacon, and was afterwards made Abbot; in this capacity he attended the Eighth and Ninth Councils of Toledo [653 and 655], and in 657 succeeded Eugenius II. as Bishop of his native place. He died on Jan. 23rd, 667, and is said by his writings to have greatly conduced to the adoration of the Virgin in Spain.

Illuminati [“the enlightened ones”].—[1] In ancient times the baptised were sometimes so called, because in the baptism of adults a lighted taper was put into their hands as a symbol of the light of faith and grace of which they were now possessed. This was not, however, a primitive custom. [2] Two fanatical sects assumed this name which arose, the first in Spain towards the close of the sixteenth century, the other in France about a century later. As is intimated by their name, they both claimed special illumination and insight into spiritual and divine matters. A. The Spaniards included under the title were charged by the Inquisition with maintaining that by assiduous prayer and contemplation they had become most closely united to God and that thereby they had attained such a degree of perfection that they stood in need neither of the Church’s sacraments nor of performing good works. B. After the suppression of these men, a similar form of heresy appeared in France. Their founder, Anthony Bucket, proclaimed that a system of doctrine and practice had been revealed to him that excelled and superseded the whole of Christianity, and that by it men would soon so outstrip the saints and teachers of Christendom in the possession of the Divine spirit and influence that there would be no more need for any religious orders or other Christian institutions. [3] A secret society, half religious and half political, was also so called, which was founded in 1776 by Adam Weishaupt, a professor in the University of Ingolstadt, in Bavaria. This society was modelled on that of the Jesuits and was started as a means for gratifying the founder’s ambitious schemes of power. It formed classes of novices in Ingolstadt, Munich, the Tyrol, and elsewhere, which had managed to keep in due order, but carried into no further developments until 1780, when the acquisition of Baron Adolf von Knigge gave a fresh impetus to the society. A firm connection was established with the Freemasons. Three classes were formed—a of the novices who were styled Mineralists, [B] of the Freemasons or Scotch knights, [7] of the pupils in the small and great mysteries—and the society began to spread widely. In 1784 Weishaupt and Von Knigge fell to quarrelling, both wanting to be Rex or Maqur, and in the same year a decree was passed forbidding all secret societies. Next year steady persecution began, and in a few years the Illuminati totally collapsed as an organised body, though isolated members still lingered on here and there for some time.

Imam signifies in Arabic the same wit Antistes in Greek, a “leader” or “governor.” This general signification is particularly applied by the Mussulmans by way of eminence to him who is head of their congregations in the mosques, who has supreme authority among the Mahometans both in respect of spiritualities and temporalities. There are, however, subordinate Imams in the towns of Turkey who represent the chief Imam, but only in matters of religion. When the Imam of the Mahometans is mentioned without distinction, the meaning is always restrained to the rightful successor of Mahomet, who is the fountain both of secular and sacred jurisdiction, all manner of authority being lodged in his single person. For this reason the Mahometans affirm that their pretended prophet had his commission and legislation given him on the model of Moses, and not on that of the Messiah, who declared His kingdom was not of this world; in consequence of these pretensions the Caliphs took the title and performed the functions of the Imam. The Mahometans are not perfectly agreed concerning the dignity of this office. Some hold the Imamate to be settled by Divine right, and fixed like the Aaronic priesthood to one family. The Shiites, or disciples of Ali, maintain that it belongs exclusively to his family, Ali being the sole and apparent heir of Mahomet; so they will not own any person for the head of religion who cannot prove his descent in a direct line from this first Imam. There have been, according to them, eleven Imams, and they look for the coming of one more who will be the last. Other Mahometans declare that the office is not so unalterably tied to genealogy and descent as to hinder its passing from one family to another. The Imams belonging to particular mosques are like our parish priests; they officiate in the public liturgy.

Immaculate Conception.—The doctrine held in the Church of Rome that the Virgin Mary was conceived and born without the taint of original sin. The Festival of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary first began to be observed about the twelfth century, but the date of its celebration was not fixed till 1439, when the Council of Basle appointed Dec. 8th for that purpose. It is said to have been instituted in England by Archbishop Anselm, in gratitude for the preservation of the Conqueror's fleet in a great storm; its observance was declared optional by the Council of Oxford, 1222. It is still retained in our Calendar among the "black-letter days."

The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was first taught by Peter Lombard about 1160, and was strenuously opposed by St. Bernard, but was recommended as "a pious opinion" by the Council of Basle. It was not exalted into an article of faith until Dec. 8th, 1854, when Pope Pius IX. published the Bull "Ineffabilis Deus," declaring "That the Blessed Virgin Mary, at the first instant of her conception, by a singular privilege and grace of the omnipotent God, in virtue of the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin."

Immortality.—"They are not to be heard," says the Eighth Article of the Church of England, "which feign that the old fathers [i.e. the saints of the Old Testament] did look only for transitory promises." We shall see immediately that there is good ground for this assertion of the Article. But it is no less true that the doctrine of Immortality takes a very subordinate place in the theology of the early days of the Old Testament. Bishop Warburton, in his Divine Legation of Moses, expressly uses the argument, that Moses was able to attest that his doctrine came from God by appealing to the temporal instincts of the people. Length of life and worldly prosperity were the promised rewards of obedience. But even in the Pentateuch there are not wanting indications of a revelation, though dim, of a glory to be revealed, and certainly of the immortality of the soul. Our Saviour's rebuke of the Sadducees declared that they erred for not perceiving this [Matt. xxii. 29-33]. The prayer of Balaam [Num. xxiii. 10] is capable of no other explanation than that he recognised such a hope. But when we come later, the Psalms of David are distinct enough, not only in such verses as Ps. xvi. 8-11 and xxiii. 4-6, but in the whole tenor, of the hopes and aspirations they breathe after God.

This belief was held unalteringly by wise heathens, and was expressed in the plainest terms by men like Plato and Cicero. The effect of the doctrines of Socrates and Plato appears strongly in the Old Testament Apocrypha; the writers of Ecclesiastical and Wisdom had undoubtedly in Alexandria become acquainted with the Platonist philosophy, and the beautiful hopes which they utter must be unquestionably traced to the light which had been thrown for them upon the Old Testament, from the writings of men whom God had been teaching in the far-off heathen lands. The belief is also so widely spread amongst even the most savage races, that it may be almost said to belong to the consciousness of humanity.

When we ask on what grounds such a belief rests, the answer must not be too hastily given. It has been asserted that the very existence of self-consciousness is evidence of indestructible power, that the very ability of "looking before and after," is an indication that the soul is not bound to the material form. But to this it may be replied that the soul loses its consciousness in sleep, in insanity, even through narcotics. Therefore this argument cannot be held of itself convincing. On the other hand the fact of the dissolution of the body, and the absolute disappearance of all further evidence of the soul's existence, is no indication at all of its ceasing to be, because all physical investigation goes more and more to show that the soul is not a simple bedily function, bound to the brain, as materialists have supposed. All physical evidence is against the theory that the soul is a part of the body, and forces the conclusion that it has a peculiar existence of its own.
Consequently we come to this—that physical investigation is baffled in this question, and we have to fall back upon some other form of evidence. Such evidence, Christians hold; was given in ancient times by God by His Voice within, and in some cases by outward revelation as well. Men believed in God because He spake to them and bade them so believe, and they recognised His voice. But the revelation was consummated in the teaching of Christ and His resurrection from the dead. We have seen no physical facts that are capable of refuting that; all investigation of moral phenomena supports it. [EVIDENCES.] The Christian revelation declares that the soul is immortal, and that the body shall rise from the dead and be united with the soul again. To deny that, as St. Paul says, is to give up Christianity itself. [1 Cor. xv. 12-17.] Certainly religion is worthless without it. [RESURRECTION.] We believe, then, and science, though it could not indeed discover the truth, follows it and acquires in it as reasonable, that this present consciousness of ours, though it must be robbed by physical death of its power of present manifestation, shall not be lost. The belief in a good and faithful Creator assures us that we are made for something better than a short life of three score years and ten, that the winding sheet is not our rightful vesture, and this beautiful world is something better than a great grave. Because God is love, because He is good and His works are beautiful, He cannot abandon the noblest of His works, which returns His love. In point of fact, those who have any positive faith in a Supreme Being, are also believers in Immortality; but nevertheless the two questions are quite distinct.

Immovable Feasts.—Those feasts which are observed on certain fixed days of the year, as distinguished from the Movable Feasts which vary with Easter. Examples of Immovable Feasts are:—Christmas Day, The Epiphany, and all the Saints' Days.

Immunity.—A law term, implying exemption from public burdens or other legal obligation. The term “ecclesiastical immunities,” therefore, refers to the rights and privileges of this kind enjoyed by the Church in any nation. The extent of meaning of the phrase varies, of course, in different countries.

Impansion.—The doctrine of the presence of Christ’s Body and Blood in the consecrated bread and wine of the Eucharist. It differs from the doctrine of Transubstantiation in considering that the elements undergo no change of their nature, but remain bread and wine after consecration. It is very similar to the Lutheran doctrine of Consubstantiation [q.v.].

Impediment. [Marriage.]

Implicit Faith.—An unquestioning belief in things, on the sole authority of the teacher; belief without examination of proof or reference to the grounds on which the thing to be believed is supported.

Imposition of Hands.—The ceremony of laying on of hands for imparting spiritual gifts and authority is very ancient. It was practised by Jacob [Gen. xlvi. 14] by Moses [Numb. xxvii. 18-23 and Deut xxxiv. 9], by our Lord himself [Mark x. 16] by the Apostles [Acts vii. 18, 19; xix. 6] and their successors [1 Timothy iv. 14; v. 22] and its use in the rites of Confirmation and Ordination has continued in the Church in all ages and countries. It is called by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews [Hebrews vi. 2 one of “the principles of the doctrine of Christ.”

Impropriation.—The possession and use of ecclesiastical revenues by a layman.

Imputed Righteousness signifies i theological language the righteousness of Christ, which is attributed to every member of Him because thus united to Him. Being a member of Christ I am partaker of His holiness. The idea is beautifully express in Dr. Bright’s sacramental hymn:

“Look, Father, look, on His anointed Face,
And only look on us as found in Him.”

[See Romans iv. 6, 7; v. 18, 19; 2 Cor. v. 21. [JUSTIFICATION.]

Incarnation.—This was the subject which occasioned the most important controversy in the Church during the first four centuries of its life. The Gnostic Arian, Apollinarian, Nestorian, Eutychian heresies all turned upon various phases of this great doctrine. These will be found under their respective heads, it only remains here to state what is the doctrine of the Christian Church on the subject. It that the Son of God took upon Him human nature, and was made man, in order to accomplish the work of our salvation. He took to Himself a true body and a reasonable soul. The reality of His body was proved by its being subject to the same weakness as our own; He hungered, thirsted, was weary as we are. He was born of a woman. His body grew from boyhood to manhood. He died and was buried. If He had not taken His fleshly substance of the flesh of His mother, He would not then have been true man and the semblance of it would reality have been a deception. But have been eternally the Son of God, He now without ceasing to be God, became the Son of man; true man as He was true God; possessed of flesh and blood, of body and soul like ourselves.

Incense.—The use of this in public worship seems to be of very ancient date in the Church. The fourth of the Apostolic Canons speaks it as being offered and consumed at the altar.
the following prayer from the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom indicates its significance:

We offer incense to Thee, O Christ our God, for an odour of sweet spiritual savour; receive it, O Lord, upon Thy holy, heavenly altar, and repay unto us Thine abundant mercies, and grant them abundantly to us Thy servants." It is used in the Roman Church at the Introit, the reading of the Gospel, the Offertory, and the Elevation at High Mass, also at the Magnificat and at funerals. The use of it has been revived in some English churches, but was forbidden by St. Pius Judge. [RITUALIS.

Inclusor Reclosure.—Hermits who lived in separate cells, and never left them unless in case of great necessity, and with the consent of their bishop.

In Cena Domini ["at the Supper of the Lord"].—A Papal Bull, the work of several Popes, issued in its latest form by Urban VII. in 1627. It received its name from the fact that it was annually read on Maundy Thursday, the day on which our Lord instituted the Holy Sacrament; but was afterwards generally read on Easter Monday. A copy of this Bull was affixed to the doors of the churches of St. Peter and St. John Lateran at Rome, and every Metropolitan was required to have it read in his churches once a year or oftener. But many Catholic Sovereigns objecting very strongly to this, Pope Clement XIV. discontinued its publication after 1773. The Bull contained a summary of the rights and powers claimed by the Church of Rome, and anathematised all who infringe those rights. It also contained a malediction of all the principal Christian sects by name.

Incomprehensible.—The word "incomprehensible" as applied to God in the Athanasian Creed, is not used in the modern sense of "inconceivable," implying that no human creature can have knowledge of Him, but signifies that He cannot be comprehended within limits.

Incorruptibles.—An ancient sect who held that our Lord's body was incorruptible. This they explained to include that Christ was incapable of suffering any change, and that He was not susceptible to heat and cold, hunger and thirst, etc. Eating and drinking they considered unnecessary for Him.

Incumbent comes from incumbo, "to sit under," and is properly applied to the minister whose duty it is to reside in his benefice and employ his study to the faithful discharge of the duties of his church.

Independent Methodists. [METHODISTS.]

Independent Methodists. The original name, still often used, of that body of professing Christians now usually known as Congregationalists [q.v.] who differ from Episcopalians in having no gradation of ministry or succession of orders, and from Presbyterians in having no gradation of courts or assemblies exercising any authoritative or judicial functions. According to both the Episcopal and Puritan idea, the Church consisted of the whole body of professing Christians; and accordingly, when Romish tendencies began, in and after the reign of Elizabeth, to exercise the minds of Englishmen, the Puritan idea, quite as much as the Episcopalian, was to purify and preserve Christian doctrine by State action: if the rulers refused to act in this way, no other means of action occurred to either. The founder of Independency, Robert Browne [q.v.], in a tract published about 1580, enforced, on the other hand, the doctrine that, religion being matter of the individual conscience, was not to be enforced or extended or reformed by any political action, or in any way dependent upon it; that "the Kingdom of God was not to be begun by whole parishes, but rather of the worthiest, be they ever so few." This doctrine implied that if the State was neglectful or in error in matters of religion, the individual man or congregation was no less bound to separate from error, and to teach and practise what was true, which indeed Browne clearly inculcated. But this teaching was too far in advance of the times; to separate from the Church was then to rebel against the State, and was therefore a crime held equivalent to treason. Accordingly, even under Protestant Elizabeth, Thacker and Coppin [1593] sealed their testimony with their blood; and ten years later Barrow and Greenwood (the one educated for a priest and the other for a barrister) also suffered for opinions which now appear the merest truisms. By 1596 at least twenty-four persons had died in prison for holding similar views. Thus hunted out of England, Independency took refuge in Holland, which then was open to them in a proud position of being the sole asylum of religious liberty. Here it grew, mainly under John Robinson, to whom fled Mr. Henry Jacob from Bishop Bancroft's persecution; but in 1616 Jacob returned to England, and founded the first regularly constituted English Independent Church. It was thus that Independency became so much identified historically with the cause of civil and religious liberty: the identification grew gradually out of English Church and State policy combined, the Independents being compelled to struggle, from religious motives, for a great deal which is now acknowledged to be elementary civil right.

During the reign of Charles I. Independency increased a great deal in secret, though Laud kept down the outward manifestation of it so rigidly that converts had to emigrate to either Holland or America: it is computed that in the twenty years ending in...
The cardinal principle of the Independent was to enforce the power, and duty, and responsibility of the individual Church and of the individual man; each had to do, in the respect of others, his or her own duty as before God. It would be unjust to regard the struggle, as some have done, as being carried on merely against the Anglican Church. I was partly so, no doubt; but it was far more against a feudal system of affairs and opinions, which then more or less pervaded the world, and affected religion as it did other matters. As we have seen, the Presbyterian equally with the Churchman, thought it quite right for the State to regulate all religious matters and forms of worship, and was in his way about as intolerant. This was the idea of the age. The truth is, that real toleration of opinion was hardly understood at all in those days, and some even of the very men who had suffered for conscience sake in England, tortured and hung Quakers in New England afterwards; indeed the entirely passive but dogged resistance of the Quakers [FRIENDS] had also its share, and a very important one, in bringing about the triumph of those rights of conscience which the Independents held so dear. Still, according to their light, they did struggle for them, and therein differed radically from the Presbyterian and other Puritans, whose aim was simply to substitute one ecclesiastical system for another. In so doing, these believed the system to be better, of course: but still it was to be set up and obeyed; whilst the Independents, on the other hand, contended for the right of every man and every Church to follow that system which approved itself to conscience and, after the first excesses of the Brownists (and fierce persecution always does produce excess afterwards repudiated)—expressly admitted that godly Christians were to be found in various communions, and that true Christian fellowship might therefore be held with them. [For a brief account of the present condition of Independancy in England, see Congregationalists.]

It only remains to notice here certain modifications or differences in practice. It is obvious that extreme Independency may lead to isolation of individual Churches. In America this was never felt, it having been always customary for many Churches in a district to unite in counsel and advice, or for consultation on general matters and ordinations, which latter ceremonies had amongst them only the character of recognition, conferring no authority or inherent rights upon the minister "ordained." The amount of fraternal union was natural amongst men, nearly all of whom were united both in religious belief and the strong bond of common persecution. There was far less of it in English Independancy for many years, owing, as naturally, to the difficulties in religious communion which severe repressions put.
the way. With greater liberty, however, came greater recognition of the need for fraternal co-operation; and now the Congregational Union and subordinate County Unions present a pretty near approach to the American system. The larger organizations were however a strictly fraternal, as against political or hierarchical, character; have absolutely no real authority over individual Churches; and even in the case of radical departure from the accepted theology, or from what is usually termed orthodoxy—as, for instance, Unitarianism, which of late has to some extent grown up under various preachers in Independent Churches—have no remedy except to withdraw from fellowship with the Church concerned: they cannot depose the minister or take any further measures. Carefully guarded as it is, however, there are still many Independents who are jealous of the modern or “Union” aspect of Congregationalism; while others, on the contrary, feel that the evils of overmuch individualism still predominate, and look for further extension of the Federal system.

Independents are the largest religious body in the United States, and, next to the Methodists, are the largest body of Dissenters in England. Strictly speaking, Baptists should be included in their numbers, as the latter hold precisely similar views regarding Church order and government, and are therefore simply a section of Independents or Congregationalists who reject infant baptism. In the year 1886, or the first time, a joint session was held of the Unions of the two bodies, a recognition of identity which may probably be carried further in these days of comprehension. In doctrine, the Independents were till lately almost without exception moderately Calvinistic; but of late years what is known as the broad Church school of thought has made greater progress among them than in any other Dissenting body, and the same may be said of actual heterodoxy of various shades, not a few former Independent Churches being now Unitarian. It will be indeed manifest that the system gives great facilities to any preacher of strong character and eminent gifts for taking and maintaining a heterodox position, since he can only be controlled by the very congregation which has probably become attached to him; the result which may be reached in this way is seen, for instance, in Harvard College, U.S., which is now distinctly Unitarian. These evils, however, it is contended, are far outweighed by other considerations, and by the stimulus given to individual responsibility. A remarkable feature about independency in England has been its strong middle-class character, and the large number of wealthy men whom it has attracted in comparison with other Dissenting bodies. This again is probably connected with the high value always set by the body upon ministerial education. Kept out of the universities, they established at a very early date ministerial schools of a high class (in one of them Archbishop Secker and Bishop Butler were educated) and have always given great attention to this subject. Within the last few years, however, the Universities have been thrown open to Nonconformists, and there is at present a movement amongst Independents for combining their own theological machinery with the University system, which has however hardly as yet taken sufficient shape to be here described.

Independents, Scottish.—The Scottish Independents first appeared during the Commonwealth, but only for a short time. In 1729 Mr. John Glas formed a sect of Independents, which received from him the name of Glassites, who are also called Sandemansians [q.v.]. The present sect of Scottish Congregationalists dates from the end of the last century, and James Hal dane [q.v.] and Robert Aikane were very active in preaching among them and in spreading the sect. It is said there are now about two hundred churches belonging to it in Scotland. They held the same doctrines as the English Independents.

Index Expurgatorius.—The result of examination by the Roman Church of all literary works intended for publication, with a view of deciding whether they are dangerous to the State, to morals, or to religion. Such censorship was exerted in early times; thus from the time of the Emperor Constantine, those books which had been censured by the Councils were often prohibited and suppressed by the authority of the prince, which he did, not only in virtue of his being protector of the Canons, but by a purely secular and original right, as reasons of State directed him. The Council of Nice condemned Arius’s tenets, and the Emperor Constantine prohibited his books by a severe edict, by which those who concealed them instead of burning them were liable to heavy penalties. In the year 386 the Emperor Arcadius set forth a proclamation against the writings of Eunomius and the Manichaeans, at the instance of St. Chrysostom, who, it is supposed, informed him that they had been censured by the Church. Theodosius the younger, after the Council of Ephesus had condemned Nestorius’s books, published an edict to have them burnt. The censure of the Council of Chalcedon upon Eutyches’s books was confirmed by an order of the Emperor Marcian, which prince two years after condemned the Apollinarian books to be burnt at the request of Pope Leo. Justinian, in 536, prohibited by edict the books of Severus of Antioch and other heretical authors, animadverted upon by the Council of Constantinople, under the Patriarch Mennas. Continued instances of the same kind meet us all through the early history of the Western.
Church. Thus Popes Leo, Galasius, and Symmachus, in 443, 492, and 503, ordered the Manichaean writings to be burned. Pope Adrian II. condemned Photius's books to the fire in the year 868, pursuant to a decree of the Council of Rome held under him. Innocent II. ordered the books of Abelardus and Arnold of Brevia to be burnt in the year 1140, after St. Bernard had got them condemned in the Council of Sens. In France the privilege of examining books relating to religion and the discipline and government of the Church was annexed to the episcopal authority, because "bishops are, by virtue of their character and office, the proper judges of these matters." But after the Faculty of Divinity was settled at Paris, the bishops delegated part of their authority to these doctors, but still upon condition of reservation of their own original right. Thenceforward the Doctors of the Faculty of Divinity at Paris looked upon the privilege of examining books before their publication as one of the principal prerogatives of their corporation.

With the printing press and the Reformation such a host of books poured in that it was no longer possible to read and decide on them before publication, so the Church of Rome at the Council of Trent appointed a commission to examine these books and prohibit if necessary. Pius IV. in 1558 issued the first Roman Index. At the last sitting of the Council in 1563 it was determined to put the matter entirely into the hands of the Pope, and Pius V. soon after appointed the Sacred Congregation of the Index, with a Dominican Friar for its secretary, and a certain number of Cardinals with theological professors called Consulters. Its powers were enlarged by Sixtus V. Many editions of the Index have appeared, notably one by Benedict XIV. in 1744. The Congregation is still in operation. It may be noted that, besides a list of books which are prohibited, there is a list of those which may be read when expurgated from the heretical or objectionable passages. Persons who read prohibited books are forthwith excommunicated.

Induction.—The ceremony of conferring the temporalities of a living upon a newly-appointed incumbent. It is performed at the church door. The inductor, who is appointed by the bishop, reads a legal document, and delivers the key of the church to the clergyman. The latter, unlocking the door, enters and signifies his possession by tolling the bell.

Indulgences.—Dispensations granted by the Pope, remitting that temporal punishment of sin, which would otherwise be inflicted, either in this world as penance, or in Purgatory.

The practice of remitting penance arose early. In the Primitive Church the penances imposed on those who disgraced their Christian profession were often very severe, sometimes extending over the whole lifetime, and the bishops frequently exercised their power of abridging the period of penance or otherwise relaxing its severity. St. Cyprian complained of the laxity of the bishops in this respect, stating that they often gave the Letters of Communion without sufficient inquiry; and others, as Tertullian and Novatian, wrote against the principle itself. The custom afterwards crept in of commuting penance for a money payment, the money being devoted to the relief of the poor and other pious uses. This, of course, soon led to abuses, and finally degenerated into the practice of granting indulgences for money. In 1095 the Council of Clermont offered indulgences to all who should take part in the Crusades, and this offer was confirmed by several subsequent Councils, including that of Lateran, Lyons, Vienna, and Constance. The theory of indulgences was expounded by the Decretal of Clement VI. as follows:—"There is left to the Church an infinite store of merits and good works, founded by our Saviour Himself, and increased by the merits of the Blessed Virgin and the supererogatory works of the saints. The disposal of this treasure is in the hands of the pastors as bishops of the Church, but the Pope has supreme control by virtue of the power of the Keys, and is able to remit the temporal punishment of sinners, living or dead, offering to God instead a portion of this treasure as a satisfaction for the sin." In 1517, Pope Leo X. resorted to the sale of indulgences on a large scale, as a means of gathering funds for rebuilding the church of St. Peter at Rome. The licences to sell different countries were disposed of to the highest bidders, and the purchasers of the licences were then at liberty to make what profit they could out of their wares. To Archbishop of Mentz, who had secured the monopoly for Germany, employed one Jol Tetzel, a Dominican, to act as his agent at travel over the country extolling the efficacy of his pardons. The intermate language of Tetzel, and the moral havoc produced by his teaching, led Luther to nail up his "theses" on indulgences to the door of the castle church of Wittenberg, which contributed materially to the spread of the Reformation, and in fact originated that movement. The text of these indulgences was as follows:—"May our Lord Jesus Christ have pity on thee, N. N., and absolve thee by the merits of His most holy passion. And I, by virtue of the apostolic power which has been confided to me, do absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures, judgments, and penalties which thou mayest have merited, and from all excesses, sins and crimes which thou mayest have committed, however great or enormous the may be, and for whatsoever cause, even though they had been reserved to our most Holy Father the Pope and the Apostolic See. I scarce all attainers of unfitness, and all marks of infamy thou mayest have drawn on thee on his occasion; I remit the punishment thou hast owed to have endured in Purgatory, make thee anew a participant in the Sacraments of the Church; I incorporate thee fresh in the communion of the Saints; and reinstate thee in the innocence and purity where thou wast at the hour of thy baptism; so that, at the hour of thy death, he gate through which is the entrance to the place of torments and punishments shall be closed against thee, and that which leads to Paradise of joy shall be open. And shouldst thou be spared long, this grace shall remain immutable to the time of thy last end. In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.

The view of the Church of England with regard to indulgences is set forth in the 22nd Article, which declares the Romish doctrine of "pardons" to be a "fond thing vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but really repugnant to the Word of God."

Indult [Lat. indulgentia, "that which is granted as a favour"] is a licence from the Pope to a corporation or an individual allowing of something which forms an exception to the common law of the Church. For instance, indults used to be granted to kings and princes, giving them the patronage of ecclesiastical dignities and benefits within their realm; and in modern days indults are given to bishops in inclement countries, allowing them to relax the rigour of the Lenten fast, as enjoined by the Canons of the Church.

Infallibility is the quality of not being able to err or fall into mistakes; the quality predicated in Scripture of God Himself, "with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." And this quality has also been claimed by controversialists on behalf of the Church, greatly as they have differed on the question of its locality.

[1] It is claimed by the Church of Rome, which, regarding herself as "the Mother and Mistress of all Churches," claims to be infallible in faith and morals, so that whilst the freest discussion is allowed to her members on matters of opinion, when a definition of faith is once promulgated by her, all controversy is at an end. Thus the Church has determined what books are Scripture and what not; therefore it is not open to members to challenge the Canon. The sense of Scripture, when once decreed, must be accepted, and a doctrine decreed necessary to salvation cannot be called in question. But this claim is a portion of a theory which covers a wider ground, namely what we may call a second view, namely [2] that the Church Universal is infallible. This is a position which has been taken by some controversialists who deny the exclusive authority of the Church of Rome; and these we may subdivide into those who place the infallibility in the Scriptures, and those who declare that it is in suspense; that the Church being divided into sects has lost the power of formally declaring doctrines, and can only receive it back through a general council of united Christendom. But this latter view seems to involve too remote a period to bring it within practical limits, and the controversy is therefore narrowed to the question, "Has the Church received such power from its Divine Author?"

The Infallibility of Scripture belongs to the question of Inspiration [q.v.], that of the Church of Rome must first of all assume the special authority of that Church. Now, as a matter of fact, the opinion of Roman theologians has been anything but clearly expressed on this point. No such doctrine was known in the primitive times; but it grew with the centralisation of the Church, along with the assumption based on the forged Decretals. Even when it became a dogma that the Church had an infallible power of discernment, it was not certain whether it rested with a general council or with the Pope as head. The Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle asserted their superiority, but the question was left undetermined. Even the Council of Trent did not define the doctrine, and it was a subject of much questioning between the Gallicans and the Jesuits. Perhaps the ablest exposition of what is substantially the Gallican view is by Cardinal Newman, as given in his Apologia. "Supposing it," he writes, "to be the will of the Creator to interfere in human affairs, and to make provisions for retaining in the world a knowledge of Himself, so definite and distinct as to be proof against the energy of human scepticism, in such a case . . . there is nothing to surprise the mind if He should think fit to introduce a power into the world invested with the prerogative of infallibility in religious matters . . . And thus I am brought to speak of the Church's Infallibility as a provision adapted by the mercy of the Creator to preserve religion in the world, and to restrain that freedom of thought which of course is one of the greatest of our natural gifts, and to rescue it from its own suicidal excesses" [1st edition, p. 382]. Further on he defines, first, the province of this power, then its limits. "This power, viewed in its fulness, is as tremendous as the giant evil which has called for it. It claims, when brought into exercise in the legitimate manner—for otherwise, of course, it is but dormant—to have for itself a sure guidance into the very meaning of every portion of the Divine Message in detail which was committed by our Lord.
to His Apostles. It claims to know its own limits, and to decide what it can determine absolutely and what it cannot. It claims, moreover, to have a hold upon statements not directly religious, so far as this, to determine whether they indirectly relate to religion, and, according to its own definitive judgment, to pronounce whether or not in a particular case they are consistent with revealed truth. It claims to decide magisterially, whether infallibly or not, that such and such statements are or are not prejudicial to the Apostolic depositions of faith, in their spirit or in their consequences, and to allow them or condemn and forbid them accordingly. It claims to impose silence at will on any matters or controversies of doctrine which, on its own ipse dixit, it pronounces to be dangerous, or inexpedient, or inopportune. It claims that whatever may be the judgment of Catholics upon such acts, these acts should be received by them with those outward marks of reverence, submission, and loyalty which Englishmen, for instance, pay to the presence of their Sovereign, without public criticism on them, as being in their matter inexpedient, or in their manner violent or harsh. And lastly, it claims to have the right of inflicting spiritual punishment, of cutting off from the ordinary channels of the Divine life, and of simply excommunicating those who refuse to submit themselves to its formal declarations. Such is the infallibility lodged in the Catholic Church, viewed in the concrete, as clothed and surrounded by the appendages of its high sovereignty. It is, to repeat what I said above, a supereminent prodigious power, sent upon earth to encounter and master a giant evil” [pp. 388, 389].

“Infallibility cannot act outside of a definite circle of thought, and it must in all its decisions, or definitions, as they are called, profess to be keeping within it. The great truths of the moral law, of natural religion, and of Apostolical faith, are both its boundary and its foundation. It must not go beyond them, and it must ever appeal to them. Both its subject-matter and its articles in that subject-matter are fixed. This is illustration; it does not extend to statements, however sound and evident, which are mere logical conclusions from the Articles of the Apostolic deposition; again, it can pronounce nothing about the persons of heretics, whose works fall within its legitimate province. It must ever profess to be guided by Scripture and by tradition. It must refer to the particular Apostolic truth which it is enforcing, or (what is called) defining. Nothing, then, can be presented to me in time to come as part of the faith but what I ought already to have received, and have not actually received (if not) merely because it has not been told me. Nothing can be imposed upon me different in kind from what I hold already—much less contrary to it. The new truth which is promulgated, if it is to be called new, must be at least homogeneous, cognate, implicit viewed relatively to the old truth. It must be what I even have guessed, or wished, to be included in the Apostolic revelation; and at least it will be of such a character that my thoughts readily concur in it or coalesce with it as soon as I hear it. Perhaps I and others actually have always believed it, and the only question which is now decided in my behalf is that I am henceforth to believe that I have only been holding what the Apostles held before me” [pp. 392, 393]. The Cardinal tells us that the normal seat of Infallibility is the Pope in Ecumenical Councils, and points out that there have been eighteen such Councils, an average of one to a century; and he founds an argument on the fact that the Popes on the whole have not been the men of greatest human genius; that it has been individuals, and not men in the highest authority, who have taken the lead in theological inquiry. It has been the special duty, he maintains, which Providence has called Rome, to stand by whilst opinion is growing. When it has grown, when all the matter has been ventilated, turned over and over, viewed on every side, then authority is called upon to pronounce the decision at which the general opinion of the Church has already arrived [p. 407].

This essay was written by the Cardinal in 1864. Six years later the Vatican Council after strong opposition, formulated the new article on Infallibility in the following language: “Therefore faithfully adhering to the tradition received from the beginning of the Christian faith, for the glory of God and Saviour, the exaltation of the Catholic religion and the salvation of Christian people, the Sacred Council approving, we teach and define that it is a dogma divinely revealed, that the Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra—that is, when in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his extreme Apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals to be held by the universal Church, by the Divine assistance promised to him in blessed Pet [Luke xxiii. 32], is possessed of that infallibility which the Divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed for defining doctrine regarding faith or morals; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are irrefrangible of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church. But if anyone, which may God avert presume to contradict this our definition, let him be anathema.” [VATICAN COUNCIL.]

The proclamation of this dogma has had some important results. It not only caused deep dissatisfaction within the Roman Church, but it led to the secession of the “Old Catholics,” and to the German Falk Laws [OLD CATHOLICS; FALK LAW], as well as to greater bitterness between the Church and the French Republic. Probably, however, it is not lo logical than the Gallican theory of an intermittent infallibility, as exercised in an Ecumenical Council. Neither theory can stand the test of history. A Council held at Constantinople in 680 condemned the Pope Honorius I. as a Monothelite heretic, and the fact was urged at the Vatican Council. But palpable historical fact failed before blind dogmatism, and all Protestant writers agree without a shadow of question in the dictum of the Nineteenth Article, that "as the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria and Antioch have erred, so also the Church of Rome has erred, not only in their living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith."

Three standard writers in English theology have fully combated this dogma, viz. Bishops Bull and Beveridge, and Isaac Barrow. After the publication of the Vatican decree, Cardinal Newman wrote a letter to the Duke of Norfolk, which is a very qualified defence of the same dogma.

Infant Baptism.—The propriety of this practice would seem to depend upon the view taken of the rite itself. If it is held to be the sign of admission to Church membership, as the vast majority of Christian bodies do hold it to be; still more, if it is held to be also a vehicle of God's grace, which may be conveyed without the recipient's actual faith (though that must be guaranteed and fostered by the sponsors), as is apparently the view of the English and other Churches, then there can be little doubt as to the advisability and even the necessity of baptising the very youngest children. And thus the analogy of the Jewish rite of circumcision will hold good, which was always performed on the eighth day after birth, and was considered the sign of entrance into covenant with God. To those, however, who, like the Baptists of the present day, believe conversion and faith to be essential before membership with Christ is possible, the practice of baptising infants must seem unprofitable and even wrong. And from the time of Tertullian in the second century, onwards, there have frequently been divines who felt and expressed misgivings on the point.

As to the history of the practice, it is conclusively proved that it prevailed more or less almost from the very beginning of Christianity, but that it did not become universal for at least the first four centuries—that is to say, so long as the snares and dangers of heathenism surrounded the Christian communities on all sides, it was naturally and properly felt to be wiser to defer the baptism of children till such time as they might be expected to have moral strength and convictions enough to resist them. But as soon as Christianity had established itself as the predominant religion throughout the civilised world, infant baptism also became the almost universal practice, the need for postponement till a riper age being done away with. [Baptism, Sponsors, etc.]

Infant Communion was the common practice of the early Church. For this we have the authority of the Apostolic Constitutions (a work which, though not so old as it claims to be, almost certainly belongs to the ante-Nicene period, and is of great weight), of St. Cyprian in the third century, and of St. Augustine at the beginning of the fifth. The practice rested upon John vi. 33, and was indeed only consistent with the primitive view that regular and frequent reception of the Holy Communion was necessary for all believers, except catechumens and excommunicated persons; and so the very youngest children directly after their baptism were admitted to communion, the bread being very often dipped into the wine for convenience' sake. We have, moreover, a continuous stream of authorities to show that the custom lingered on more or less languidly in many parts of Western Christendom till the twelfth century at least. But it was at length formally condemned by the Council of Trent in the sixteenth century. In the Eastern Churches, on the other hand, it would seem still to be practised with certain modifications; for instance, in the Greek Church children under one year old are not communicated except in cases of dangerous sickness. We remark further in passing that this custom obviously dispensed with the need for the rite of confirmation (or laying on of hands), which was in fact originally nothing but the concluding ceremony at holy baptism. [Confirmation and Baptism.]

 Inferior Orders.—In the early Church, besides the three orders of bishop, priest, and deacon, there were other offices filled by men who occupied a sort of intermediate position between clergy and laymen. These "Inferior Orders," as they have been called, varied in number with time and place. Most frequently there were Readers and sometimes also Sub-Deacons, Exorcists, Ostiaries, Acolytes, and Singers. These orders might be conferred by priests, and were not considered as "orders" in the same sense as the three universal grades of the ministry.

Infidel.—One who is not among the fideles, the latter being one of the names given in ancient times to the disciples of Christ, and still kept in that sense in the Book of Common Prayer—e.g., "the souls of the faithful" in the Burial Service, and "a congregation of faithful men" in the 18th Article. Thus strictly, an infidel, in theological language, is an unbeliever in Christ's religion as a revelation from God. In the Collect for Good Friday it is synonymous with "pagan" or “heathen.” Jews are not there included, because they do not deny a Divine revelation, nor were Mahometans, seeing that even they acknowledge the God of Abraham as supreme. But in our present language the word is restricted to those who, having heard the proclamation of Christianity, reject and oppose it. The title would not justly be applied by Churchmen to a Unitarian who refused to accept the Creeds, seeing that he holds the faith that Christ was a teacher who came from God, however much may be lamented his interpretation of the Scriptural language concerning Him. Nor can it be fairly given to the natural philosopher, who places science in the forefront of his profession of faith, so long as he does not denounce the Christian faith as being untrue.

Infraapsarianism [Lat. *infra, “below;” *lapsus, “the fall”].—One of the doctrines held by the Calvinists, namely, that God created the world for His own glory, and chose a certain number for salvation, but, foreseeing the sinfulness of others, doomed them from the beginning to eternal punishment.

Ingham, Benjamin, was born in Yorkshire in 1712, and educated at Queen’s College, Oxford, where he became acquainted with the two Wesleys. He was ordained in 1735, and began to work in London; but was soon prevailed upon to accompany the Methodists on their missionary journey to America. While there he was brought into union with the Moravians, and on his return to England joined the London Society in Fetter Lane. He finally became head of the Yorkshire Moravians, and preached in fields or barns. In 1740 Wesley was expelled from the society, so the former friends became separated. In 1741 Ingham married Lady Margaret Hastings, sister of Lord Huntingdon, and was thus brought into intimate connection with the Countess of Huntingdon [q.v.]. In 1753 he withdrew from the Moravians, and formed a sect of his own, assuming the position of “general overseer,” or bishop. His followers received their members by lot, and required them to declare before the church their experience, that the whole society might judge of the change that had been wrought upon their hearts. About the year 1759 Ingham read the works of Glass and Sandeman [Sandemanians], which impressed him so much that he sent two of his disciples to Scotland to investigate the principles of the sect, and they came back strong Sandemanians. This caused a division in Ingham’s societies, which proved so bitter that only thirteen remained faithful to him out of eighty. Ingham died at Aberford in 1772, his end being probably hastened by the desertion of his followers. His sect still survives, but numbers only six societies.

Ingulphus, Abbot of Crowland, in Lincolnshire [b. in London about 1300, d. at Crowland, 1109]. He became in 1051 secretary to William of Normandy, who, after his accession to the English throne, made him Abbot of Crowland in 1076, and granted lands and numerous privileges to the abbey. Meanwhile Ingulphus, had made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1064, and after his return had become an inmate of the Monastery of Fontenelle, in Normandy. His fam-

Inheritance—An heir; one who is entitled to inherit. In baptism the Christian is made an “inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven,” or as expressed in the baptismal service, “heir of everlasting salvation,” and “inheritor of Thine everlasting Kingdom.”

Inhibition is a writ to forbid a judge from further proceeding in a cause depending upon him. It commonly issues from the higher court to the inferior upon an appeal. Inhibitions pendente lite, or “during the trial,” are notices which the bishop can serve on any accused clerk, forbidding him to perform any services of the Church within the diocese till sentence shall have been given. During a bishop’s visitation all inferior jurisdictions are inhibited from exercising their offices.

Initiated.—A name applied in the early Church to baptised Christians, as distinct from catechumens and outsiders. Candidate for baptism had to undergo a term of probation, which, in some Churches, lasted for three years. During this time they were forbidden to be present at the celebration of the Holy Communion; and though they were allowed to hear sermons, reference to the higher mysteries of our religion was always made in terms unintelligible to them, but perfectly understood by the initiated. A phrase of common occurrence in the Fathers is “the initiated understand what is said.”

Innocent III., Pope (Lothair), son of Trasimund, Count of Segni and of Claricia, member of the noble family of Scotti, was born in 1160. He was educated at Rome, Paris, and Bologna, where he distinguished himself in philosophy, theology, and Canon Law. After several preferments, he was made Cardinal-Deacon by his uncle, Clement III., in 1190. Clement was succeeded by Celestine III., on whose death, in 1191, Lothair was unanimously elected Pope. He was possessed of very great abilities, indefatigable industry, and a firm resolve to rai-of the children at Bethlehem by Herod. Its origin is very ancient, but it was originally, and until the fifth century, connected with the Feast of the Epiphany. In England it was formerly called Childermas Day, and was celebrated with the use of muffled peals and other signs of mourning and processions of children. The latter were forbidden by a proclamation of Henry VIII. in 1540.

Inquisition, The.—A tribunal in the Church of Rome for the trial and punishment of heretics. The first foundation of it was laid by Innocent III. in the year 1215, when he commissioned Father Dominic to judge and to deliver to punishment obstinate and relapsed heretics among the Albigenses. The result was that 30,000 persons of every age, sex, and condition were massacred. But the court of the Inquisition was not formally established till the Council of Toulouse, under Gregory IX., in 1229. By this Council a tribunal was erected in every city, consisting of a priest and three laymen, who were charged with the work of seeking out heretics and denouncing them to the bishops. In 1233 Gregory transferred the working of the Inquisition from the bishops to the Dominicans, who discharged their functions with great vigour. In 1263 Urban IV. appointed an Inquisitor-General, to whom reference might be made by his subordinates in all cases of doubt; and in 1542 Paul III., alarmed at the spread of Lutheran doctrine, appointed a committee of nine learned men for the reformation of Church discipline. This committee was reorganised, and its powers extended by Pius IV. in 1564. The new Council consisted of twelve cardinals as Inquisitors-General, and a number of other clergy, called consultors, with a Dominican as commissary, and it had power to appoint provincial inquisitors and to receive appeals. Princes and rulers were commanded by Pius V. to execute its orders. Sixtus V., in 1588, further perfected the organisation by increasing the numbers of the Council, and dividing it into fifteen congregations, to each of which a particular branch was assigned.

Spain, since 1483, had its own Grand Inquisitor, who was nominated by the King and appointed by the Pope. The post was first filled by the famous Tomas de Torquemada, under whom, in the first eighteen years of the Inquisition, 10,220 prisoners were burnt, and 97,321 imprisoned, exiled, or stripped of their property. The Grand Inquisitor named his own assistants, and from him there was no appeal, except to the King, who was bound by his coronation oath to submit to the laws of the Inquisition.

The prisoners of the Inquisition were never confronted with witnesses, but were imprisoned and tortured to make them confess and recant their error. The ceremony of pronouncing sentence, called an Auto da Fé.
(Act of Faith) was solemn and imposing, and was performed in public. A procession was formed of the accused in order of their guilt: first came those who were to be discharged, wearing their ordinary dress, and separated from the condemned by a crucifix; then followed the bones and effigies of dead heretics, with inscriptions intimating their crimes; and, finally, the condemned, each clad in a yellow garment, called a San Benito, decorated with significant emblems. St. Andrew's crosses marked those who had escaped with their lives, red flames those who were threatened with burning if again convicted, whilst representations of devils amongst the flames covered the robes of those who were to suffer death. Thus appalled, the prisoners were led before the Inquisitor, who "reluctantly" handed them over to the secular arm and delivered them to be burned. The Inquisition has been vindicated by the Church of Rome in our own day by the "Syllabus" of 1864, which asserts the right of the Church to use both the spiritual and temporal sword for the reclamation of heretics.

Inscriptions in Churches.—The eighty-second canon appoints "that the Ten Commandments be set up, and other chosen sentences written upon the walls of churches and chapels, in places convenient." The custom is one of great antiquity. In accordance with this canon, it is common to see the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments painted upon the east wall of a church. The Canon, however, does not limit the inscriptions to any particular spot, and hence texts are sometimes emblazoned in other parts of the church.

Inspiration.—The nature of the Sacred Volume is a subject closely connected with all other theological subjects; the controversy arising out of it turns upon the question, "What are the boundary limits of the Divine and the human elements in Scripture?" or, put in another way, "In what sense is the Bible the Word of God? and how far was Dr. Williams justified when he called the Bible in the second of the Essays and Reviews, 'the devout voice of the congregation'?" It cannot be denied that the views formerly held by the bulk of Christians have been of late modified under two influences—viz. scientific investigation and increased knowledge of historical criticism. Few persons are found now-a-days who hold that the world was created in six days like ours, or that the Flood of Noah covered the Alps or Himalayas, or that the ark held two of each species of animals on the face of the globe. Galileo was condemned for teaching that the earth went round the sun, and many opinions which were held for a long time after him are now abandoned.

But it is no less true that the Bible is probably more revered now than it ever was. Vituperators and blasphemers there are still, but they belong exclusively to the ignorant and vulgar. Men like Matthew Arnold and Professor Huxley are more or less opponents of current Christianity, but both of them have expressly declared that the religious feeling, which is the essential basis of all right conduct, has been kept up by the use of the Bible.

A volume lying before us, entitled Inspiration: a Clerical Symposium, consists of a number of essays written by prominent members of the various Christian bodies, and published in successive numbers of the Homiletic Magazine. The writers comprise two or three members of the Established Church, a Presbyterian, a Congregationalist, a Unitarian, a Swedenborgian, a Wesleyan, a Jewish professor, and a Roman Catholic bishop. Some of these writers approximate closely, but, having read through the volume, we discern three main currents of thought on this important subject:

[1] What we may call the orthodox view i.e., the view received by the old-fashioned religious people of this country, as represented by the great standard divines: "The Bible is the Word of God." "If we are to accept the Bible on its own terms, we shall be obliged to confess that it comes to us with Divine authority, as not only containing a Divine message but as being in some sense the very embodiment of that message." [Prof. S. Leathes. The writer we have just quoted rests a strong argument upon the recognition in the New Testament of the authority of the Old Our Lord "manifestly accepted the old dispensation as a sacred and divine communication, which could not in principle or in essential and important fact be broken. An we cannot conceive Him to have been wrong here without striking at the root of His claim upon our reverence as the Son of God." An he goes on further to argue that in the Old Testament we cannot choose what we like, that there is an organic unity which prevents our setting any part aside. And having given his reasons for holding the New Testament to be of equal Divine authority, he concludes that the Bible is the authorised record of the way in which God communicated His will to man, and is the appointed instrument for making known that will."

[2] In contrast to this we take next the essay of the Rev. John Page Hopps, Unitarian preacher. He rejects all idea of infallibility for the writers, and declares that the prophet claimed "the Word of the Lord" for a kinds of trivialities, and not a few absurdities. This, it will be confessed, is somewhat startling language, but in reading the essay we cannot charge the writer with irreverence of spirit. He frankly declares that he desires at once to get rid of the notion that "the Bible is altogether a supernatural book, and all alike the Word of God;' that it must be submitted "t the verifying faculties of reason, conscience, humanity, and our own reverent trust in God."
to proceed to argue that, as everyone has come to acknowledge that the ethnology and geology of Scripture are not to be accepted as authoritative teachings, so of "the varying standards of morality," that "we find in the Bible precisely what we find elsewhere—manifest signs of progress, and all the indications which show that men, in regard to religious truth as in regard to the scientific and political truth, have had to find their way out of darkness into the marvellous light," that revelation does not imply infallibility. He would rather identify it with discovery, that God is always teaching His children, and that the Bible is one of the records of God's revelation of the past, of which there have been many others since.

[3] Archdeacon Farrar closes the volume, and may be called the representative of the liberal school of interpretation. He criticises keenly some of the preceding papers, rejects the phrase that the Bible is the Word of God, a favour of the expression in the Article, "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation;" and expresses his own conclusion thus: "Were it not better, without these mechanical theories and procustean formulae, to speak to the people concerning the Bible more as follows:—The Bible is the book which contains the records of God's dealings with a chosen race, and through them with all mankind. Above all, it is the Book which contains the Gospel of His Son, and the lesson of salvation. It is not all of the same value. It is not all written on the same level. It does not teach throughout the same morality. It contains some things which were permitted once 'because of the hardness of men's hearts,' but which are not permitted now. Much of it was addressed 'to men of old time,' which we have to supplement, to correct, and even to reverse. Much of it is occupied with the 'weak and beggarly elements of an obsolete bondage,' with statutes which were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live. Much of it is written from the imperfect moral and spiritual standard of 'times of ignorance' at which 'God winked.' You will find recorded in it, and recorded without comment or disapproval, some opinions and some actions, even of good men, which were not commendable. You will find attributed to God's command, conduct which for us would now be feloniously criminal. Nevertheless, this book is a sacred book, for the sum total and general drift of its teaching is lofiter and diviner than you will find in any book in all the world. Both by its own loftiest utterances, and by the Christian conscience which it has trained, and by the final standard of its Gospel, it furnishes you with ample means whereby to judge what things are right and wrong. The Spirit of God is with us still. The promise of that Spirit was not confined to the contemporaries of Pentecost, and His influences are living influences, and by them, throughout long ages, men have been slowly correcting the errors and the crimes for which their fathers have pleaded the sanction of the word of this Book. By that Spirit of God you will be saved from the tyranny of a dead letter which might otherwise be to you, as it has been to thousands, a savour of death unto death. He will not in the least degree make you infallible, or give you the least authority to any assertion or opinion, or definition, or interpretation of yours about points respecting which Christians differ, but He will teach you all things which are necessary for your holiness here, and your eternal happiness hereafter. Your Bible is no homogeneous whole which dropped down from heaven. It consists of sixty-six different books, the work of at least forty or fifty different writers, writing in different languages and dialects, and separated from each other by hundreds of years. It is not a book, but a library of literature. Great parts of it are but the fragmentary wreck of a literature, from various books of which—now no longer extant—many of its writers quote. The Old Testament, of which a considerable portion is by unknown authors, extends over a thousand years. It is separated by four hundred and fifty years from the New Testament. The translation of it is not always correct; the exact meaning is not always ascertainable; the text is not always certain; the meaning is not always clear; and the moral decisions which it contains are not always co-ordinate or comprehensible. But all this is a matter of no essential importance, seeing that in this Book, and above all in the Gospels, which record the life and teaching of the Saviour of the world, and in the epistles of the greatest preachers of that Gospel, you may find, not, indeed, a minute system about which you can dogmatise, or religious opinions which you can force on others with anathemas, but a moral and spiritual guidance which you cannot mistake. The end of the whole book is Christ. If it leads you to Christ its whole function is fulfilled. What is essential for rightly learning the way of salvation is not in the dead letter, which may only kill, but in the spirit, which giveth liberty and life. Do not hear or read it for any other end but to become better in your daily walk, and to be instructed in every good work, and to increase in the love and service of God."

Installation.—The ceremony of introducing a functionary into his office, and investing him with its powers and rights. The term is chiefly used of the act of putting a dean, prebendary, or other dignitary in possession of his proper stall in the cathedral.

Institution.—A book of occasional offices.

Institution.—The act of bestowing the spiritual charge of a parish or other benefice, while induction bestows the temporalities.
"Institution of a Christian Man."
—The title of a book commonly called "The Bishops' Book," published in 1537, as a standard of doctrine for the English Church. It is supposed to have proceeded from the pen of Stephen Coynet, Bishop of Winchester. It contained an explanation of the Creed, the Seven Sacraments, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ave Maria, with articles on Justification and Purgatory. A revised edition was published in 1543, under the title of A Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.

Intention.—A Dogma of the Church of Rome, asserting that a sacrament is of no value unless administered with the intention of the officiating priest. It is distinctly laid down in the Eleventh Canon of the Council of Trent [1545], which says: "If anyone say that there is not required in the ministers while they perform and confer the sacraments at least the intention of doing what the Church does, let him be accursed." As a consequence of this doctrine, the recipients of the sacraments are exposed to doubt and uncertainty. For example, a person cannot be certain that he has been properly baptised, although he has been through the form of baptism, for the intention of the priest may have been wanting; and a similar insecurity attends the reception of the Eucharist. The doctrine is opposed by the Church of England in the Twenty-sixth Article of Religion, where it is declared that the unworthiness of ministers hinders not the effect of sacraments, "as far as much as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by His commission and authority."

Interdict.—An ecclesiastical sentence placing a kingdom or district under a ban, forbidding the performance of Divine Service and the administration of the sacraments (except private baptism). Interdicts were invented for the punishment, through their subjects, of princes who were powerful enough to resist excommunication and anathema. They do not appear before the ninth century. In A.D. 869 Hincmar, Bishop of Laon, attempted to lay his diocese under an interdict, but his dictum was set aside by his Archbishop, the elder Hincmar. The first known instance of the actual enforcing of an interdict is that of Alduinus, Bishop of Liémos, who laid his diocese under such a censure in A.D. 994. Ivo of Chartres, who died in 1215, characterises the expedient as a novel one. In the year 1208 all England was laid under an interdict by Innocent III., and the sentence was rigidly enforced. The church bells were silent, public worship was stopped, and the dead were buried without service. The publication of interdicts, however, as time went on became less and less frequent, their use evidently tending to produce ungodliness, and revolt against the authority pronouncing them.

Intercessions.—Prayers made on behalf of others. Thus the prayers after the anthem in morning and evening services, in which we pray for the Queen, royal family, clergy, etc., are known as the Intercessory Prayers. The name is more strictly applied to the prayers for others in the Litanies which are accompanied by the response "W. beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord."

Interim.—A name given to decisions of Charles V. concerning the German Reformers until a council could be held. There were three such interims. The first was the result of a commission held at Ratisbon in 1541, when Melancthon, Bucer, and Pistorius on one hand, Eck, Pflug, and Gropper on the other, had a discussion concerning the sacrament and the power of the Church, and the parties were found to be irreconcilable. The second was prepared at Augsburg in 1548. Pflug, Heling, and Agricola had drawn up a paper containing twenty-six points of difference between the Roman Catholics and Protestants. It was agreed that the use of the cup by the laity, the marriage of the priests, and a few other minor matters should be conceded to the Protestants but that in other points they should follow "the Universal Church." This agreement was objected to, and was revoked in 1552. The third interim was adopted at Leipsic Dec. 22nd, 1548, by the exertions of the Elector Maurice of Saxony. It was in favour of Protestantism, but adhered to some of the Catholic doctrines, and approved of the power of popes and bishops when not abused. This led to a strife among the Protestants, Melanchthon, Bergerhagen, and Major, and they opposed the interim, while others were opposed to it.

Interludes.—A term formerly used in the sacred theatricals or miracle plays; not only applied to passages of instruments music played between the verses of a psalm or hymn.

Intermediate State. [Eschatology.]

Interstices or Interstitia.—A word formerly used in ecclesiastical law, signifying the spaces of time which must elapse between the degrees of promotion from one Order to another. The Canon was fixed in 347 by the Council of Sardica, and was followed as long as the clergy were obliged to rise from the lower orders before attaining to the higher. Later it became customary to confer many degrees at once, and though the Council of Trent ordained that interstices should be at least a year's duration, the bishops obtain a power of dispensation.

Intinction.—The mode of administering the Holy Communion in the Eastern Church. The bread is broken into small pieces, dipped in the wine, and presented to the communicant in a spoon. The custom has prevailed in the East probably since the fifth century.
It was frequently followed in the Western Church in the twelfth century, but gradually degenerated into the practice of communicating in one kind.

Intonation.—The passage before the reciting note of a Gregorian chant. It is usually sung at the commencement of each psalm by the priest or chanter, but at the beginning of each verse of the Canticles by the whole choir.

Introit.—A psalm, hymn, or anthem sung before the Communion Service, while the priest is entering the altar rails. The custom is an ancient one, and was enjoined in the first Prayer Book of Edward VI., Psalms appropriate for this purpose being prefixed to the Collects, e.g. Christmas Day, Psalm xcviii. and Psalm viii.; Easter Day, Psalm xvi. and iii. These were removed at the revision of 1552, but the practice of singing a hymn or anthem before the service is still generally retained.

Intuitionists.—Those who make the basis of faith not an external revelation (whether through the Church or through the Scriptures) but the intuitions and instincts of the soul. The principle underlying this theory has shown itself in all ages; it belongs to a certain class of mind, and some of the early heretics, as well as some of the noblest of teachers, made it their starting point. Thus not only the Gnostics regarded themselves as "spiritual," lifted out of the regions of sensation and verbal teaching by the intuitions of a Divine knowledge imparted to them, but men like Thomas à Kempis felt comforted and strengthened by the conviction that as they retired into religious contemplation, God spoke, as confidentially, to their souls. [NeO-PlATONISTS, MYSTICS.] But intuitionism was concreted into a system as a result of the Reformation. That event taught men to challenge all traditional beliefs, and to make themselves sure of their foundations. Not merely the doctrines of the Creeds, but the authority of the Scriptures demanded at their hands credentials for their acceptance. And hence followed two lines of thought. There were those who declared that nothing is to be believed which imposes the acceptance of an external authority; that the Creeds, that the Bible itself, must make way for the religion of nature and the teachings of the spirit of man. Such was the teaching of some of the Deists, as Lord Herbert of Cherbury and Tindal. But there were others who accepted the Christian faith as true, on the ground that the human spirit bears witness to it, and approves it to the conscience. This was the line taken by some of the eminent Germans who are lumped together under the name of Rationalists. Their views were opposed, accepted, discriminated by writers of our own country who are sometimes known as Eclectics, the foremost of them being Coleridge. But a new school of Intuitionists has arisen in the nineteenth century, to be accounted for by the altered conditions which are the results of fuller historical criticisms and scientific discovery. The believer in the Divine authority of the Church and the truth of the Creeds remains as he was in the conviction that from the very nature of the case no questionings can touch these. But those who deny the binding authority of any external revelation have no such conviction, though those who are religious and desire to see the world made better cannot acquiesce in negations. Hence we have such writers as Emerson and Carlyle, each in his way an Intuitionist of the new school. Carlyle, however, with his historical instinct, put aside his questionings in pursuit of historic facts; Emerson was religious above all things besides, however dreamy and unpractical. According to him, it might be said that man is his own teacher, his own Bible, practically his own God. [EMERSON; PANTHEISM.]

Invention of the Cross. [CROSS.]

Investiture.—The great controversy about investiture which arose in the twelfth century was the question whether a bishop should be installed by the Pope or by the Sovereign of his own country. In early times it had been the custom that the clergy and people of a vacant diocese should elect their own bishop, the election being confirmed by the bishops of the province. Confirmation by the emperors was only necessary in the patriarchal Sees, such as Rome and Constantinople. In France the Sovereigns often took it upon themselves to nominate to vacant Sees. But though unable to consecrate newly-made bishops, the Sovereigns had the power to grant or withhold the estates, titles, etc., without which the bishop was unable to maintain the state which was necessary. Charlemagne introduced the practice of investing him with the staff and ring, which were the symbols of his spiritual office; but Gregory VII. objected to this as uncanonical, maintaining that it was right that all the temporal benefits of the office should be annexed to the spiritual, and that the two should be inseparable. This contest was carried on by the successors of Gregory for fifty-six years, and was not settled until the Council of Worms was held in 1122, when the Emperor Henry V. and Pope Calixtus II. made a compromise, agreeing that the elections should be made in accordance with the laws of the Church, but that the consent of the emperor was necessary. It was also arranged that the Pope should invest the bishop with spiritual power, and the sovereign should confer the temporalities. Until Anselm became Archbishop of Canterbury, the King of England and the Primate had acted in concert as regarded their agreement with the Pope's pretensions; but on Anselm's promotion there came a quarrel, as he requested that he might be invested by Pope Urban II. At this time there were two popes, as the German Emperor had set up a rival at Avignon, and the King had not yet made up his mind which he would acknowledge. This made the King determine that Anselm should not have his will, and the question was finally settled by the Pope's Legate, who effected a compromise by placing the pall on the altar, so that Anselm might take it, neither the Pope nor the King being concerned. Anselm then demanded permission to go to Rome to lay the question before the Pope. William threatened that if he did so he should forfeit his archbishopric; but Anselm persisted, and the threat was fulfilled. Before his return William died, and Henry I. succeeded him. Anselm was welcomed back to England; but, on the proposal of the King to re-invest him with the primacy, he refused, saying that he would not receive his office except at the hands of the Pope. The contest lasted for a long time, and Henry did his utmost to conciliate Anselm, sending embassies to the Pope to find some way of satisfying the conscience of the Archbishop without giving way. To this the Pope replied by a declaration that he refused to permit investiture by the King, intimating, nevertheless, that he would not interpose if Henry chose to take his own course. Anselm was offered the alternative of submitting to his Sovereign or of leaving the kingdom, and he chose the latter, upon which the King took his archbishopric. Anselm was on the point of excommunicating him, but Henry suggested that a compromise should be proposed to the Pope—namely, that the bishops should do homage to their King and take the oath of fealty, but that they should be invested by the Pope with the pastoral staff and ring. This decision was confirmed by a Council held in London in 1107, and thus the question was settled.

Invisibles.—A name given to some of the Reformers who denied the perpetual visibility of the Church, and in answer to the inquiry of Romanists as to the whereabouts of the Church before the time of Luther, asserted that it was invisible.

Invitatory is a short anthem which varies with the season, sung before the 95th (or Invitatory) Psalm, and repeated in whole or in part several times in the course of the Psalm and after the Gloria Patri at the end. In the Roman Offices this Psalm, with its proper Invitatory, is said daily at Nocturns as "an invitation to praise God." In the English Church this same Psalm is ordered to be said daily at morning prayer, except on Easter day (and, by a recent Convocation, through the octave), when special anthems are provided; but the Invitatory does not vary, being fixed throughout the year in the form of verse and response:—"V. Praise ye the Lord. R. The Lord's name be praised." The origin of this use of the 55th Psalm is said to be as old as the Temple services.

Invocation of Saints.—The practice of calling upon the souls of departed saints for their intercession and aid began to creep into the Church about the fourth century. It arose from the great veneration paid to martyrs. The remains of the old pagan idea, that the souls of the dead haunted the spots where their bodies were buried led people at first to resort to their graves to beg for their intercession; in the course of time visits to the cemetery were discontinued, while the prayers to the saints were retained. Invocations of Saints appear in the liturgies of the eighth century, and in all the ancient liturgies after that date, and three of these were retained in the English version of the Litany set forth in 1544. The doctrine of the Church of England upon this point is contained in Article XXII.

Invocations.—A calling upon God in prayer. It is generally considered as the first part of that necessary duty, and includes:[1] A making mention of one or more of the titles of God, indicative of the object to whom we pray. [2] A declaration of our desire and design to worship Him. [3] A desire of His assistance and acceptance under a sense of our own unworthiness. The Litany opens with a separate invocation of each Person of the Trinity, and then an invocation of the whole Godhead, as if to bespeak the ear of a merciful God that we may be blessed with an answer to all the petitions which follow.

Inward Light. [Friends.]

Iona or Icolmkill, one of the western islands of Scotland, three mile in length, and one to one and a half breadth, is famed for many monuments of antiquity, but especially as having been the residence of St. Columba [q.v.], who landed here in 563. There are on the island the ruins of St. Mary's Nunnery, the Cathedral and a great number of chapels, magnificently built, some by the Kings of Scotland others by the petty kings of the island. The Bishops of the Isles resided here after the English had taken the Isle of Man. Amongst the ancient ruins is a burying-place where not only all the nobility of the isle were interred, but forty-four Scotch, for Irish, and eight Norwegian kings.

Ireland, Church of.—The foundation of an organised Church in Ireland is said to be due to St. Patrick [q.v.], but there seems little doubt that Christianity existed still earlier. He began his labours in 432, and in 472 he made Armagh the seat of an archbishopric, and at his death, in 492, he left a body of well train missionaries to carry on his work. The early Irish Church was essentially monastic, and continued to be famous down to the leaven century for the number of pious and eminent men to which it gave birth, and also for being a source from which he light of truth burst forth to illuminate great portion of Europe. Bede tells us that in the seventh century many of the Anglo-Saxon clergy and nobles came to Ireland for instruction; and Burgundy, Germany, and the Netherlands all owed much of their knowledge of Divine truth to Irish missionaries. Until after the eleventh century the Irish Church remained independent of Rome, though many attempts had been made to attach her to Papal authority. But calvary of the power of the Archbishop of Armagh caused dissension between the bishops, and encouraged the Romanning tendency of the party. St. Malachy [q.v.] was just then exercising great influence, and by his means synod was called at Wells in 1152, where he introduced a stricter diocesan jurisdiction and adopted many Romish practices. Three years later [1155] the only English Pope, Adrian IV., assumed the right of authority over Ireland, and issued a Bull by which he wanted it to Henry II. on condition of the entire submission of the Irish Church to Rome. In 1172, when Henry completed his conquest of Ireland, he called a council of the Irish bishops and clergy at Cashel, at which it was decreed that the rites and ceremonies of the Irish Church should be ordered so as to agree with those of the Church of Rome. Henceforward her established doctrine was Roman, and so it continued till the time of the Reformation. For two centuries before the Reformation incessant contests were carried on between the Irish clergy and the English overlords, both parties struggling for supremacy in ecclesiastical matters. The English kings filled the vacant Irish Sees mostly with their own countrymen, and the Irish accordingly sought to be delivered from allegiance to England and owe submission to the Pope alone. In the reign of Henry VII. some of the English settlers carried over new seeds of Lollardism, but they did not all on a congenial soil.

Henry VIII., having obtained the compliance of his English subjects with his conduct towards Rome, resolved to extend it also to Ireland, and called together the clergy and nobles with the view of getting them to acknowledge the King's supremacy over the Church. But this was not such an easy matter as he had supposed; the Irish looked on it as an arbitrary act of the power which they detested, and in their opposition they were aided by Cromer, Archbishop of Armagh, the chief supporter of the King was George cown, the Archbishop of Dublin, who, for a long time, had been teaching doctrines subservient of the Papal authority, and by whose advice Henry summoned a Parliament to enforce his wishes. This Parliament met at Dublin in 1536, when the Royal Supremacy was sanctioned, and Protestantism declared, by law, to be the religion of Ireland. Several of the chieftains headed an insurrection to oppose it, but without avail, and they had to remain passive during the remainder of Henry's reign. With the accession of Edward VI., and the pressing on them of the new Liturgy, they made fresh struggles, but all vacant charges were promptly filled by Reformed ministers, and thus the Protestant influence was strengthened. When in Queen Mary's reign the Roman Catholic Faith was restored, the Protestants did not suffer the same persecution as in England. In 1569 Queen Elizabeth summoned an Irish Parliament to re-enforce Protestantism, the Act of Uniformity obliged the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and it was forbidden to hold Divine Service in the Irish tongue. The Reformation took no hold on the feelings of Irish churchmen, and the reign of Elizabeth is the history of a series of rebellions, which were abetted by the Pope, but proved unsuccessful. When James I. succeeded, the Romish party in Ireland fancied that he was secretly attached to their Church, and proceeded to exercise their form of worship openly in defiance of the established law; but James ordered all Roman priests to leave the country, unless they chose to conform. The northern chiefs rebelled, and their land in Ulster was confiscated to the Crown; James took advantage of this to introduce Scotch settlers there, and thus laid the foundation of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. He called together an Irish Parliament in the hope of putting an end to the religious dissensions in the country, and while it was sitting a convocation of clergy was held in Dublin, and in 1615 a public confession of faith for the Established Church of Ireland was drawn up by Archbishop Ussher of Armagh. Ussher desired, in common with others, that some points not mentioned in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England should be mentioned in the Confession of the Church of Ireland, and that other points should be mentioned more fully, and they considered this might be done without breach of agreement. Accordingly Ussher drew up these new Articles, numbering no less than one hundred and four, containing passages from the Homilies and the Catechism, besides others not found in either. Thus they declare that the Pope is the man of sin spoken of by St. Paul in 2 Thessalonians. After quoting our 11th Article on justification, they add: -"Christ is now the righteousness of all them that truly do believe in Him. He for them paid the ransom by His death. He for them fulfilled the law in His life: so that now in Him and by Him every true Christian man may be called a fuller of the Law." The 7th Article, on election to eternal life, is supplemented by the additional doctrine of reprobation to death. These Articles are now mere matter of history, for whatever force they may have had as long as the Church of Ireland remained a separate body—that is, down to the year 1800—this authority passed away when the English and Irish Churches were united. But, in fact, this authority soon received a severe blow from the hands of Ussher himself; for during Strafford's Vice-royalty, Laud being anxious to bring the Irish Church into the strictest conformity with the English, prevailed on Ussher to receive the Thirty-nine Articles as the Irish Confession, the latter, however, retaining the Irish Articles as a commentary on the Thirty-nine, and in his own diocese requiring his candidates for orders to pass an examination in them.

Charles I.'s government of Ireland was very vacillating; the people at heart were devoted to the Church of Rome, and at length, in 1641, an alarming rebellion broke out among the Papists, and they massacred the Protestants in the north. The survivors, who were mostly Scotch, applied to the Church of Scotland for a supply of ministers, and this led, in June, 1642, to the holding of the first Presbyterian by the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. Many of the episcopal clergy joined the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. Meantime the Romanists held a counter-meeting in Kilkenny, and adopted resolutions for securing the exercise of their religion, and they resolved to carry on the war in Ulster under General O'Neill. Charles being distracted with troubles at home made terms with them, which gave him the impression that he secretly favoured their views. Then, in 1644, came an order that all should be made to subscribe to the Solemn League and Covenant. Throughout the remainder of Charles's reign the history of the Irish Church and of Ireland herself is one long series of struggles and misery. In 1649 Cromwell went over to Ireland, and for a time things were more satisfactory; the Presbyterians gained the upper hand, and though Cromwell forbade them to celebrate Mass, the Roman Catholics were not persecuted. During the short time that Henry Cromwell governed Ireland much was done to promote the tranquillity of the Church, and the Presbytery of Ulster took the opportunity of this unusual quietude to settle ministers into vacant posts. Charles II.'s policy undid much of this; he restored prelacy and the Liturgy, denounced the Covenant, and refused toleration to Nonconformists. The bishops chosen by him took possession of their Sees and turned out the Presbyterian ministers. In 1672, however, Charles granted small pensions to these ejected ministers. James II., who succeeded in 1685, was bent on establishing Popery once more in Ireland; and to encourage the established clergy to join the Church of Rome, they were allowed to retain their benefices, even after leaving the Established Church. Then James issued his "Declaration of Liberty of Conscience," and this afforded relief from persecution to the Presbyterians. When the Revolution of 1688 took place, the Presbyterians of Ulster hailed William and Mary with great joy, notwithstanding that King James had landed in Ireland and commanded all the Roman Catholic interest. The Protestants were driven northwards till Derry was their only city of refuge, and here they maintained their ground for one hundred and five days against James and his army until they raised the siege. William conferred on the Presbyterians of Ulster many privileges. After the Battle of the Boyne, in 1691, a treaty was concluded at Limerick, by which the Roman Catholics were secured all rights which they had enjoyed under Charles I. The Protestant Episcopal Church was jealous of the Presbyterians, and consequently opposed them; they called in question the legality of marriages performed by them, and urged that they should be forced to use the Burial Service in the Liturgy. The King expressed his entire disapproval of this conduct, but without producing any effect. He died in 1701, and Queen Anne put herself into the hands of the High Church party, who were strongly opposed to the Presbyterians of Ulster. Then a bill was passed, requiring all persons in office, whether civil or ecclesiastical, to take the oath of abjuration, and this was done by most of the Presbyterian ministers; but some refused, and were called Nonjurors. Next came a further Bill to prevent the progress of Popery; but one of its clauses required all persons holding office to receive the Sacrament according to the Established Church within three months from their appointment, and this virtually excluded the Presbyterians from holding any public office. This was called the Sacramental Test. But, in spite of all opposition, the Presbyterian Church continued to increase, though the penal laws were vigorously enforced. The accession of George I. was welcomed by the Presbyterians as likely to secure them civil and religious freedom; they appealed to have the Test Act removed, and to have an Act of Toleration granted, but the Irish bishops prevailed against them. In 1719, however, a Toleration Act was passed in order to provide for the admission of the Presbyterians into the army, as Parliament felt that they were needed in the expected landing in Ireland of the Pretender. In 1727 the Presbyterian Church was weakened by a split in her party; the Synod of Antrim, after much discussion, seceded, refusing to sign the Westminster Confession which had hitherto been its standard. Also an immense emigration of the agricultural population took place to America; the leasing granted by William III. having fallen in, he landlords raised the rental, and the farmers, unwilling to submit, went to America with feelings of bitter hatred against the English rule. Wesley preached with success in Ireland in 1747. The first Presbytery of the seceding body was organised in 1770, under the name of the Presbytery of Antrim. In the Irish Episcopal Church many of the inferior clergy held Arian views. In 1778, when the revolutionary war had broken out between America and England, and volunteer bands had been formed for the defence of Ireland, the Irish House of Commons made once more an attempt to obtain the repeal of the Test Act, and to get a Bill passed to relieve the Roman Catholics of some of their disabilities; the latter Bill was passed, but it was not till 1779 that the grievances of the Dissenters were relieved. In 1782 the legislative independence of Ireland was acknowledged, and for the next eighteen years she had her own Parliament, during which laws were passed to improve the condition of the Presbyterian ministers. In 1795 the Government had declared its intention of erecting and endowing a school at Maynooth for the training of Romish priests; and the Presbyterians indulged the hope that they would have a college in Ulster, but were disappointed. Maynooth was built, but the Ulster plan was indefinitely postponed. In 1798 came the political rebellion, which had for its object the erection of Ireland into an independent republic. This was steadfastly opposed, both by the Presbyterian clergy and laity. Pitt effected the union between England and Ireland in 1801. Notwithstanding the favour shown by Government, the Presbytery of Ulster were at a low ebb in their orthodoxy, many of their ministers having embraced Arian and even Unitarian principles; but in 1827 Dr. Cooke took the leadership of the Synod, and did much towards uprooting Arianism and infusing new vitality into the Church. The Synod in 1828 passed eight rules which excluded Arians, Socinians, Pelagians, and Arminians from holding any office in the Church. Seventeen ministers withdrew from the Synod, and in May, 1830, formed themselves into a separate body under the name of the REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER. In 1840 the Ulster and Seccession Synods were united into one Church under the title of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland. There were four hundred and thirty-three congregations belonging to it.

In 1868 an Act of Parliament was passed which disendowed and disestablished the Episcopal Church of Ireland. Since then that Church has been governed by a General Synod, which consists of the House of Bishops, twelve in number, and the House of Representatives, two hundred and eight clerical and four hundred and sixteen lay members. The Representative Church Body consists of sixty members, viz., the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin, and the bishops of Meath, Down, Killaloe, Limerick, Tuam, Derry, Cashel, Kidmore, Cork, and Ossory, ex-officio, thirty-six elected members (twelve clerical and twenty-four lay), and twelve co-opted members.

IRENAEUS.—The greatest Christian writer of the second century. The date and place of his birth are unknown, but from his letter to Florinus, a Presbyter at Rome, it is gathered that he was an Asiatic Greek, and was taught in his childhood by St. Polycarp and by Papias, who had both been disciples of St. John. He became a presbyter in the Church of Lyons, and on the martyrdom of the aged Bishop Pothinus was elected his successor, A.D. 178. [LYONS, MARTYRS OF.] The controversy respecting the time of keeping Easter was going on at this period; and there is extant a letter from Irenaeus to Victor, Bishop of Rome, remonstrating with him for his want of charity in excommunicating those who disagreed with him.

But the chief work of Irenaeus is his book against heresies. He saw the Church deeply afflicted by them, and he classified them as a physician would diseases, preparing the remedies with care that his heretical patients might be healed, whilst they suffered as little as possible. His five books, entitled A Refutation and Subversion of Gnosis, falsely so called, was originally written in Greek, of which the original is lost except in many quotations of subsequent Fathers, but a Latin translation has come down to us. The first book is wholly occupied with a statement of the various heresies which are confuted in the remainder. Much information concerning ancient Church government is contained in this work. There are many noble sentences well worthy of remembrance, e.g. "Ever speaking well of the deserving, and never ill of the undeserving, we attain to the glory of God." He is also the author of a letter to Florinus Concerning Monarchy, in which he proves that God is not the author of evil; and of another to Blatus On Schism; besides a treatise On Knowledge, addressed to the Gentiles, and several "discussions." Irenaeus died in the reign of Severus, in the beginning of the third century. He is generally supposed to have been martyred.

There was another Irenaeus, Bishop of Sirmium in the fourth century. He was tortured and beheaded in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 304.

IRENE, Empress of Constantinople, wife of Leo IV., was born in Athens about 752. It is said that she poisoned her husband, having been banished from court for trying to bring in the worship of images. Her son, Constantine VI., was only nine years old at the death of his father in 790, and she was appointed Irene [Gr. Irene, "peace"]. — A work written with the object of restoring broken unity. The title has been given to several works in different periods of the Church, and the object aimed at should be dear to all Christian people — the unity of spirit of Christian men, if their organic reunion cannot be compassed. An irenic aim sets forth all common grounds, and to minimise differences or to show their comparative unimportance. The German KirchenTAG, the Evangelical Alliance, the Home Reunion Society, the Association for the Promotion of the Unity of Christendom, are all indications of the yearning of Christians to find peace after warfare, to unite in the bonds of one brotherhood in Christ against the sin and oppression and selfishness which are the real enemies of mankind. The well-known saying, "In necessariis unitas, in dubiis libertas, in omnibus caritas," has done much good in softening asperities, and the more we learn to act upon it, the brighter will the hope grow that our differences will, in God's good time, disappear.

Irons, William Josiah, a learned divine of the Church of England [b. 1813, d. 1883], was the son of a celebrated Congregational minister at Camberwell, was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, ordained in 1833, and became D.D. in 1854. He held two incumbencies before he became vicar of Brompton, where he began a distinguished literary career. Among his most important works are The Church of all Ages, The Bible and its Interpreters, A Defence of the Church of England, addressed to Dr. Newman, and many controversial pamphlets. For some years he was editor of the Literary Churchman. He became rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, City, in 1872, and ceased not from zealous work until prostrated by illness in 1882. His line was that of the old-fashioned High Churchman, and he viewed with deep dislike any approach to Rationalism. He was one of the promoters of the Clerical Protest against Essays and Reviews. But he will be better remembered in coming times for his familiar translation of the Dies Irae, and for many other well-known hymns. In his dying hours he begged that anyone would feel free to make use of any of his hymns, on condition of making no alteration in them.

Irving, Edward [b. 1792, d. 1834]. — One of the most celebrated preachers of this century. His birthplace was Annan, in Dumfriesshire; he was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and in 1811 appointed to superintend the mathematical school at Haddington, and in the following year removed to Kirkcaldy to instruct the higher classes. Having completed his curriculum for the ministry, he became, in 1819, assistant to Dr. Chalmers, in St. John's parish, Glasgow. Here he gained a great reputation, and on a vacancy occurring in 1822 in the ministry of the Caledonian Church, in Cross Street, Hatton Garden, he was invited to undertake it. Here he soon attracted such large congregations, not less by the force and eloquence of his discourses than by the singularity of his appearance and gesticulations, that his chapel was crowded by persons of rank and fashion to such a degree that it became necessary to admit everyone by ticket, and carriages reached through several streets. This tide of popularity, however, decreased almost as suddenly as it had risen, when the novelty began to wear off. His style, expressed in the manner of Milton, Jeremy Taylor, and the old divines, and embellished with the metaphors of poets and philosophers, was very ornate, and acquired fresh piquancy by means of personal allusions and homely truths. Irving's more enthusiastic admirers built him a church in Sidmouth Street, Regent Square, which was completed in 1829, but before that time his popularity was gone; already his more discreet followers seem to have discerned an appearance, if not a reality, of sensationalism in his career. The publication of his Oracles of God, etc., proved that he was more indebted to manner and powers of delivery than to originality of matter. Hardly was he established in his new pulpit, when his peculiar temperament urged him to the adoption of eccentricities which caused him to be charged with heresy, and at a meeting of the Presbytery in London, Nov. 29th, 1830, the report of the committee appointed to examine his work on Christ's Humanity was read. Irving was therein charged with holding Christ guilty of original and actual sin, and denying the doctrines of the Atonement. For eighteen months the proceedings were prolonged, during which time he adopted a fresh novelty, that of the "unknown tongues." [IRVINGITES.] Then the trustees of his church completed his ejection. May 3rd, 1832, and he was deposed in 1833.
by the Presbytery of Annan, which had licensed him. Shortly after this his health failed him, and he died of consumption in Glasgow. Dr. Chalmers thus estimates Irving's character: "The constitutional basis and ground-work of his character was virtue alone, and, notwithstanding all his errors and extravagances, which both injured him in the estimation of the world and threw discredit upon much that was good and useful in his writings, I believe him to be a man of deep and devoted piety."

In 1827 he published The Coming of the Messiah in Glory and Majesty, by Juan Josafat Ben Ezra, translated from the Spanish, professing to be written by a Christian Jew, though in reality by a Spanish Jesuit, and in his preface Irving first betrayed his heretical opinions. In 1828 he published Homilies on the Sacraments, Last Days, and Discourses on the Evil Character of These Times, besides some sermons, lectures, etc.; Church and State Responsible to Each Other, A Series of Discourses on Daniel's Vision of the Four Beasts [1829]; Lectures on the Book of the Revelation [1830]; The Orthodox and Catholic Doctrine of our Lord's Human Nature [1830]; The Day of Pentecost, or the Baptism with the Holy Ghost, in three parts [1831], The Confessions of Faith and the Books of Discipline of the Church of Scotland. A life of him has been written by Mrs. Oliphant, and by Carlyle in his Miscellaneous Essays, and a handsome edition of his works has been published by Messrs. Strahan and Co.

Irvingites.—The religious body commonly so called, after Irving, strenuously rejects this title, and calls itself the Catholic Apostolic Church. Its origin is to be traced to the period mentioned above in Irving's life, when the alleged phenomena of the unknown tongues first appeared. The gifts were first claimed in Scotland. One of the members of the congregation of Mr. Scott, a Presbyterian clergyman of Woolwich, who had declared himself an adherent of Mr. Irving in the matter of Christ's fallibility, was a young woman who had gone to Scotland and suddenly claimed the power to speak with new tongues. Almost simultaneously these utterances were heard in London. This was in 1830. Great excitement was caused by joy, grief, amazement, shame, according to the views of the various witnesses. The utterers, mostly females, suddenly rose up in the congregation and spoke rapidly. The sounds were taken down and laid before several linguists, who declared them incoherent jargon. When the words were intelligible they testified that the second coming of Christ was at hand, to be preceded by sore judgments. After three and a half years of testimony, beginning from Jan. 14th, 1832, Christ would come in glory, the living saints would be caught up to meet Him, and the dead saints would be raised. Irving declared with great eloquence that the supernatural nature of the manifestation was obvious, full of majesty and grandeur, and such as those which astonished the witnesses of the first Pentecost. Meanwhile Irving was deposed from the ministry of the Scottish Church, and removed, with such remains of the congregation as still held to him, first to a room in Gray's Inn Lane, and afterwards to one in Newman Street, which had once been the studio of Benjamin West. Here the "Catholic Apostolic Church" was organised, The room was fitted up in obedience to what were supposed to be inspired utterances. Instead of a pulpit there was a raised platform, to contain about fifty persons, the ascent to which was by several steps. In front of it were seven seats; that in the centre was for the angel, the others for six elders. Below these were seven other seats for prophets, four of whom were women. Below these, again, were seven deacons. But the great feature was that the utterances commanded the appointment of twelve apostles, several of whom were prophets. The angel ordered the service, exposition was the work of the elders, after whom came the prophets speaking in utterance. There were sixty evangelists, antitypes of the sixty pillars of the tabernacle. Soon after the completion of the arrangements Irving died. He had been an angel, but not one of the twelve apostles. An angel was appointed in his place, and there was no break in the new Church. In 1835 other congregations had been formed in London to the number of seven, and the analogy of Rev. ii. and iii. was pronounced complete. At first an utterance bade the apostles go into all the world to preach, but afterwards they were ordered to go to Albury, near Guildford, for study and consultation. In 1836 they presented their "testimony" to the Archbishop of Canterbury, then to the King and the other Sovereigns of Europe, then to the Pope. In 1838 the apostles, in obedience to another utterance, went on the Continent for two years, but were recalled in 1840 to settle some disputes which had arisen in the council. The end of it was that they suspended the council, which has not met since. One of the apostles seceded; the others, all but one, have since died. In 1842 a liturgy was published, "combining the excellencies of all preceding liturgies." It is founded on that of the Church of England, but is much more elaborate. Thus, while there are three forms of Communion Service, there are also forms for "Removing the Holy Sacrament," for the "Benediction of Holy Water," "Before a Council," "Before a Visitation," thirty-seven services for special occasions, and twelve for private occasions, such as the "benediction of a house," "of a ship," "of holy oil," etc. The anointing of the sick with oil was not introduced until 1847, and the Reservation of the Sacrament in an appropriate tabernacle to be taken by the angel and "proposed before the Lord at morning and evening service," not until 1850. The latest addition was in 1852, when two lights upon the altar, and seven before it, were ordered, and incense was to be burnt during prayer. It will thus be seen that the ritual of this Church is of an elaborate and imposing character. The dress, as every other part of the worship, is highly symbolic; thus the prophets wear blue stoles, typical of the skies, the source of their inspiration; the evangelists wear red, to represent the blood of the cross, which forms the basis of the gospel which they preach. Each congregation is presided over by an angel or bishop, the two offices being held to mean the same thing, and under him are the priests and deacons. They have a magnificent church in Gordon Square, to which the Newman Street congregation removed in 1853, and their churches generally are handsome. The members belong, for the most part, to the wealthy classes, the movement having made but little progress among the poor. They are remarkably zealous and eager to proselytize, and their consistency to their opinions, in regular attendance on their worship, as well as in their self-denial and deeds of charity, is such as members of any communion might rejoice to emulate. They regard it as a sacred duty to pay a tithe of their substance to the service of God. In any place where there are a certain number of members they build a church, but in other places they are among the most constant and devout members of the Church of England congregations. The often deferred announcement of Christ's Advent will probably account for the non-increase of their numbers, but the zeal to gather fresh members seems to be as strong as ever in the most fervid. They are numerous in Germany, and there are also congregations in France and Switzerland, as well as in America. The last census of religious worship [1882] returned forty-seven registered places of worship in England and Wales.

Isidore, Sr., of Alexandria, was a celebrated hermit, born in Egypt A.D. 318, and renowned for his learning and austerities. A disciple of St. Athanasius, who had ordained him priest, he was a strenuous opponent of Arianism. He became the friend and confidant of Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, who wished to advance him to the Bishopric of Constantinople in opposition to St. Chrysostom. It was probably the same Isidore who, in 401, occupied the post of Hospitaller at Alexandria, an office which charged him with the relief of the poor and of strangers. He incurred the displeasure of Theophilus by opposing him in the attempted misuse of a sum of money dedicated to the poor. The Bishop was vindictive, and accused the old man—now over eighty years of age—of crimes said to have been committed years before, and supported the charge by the evidence of a paper which he professed had been mislaid for eighteen years. Isidore fled into the desert of Nitria with a number of monks, but the relentless Theophilus followed him, and they were compelled to seek a refuge in Palestine, whence they were also dislodged. Finally they placed themselves under the protection of Chrysostom at Constantinople. Chrysostom's efforts to bring about a reconciliation, combined with the jealousy of Theophilus against the See of "New Rome," to draw the anger of the latter upon himself, and led at last to his banishment. Isidore died at Constantinople in 403.

Isidore of Seville succeeded his brother Leander as Archbishop of that city in 595. He gained an extraordinary reputation for learning, and wrote a large number of books, which were widely read throughout Europe. The Venerable Bede was engaged on a translation of Isidore's works at the time of his death. His chief works were—an encyclopedic compilation in twenty books: a chronological compendium, from the Creation to 626; a history of the Goths; a book on ecclesiastical writers, and several commentaries. To him were formerly ascribed the "Isidorian Decretals," on which so many of the extravagant claims of the Popes were based. But it has now been proved conclusively that they are forgeries. [Decretals.]

Islam. [Mahometanism.]

Italian Architecture.—Gothic Architecture [q.v.] began to lose its purity about the end of the fifteenth century, when Classical features were introduced, attributable to the revival of Pagan learning in Europe. The change was less marked in England than on the Continent, where the Classical style obtained preeminence, and Michael Angelo adopted it for the magnificent Cathedral of St. Peter's. Italian architecture became from that time the prevalent style until the revival of Gothic in our own century.

"Ita, missa est" [literally, "Go; it is a dismissal"], the formula which was ancienly used to dismiss the catechumens before the Holy Mysteries were celebrated. In some Liturgies the formula is, "Let us go on in the peace of the Lord." [Mass.]

Itinerary.—A form of prayer which is used by Roman Catholic clergy when about to start on a journey. It consists of the Benedictus, an antiphon, preces, and two collects, which are taken from the Gregorian Sacramentary. The itinerary is not found in the older Breviaries, but in an ancient Pontifical there is one similar to, but rather longer than that used at present.
Jablonski, DANIEL ERNST, a distinguished German Protestant, was born near Dantzig in 1660. Brought up as a Moravian, he studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Oxford, was ordained, became a Court Preacher, and in 1737 was consecrated Bishop by Count Zinzendorf, the founder of the Herrnhuters, or modern Moravians. Jablonski died at Berlin in 1741. He is chiefly noted for his endeavours to bring about a union between the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, which led to his correspondence with Leibnitz, which was published in 1747.

Jacobi, FRIEDRICH HEINRICH [b. 1743, d. 1819], a German metaphysician of whose history we know some interesting particulars from the autobiography of his friend Goethe, who says that their conversations and readings together by the Rhine affected his own future life. It was Goethe who persuaded Jacobi to put forth the ideas which so profoundly moved him, and he did so at first in the form of two philosophical novels. Many influences were at work upon him—first Spinoza's works, then those of another Jew, a friend and contemporary of Jacobi, Moses Mendelssohn. But Kant's philosophy [KANT] was now exercising the religious spirit of Germany, and though Jacobi rejected resolutely Kant's doctrine that faith cannot be without evident and apparent demonstration, he afterwards recognised that Kant attributed to the power which he denied to Understanding, and so made spiritual religion not only a possibility, but a necessity. Hence he is to be reckoned a disciple of Kant, and cannot be said to have developed any original system of his own. He advocated belief not because the thing believed was true, but because it satisfied the soul, and raised it above the sordid ares of life. Mr. Maurice quotes a very fine passage from him [Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, vol. iv, p. 650], which shows that though his principle was worthless, and one may say dangerous, as a philosophical basis, he practical conclusions which he arrived at were sound, namely, that obedience is better than knowledge, that the fear of the Lord is wisdom, and departure from evil is understanding.

Jacobins.—A name applied in France to the Dominicans, whose chief convent was near the gate of St. Jacques, in Paris. The members of the Breton Club used to assemble in the hall of St. Jacques at the outbreak of the French Revolution, and the name of Jacobins was accordingly given to the violent revolutionists.

Jacobites.—A sect which arose in the last about the year 450. They held the Monophysite doctrine, i.e. that there is but one nature in Christ, the human nature being so absorbed into the Divine that Christ was not perfect man. This heresy was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon in 451, and Dioscorus, Patriarch of Alexandria, its originator, deposed. But on the death of the Emperor Marcian, who had taken the side of the orthodox, a Monophysite named Timothy Ælurus, called also "The Cat," caused himself to be consecrated Patriarch of Alexandria in 457, and ever since the Monophysites have maintained their possession of the Patriarchate. Proterius, the orthodox patriarch, was savagely murdered by the mob. At the same time the Monophysites set up a succession of bishops throughout Palestine, and gradually outnumbered the orthodox Christians in both countries; they spread rapidly also in Armenia. The tenets of the sect were modified somewhat by Timothy, and again about the year 520 by Severus, who taught that the human nature in Christ was not altogether lost, but rather amalgamated with the Divine, retaining certain of its qualities, but still not a perfect human nature. These modifications, however, caused divisions, and the sect was much weakened and depressed in consequence. But a great leader and propagator of their opinions arose in Jacobus Baradus, Bishop of Edessa [541—578]. Principally by his exertions the sect spread rapidly throughout Syria and Egypt, and henceforth they took their name from their great leader and were called Jacobites. At the conquest of Egypt by the Mahometans they were established as the recognised Christian Church of that country; they are known in Egypt also under the name of Copts. At the present time they possess three patriarchates, viz. Alexandria, Antioch, and Armenia. The Church of Abyssinia holds communion with the Coptic Church of Egypt. With the exception of their views regarding the nature of Christ, the Jacobites are in general agreement with the orthodox Eastern Church. [See also Eastern Church, Monophysites.]

Jacobson, WILLIAM [b. 1803, d. 1883], Bishop of Chester. His father was a mercantile clerk at Yarmouth, and was lost at sea when his son was an infant. The boy was brought up as a Nonconformist, but his views were of such a character that he was advised by the Principal of Mill Hill College, Birmingham, to study for the ministry of the Church of England. He went to Exeter College, Oxford, being befriended by a rich and liberal banker of Yarmouth, Mr. Dawson Turner, a member of the Society of Friends. He afterwards married Miss Dawson Turner. Among his earlier friends was Frederick Denison Maurice, who was indebted to Dr. Jacobson for timely pecuniary aid, proffered with the utmost delicacy and good feeling at a critical period of his life. In 1848 Dr.
Jacobson, who had held the office of Public Orator for six years, was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity. To this chair was attached a canonry at Christ Church, and also at that time and for some years afterwards the rectory of Ewelme, in Oxfordshire, though in the latter case a separation has since been effected. Dr. Jacobson was Regius Professor till 1865. His lectures were remarkable rather for solidity than brilliancy, and the honourable epithet of "Judicious," which belongs of right to a father of the English Church, would probably best represent the impression he made on the successive generations of candidates for holy orders who attended his lectures in the Latin Chapel of the cathedral. He was however, the active and astute chairman of Mr. Gladstone's Election Committee in 1865, when that gentleman was defeated by Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, and went away "unmuzzled" to Lancashire. Very shortly afterwards Dr. Graham, Bishop of Chester, died, and Lord Palmerston nominated Dr. Jacobson to the see. Lord Palmerston himself died in the October of the same year (1865), and Dr. Jacobson, therefore, was the last of his Episcopal appointments. Dr. Jacobson administered his diocese with discretion, moderation, and tact, and conferred on it in trouble times the distinction, so coveted by nations, of an uneventful history. To make no enemies, to stand aloof from controversy, and to retain the attachment of all his friends was his happy fortune. His reputation was firmly established in the kindly memories of many generations of Oxford men long before he became Bishop of Chester in 1865. He belongs to the generation which witnessed the Tractarian movement from its earliest beginnings to its tragic catastrophe, and he was one of the few men who lived through that tremendous time without being perceptibly affected by its dominant influence. It would be very unfair to say that Dr. Jacobson was an old-fashioned bishop, though it is true that his name and personality were not so much before the world as those of many of his younger brethren. A man who becomes a bishop at past sixty, and whose previous life for many years has been an example of studious retirement and practical quietism, may well be excused if he prefers to be a bishop rather of the older scholarly than of the newer energetic type. But Dr. Jacobson was never unmindful of the spiritual needs of his populous diocese. It needs a bishop of energy and perseverance to carry into practical effect the subdivision of his See, necessitated by the incessant growth of population; and, therefore, the constitution and endowment of the bishopric of Liverpool deserves to be recorded as a testimony to Dr. Jacobson's episcopal activity. His health giving way, he retired from his See in 1883, and died a few months later. He was the editor of Novell's Catechism, The Letters of SS. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp, a new edition of The Oxford Paraphrase and Annotations on the Epistles of St. Paul, The Collected Works of Bishop Saunderson; and author of Fragmentary Illustrations of the History of the Book of Common Prayer, A Speech in the Convocation of York on The Athanasian Creed, three Charges, contributions to the Speaker's Commentary, and a volume of sermons.

Jacomb, THOMAS [b. 1622, d. 1687], was a London Nonconformist who was ejected from his living by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He is chiefly noted for his sermons on Romans viii., and he also continued Poole's Annotations.

Jacoponi da Todi, an Italian hymn-writer, was born at Todi in 1240. He studied law at Bologna, where he became noted for his talents. He spent a wild youth, but his life was changed by the sudden and violent death of his wife. He determined to become a monk, and in 1278 entered the Franciscan Order of Minorites. He composed poems against Boniface VIII., and in 1297 framed a plot to depose him, which was discovered, and Jacoponi was imprisoned till the Pope's death. The monk died in the monastery of Collayone in 1306.

Jacoponi wrote many hymns, the best known of which, Stabat Mater dolorosa, has been translated into English, At the Cross her station keeping. It is said that he also wrote Stabat Mater speciosa, Stood the glad and beauteous mother, but this is doubtful. The Stabat Mater has been also ascribed to Gregory the Great, Innocent III., and others, but tradition has for long attributed it to Jacoponi, and most probably it is his. It has often been set to music, the best known composition being by Rossini.

Jago - Compostella, St. — This is a corruption of Sanctus Jacobus Apostolus, "St. James the Apostle," and is the Spanish name of the shrine of that Apostle, who is regarded as the patron saint of Spain. The Spaniards say that after Christ's ascension James preached the Gospel in Judea, then travelled over the whole world, and at last came to Spain, where he made few converts, but one day the Virgin appeared to him on the top of a pillar of jasper on the banks of the Ebro, commanded him to build her a chapel on the spot, and prophesied that all the province would become Christian. James built the famous Church of Our Lady of the Pillar, and founded the faith, and then returned to Judea, where, as is told in the Bible, he was beheaded by Herod Agrippa. His disciples took away his body, and, not daring to bury it for fear of the Jews, carried it to Joppa, and placed it on board a ship. Angels directed the course for the coast of Spain, and they landed on the coast of Galicia, where the saint was buried. During the invasion of the barbarians the Jahn, Johann [b. 1750, d. 1817], a celebrated Roman Catholic writer, born at aswitz, in Moravia. He gave himself up to the study of Oriental languages, and wrote commentaries of Chaldee, Syriac, Arabian, and Hebrew, and was appointed Professor at Litzitz in 1784, and at Vienna in 1789. One diversity from other theologians in his own on several points of exegesis caused him to resign his office in 1805, and he was then made a Canon of St. Stephen. His chief orks, which have been translated into English, are Introduction to the Old Testament Biblical Archeology, published at Vienna 1797—1800, and a Critical Commentary on the Prophets of the Old Testament, published in 1815.

James, Sr., of Nisibis, in Mesopotamia, as born towards the end of the third century. From his zeal to defend and propagate the true faith he suffered much from idolaters and heretics. He lived at first in solitude, practised great austerities, was famous for being a confessor under the Emperor Maximin, and was chosen bishop of the town of isibis. He is said in Catholic tradition to have wrought a great many miracles, even using some dead people to life. He was present at the Council of Nicaea in 325, where he said to have taken a leading part. He erected a beautiful cathedral in Nisibis. Sapor II., king of Persia, besieged the town three times in 389, 436, and 350—but he was defeated with his great army by the address and bravery, and, tradition says, miracles, of the saint. James died, probably about 350.

This saint was the author of several catises, as De Fide, De Bello, De Punitientia, e Resurrectione, etc., of some commentaries Syriac, and of a letter to the Bishop of Melia and Ctesiphon on the Assyrianism. The Liturgy which has been ascribed him [LITURGIA] was probably the work of James of Sarug.

James, John Angell, a Congregationalist minister, was born at Blandford in 1785. He was educated at Gosperton, and in 1806 became pastor of Carr's Lane Chapel, Birmingham, where he remained till his death in 1859, working with single-hearted conscientiousness and exhibiting great power as preacher. He is the author of several works, the best known of which are his natural Addresses and The Anxious Enquirer Salvation Directed and Encouraged.

Jameson, Anna, Mrs. [b. 1797, d. 1860]. One of the most distinguished female writers on art and general literature. She was born in Dublin. Her maiden name was Murphy. She married a barrister named Jameson, and went with him to Canada, but they were separated shortly after. Her earliest publication was the Diary of an Ennuyée, published in 1826; this was followed by various works on general subjects; but we mention her here on account of the great influence some of her publications have had on sacred art. These are:—Sacred and Legendary Art [1848]; Legends of the Monastic Orders [1850]; Legends of the Madonna [1852]; Scriptural and Legendary History of Our Lord as Represented in Art. The first volume of this was published the year of her death [1860]; the second volume was finished by Lady Eastlake, and published two years later.

Jansenists.—The questions raised by Luther concerning the salvation of man, the doctrines of grace, of free will, of human merit, profoundly stirred the whole Christian world, far beyond the persons who broke away from the Roman Church. These questions had, in fact, been in agitation from the days of Augustine to those of Thomas Aquinas; there had been many searchings of heart, and yearnings after more light, long before Luther appeared. So mighty was the effect which his preaching produced, that there were some of the most ardent upholders of the Papal power who did not cease to declare that that power must be upheld by a fuller preaching of the justification of sinners through the finished sacrifice of Christ. Men like Cardinal Pole, and even Bishop Gardiner, maintained that Lutheranism could only be stopped by firm opposition to Pelagian error, by the full statement of the grace of God and the merits of Christ as the ground of acceptance. To oppose this view was one of the first works of the newly risen Order of Jesuits. The Council of Trent was convened, and Lainez, who had succeeded Loyola as General of the Order, gave to the society its tone and direction. Loyola had been the founder; Xavier had given to it a wonderful prestige by his enthusiastic labours in the East; but to Lainez, more than to any one else, should we attribute the character and principles which we associate with the name of Jesuitism. At Trent, then, when Pole, with the Archbishop of Sienna and a few others, entered the Council not to reject a doctrine simply because Luther had taught it, but to ascribe justification simply and solely to the merits of Christ through faith, Lainez led the opposition, and procured the adoption of the Tridentine canons and anathemas. But this was only a step. In 1588 Molina [q. v.] carried his views to the extent that free will, without the aid of grace, can elevate itself so far that a man shall so merit the favour of God that He shall bestow grace on account of Christ's merits, whereby he shall experience the supernatural effects of justification. In other words, man begins a work which God completes. Such views created intense alarm, and the Jesuits (who were identified with them) were in 1596 formally accused before the Inquisition of heresy. The Pope Clement VIII. showed that he upheld the doctrines of grace and predestination as taught by the Dominicans against the Jesuits. But the latter had been staunch supporters of the Holy See, they had powerful friends among the European sovereigns, and Cardinal Perron warned the Pope that even a Protestant might sign the doctrines of the Dominicans. Consequently Pope Clement put off the definitive decision to which he was inwardly inclined. In 1605 he was succeeded by Paul V. His judgment was like that of his predecessor, but the same difficulties also confronted him. In October and November he was considering in what precise form to condemn the Molinist doctrines, but the Jesuits so skillfully postponed the matter, that in August, 1607, the contending parties were dismissed with the announcement that decision would be given in due time, and meanwhile the litigants were to refrain from maligning each other. This was a triumph for the Jesuits, who made good use of the fact that Molinism had not been condemned, and proceeded to denounce the Protestant doctrine that we can do no good works acceptable to God without the grace of Christ. Many hearts still clung to St. Augustine, and felt that his teaching was utterly impugned hereby. Hence the deep relief that came to these when Cornelius Jansen, Bishop of Ypres, completed his Augustinus. His history may be told in a few words. Born in 1585 at Akki, in Holland, he had studied at Utrecht, Louvain, and Paris, and having acquired a deep knowledge of Scripture and the Fathers, especially of Augustine, he became Professor of Scripture at Louvain. The prominent part which he took here in a controversy with the Jesuits caused him to be sent on an embassy to Madrid. In 1636 he was appointed Bishop of Ypres, and died of the plague, May 6th, 1638, just as he had finished the great work on which he had been engaged for so many years. He had left in writing a declaration that he submitted his work to the judgment of the Pope. But the Jesuits were already on the alert for its suppression, and his friends, knowing this, were eager for its publication without waiting on the procrastinations of the Roman Court. It was published at Louvain in 1640, and was hailed by many who, while remaining within the pale of the Church, sighed for real spirituality, and, feeling their own impotence, rejoiced at such a proclamation of the grace of God. Against it were ranged the Jesuits, who, to consolidate their influence, multiplied books of loose casuistry, and softened down guilt when they got themselves everywhere installed as confessors. The bitterest object of their enmity in France was Jean Baptist du Verger de Hauranne, commonly known as M. de St. Cyran, from the abbacy which he held. He had been a fellow-student of Jansen at Louvain, and they had worked hand in hand against the Jesuits. He had laboured simultaneously, but independently, on the same side, and, eight days after the death of Jansen, had been immured in the dungeons of Vincennes for heresy by Cardinal Richelieu at the instigation of the Jesuits. He was released after Richelieu’s death in 1643, but his health was ruined, and he died a few months later. [Port Royalists.] In 1642 the Jesuits obtained from the Pope a general condemnation of the Augustinus. This was a decisive point, contrasting strongly enough with the dilatory course of proceedings against the Molinists, and was carried in consequence of a passage in which Jansen had brought forward a passage of St. Augustine as decisive, although the same doctrine (without reference, of course, to that Father) had been condemned at Rome. Such an inroad on Papal Infallibility ensured condemnation. But the controversy was not hereby ended. Many refused to receive the Bull of Condemnation (in Eminenti), and the Jesuits drew up five propositions as containing the special heresies of Jansenism, of which they demanded condemnation. They were as follows:—

I. Aliqua Dei praecertis hominibus justis volentibus, et conscius, secundum quos habent vires, sunt impossibilia: destinorum illi gratia, qua possit fieri.

II. Interii gratiae, in statu naturae lapse, nunquam resistitatur.

III. Ad merendum, et demerendum in statu naturae lapso, non requiritur in homine libertas i necessitate, sed sufficient libertas a coactione.

IV. Semipelagian admittereat praeventi gratias interioris necessitatem ad singularis actus et quod in hoc gravi negotio fidelis, usque in hac praeventi quod teneatur eam gratiam talem esse, cuius humana voluntas resistere, vel obtemperare.

V. Semipelagianum est, diece Christum pro omnibus mortuam esse, aut sanum fudisse.

1. Some commands of God are impossible for just men to perform, even when willing and endeavouring to do so, in accordance with the strength which they at present have: there is also wanting to them that grace by which it may be possible for them to perform them.

2. In the condition of fallen nature resistance never made to inward grace.

3. For deserving and meriting reward, in the condition of fallen nature, there is not required in man freedom from necessity, but freedom from compulsion suffices.

4. The Semipelagians allowed the necessity of a prevenient grace for single acts, even from the beginning of faith, and in the first they were heretics, until they held that grace to be such, to the will of man, as able to resist it or otherwise suffices.

5. It is Semipelagian to say that Christ died, shed his blood for all men absolutely.

The Dominicans, who saw that the doctrine of St. Augustine was being attacked, objected to a condemnation; but Pope Innocent X. though he hated all theological studies, cared nothing personally about the question.
was urged on by his secretary, Cardinal Chigi, and pronounced the condemnation May 31st, 1653. To the mortification of the Jesuits, the Jansenists declared their willingness to sign the condemnation, declaring that the propositions in the sense which the Jesuits affixed to them were not to be found in the writings of Jansen at all. Their adversaries were thus checked for the time, and the Jansenists took advantage of their ignorance o publish anonymously an epistle of St. Prosper (the scholar of St. Augustine) to Ruffinus against Pelagius. The Jesuits pronounced this a fresh piece of Jansenist heresy, and when they discovered the trap into which they had run, declared that the doctrine was true when understood in an orthodox sense. That is, words heretical in the mouth of a Jansenist, were sound when spoken by St. Prosper: not what is said, but who says it, is the true test. The Jesuits next proceeded to procure from the Pope the declaration of the fact that the incriminated propositions were actually in the writings of Jansen, and in this they succeeded [Sept. 29th, 1654]. Hence arose the celebrated distinction of \textit{fait} and \textit{droit}. The Jansenists denied the Papal prerogative to extend to questions of \textit{fait}, and were supported by the highest authorities, who held that the Pope was guided infallibly to questions of doctrine; but that where supernatural judgment was not needed the Pope might be wrong, misinformed, ignorant, or prejudiced. Thus the null enmity of the dominant party in France was now declared. Not only a man who held he five propositions was a heretic, but even one who condemned them, but denied that they were the doctrines of Jansen. A man was responsible not only for his own, but for his neighbour's faith. This triumph was practically demonstrated by the decree which the Jesuits obtained against the Port Royalists \cite{9ff}. They were checked, indeed, by the wonderful effect of Pascal's \textit{Provincial Letters} \cite{Pascal}, and the nuns were left in peace for while; but Papal Infallibility was too much endangered to allow justice in other respects a prevail. Cardinal Chigi, who had persuaded Pope Innocent X. to condemn Jansen, succeeded to the Pependom as Alexander VII., and issued a new Bull declaring that the \textit{case} which Jansen had intended was heretical. Four years later, Louis XIV. gave effect to this \textit{bull} by assembling the bishops in December, 1660, when the crafty and unscrupulous De Marcq, Archbishop of Toulouse, drew up he following proposition:—

"I condemn from my inmost soul, and by word of mouth, the doctrine of the five propositions which are contained in the work of Cornelius Jansen, a doctrine which is not that of St. Augustine, these sentiments Jansen has misrepresented."

Subscription to this was demanded not only rom all the clergy, but (which was altogether novelty) from laymen engaged in tuition of any kind. Persecution now began in earnest, and the Bastile was crowded with those who refused to violate their conscience by subscribing. It was a strange state of things. On one side was the most absolute king in Europe, all the resources of Rome, the powerful Jesuit body; but, nevertheless, a few weak women at Port Royal resolutely held their ground, supported by One who ruleth the raging of the sea and the stirvings of the people.

In 1668 a change came, known as "the pacification of Pope Clement XIV." Such representations were made to him, that he accepted the Jansenist subscription to the condemnation of the five propositions, \textit{without reference to Jansen's writings}, and with reservation of all senses laid down by St. Augustine. Then the prison doors were opened, a Jansenist was no longer of necessity a heretic, and the principles of the Jansenists became widely diffused. They now busied themselves in circulating the Scriptures in French. But in the death of the Duchess of Longueville in 1679 they lost a strong friend; a few weeks later the Jesuits procured the expulsion of the Port Royalists; the Jansenists were oppressed anew, Fénélon was banished, and the Jesuits triumphed everywhere.

Among those who had received some Jansenistic doctrines were the French Benedictines. That learned and laborious body had commenced the publication of their splendid edition of \textit{St. Augustine} in 1679, and men were astonished to find that the great Father was even more of a Jansenist than had been expected. For the Benedictines had published the genuine text, which it was found had been again and again falsified to make it more in accordance with Roman teaching, so that even Jansen himself had not known the full force of Augustine's doctrines. The Jesuits furiously charged the Benedictines with falsification of documents; but the charge recoiled upon themselves.

Amongst those who had preached the doctrines of grace was \textit{Quesnel} \cite{Quesnel}. His writings had been strongly recommended by De Noailles, Bishop of Châlons; but he, on becoming Archbishop of Paris, was forced by the Jesuits to eat his words, and to condemn Quesnel. It caused him the most poignant and bitter remorse afterwards, and he endeavoured to repair the mischief which he had done, but the Jesuits were implacable. The publication of the Bull \textit{Unigenitus} by Pope Clement XI. (Sept. 8th, 1713), in which a hundred and one propositions of Quesnel were declared heretical, was the culmination of their triumph. But the Jansenists, though there was no longer a united body like the Port Royalists to act as their focus, were numerous though scattered, and these oppressions and persecutions created a great sympathy in their favour: so much, that several French bishops solemnly appealed from the Papal Bull to a General Council. Unfortunately the Jansenists had placed themselves in a false position by submitting at all. It would have been better had they appealed to the Scriptures in the beginning, instead of identifying the Papal decision with the voice of the whole Church of Christ, and endeavouring to make a saving clause of "accepting so far as their conscience would suffer them." They became stronger when they were driven to repudiate Papal Infallibility altogether. Ranke says, "We find traces of them in Vienna, in Brussels, in Spain and Portugal, and in every part of Italy. They disseminated their doctrines in every part of Christendom." In Rome, however, the Jesuits had it all their own way, until their tyranny so manifested itself that a clamour arose for their suppression. Pope Benedict XIV. would probably have restrained them, but he died. Clement XIII. favoured them, but in the beginning of 1769 ambassadors came from Naples, Spain, and France to renew the cry for suppression. The Pope convened a Consistory, and died the evening before it should have met. Clement XIV. was tinged with Jansenist sentiments. He abolished the Order [July 21st, 1773], and for doing so the Jesuits are charged with poisoning him. In an evil hour Pope Pius VII. restored it [Aug. 7th, 1814]. [Jesuits.]

Meanwhile the Jansenists, hated and proscribed, found shelter in Protestant Holland. The Roman Catholics of that country were reputed to comprise 330,000 Jansenists. The Jesuits were powerless here to set open persecution on foot, so they called on the Pope to appoint Jesuits to places of authority. Holland had formerly belonged to the ancient See of Utrecht [WILLIBROOD], but in 1559 Pope Paul IV. had erected that See into an archbishopric with the five Suffragan Sees of Haarlem, Deventer, Leeuwarden, Groningen, and Middelburg. When Protestantism became the religion of Holland, after the emancipation from Spain, and only Utrecht and Haarlem remained faithful to Rome, the Suffragan Sees were suppressed, and in the Catholic district the Chapter of Haarlem was joined to that of Utrecht. The See became vacant in 1688, and the Jesuits persuaded the Pope to overrule the election of the Chapter in favour of M. van Heusen, a holder of Jansenist views. A miserable series of intrigues followed. The Chapters firmly asserted their undoubted rights, but endeavoured, without compromise, to arrange the differences with Rome. After appealing many times in vain, during which the See of Utrecht remained vacant, and the Church was administered by Vicars-General, they took a decided step. They elected Cornelius Steenhoven Archbishop of Utrecht in 1721, and petitioned the Roman Pontiff for his consecration. Their letters one after another remaining unanswered, they addressed an appeal to the bishops of neighbouring dioceses, on whom, according to ancient precedent, the duty of consecration lay. Then the Holy See broke silence by commanding the bishops to take no part in their consecration. In 1724 the Chapters applied to Doctor Varlet, the Bishop of Babylon "in partibus," who had been driven from the discharge of his episcopal functions for his opposition to the Bull Unigenitus: he complied with their prayer, and consecrated Steenhoven Oct. 15th, 1724. A formal notice was sent to the Pope, who replied by cursing them. Steenhoven appealed to a General Council, but died in a short time. Then the Chapters elected Johannes Barchman Wytiers, and him also the Bishop of Babylon consecrated. He received letters of communion from many bishops, which are preserved at Utrecht. This Archbishop died in 1733 and again a third and fourth time the Bishop of Babylon consecrated. The fourth Archbishop restored two Suffragan Sees—Haarlem and Deventer—so securing the succession, and they consecrated the fifth Archbishop of the Jansenist Church of Holland. An attempt was made by Napoleon when the Dutch nation, like the rest of the Continent, lay for a while prostrate at his feet, to suppress it by putting forward the claim to regulate public worship, but the attempt failed, and the Jansenist Church in Holland still holds its ground having thus been in existence 180 years. Each bishop notifies his election to the Pope and craves confirmation; but the Papacy has continued to reject all advances; and the result is the curious phenomena of a body professing to recognise the primacy of the Papal See, but rejecting its tyranny, declaring the Pope to be head of the Bishops, but subject to the authority of a General Council. The recent promulgation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception the Virgin Mary occasioned a fresh protest from the Utrecht Church, which now probably numbers about 5,000 to 6,000, with a clergy of about thirty. From the Jansenists the Old Catholics have received the Episcopal succession. [Old Catholics.]

Januarius, Sr., Bishop of Beneventus in the kingdom of Naples, in the reign of Diocletian and Maximian, and remarkable for his friendship with Sosius, a deacon of Misen near Puzzuoli. On hearing that he, together with another deacon, Proculus, and two laymen, Eutyches and Acutius, had been thrown into prison, Januarius visited and ministered to them, and at length was himself apprehended and thrown into a furnace, from which, as are told, he received no hurt. A Deacon Festus—and a Reader—Desiderius—having come to Nola, the place of the Bishop's confinement, to see what could be done for relief, were also seized, and with Januarius...

aken to Puzzuoli to join the other four, and orders were given that the following day they should be devoured by beasts in the amphitheatre; but the animals refused to touch them, and they were beheaded. A poor woman is said to have collected some of the blood of St. Januarius in two glass phials; and the Roman Church still believes in a standing miracle of the liquefaction of this blood; whenever it is brought near to the martyr's head it is said to become liquid, and hat bubbles arise on its surface. It is also believed that several eruptions of Mount Vesuvius have been averted by carrying these relics in procession. The relics were translated to the Cathedral of Naples about 00, and they are always exposed on Sept. 19th, the day kept in memory of him and his fellow-martyrs.

Jebb, John, D.D. [b. 1775, d. 1833], born at Drogheda, graduated at Dublin in 1796, was made Bishop of Limerick in 1823. His principal literary work was a review of Bishop Louth's works on Hebrew poetry and on Isaiah, which was published separately under the title of Sacred Literature, and has gone through many editions. In 1816, while Vicar of Abington, he published a volume of very eloquent sermons. He died at Wandsworth, and was buried in the tomb of the Thornton's in Lapham Church. His life was written by his chaplain, the Rev. C. Forster. His nephew, John Jebb, wrote an excellent work on the Choral Service, and until a few years since was a highly venerated member of the Lower House of Convocation of Canterbury.

Jerome, Sr.—Erasmus, in writing of his saint, says that "he was, without controversy, the learnedest and most eloquent of all Christians, and prince of divines; and for eloquence excelled Cicero." His chief work was to give a trustworthy translation of the Hebrew Scriptures in the Latin tongue. For this the whole Church owes him a deep debt of gratitude. The Old Italic version of the Bible, which was in general use until the time of St. Jerome, was a translation, not of the original Hebrew, but of the Septuagint, and hence did not accurately represent the sacred text. St. Jerome's version is known as the Vulgate, though certain parts of the recent Vulgate—including the Psalms and the Apocrypha—are not his work. In addition, St. Jerome wrote learned commentaries on all the books of the Bible, and also a revision of the Latin translation of the New Testament. His controversial writings are marred by extreme bitterness and violence of language. In reference to this, Dr. Newman, while still in the Church of England, wrote as follows:—"I do not scruple to say that, were he not a saint, there are things in his writings and views from which I should shrink; but as the case stands I shrink rather from putting myself in opposition to something like a judgment of the Catholic world in favour of his saintly perfection. I cannot, indeed, force myself to approve or like against my judgment or feeling, but I can receive things on faith against both one and the other, and I am willing to take certain characteristics of this learned and highly gifted man on faith." It should also be remembered that history is, for the most part, a record of quarrels, controversies, and stirring events; but quiet devotion and unobtrusive charity are not, as a rule, recorded. So in the case of this saint, we have more details of the heat and anger of the controversies in which he took part, than of the wonderful zeal and devotion which made him sacrifice everything to the cause of the Church of Christ. St. Jerome was born of Christian parents in the village of Stridon, on the borders of Pannonia and Dalmatia. The date of his birth is uncertain. Prosper places it in A.D. 331; Tillemont in 342; and Thierry in 346. He was sent to Rome to study rhetoric, grammar, and the classics under Donatus. At the age of twenty, and while still at Rome, he was baptised. Having finished his course of studies, St. Jerome set out from Rome on a tour through a great part of Gaul, stopping at Trèves for some time in order to copy out Hilary's Treatise on Synods and his Commentary on the Psalms. He next visited Aquileia, at the head of the Adriatic, where he met Rufinus, a man of great piety and learning, who became afterwards his intimate friend, and then his bitter opponent. After leaving Aquileia, St. Jerome again visited Rome; but his restless spirit and thirst for knowledge led him after a brief stay to resume his travels. He accordingly set out for the East. At Antioch in Syria he became a disciple of Apollinaris, afterwards the famous heretic. St. Jerome had, through all these years, devoted himself with great zeal to the study of classical literature; but it was either during this stay at Antioch, or a little later, that the direction of his studies was completely changed. He says that during a severe illness, when he was thought to be dead, he found himself before the judgment-seat. In answer to a question, he replied that he was a Christian. "Thou liest," came the reply; "thou art not a Christian, but a Ciceronian, for where thy treasure is there is thy heart also." In pity, however, of his youth, his life—he says—was spared, after being severely beaten. He thereupon vowed never to open a heathen book again, a vow which was not strictly observed. St. Jerome now retired to the desert of Chalcis, eastward of Syria, where he practised the most severe mortification of the flesh, striving hard by prayer and fastings to overcome the temptations of impurity to which he had given way in Rome. He relates with what force the same temptations attacked him in his solitude. Luther had a similar experience. It was during his stay in the desert that St. Jerome set himself to master the Hebrew language, a task very uncongenial to his tastes, but productive of very great benefit to the Church hereafter. The close of the fourth century was an age of great controversy on Christian doctrine. The quiet of the desert was disturbed by angry quarrels, and St. Jerome was attacked for his use of the word "hypostasis." After spending three years in the desert, St. Jerome left in the year 377, and was ordained priest by Paulinus, Bishop of Antioch, on the condition that he was not to be settled in any definite sphere of work, and that he might be free to continue his monastic life. So great a veneration had Jerome for the high office of the priesthood, that he never could be persuaded to venture to celebrate the Holy Eucharist. Soon after his ordination he went to Constantinople and studied under Gregory Nazianzen, the Bishop. He had not been long in Constantinople when, in 382, Damasus, Bishop of Rome, summoned him to act as his secretary, and to advise him on questions relating to the Church at Antioch. For three years Jerome stayed in the capital. At first he was held in high public estimation, and was considered worthy to succeed Damasus, but his teachings on monasticism and celibacy, and other causes, made him very unpopular by the time he left the city. During his stay at Rome he revised, at the request of Damasus, the Latin translations of the New Testament, and also the Latin Psalter. Many Roman ladies of high rank were greatly influenced by St. Jerome, and were persuaded by him to shun marriage, to be ascetic, to live in seclusion, and relinquish all ordinary amusements. Among his pupils were Marcella, Asella, Paula and her daughter Eustochium, and Fabiola, all of very high rank. To illustrate his teaching on marriage, he used to compare the three states of wedlock, widowhood, and virginity, to the grounds in the parable that brought forth respectively thirtyfold, sixtyfold, a hundredfold. The populace and nobility were enraged at the results of Jerome's teaching. The clergy also were hostile to him, because he did not hesitate to rebuke them for their greed, laziness, and ignorance. Accordingly, at the death of his patron Damasus in 384, Jerome quitted Rome in disgust. He was soon followed by Paula and Eustochium; and after travelling through the Holy Land and in Egypt, they finally settled at Bethlehem in 387. Here Jerome resided at first in a cell, but subsequently, with what was left of his property, he built a monastery, in which he lived, and also a hospital for the pilgrims, who flocked to Bethlehem in great numbers. It was here that St. Jerome undertook his great work, the translation of the Hebrew Bible. His studies, however, were much disturbed by the multitudes of pilgrims, and by the controversies in which he engaged. Jerome in 392 renewed his acquaintance with Rufinus of Aquileia, who, having been ordained a priest by John, Bishop of Jerusalem, had settled on the Mount of Olives; but in the following year the friendship was broken on the Origenistic controversy. On the same question also Jerome and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, were bitter opponents. So bitter was the controversy between Jerome and Rufinus, that St. Augustine felt called upon to remonstrate with Jerome. Rufinus died in 410; even then Jerome's bitterness was not abated. Speaking of the former's death, he says: "The scorpion is buried under the soil of Sicily." It must be remembered that Jerome considered that he was fighting, not personal foes, but the foes of the Church, and hence his enmity was strong and enduring. Previously to this Jerome had engaged in the monastic controversy, writing with great bitterness against Jovinian and Vitalianus. Paula, who had built three monasteries during the latter's stay at Bethlehem, died in 404, Jerome writing his eulogy in the most glowing terms. One more controversy—the Pelagian—engaged Jerome's attention. He was now getting old and infirm, but with the greater zeal and energy he opposed the doctrines of Pelagius. So enraged were the followers of Pelagius that they attacked Jerome's monastery at Bethlehem, and for a time forced him to take refuge in a fortified town. Had it not been for Jerome's vigilance, the doctrine of Pelagius would most likely have found general acceptance in the East. In 420 Jerome died. "More than any other Father of the Church did he watch over the sacred deposit of the Scriptures, the foundation of our faith, and open the sacred path of the true explanation of them." Another side of his character was seen in the year 410. On the fall of Rome in that year, many fugitives fled for refuge to the East. Many came to Bethlehem; and Jerome writes:—"We cannot see them coming in crowds without groaning; we have therefore suspended our studies, desiring rather to act Scripture than to write it—to do rather than to say holy things."

Jerome of Prague, the Bohemian Reformer, was born towards the end of the fourteenth century. Having taken in the University in Prague a B.A. degree, he studied in Paris, Cologne, Oxford, where he became imbued with Wicliffe's doctrines, and in Heidelberg. When he returned to Prague in 1407 he became a great friend of John Huss [q.v.] and helped in spreading his doctrines. His reputation for learning was so great that Ladislas III., King of Poland, consulted him concerning the erection of a university in Cracow, and Jerome went there in 1410. He went to Constance in 1415, when Huss was prisoner there, and said that he had come to confide his master; but at the instigation of the Bohemian nobles he fled. He was seized at Hirschau, on the frontiers of Bohemia, and carried back to the Council, where he resented, but afterwards abjured his recantation, and was delivered to be burnt alive in Con­dance on May 30th, 1416.

Jeronymites, or Hieronymites, a name given to several religious congregations who followed the example of St. Jerome. There were four of these congregations—the first, and most important, the Hermits of Spain, whose founder was Thomas of Sienna. This institution was confirmed by Pope Gregory XI. in 1373; their convent was that of St. Bartholo­new de Lupiana, in Castile, in the diocese of Toledo. They followed the rule of St. Augustine. In Spain also were the convents of St. Isidore, at Seville; St. Lawrence, at the Escorial; and St. Just, near Placentia, of which Charles V. retired after his abdic­ation. 2nd. The Hermits of the Observance of Lombardy, whose Prior, Lupus Olivetus, in 1424, projected a rule drawn from the works of St. Jerome, and sanctioned by Pope Martin V. 3rd. The Hermits under the zealous Peter of Pisa, who followed a very austere rule. 4th. The Hermits of Fiesole, founded in 1417 by Charles of Montegruvelli. There are probably no Jeronymite convents existing at the present time.

Jerusalem.—The history of this city during the times of the Sacred Volume belongs to the Bible Dictionary. It was taken by Titus, Sept. 8th, A.D. 79; the Temple was laid in ruins, and the city lay desolate. In A.D. 132 the Emperor Hadrian began to rebuild it, and called it Ælia Capitolina; and, in conse­quence of a revolt of the Jews, who enlisted themselves under an impostor called Bar­choeb, he forbade them to enter the city, and Eusebius adds that they were forbidden to even look upon it from afar or from any high place. And in order to profane it he caused to be cut and put upon Bethlehem Gate the figure of a swine. Not contented with that mark of slavery, he built temples to the honour of Venus and Jupiter, which stood till the time of Constantine, who repealed Jerusalem and adorned it with divers sacred edifices. Under the empire of Herachus, Jerusalem was taken by Chosroes II., King of Persia, in 614. Afterwards, in the eighth century, this city and almost all the Holy Land were subject to the Saracens, Mahomet's successors, down to the time of Charlemagne, to whom the King of Persia gave this land and Christ's sepulchre, reserving only to himself the bare title of his lieutenant. But after the death of this great monarch, who was the first king of the West that was made Lord of the Holy Sepulchre, the infidels continued their tyrannies. The French princes took the Crusade at the Council of Clermont, A.D. 1096, and having Godfrey of Bouillon for their chief, subdued Jerusalem on July 15th, 1099. This gave a beginning to the kingdom of Jerusalem, of which Godfrey was the first monarch. Saladin, King of Syria and Egypt, after having obtained several victories over the Christians, at length took Jerusalem from them on Oct. 2nd, 1187, and all the Holy Land, Tyre, Tripoli, Antioch, and some forts excepted. So that after eighty-eight years standing the king­dom of Jerusalem came to an end. Alifìr, Sultan of Egypt, in 1288, took a great many cities from the Christians; so that they had nothing remaining at last excepting St. John d'Acre, or Ptolemais; which the Sultan Melee-Arafî, Alifir's successor, besieged in 1291, and, after forty days' close siege, carried it by storm, May 29th, and massacred all the besieged, except those who made their escape in boats. Since the loss of Acre no Christian forces had passage into Jerusalem, but pil­grims only, and the holy inheritance re­mained under the power of the Caliphs, or princes of Egypt, until 1517, when Selim, the Turkish Emperor, made himself master of it.

At present it contains 24,000 inhabitants, of whom 13,000 are Mohammedans, 7,000 Chris­tians, and 4,000 Jews. The Christians belong to the Greek, old Armenian, and Latin, and a few to Protestant Churches. The Greeks are the most powerful, as there is a Russian colony outside the walls with accommodation for a thousand pilgrims. The Latins have only been numerous since 1847. The Protest­ants are very few. Beside the Church and school there are German hospitals and an orphanage.

Jerusalem, Bishopric of.—In 1840 King Frederick William of Prussia, acting under the advice of the Chevalier Bunsen, proposed to the English Government that a Protestant Episcopal See should be established in Jerusalem, for the joint benefit of English and Prussian residents there. It was believed that such an establishment would draw to­gether the English and the Prussian Evangelical Churches, as well as help on missions to the Jews, and there were some of the High Church party, e.g. the late Dr. Hook, who had hopes that it might be the means of intro­ducing episcopacy into the Prussian body. But the High Church party, as a whole, was alto­gether adverse to the step, on the ground that it was an unlawful interference with the episcopal jurisdiction of the Bishop of the Eastern Church at Jerusalem. Dr. Newman, then the leader of this party at Oxford, pub­lished a formal protest against it, and declared that the act of schism, for such he deemed it, was one of the final acts which caused him to leave the Church of England. The bishopric was placed under the metropolitan authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the right of appointment belonging alternately to the English and the Prussian Churches, but the bishop was to be consecrated according to the English form of service. To meet the objection that it was an interference with the jurisdiction of the Eastern Church, it was carefully notified that the bishop would not proselytise from other Christian bodies, but only minister to congregations of the two nationalities concerned. The first bishop was Dr. Alexander, the Hebrew Professor at King's College, London [d. 1845]. He was succeeded by Samuel Gobat [d. 1879], and he by Joseph Barelay. Since the latter's death in 1881, the Prussian Government, whose turn it is to nominate, has not done so, and it is understood that the bishopric will fall into abeyance. Several causes seem to have combined to this result. The bishopric has not commended itself to the popular judgment by any good results which it has been enabled to show, and an anonymous biography of the late bishop draws a very unfavourable picture of the state of things. The objections made at first by some English Churchmen still prevail, whilst the Germans are said to be dissatisfied—not unnaturally from their point of view—that no recognition is made of their orders, and that their pastors are not allowed to minister at the altars of the English Church. A valuable history of the bishopric, containing the original documents, was published in 1883, by the Rev. W. H. Hechler.

Jerusalem Chamber.—A hall in the deanery of Westminster running along the wall of the Abbey from the south side of the west doorway. It is now used as the meeting place of the Lower House of Convocation. It was rebuilt by Abbot Littlington about 1380, and is supposed to have derived its name from the tapestries with which it was hung, and which represented the history of Jerusalem. It was originally used as a private apartment, and was the scene of the death of Henry IV. in 1413. Here Sir Thomas More was confined in 1534, and Addison and Congreve lay in state before their burial in the Abbey. The Jerusalem Chamber has a remarkable fireplace, and the warmth derived from it caused the Westminster Assembly to adjourn hither in 1643. The revision of the Authorized Version was accomplished in this chamber.

Jesuits.—The Order of Jesuits, or Society of Jesus, was founded in 1534 by Ignatius Loyola [q.v.], with the help of Peter le Fevre, James Lainez, Francis Xavier, Nicholas Bobadilla, and Rodriguez. Pope Paul III. approved of the plan, and it was authorised by a Bull in 1540. The chief objects of the society were: the education of youth, preaching to and instructing grown-up people, the confusion and suppression of heresy, and teaching Christianity to heathens by missionaries. The chief differences between the Jesuits and the old monastic orders were that their Society was strictly monarchical, that they did not keep the canonical hours, and therefore had more time for study, and that they adopted no particular dress, but simply wore that of a secular priest. The Society consisted of four classes. In the lowest class were novices who spent their time in prayer, meditation, and study for two years, until they became scholastics, and either continued their studies or taught in the schools. The next class was the Coadjutors, some of whom—the Temporal—acted the part of lay-helpers, while the Spiritual, who had been ordained, preached and helped the Professed of the highest class. The candidates had to work ten or twelve years before they reached this last class. From among them was chosen a General, who governed the whole Society. The first of these Generals was Loyola. He drew up the "Constitutiones," or rules of the Order, which were published in Rome two years after his death by Lainez, his successor as General. They consisted of ten parts, subdivided into chapters, and gave instructions concerning the different orders, their manner of life, etc. The Jesuits soon spread into other countries, and at the time of Loyola's death were established in Italy, Spain, Portugal, and Germany. About 1561 they began to open schools and colleges in France, where they taught gratis, for which the University attacked them; but it was a common belief that they were formed to destroy Protestantism, so they were allowed to stay, and formed a college in Paris. In the War of the League they were opposed to Henry IV., and two of their number attempted to assassinate him. The Parliament of Paris decreed their banishment; but Henry, at the pressing request of the Pope, recalled them in 1603, and they remained in France till their expulsion in 1674. It is said that Ravaillac, the actual murderer, was instigated by the Jesuits. In Germany they were received with great favour; and in the time of Lainez almost all the German towns of note had a Jesuit College. They first came to England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and many were executed for conspiring against her. One of the Fawkes conspirators—Garnet—was a Jesuit. A very important part of the history of the Jesuits is their missions. The first attempts were made by Francis Xavier in the East. [XAVIER.] But the country where they had most influence was Paraguay. They went to South America after the Spaniards had conquered the country, and formed a colony on the banks of the Paraguay and Parana which is said to have included between one and two hundred thousand Indian converts, whom they governed for a century and a half. In 1750, Spain gave up part of her possessions in Paraguay to Portugal, and ordered the Jesuits and their pupils to move to some other part of the Spanish dominions. The Indians rebelled, and some noblemen attempted to murder the Portuguese King, which was laid to the charge of their confessors the Jesuits, who were expelled from the Portuguese territories, and their lands confiscated. This example was soon followed by the French. The Jansenists had risen in opposition to the Society, the Parliament of Paris had never lost its old hostility, and they had also private enemies in the Minister Choiseul and Madame de Pompadour. An opportunity was soon found for these parties to bring about their object. Father Lavallette, the head of his missions in Martinique, speculated in colonial produce; his goods were seized by the English, and he became bankrupt. His French creditors proceeded against the Society, condemned them, and in 1764 a proclamation was published by which they were suppressed in France and their property confiscated.

Three years after, they fell in Spain through the instigation of Choiseul, who persuaded Charles III. that an insurrection which had broken out in Madrid in 1766 was their work. A decree was made against them, and on March 31st, 1767, they were all commanded to turn out of their homes, were escorted to the coast, and embarked for Italy. They were refused admittance at several ports; and after being several months on board, where many died, the survivors were landed in Corsica. They were, at the same time, expelled from Spanish America.

In 1768 the Society was suppressed in the two Sicilies; but it still remained in the papal dominions and in Saragossa. Pope Clement XIII., who had been their supporter, died, and Ganganelli was raised to the papal chair. He was begged on all sides to totally exterminate the Society; and in 1773 he issued a Bull, in which he said that disputes were always rising up among them, which had compelled the Catholic princes to expel them, and then he declared them suppressed and extinct, and their statutes annulled. The Society now remained only in Russia and Prussia; and from the former they were expelled in 1817.

The Jesuits remained suppressed for about thirty years, but at the beginning of the recent century several attempts were made to restore them, in the hope that they might help bring peace to the countries which were enwiled with revolutions and wars. Several briefs were issued allowing them to return to be various countries; and in 1814 Pius VII. issued a Bull solemnly re-establishing the Society under the constitutions of St. Ignatius. They now exist in every country, of Protestant and Roman Catholic, in Europe, but their public institutions are suppressed in France. They have at present thirty-three establishments in England, among which are six colleges, the chief one being at Stonyhurst, near Whitby, in Lancashire. [See Jansenists, Loyola.]

Jesuitesses.—An order of nuns founded by Isabella Rosella, a Spaniard, who greatly assisted St. Ignatius Loyola when he was studying at Barcelona. In 1545 she came, with two companions, to Rome, and, putting herself under the saint, entreated him to direct them, and to allow them to live under the Jesuit rule. Loyola finding it took up too much time, obtained an order from Paul III., in 1547, that the Society should not comprise any nuns. In spite of this injunction Isabella formed several houses which were called colleges, and others called noviciates, where there was a Superior, or Lady Abbess, who took their vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; but they did not confine themselves to the cloister, but went about and preached. There were two English nuns in Flanders, who being instructed and encouraged by Father Gerard and some other Jesuits, set up this order. The Jesuits' design was to send these women for missionaries into England. One of them, whose name was Ward, was a sort of general over more than two hundred nuns. Pope Urban VIII. suppressed this Order in his Bull bearing date Jan. 13th, 1630, which instrument was dispatched to his Nuncio for Lower Germany, and printed at Rome A.D. 1633.

Jesus, Name of.—A festival in commemoration of the sacred name was kept in Saxon times on the Feast of the Circumcision, but was altered to the second Sunday after Epiphany, and at the Reformation removed to Aug. 7th, where it still remains as a black letter day in our calendar. The point which it sets before us is the peculiar sanctity of that Name, given to Him at His Circumcision according to the direction of the angels to the Virgin before His birth. The sacredness of the name was analogous to that of the name Jehovah—i.e. the Lord. St. Paul testifies to its sanctity in Phil. ii. 10—"At the name of Jesus every knee should bow," etc. The symbol for this name in the Church has long been "I H S." [q.v.]

Jew, The Wanderer.—The legend of the Wanderer Jew first appears in England and France in the thirteenth century, when the story was told by Matthew Paris, an English monk who lived at Paris, and affirms that he had it from an Armenian bishop. The story he tells is that Kartaphilus, Pilate's door-keeper, struck our Saviour on the back as He was being led out to crucifixion, and jeeringly urged Him to go on faster, to which Jesus replied, "I go, and thou shalt wait till I return," hereby, it is said, condemning him to remain on the earth till Christ's second coming. Other legends attach the story to one Abasnerus, a shoemaker of Jerusalem, who drove our Lord from his house when He wished to rest there. Even as late as the last century impostors have availed themselves of this story to give themselves out as the Wandering Jew, and people have not been wanting to maintain that he had appeared to them under different forms. In German literature no such story appears till the beginning of the seventeenth century. As may be supposed, it has given a subject to many authors. The chief modern works on it are Vom Ewigen Juden [Berlin, 1870]; Eugène Sue’s Légende du Juif Errant. It has been worked up into a poetical form by Schubert in Ahasuer, by Schlegel in Die Wurzun, by Goethe in Aus Meinem Leben, and by Mrs. Norton in The Undying One.

Jewell, John [b. 1522, d. 1571], Bishop of Salisbury, 1560, was born at Buden, in the parish of Berry Narber, Devon. His father was a gentleman of ancient but not very rich family, and left nine children besides John. When about thirteen years of age he was sent to Morton College, Oxford, and for his second tutor had John Parkhurst, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, who loved the Reformation, which his first tutor did not. The plague breaking out, he removed to Crockham, but being lodged in an unhealthy room he caught cold, and this brought on lameness for life. In 1539, the thirty-first year of Henry VIII., he removed to Corpus Christi College, next year he took his degree of B.A., was afterwards chosen Reader of Humanity and Rhetoric, and in 1544 he became M.A. On the accession of Mary in 1553 Jewell was forced to leave his college, and was reduced nearly to a state of poverty; but, finding a place of refuge in Broadgates Hall (now Pembroke College), the shipwreck of his temporal estate was for a while delayed. Soon after this, one of his bitterest enemies, Dr. Marshall, Dean of Christ Church, who had already twice changed his religion, a man “who loved the praise of men more than the praise of God,” sent him a paper containing Popish doctrines, which he was either to subscribe or to remain in danger of the stake. This snare was so suddenly laid for him that he had no time to consult his Protestant friends, so, taking the pen in his hand, he said: “Have you a mind to see how well I can write?” and subscribed his name. By doing this he lost the favour of his friends and brought guilt upon his own conscience, but did not, in the least, satisfy his enemies. They still sought his life, and he fled from Oxford on foot, and was found by Augustine Bernard, Bishop Latimer’s servant, lying upon the ground, weary, cold, and distressed. He was put upon the servant’s horse and taken to the house of Lady Ann Warcup, and afterwards removed to London; there, by the help of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, he went on board ship, and sailed from England to find a place of safety abroad. Upon his arrival at Frankfurt he found many great and good men, who, like himself, had fled from England, and the next Sunday deeply expressed his sorrow for having signed the paper at Oxford. “It was my object and cowardly mind and faint heart,” said he “that made my weak hand to commit this wickedness.” Tears and sighs accompanied this confession; he then implored pardon first of Almighty God and then of the Church. From Frankfurt he removed to Strassburg a the earnest request of his friend Peter Martyr. These two read St. Augustine’s works together. From Strassburg they removed to Zurich, and there remained till the death of Mary. Then Jewell returned to England; he was soon employed in promoting the cause of the Reformation, and in 1560 was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury. In 1562 he published Apology of the Church of England, by the Queen’s authority, intende as the public confession of the Christian faith of the Church of England, and to give an account of the reasons of its departure from the distinctive doctrines of the Church of Rome. This book was translated into many languages and spread over Europe.

Jews.—We purpose under this head to give a short sketch of the history of the Jew after the destruction of the temple by Titus. About fifty years after, the Jews murdered nearly five hundred thousand of the Roman subjects, for which they were severely punished by Trajan. They made Janus the seat of learning and of the reorganisation of their religious life. About 130 or Bar-Cochba pretended that he was the Messiah, and raised a Jewish army of twenty thousand, who murdered all the heathens and Christians who came in the way. But he was defeated by the forces Hadrian. In this year it is said that six thousand Jews were slain or perished. Hadrian then built a city on Mount Calvar and erected a marble statue of a swine on the gate that led to Bethlehem; no Jew was allowed to enter the city or to look towards at a distance on pain of death. In 360 they began to rebuild their city and temple, but terrible earthquake killed the workmen as they scattered their materials. In the third, and fifth centuries many of them were harassed and murdered. In the fifth century Babylon became their centre; they stood at Palestine. In the sixth century twenty thousand were slain and as many sold into slavery. In 602 they were severely punished for their horrible massacre of the Christians at Antioch. They far somewhat better at the time of the rise of Mahomet, for, though expelled from Arab they were favourably received in Spain and Mauritania, and also in France under Injuries or weaken the Protestant Church. By Statute 21 & 22 Vict., c. 49 Jews are excluded from holding the office of guardians or justices of the United Kingdom, or of Lord High Chancellor, Lord Keeper, or Lord Commissioner of Great Britain or Ireland, or the office of Lord Lieutenant, or deputy, or other chief governor of Ireland, or Her Majesty's Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.

In their religious observances the modern Jews adhere as closely to the Mosaic dispensation as their scattered condition will allow. Their service consists chiefly in reading the Law in their synagogues, together with a variety of prayers. They abstain from the meats prohibited by the Levitical Law: they observe the same ceremonies as their ancestors at the Passover. They offer prayers for the dead, because they believe in purgatory as a place where the souls of the wicked go, but they limit the time of their remaining there to a year, and they believe that only very few will suffer eternal punishment. All Jews are obliged to live and die in the profession of the following Thirteen Articles, which were drawn up for them about the end of the eleventh century by a celebrated rabbi named Maimonides:

I. That there is one God, Creator of all things, the first principle of all beings, who is able to subsist and continue his perfections without any part of the Universe, but that nothing in the world can maintain their existence without Him.

II. That God is an uncompounded indivisible essence; but that His unity is different from all other unities.

III. That God is an immaterial being, and that no corporeal quality, however refined, can possibly make part of His essence.

IV. That God is eternal a parte ante as well as a parte post, and that every thing excepting the Unity had a beginning in time.

V. That God alone ought to be worshipped, and that we ought to adore no other beings either as mediators or intercessors.

VI. That there have been prophets qualified to receive Divine inspiration, and that there may be such for the future.

VII. That Moses was the greatest prophet that has hitherto appeared, and that the degrees of supernatural light communicated to him were altogether singular, and much above the communications and inspirations vouchsafed to other prophets.

VIII. That the law which Moses left them was all of it dictated by Almighty God, that it is not so much as a syllable in it not received by inspiration; and that by consequence the traditional expositions of these precepts are entirely a Divine revelation given to Moses.

IX. That this law is immutable, and that it is lawful neither to add nor diminish.

X. That God knows all our actions, and governs them according to His pleasure.

XI. That God rewards the observance and punishes the violation of His Law; that the best rewards for virtue are reserved for the other world, and that the damnation of the soul is the deepest punishment.

XII. That a Messiah will appear of much more merit and virtue than all the kings before Him; that though His coming is delayed, we ought neither to doubt the certainty nor prescribe the time, and much less offer to foretell it from the Scripture.
XIII. That God will raise the dead at the last period of time, and pass judgment upon all mankind.

This truth with the consequences of it they maintain from Dan. xii. 2: "And many of them that sleep in the dust shall wake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

Joachim, Sr., legendary husband of St. Anne, and father of the Blessed Virgin. The Greek Church keeps their joint festival on September 9th, but the Latin Church keeps March 20th in memory of St. Joachim, and September 26th in memory of St. Anne.

Joachim. Abbot of Floris, in Calabria. He was a Cistercian monk who claimed to be inspired. He says of himself that when very young he went to Jerusalem in the dress of a hermit to visit the holy places, and that whilst praying in the church God communicated to him by infusion the knowledge of Divine mysteries and of the Holy Scripture. He wrote against Peter Lombard, the Master of the Sentences, who had maintained that there was but one essence in God, though there were three Persons; and Joachim asserted that since there were three Persons there must be three essences. This dispute was in 1193. Joachim's writings were condemned by the Fourth Lateran Council. His followers, the Joachimites, were particularly fond of certain ternaries. The Father, they said, operated from the beginning until the coming of the Son; the Son, from that time to theirs (1260); and the Holy Spirit then took it up, and was to operate in His turn. They divided everything relating to men, doctrine, and manner of living into three classes, according to the three Persons of the Trinity:—

[1] Of men, the first class was that of married men, which had lasted during the whole period of the Father; the second was that of clerks, which lasted during the time of the Son; the third was that of monks, wherein was to be an uncommon effusion of grace by the Holy Spirit. [2] Doctrine, viz., the Old and New Testament, and the everlasting Gospel; the first they ascribed to the Father, the second to the Son, the third to the Holy Ghost. [3] Manner of Living. Under the Father, men lived according to the flesh; under the Son, according to the flesh and the Spirit; under the Holy Ghost, they were to live according to the Spirit only.

John, Pope.—A woman who is said to have become Pope in the ninth century, between Leo IV. and Benedict III. It is said that her pontificate lasted two years, five months, and four days, and that she died in giving birth to a child on the road between the Colosseum and the Church of St. Clement. The first mention of such a story is to be found in a doubtful manuscript of Marianus Scotus, a monk of the Abbey of Fulda, in the ninth century, and then in the chronicle of Martinus Polonus in the twelfth century, and again by a French Dominican, Stephen of Bourbon, about 1225. The story is now however, rejected as without historical evidence.

John, St., of Nepomuk.—The most popular saint of Bohemia. He is said to have been born at Pomuk in the fourteenth century. He was made a Canon of the Cathedra of Prague, and Vicar-General of the diocese of Sophia, the Queen of Wenceslaus IV., chose him as her confessor. Her husband being suspicious of her, tried to make John reveal to him the matter of her confession, and on his refusal vowed to be revenged. John having confirmed the election of an abbot in accordance with the wishes of the monk against the King, Wenceslaus had him tortured and then thrown into the river Moldau in March, 1393. According to the history which is in great part legendary, his body was discovered by a miraculous light which issue from it, and it was buried with great honour and marvellous cures of the sick were wrought at his shrine. He was canonized in 1729 by Benedict XIII. as a martyr for the inviolability of the seal of confession, and his festival is fixed for March 20th.

John Scotus. [Duns Scotus.]

Johnson, John [b. 1662, d. 1725], learned theologian of the English Church, was educated at Cambridge, ordained Priest by Bishop Sprat in 1686, and appointed Vicar of Boughton-under-Blean by Archbishop Sancroft the following year. I came to be known to the neighbouring clergy for his religious earnestness; and Archbishop Tenison in 1697 appointed him Vicar Margate and Appledore, the last being he for the sake of the income, Margate being very poor. But being anxious to pursue his theological work, he asked leave to retire from Margate and live at Appledore, while the Archbishop unwillingly granted, for I was anxious to keep a learned man in Thanet. At Appledore he published his Clergyman Vade Mecum, an excellent work. In 170 his health having failed through the climate of the Appledore Marsh, the Archbishop pointed him to Cranbrook, to be held by Appledore. He removed to Cranbrook, and there spent the rest of his life, though often visited his Appledore flock. In 17 he published The Propitiatory Oblations in t Holy Eucharist truly stated and defended from Scripture and Antiquity, and the Consideration of the Church of England. This book raised a considerable outcry, one par onouncing it Popery, and another true tholic doctrine. One bishop at least (Trimmell, of Norwich) charged against it; at Johnson was a learned man, and quite le to take care of himself. His parsonage Cranbrook became a favourite meeting ane of many of the Nonjurors, among them ert Nelson and Dean Hickes, who were armed with a work representing, as it did, eir own views so entirely. He entered into nterview with Bishop Trimmell and other saliants; and in 1713 published his treatise, Unbloody Sacrifice and Altar Unveiled and supported. This was a more elaborate vindication of his former treatise, and was reprinted a few years ago in the Anglo-Catholic brary. There are some noticeable features this remarkable book. Thus: Johnson s a strong objection to the bread and wine the Sacrament being bought out of the arch rates. It should come, he contends, on the free-will offerings of the congregation, and from no other source. He contends e mixed chalice, and for the restoration the kiss of peace, if it could be done with pure mind; if it be thought undesirable, taking of hands should be used instead. In 14 he got into trouble for not keeping the ing's Accession day, though, as usual, he d morning prayer in his Church. He was immoned before the Archdeacon, who was sposed to punish him heavily; but Johnson lended himself so boldly that the Archdeacon judged it wiser to let him alone. But a years later he took up the defence of aergymn who had taken a similar line, and lished a statement of his own case. So rant a defiance of authority so incensed archbishop Wake, that he sent him a peremptory order to withdraw and retract his nplet, which Johnson did. It is curious note that during the eighteen years that hson held Cranbrook, confirmation was ly administered twice—"once," writes hson in the parish register, "at the reest of Mr. Johnson, and once of the Archbhop's free motion." In order to meet the ruples of the Anabaptists, who were in vour of baptism by immersion, he had a pistery made in Cranbrook Church, where can still be seen. It appears, however, om the register to have been only once ed. He is buried by the vestry door of his arch, and a long Latin inscription is et over the place.

Jonas, Justus [b. 1493, d. 1555], pri-eally noted for his friendship with Luther. was born at Nordhausen, studied law in Erfurt, but afterwards gave himself up to ology. He helped to found the University Jena, and was made Court Preacher at burg in 1551. His devotion to Luther ring twenty-five years was very remarkable. is works are chiefly controversial. His ters, which would be of great historical interest, have not been collected. He died at Eisfold.

Jones, William, rector of Nayland [b. 1726, d. 1800], one of the Hutchinsonian divines. He was educated at University College, Oxford. From 1765 to 1777 he held the living of Pluckley, in Kent. He wrote and published much, notably a valuable work on The Doctrine of the Trinity [1767]; A Course of Lectures on the Figurative Language of the Holy Scripture, and the Interpretation it from the Scripture itself [1788], in which he upholds the Hutchinsonian views; Memoirs of Bishop Horne, his great friend and patron [1795]; A Letter to Three Unconverted Jews [1799], and many Sermons.

Joris, Johann David, an Anabaptist fanatic, b. at Bruges early in the sixteenth century, d. 1556. He was educated at Delft, and adopted the principles of the Reformation, but failing in with some Anabaptists he took up their notions and started an Anabaptist-Chiliast-Adamite sect, and professed to be their Messiah. He exercised great influence over his followers, and amassed a large fortune, which he took with him and settled at Basele under the name of John of Bruges, con-triving that no one should recognise in him the obnoxious Joris who had caused such dis-turbances by the publication of pamphlets dealing with mysticism and coarse sexuality intermixed. When the truth was learnt after his death, his books were publicly burnt at Basele.

Jortin, John, D.D. [b. 1698, d. 1770], an admired and popular preacher. He was of French extraction, his family having come to England on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He was educated at Charterhouse and at Jesus College, Cambridge. He held no considerable preferment till 1702, when Osbaldeston, Bishop of London, made him one of his chaplains, and gave him a prebendal stall at St. Paul's and the vicarage of Kensington, where he died. He was also Archdeacon of London. He wrote Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History [1751], Life of Erasmus [1758], and many sermons which dis-play originality of thought and style.

Joseph of Arimathea. [Glaston-bury; Grail, The Holy.]

Josephus, Flavius, the Jewish historian, was born during the reign of the Emperor Caligula, about 37 A.D. He was of noble birth both by his father Matthias, who was descended from the race of high priests, and by his mother, who was of the blood-royal of the Asmonaens. At the age of sixteen he betook himself to study, living for three years with Banus, an Essene. He then joined the Pharisees. In 64 he took a jour-ney to Rome on account of some priests whom Felix, the Governor, had sent prisoners to that city. Here, through a Jewish actor named Alityrus, who was a favourite with Nero, Josephus was made known to the Empress Poppea, and carried his point with regard to the priests. Upon his return to Judea he was made Captain General of the Galileans, and worthily discharged that function till the taking of Jotapata, in which town he was. He was forced to hide with some of his men in a cavern, and was taken by Vespasian. He would have been delivered up to Nero, but foretold that his captor should gain the Empire, who therefore kept him in easy confinement for three years. Josephus accompanied Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterwards lived at Rome, where, under the protection of the Emperors, he studied and wrote. The date of his death is not known, but it must have taken place after the accession of Trajan in 97.

His works are:—History of the Jewish War, which is very trustworthy; Jewish Antiquities, in books containing their history up to 66 a.m.; his Autobiography; and a work against Apion of Alexandria, entitled Antiquity of the Jews. Other works attributed to him are not genuine.

Jubilate Deo ["O be joyful in God"].—The 100th Psalm. At the revision of the Prayer Book in 1552 this psalm was added in its present place in the Morning Service as an alternative to the Benedicteus, "when that shall happen to be read in the chapter for the day or for the Gospel on St. John Baptist's Day." Formerly it was sung as one of the psalms at Lauds, and its position then corresponds very closely to its present position; then its place was before the lesson, now it comes after. It is a song of praise and thanksgiving to God for our creation and preservation by His mercy. It is most suitable to be used with the Te Deum on occasions of solemn thanksgivings to God for victory or deliverance from any great peril.

Jubilee. — By the Levitical Law [see Leviticus xxv. 8-18] every fiftieth year was to be kept as a jubilee; it was to be a year of rest to the land, like other Sabbatical years; no sowing, reaping, or pruning of vines was to take place; liberty was proclaimed throughout the land to all the inhabitants; slaves were to be set free, debts were to be forgiven, and every man was to return to his own possession. The derivation of the word "jubilee" is uncertain, but it is supposed to be derived from Hebrew yobel, "a blast of a trumpet or ram's horn;"—for it was with a blast of rams' horns that the jubilee was to be proclaimed. The Hebrews being the servants of God, and the land and all that they had belonging to Him, it was impossible for any Jew to be absolute owner of what God had given originally to another; hence at every jubilee, on the day of atonement, the tribes and families were restored to their original possessions. After the Babylonish Captivity the Jews no longer observed the year of jubilee. In imitation of the Jews the Roman Catholic Church adopted a kind of jubilee in the year 130 Boniface VIII. being Pope at the time. "Most full pardon of all sins" was granted to all who repented, confessed, and made certain number of visits to the churches St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome; the jubil was, at the same time, decreed to recur every hundredth year. About two hundred thousand pilgrims are said to have resorted to Rome the first jubilee. Pope Clement VI. in 13 fixed the Jubilee or Holy Year at every fiftieth year, requiring the pilgrims to visit the Lateran Church in addition to the other churches. Again in 1389 Urban VI. allowed the jubilee to every thirty-third year, the being the age of our Saviour. Finally the date was fixed at every twenty-fifth year; Paul II. in 1470, and so it remains to the present time. These are the ordinary jubilees but in addition there are extraordinary jubilees, which may be appointed at a time or on any special occasion, such as the beginning of the reign of a pope. The ordinary jubilee lasts from Christmas to Christmas. It is no longer necessary for pilgrims except from Italy, to resort to Rome to obtain the benefits of the jubilee, for it extended the following year to other countries. Extraordinary jubilees do not usually last the whole year; they may extend to the whole Church or only to a particular country district or town. The usual conditions: sharing in the indulgences and pardons of jubilee are: Fasting on three days of the week, visiting certain specified churches certain number of times, praying according to the directions of the Pope, confessing a priest, and communicating at the Mass. Boniface IX. granted the privilege of holding jubilees to several princes and monasteries; thus the monks of Canterbury had a jubil every fifty years, when people flocked from all parts to visit the tomb of Thomas Becket. In 1640 the Jesuits celebrated a solemn jubilee at Rome, that being the hundredth year from their institution.

Judaists. [EBRINTES.]

Judgment. Day of.—The Old Testament is full of declarations of coming judgments of God, sometimes executed by vic of prerogative as King, sometimes as one of the works of the promised Messiah. With our Lord declared His Kingdom He spoke emphatically of this judgment, and connected it, not with ideas of abstract justice and tribulation, but with His own special word He (the Father) hath given Him (the Sovereign authority to execute judgment, because He is the Son of Man. It is evident that there has been many rehearsals of the great consummating judgment to come. The language of our Saviour respecting the fall of Jerusalem...
Judicium Dei.—In cases where it was impossible to get direct evidence touching the guilt or innocence of an accused person it was commonly believed in many countries that God Himself would reveal the truth of the matter if he was appealed to; hence in many of the early heathen codes of law there is an appeal to the “judicium Dei,” the judgment of God. Even in Christian countries the custom was retained till the twelfth century. The methods of finding out the “judicium Dei” were as follows: The suspected person would walk over red hot ploughshares burning coals, if innocent, without suffering any harm. The Empress Cunegunde, about the year 1010, is said to have successfully passed through this ordeal and thus established her innocence. Another method was for the suspected person to thrust his arm into boiling water. Then there was the cold water ordeal: a man was bound hand and foot and thrown into the water; if he floated he was considered guilty, if he sank he was innocent. The trial by combat, in which the unshod was considered guilty, survived all the other forms of finding out the “judicium Dei.” Trials of this sort were usually held in churches in the presence of ecclesiastical and secular judges, preceded by three days’ fasting, confession, communion, and many adjurations and ceremonies.

Judson, Adoniram, the first of American missionaries to the heathen, and one of the noblest names in missionary history, was born in New England in 1788; died at sea, April 12th, 1850. He was the son of a minister of Massachusetts, and during his youth professed infidelity; but afterwards returned to Christianity, and made up his mind to become a missionary. He was the first missionary appointed for Burmah, whither he was sent by Felix Carey. This mission was the result of an appeal which had been made in 1810 by Judson and others for support from his native country instead of from European societies, and which was answered by the institution of the American Board of Foreign Missions. [Missions.] Judson and his wife arrived after many hardships in Burmah in 1812 with four other missionaries, but it was a long time before they succeeded in converting the natives, and meanwhile they suffered greatly from cholera and fevers. In 1824 Rangoon was captured by the English, and the Burmese people suspected the missionaries of having plotted against them; Judson was seized and imprisoned for many months, and anxiety for his safety caused the death of his wife in 1826. They had previously lost both their children from the unhealthiness of the climate. Judson’s labours had by this time met with more success, and in 1834 he married again and removed to Mouleimein. Here he baptised hundreds of Burmese converts, and translated the Bible into the native language. In 1845 his wife’s health completely gave way; and they set out for America; but she died on the way, and he soon returned to his missionary work, taking with him his third wife, and settled again at Rangoon, where mission work was much needed. In 1849 he became so seriously ill that a sea-voyage was prescribed, and he set sail for the Isle of Bourbon, but died during the voyage. His last literary work was a Burmese dictionary, which he continued to work at till his death.

Juggernaut or Jaggernaut.—A town in Orissa, Bengal, famous as one of the principal places of pilgrimage in India. Its temple, containing an idol of Fishnu, the Hindoo god, is annually visited by upwards of a million pilgrims. A legend says that this image appeared out of the water to a certain Rajah, and that he was told to build it a temple and worship it. The present temple was finished in 1198, during the time of the famous Rajah Anung Bhim Dee. The name of the temple is a corruption of the Sanscrit word Jagnanatha—i.e. “The Lord of the World.” Another name for the image is Krishna. It is a carved block of wood, painted black, and of a hideous countenance. Two other images share the temple—Siva, white; and Sudhadra, yellow. The festival is kept in March, and then these idols are dragged out in procession, each on an enormous car of great weight, Juggernaut's being the largest and heaviest. The devotees work themselves up into a frenzy of enthusiasm, and many of them cast themselves under the wheels of the carriages, and are crushed to death, their self-sacrifice being greeted by the acclamations of the crowd. Revolting indelicacy and horrible cruelty are the essential characteristics of this worship. There are many temples to this idol in India, but the atrocities of the worship are far less than they were, owing to the influence of Europeans.

Julia, Sr., was a virgin martyr of Carthage. This town being taken in 439 by Genseric, King of the Vandals, Julia was sold for a slave, and carried into Syria. The merchant who bought her sold her to Eusebius, another rich merchant. Julia served him faithfully and well, and spent all the time not employed in his business in prayer and study of the Scriptures. The merchant embarked with her for Gaul; but when he arrived at the island of Corsica he went on shore to take part in an idolatrous festival. Julia refused to be present, and spoke strongly against the superstitious ceremonies. Felix, governor of the island, heard of this, and questioned Eusebius, who answered that she was a Christian, but that she served him so well that he would not give her up. Felix was determined to gain possession of her, so when Eusebius was sleeping he captured her, and ordered her to sacrifice to the gods. Julia refused, on which the governor ordered her hair to be torn off, and then she was hanged on a gibbet. The monks of the island of Gorgon carried off her body, and put it in a rich tomb, where it remained till Theodoricus, King of the Lombards, removed it to Brescia, 763. Her festival is kept on May 22nd.

Julian, Flavius Claudius, surnamed "the Apostate," the son of Julius Constantius, half-brother of Constantine the Great, was born at Constantinople in 331. He and his brother Gallus were saved when the rest of Constantine's family were massacred by Constantine II. because they were considered too young to be dangerous. He was brought up in the Christian faith with his brother, in the palace of the Cappadocian kings, near Cæsarea. One of his teachers was Mardonius, a heathen, though he professed Christianity; and when he went to Constantinople in 350 he studied under the grammarians Niccaces and the historian Eubulus, both men of the same type. When he went to Athens to study he was attracted by pagan philosophy, and thus in his heart he became an apostate, but could not declare the change because his cousin, the Emperor, was a zealous Christian; so Julian and Gallus took part in the services and were readers. Gallus had married Constantina Constantius's sister, who led her husband on to commit treason, and he was put to death. In 355 Julian married Helena, the Emperor's sister, was made Caesar, and became Governor of Gaul. He soon showed that, in spite of his studious habits, he was possessed of great military talents. He relieved Gaul of its enemies, and enlarged the boundaries of the Empire. Constantius, who was engaged in less successful war against the Persians, became jealous, and ordered Julian to send him a greater part of the army. Julian was about to obey, but the soldiers refused to leave their favourite leader, whom they proclaimed Emperor. He received the title with great reluctance, as it is said, and wrote to the Emperor's sanction. Constantius was very indignant, and ordered Julian to lay aside his title, which the latter refused to do. The Persian War prevented Constantius from marching against his rival, who took advantage of his absence by making himself master of Illyricum. The Emperor, on hearing this, marched towards Europe, but died suddenly in Cilicia, and Julian was left in undispute possession of the whole Empire, in 361. He took off the mask, and proclaimed that he was a heathen. His first act was to publish an edict proclaiming full liberty of conscience; but he at once began to try, by all the means in his power, to undermine the Christian faith. The churches were shut up, the heathen temple reopened, and all the places of honour we given by preference to the heathen. Religious persecution began in the province at which Julian looked on with indifference. He also wished to revive heathen literature and himself led the way by writing oration in praise of the mother of the gods and of the sun. He delighted in dissensions among the Christians, recalled all the heretic and restored the Donatists to their places: Africa. As a further insult to the Church, he patronised the Jews, and issued an edict for the restoration of their Temple. But the wound blow of all that the Christians received was the school law of 362, which ordered that: who desired to teach should gain permission from secular authorities, which was real from him, and thus Christians were prevented from teaching. He erected large public schools, where the young were instructed the Pagan religion and customs. He intended also to build hospitals for the sick and poor but did not live to carry out these designs. In 362 he went to Antioch to prepare his forces for a campaign against the Persians. He sacrificed to the gods, and consulted the oracles of Delphi, Delos, and Dodona, who promised him certain victory. He set out with an army of about 65,000 men, cross the Euphrates and Tigris, and advanced to Ctesiphon; but here the Persians came up and attacked him. Julian repulsed the enemy several times, but at last received a mortal wound in his side, June 26th, 363. There are reports given of his last hours, but on receiving the wound he cried out, "Thou hast conquered, Galilean." But Ribben rejects this, and apparently on good grounds.

Julian's works consist of orations, satires, The Censars, and Misopogon, a satire against the inhabitants of Antioch, who had ridiculed him for his neglected attire and austere habits. His accounts of his Gaulish and German campaigns have been, unfortunately, lost. There is no doubt that he possessed many good qualities, was a learned man, and a brave and wise soldier. He was more attached to philosophy than to religion, and could more readily believe in things which appealed to his intellect than those which spoke to the heart.

Julius, Pope. [Popes.]

Jumpers.—A sect of Welsh Methodists. In the early days of Welsh Methodism the ill-regulated dressings of some of their preachers excited their hearers that the practice of "jumping or leaping for joy" [Luke vi. 23] was a characteristic feature of their meetings. The more thoughtful and educated Methodists have always discouraged this strange custom, but it has found a defender in Mr. William Williams, the Welsh poet, and has not even yet quite died out. The sect declines the practice on the passage in St. Luke, quoted above, and on 2 Samuel vi. 16—"The King of Israel danced and leaped before the Lord." The custom has also spread to America, where a somewhat similar sect—the shakers—were already in existence. When people were roused to a state of unhealthy excitement they would continue jumping until they were quite exhausted, after the manner of the dancing Dervishes.

Jurien, Pierre, a great controversialist, was born in 1637, and was the son of a Protestant minister at Mer. He was educated in Holland and England under the direction of the celebrated Rivet and Du Moulin, his uncles. He was ordained in England, and then returned to Mer to assist his father. He next went to Sedan, where he was Divinity and Hebrew Professor. In 1681, the University being taken out of Protestant hands, Jurien went to Rouen, and thence to Rotterdam, where he was appointed Professor of Theology. He died in 1713.

Jurien wrote many works, which were very popular on account of the profound learning they display. The chief are:—A Treatise on "Debutter; Defence of the Morality of the Reformed Church" (written in answer to Arnauld's Morality Destroyed by the Calvinists);

Preservative against Change in Religion, levelled against Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, who had lately brought out an Exposition of the Catholic Faith, a work which had been the means of converting many to Catholicism. Jurien accused Bossuet of falsehood and dishonesty; and Bossuet answered by charging his antagonist with Socinianism. Jurien also wrote Letters against Mainbourg's History of Calvinism, The Last Efforts of Oppressed Innocence, A Treatise on the Church, A History of the Jews, A Treatise on Mystical Theology, and A Commentary on the Apocalypse, in which he predicted the establishment of Protestantism in France during the year 1686. Jurien had a warm controversy with Boyle, Basnage, and Saurin.

Jurisdiction [Lat. jus dicere, "to administer the law"].—Jurisdiction is exercised by such as have committed to them public authority over others for their rule and government. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction may be divided into two heads: [i.] voluntary—i.e. as in ordination, where men, by voluntarily taking Holy Orders, render themselves subject by their ordination vows to the constituted Episcopal jurisdiction; and [ii.] contentious, as in questions relating to errors in doctrine or morals, where the Ecclesiastical Courts have authority to decide the matter and enforce penalties. Again, jurisdiction may be either ordinary or delegated. In the Church of Rome the Pope alone exercises ordinary jurisdiction; all other jurisdiction is delegated by him to bishops, legates, or other officials. In the Church of England it is held that all the bishops exercise ordinary jurisdiction, conferred upon them by Christ through His Apostles and their successors at consecration. The exercise of this jurisdiction is, however, limited, and regulated by Canons of General Councils and by Ecclesiastical laws. Thus a bishop's jurisdiction is confined to his own diocese. Owing to the union of Church and State in England, the Royal assent must be obtained before a bishop or any other ecclesiastical officer can exercise his jurisdiction. The bishop's jurisdiction is often delegated in contentious matters to an Ecclesiastical Court. The jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts is sanctioned by the laws of the country, but the Ecclesiastical judge is, according to the Constitution, appointed by the Ecclesiastical Power—e.g. vicars-general, officials principal, chancellors, etc.

Justification.—The exact signification of the words justification and justified, which occur repeatedly in St. Paul's Epistles, has been the subject of prolonged and bitter controversy. That they imply a state in which the sinner, by reason of the redemption effected by Christ, is become acceptable to God, is not disputed; but two different views have been taken of the way in which this exceptableness is brought about. These views may be briefly stated thus:—the one, that God accounts the sinner to be righteous because the righteousness of Christ is imputed to him; the other, that God makes the sinner righteous by infusing the righteousness of Christ into him. In the former case, the word "justify" is used in the forensic sense of "acquit," "pronounce guiltless;" and, although the primary signification of the Greek verb is "to make righteous," yet it is frequently found in Holy Scripture in the sense of accounting or regarding a person as righteous. Thus in Luke x. 29 we have: "He, willing to justify himself"—i.e. wishing to make himself out righteous; xvi. 15: "Ye are they that justify yourselves before men"—i.e. present the appearance of righteous men; vii. 29: "All the people justified God"—i.e. acknowledged God's justice; xviii. 14: "This man went down to his house justified rather than the other"—i.e. counted righteous before God; Matt. xii. 37: "By thy words thou shalt be justified"—i.e. acquitted. In all these sentences the word is used in a sense more or less connected with the ideas of acquitted, pardon, acceptance, or approbation—i.e. in a legal or judicial sense. And the same is to be observed of its use in the Old Testament—e.g. Deut. xxv. 1, 1 Kings viii. 32, Prov. xvii. 15, etc. On the other hand, there is no instance of its use in Holy Scripture in the sense of "making righteous." The usage of the word elsewhere is, therefore, regarded as in favour of the view that the terms justification and to justify, in the Epistle to the Romans, imply the imputation of the merits of Christ to the sinner, rather than the infusion of righteousness into him; and to this view support is said to be given both by detached expressions, and also by the whole course of St. Paul's argument in the earlier chapters of this epistle. It is stated [iv. 9] that Abraham's faith was reckoned for righteousness; in iii. 24—26, the remission of sins is equivalent to the act of justifying; while in v. 18 condemnation and justification are opposed to one another. Moreover, St. Paul's argument is that all have sinned—all, Jews as well as Gentiles; all are condemned by a law, the Jews by the Mosaic Law, the Gentiles by the law of nature under which they lived. All, without exception, need release from this condemnation. This cannot be effected by the works of a law, whether of Moses or of nature, because it is through law that the condemnation has passed upon all men. God has revealed the remedy. It is the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe—that is to say, justification. And justification being thus contrasted with condemnation, must mean pardon for sins committed and deliverance from condemnation incurred; such pardon and deliverance are implied in imputed righteousness, but not in infused or imparted righteousness. St. Paul's teaching therefore appears to be that the justification of the sinner is effected by the imputing to him the righteousness of Christ.

A further controversy with regard to justification, disputes whether the instrument by which man receives justification from God is faith alone, or faith in conjunction with the Christian graces of charity. It is to be observed that St. Paul's argument in the epistle to the Romans is directed against the doctrine that justification could be claimed by merit, through obedience to the Mosaic law. This leads him to the precise statement, "We reckon that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law" [iii. 28, Rev. Vers.]; but the same Apostle in his epistle to Titus, iii. 8, in close connection with the words "justified by His grace," writes, "Faithful is the saying, and concerning these things I will that thou affirm confidently, to the end that they which have believed God may be careful to maintain good works." It is evident that he is not concerned to separate works from faith, except where any claims of merit and worth are founded upon them. The distinction is drawn plainly by Hooker, Book v. Appendix, p. 553: "To the imputation of Christ's death for the remission of sins we teach faith alone to be necessary, whereby it is not our meaning to separate thereby faith from any other quality or duty which God requireth to be matched therewith, but from faith to seclude, in justification, the fellowship or worth through precedent works. Nor doth any faith justify, but that whereby there is joined both hope and love. Yet justified we are by faith alone, because there is no man whose works in whole or in particular can make him righteous in God's sight." And the homily on salvation, Part I., puts the matter thus: "Faith doth not shut out repentance, hope, love, dread, and the fear of God, to be joined with faith in every man that is justified; but it shutteth them out from the office of justifying." Having regard on the one hand to St. Paul's words—Rom. iii. 24, "Being justified freely by His grace;" ch. iii. 28, "Justified by faith apart from the works of the law;" ch. v. 1, "Justified by faith;" ch. v. 9, "Justified by His blood;" and Gal. ii. 16, "Justified by faith in Christ and not through the works of the law;" and on the other hand, to his positive assertion—1 Cor. xiii. 2—that faith is worthless unles conjoined with love, it is concluded that that instrument of justification is faith alone, but such faith only as is productive of good works or, at least, is capable of producing good works where the opportunity is given. Regardin justification then as the imputation of Christ's righteousness to the sinner, and faith as the instrument by which the sinner receive justification, it is concluded further that justificaion is the free gift of God, and that it meritorious cause is the atonement made by Christ—"Who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification." Man is put in possession of this free gift through the operation of the Holy Spirit [1 Cor. vi. 11], who is thus the efficient cause of justification. The Church holds that the channels of the conveyance of this gift are those of the ministry of the Word and Sacraments, especially the Sacrament of Baptism [see Rom. vi. 4–8]—"We were buried therefore with Him through baptism into death. . . He that hath died is justified from sin;" 1 Cor. vi. 11, "But ye were washed, but ye were sanctified, but ye were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and in the Spirit of our God;" Titus ii. 5–7, etc.; and faith is the internal instrument by which man becomes the "recipient of God’s bounty." While, however, we distinguish between "the imputation of Christ’s righteousness"—i.e. justification—and "the infusion of His righteousness"—i.e., sanctification—such a phrase as "justification of life" [Rom. v. 18] makes it plain that, while justification and sanctification are distinct, they are not separate; the making righteous follows on the accounting righteous; where justification is accepted, there sanctification will follow. It is hardly necessary to add, after all that has been written on the subject, that there is no opposition between St. Paul’s language about justification "by faith apart from the works of the Law," and that used by St. James, who writes that "by works a man is justified, and not only by faith." The two Apostles treat the subject from different points of view, and the works spoken of, by the latter are not the works of the Law, but works which are the fruits of a lively faith. Both would hold that faith, to be justifying faith, must be, not dead, but living and productive.

Justin.—A Father who lived in the second century, commonly known as Justin Martyr. He was born at Sichem (Neapolis, in Samaria, probably of Gentile parents. In early life he examined in turn the principles of each of the chief schools of philosophy, but found them all unsatisfactory. The Stoic could tell him nothing of the nature of the Deity, the Pyrrhonist preceptor was too eager to fix the rice of his instructions, the Pythagorean required previous acquaintance with music, geometry, and astronomy. The Platonist was, or a time, more successful in satisfying his raving mind; but, one day, while he was walking on the seashore, absorbed in meditation, he met an aged man, who directed him to the study of the Sacred Books, some of which were more ancient than the writings of any philosopher, advising him at the same time to pray that the gates of light might be opened to him. Justin did so, and found that he only sure philosophy was contained in the divine Scriptures.

Justin was the author of several works. Besides his Dialogue with Trypho, a Jew, from which the above account of his early life is obtained, his most notable writings are his two Apologies. In the first apology, addressed to the Emperor Antoninus Pius [about A.D. 140], he gives an account of the rites and doctrines of Christianity, shows the absurdity of the charges against its followers, and directs attention to the integrity of their life. It was probably this appeal which induced the Emperor to issue an edict commanding that Christians should not be disturbed, and that informers against them should be punished. In the second apology, written in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the successor of Pius, Justin complains of the treatment of the Christians. He states that the immediate occasion for the apology was the fact that two Christians, Ptolemy and Lucius, had lately been put to death by the Prefect Urbicius, not for any specific crime, but merely for bearing the name of Christian. Justin himself expects to be treated in the same way, through one Crescens, a Cynic, who, though totally ignorant of their character, accuses the Christians of atheism and impiety.

Justin’s anticipation of death was soon realised, and he earned his surname of "Martyr" about A.D. 163. Amongst his other works are a Treatise against Heretics, now lost, and a Treatise on the Monarchy of God, which has come down to us. Several others have been ascribed to him, but are usually considered spurious, e.g. An Exposition of the Faith, Questions to the Gentiles, and Answers to Questions to the Orthodox.

Justinian I., called "the Great," a famous Emperor of Constantinople [b. 483, Emp. 527, d. 567], celebrated for his victories over the Persians, Vandals, and Goths, and for reconquering Italy to the Empire. The great glory of Justinian reposes on the legislative works undertaken in his reign. He commissioned ten of the ablest men in the Empire to collect and abridge the different codes of Roman jurisprudence, and in the course of a few years no less than fourteen publications came forth:

1st. The Code [528], a collection of imperial institutions, in twelve books.
2nd. The Institutes [533], which reduced the whole system of Roman law to elementary principles, for the use of schools.
3rd. The Pandects, or Digest [533], a compilation in fifty books of the Gregorian, Theodosian, and Hermogenian codes, besides two thousand treatises on jurisprudence.
4th. The Novels, or Authentics [541], a collection of recent laws issued by Justinian. Justinian built a great number of churches, above all that of St. Sophia, esteemed as one of the greatest wonders of architecture.

Justus, a Roman monk, was the first Bishop of Rochester, and succeeded Mellitus, in the archbishopric of Canterbury [624-627]. He made Paulinus Bishop of the Northumbrians, who converted King Edwin and many of his subjects, and afterwards had the See of York.

Juxon, William, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1582, d. 1663], was born at Chichester, educated at St. John's College, Oxford, of which he became President in 1621. He attracted the notice of Archbishop Laud, and Charles I. made him Dean of Worcester, Bishop of Hereford, and in 1633 Bishop of London; and finally, in 1635, Lord Treasurer, which station he filled to the general content. He was selected by the King to attend him on the scaffold and administer the sacrament to him, and to him Charles uttered the mysterious word, "Remember." In 1660 Charles II. made him Archbishop of Canterbury. He died in 1663, and was buried in St. John's College, to which he had been a great benefactor, as he was also to St. Paul's and Lambeth Palace. He was much esteemed for his learning, piety, and sweetness of temper.

Kant, Emmanuel [b. 1724, d. 1804].—This great philosopher and metaphysician may be called the father of modern German theology. Germany has always been a home of deep thought and inquiry. Even in mediaeval times it produced the great mystics, such as Tauler. In the sixteenth century it begat the Reformation, and out of the same source, namely, profound meditation upon things visible and invisible, not as seen through the media of the Church or of evidences, but through converse of the personal soul with God. The Church of Rome was obnoxious, as resting its claims on tradition; the seventeenth century Deism of England and France, as resting upon apologetic evidences. So far from Germany rejecting either on religious grounds, it was because each professed a religious object that it was accepted at all. When the claims of each were pronounced insufficient, the attempt was made to find a new ground for faith, namely, the internal reason. Scripture was to be accepted on the ground that it was in harmony with that, not that it came with external proofs in its hands. This is the origin of what is known to us as German Rationalism.

Kant was born and educated at Königsberg, and in 1770 was appointed Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in his University. He was so attached to his native place that he hardly ever left it all his long life, and never to go any distance. He never married. It was not until he was fifty-seven years old that he published the great work which formed the basis of his philosophy, Kritik der Reinen Vernunft ["Critique of the Pure Reason"]. He is said to have been a splendid lecturer, illustrating from travels, novels, all kinds of literature, with wonderful profusion, and possessed of such humour that he would keep a whole table in a roar, while he preserved his own gravity unshaken. But no sign of humour or lightness appears in his book. He writes with deep gravity, as though cognisant of the serious interest of his subject. It is impossible to give any kind of conspectus of this great work here. Kant's philosophy was opposed to that of Hume on one side and to the later views of Paley on the other. We will quote F. D. Maurice's admirable summary:—"All three start from the moral ground. All three regard speculation, philosophical or theological, as important only for moral ends. Hume lays his ethical groundwork in an easy happiness mainly social, but which permits the amusement of a free exercise of thought to those who like that amusement. To remove impediments from this happiness he devotes himself to abstruse philosophy; he sweeps away the doctrine of causality, the belief in miracles, supernatural fears and hopes generally. Paley lays his ethical groundwork also in happiness, but not exactly in easy social happiness. The world must be kept in order. The polity of nations must be upheld. There must be a motive violent enough to hinder men from doing mischief. The Will of God which Hume had thrown aside, is necessary for these purposes. Such a Will must somehow be proved (miracles Paley thinks the only sufficient proof) to have given laws to man, and to have confirmed those laws with sanctions of fear and hope. Such a Will must somehow be proved (Paley thinks the adaptations of works to different ends a sufficient proof) to have designed our world. Kant is no fine gentleman. He has no special vocation as the protector of drawing-rooms from reproaches of conscience or fears of the future. Neither does he perceive that it is his function to provide the policeman with those reproaches and fears to assist him in his work. But he has a strong conviction that there is an authority over him, which does not suspend his liberty, but without obedience to which he cannot enjoy his liberty. The existence of this law for himself and for his kind—for himself as one of a kind—makes morality possible and real for him. He devotes himself to abstract philosophy like Hume, also with a moral end always before him. But the results are different, as the starting point was different. He accepts all Hume's positive statements so far as they assert the dignity of experience, so far as they make that the key to knowledge. He accepts Hume's negative statements so far as they show the baselessness of attempts to draw principles out o experience, which are not in it. He says more than had ever been said before of the limitation of the human intellect. He says more than had ever been said before of the helplessness of mere speculation. But all this searching criticism, all this denial lead us at last to the conclusion, adopted without a single theological prejudice, arrived at by casting all such prejudices aside, that there are eternal grounds of morality, that they have their basis in an Eternal Being, that conformity with them is the condition of man's eternal blessedness.'

The rationalising arguments for the being of a God which had been adduced by the Deists, and which form the basis of Paley's natural theology, being rejected by Kant, he put forth another, namely, the needs of our moral nature. The sense of responsibility within us necessitates our freedom. Conscience says you ought, therefore you can. Nevertheless, reason tells us we are not free. How is this difficulty to be solved—the voice of conscience against the testimony of fact? It can only be solved by the conclusion that the voice of conscience is the harbinger of the nature, that we have instincts which cannot be satisfied with temporal ends. Therefore there must be a life beyond this, and a law in whose light the soul shall find its perfect freedom. This is the doctrine to which the same Transcendentalism has given. It was taken up and put into English methods of thought by Coleridge, and is the basis of a real living school of English divines. Upon his basis Kant proceeded to construct his theory of Christianity. But setting aside all external authority, as he did, his reconstruction was simply an adaptation to his preconceived ideas, executed by cutting away whatever objective facts stood in its way. The historical Christ might be true, but was not a necessity; the ideal Christ sufficed, as representing the necessary truth. "It would be unjust," says Dr. Matheson in his excellent handbook to the study of German theology, "to deny that the Kantian philosophy has great and lasting merits, and has laid a claim to the gratitude of all... It is indirectly borne a testimony to the truth. Christianity, for it has shown that the ideas of Christianity are eternal ideas, that the historical framework is the expression and abridgment of the deepest instincts of the human heart."

Karaites.—A Jewish sect which adheres closely to the text and letter of the Scriptures, rejecting the Rabbinical interpretations and the Cabala [q.v.]. The Talmud appearing at the beginning of the sixth century, the more sensible among the Jews were disgusted with the ridiculous fables with which it abounded. About 750 A.D. a Babylonish Jew, declared himself for the written word of God alone, exclusive of all tradition; he accepted only the twenty-four books of the Bible which are in the Jewish canon. This declaration produced a schism; those who upheld the Talmud, being almost all Rabbis, were called Rabbinists, and those who rejected traditions were called Karaites or Scripturists, from the Babylonish word karai, scripture. The Karaites have never been very numerous.

Kay, William, D.D. [b. 1821, d. 1885].—A learned Biblical and Oriental scholar, born at Knaresborough, educated at Giggleswick Grammar School, Yorkshire, and at Lincoln College, Oxford, where he obtained a first-class in classics, and became Fellow and Tutor of his college. In 1849 he was appointed Principal of Bishop's College, Calcutta, but resigned for his health's sake in 1866, and took the country living of Great Leigh, Essex. He was one of the Old Testament Revision Committee, and to the end of his life unremitting in Biblical study. He wrote the commentary on Isaiah in the Speaker's Commentary, and was also the author of a translation of the Psalms with Commentary, and of Crisis Hupfeldiana, a clever exposure of the shallowness of the hierophants of the "Newer Criticism" in their treatment of the Pentateuch.

Kaye, John, D.D. [b. 1783, d. 1853], Bishop, first of Bristol then of Lincoln. He was a learned man, being head of the classical tripos in 1804, and Regius Professor of Divinity in 1816. His writings were:—Ecclesiastical History Illustrated from the Writings of Tertullian; Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr; Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria; The Council of Nicea; External Government and Discipline of the Church in the First Three Centuries; and a volume of Sermons and Charges.

Keach, Benjamin [b. 1640, d. 1704], was a member of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, and for thirty-six years minister at Horselydown, Southwark. He wrote Tropologia, Travels of True Godliness, Progress of Sin, A Golden Mine Opened, Gospel Mysteries Unveiled, and War with the Devil.

Keble, John, the most popular of English sacred poets, born at Fairford, in Gloucestershire, April 25th, 1792; died at Bournemouth, March 29th, 1866. He was the son of the Rev. John Keble, for fifty-two years vicar of Cols St. Aldwyn's, Gloucestershire, and of Sarah, daughter of the Rev. John Maule, vicar of Ringwood, Hants. He received his early education at home from his father, and before he was fifteen gained a scholarship at Corpus Christi, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. first-class both in mathematics and classics in 1810, being then only just eighteen. Soon after, he was elected a Fellow of Oriel, where he took his M.A. in 1813. During his college course, Dr. Arnold was his contemporary and friend. In 1813 Keble gained the Chancellor's prize for an English essay on Translations from the Dead Languages, and for a Latin essay on A Comparison of Xenophon and Julius Cesar. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Jackson, of Oxford, on Trinity Sunday, 1815, and took priest's Orders a year later. He became a Tutor of his College, and in 1814 and 1821 was Public Examiner in the University. In 1823 he gave up his Tutorship and resided with his father at Fairfield, taking a few pupils, and keeping up a constant intercourse with Oxford, and he held the curacies of East Leach and Burthorpe, both in the immediate neighbourhood. In 1825 he accepted the curacy of Hursley, Hampshire, but after a short time he relinquished it on account of the death of his youngest sister, and returned to his father and only surviving sister at Fairfield. Here he remained till 1835. In 1827 he published The Christian Year, at the earnest request of his friends, with whom parts of it had already existed in albums, etc. It appeared anonymously, and has had a greater influence on religious feeling in England than any other book of poems. Its motto was: "In quietness and confidence shall be your strength," and its object, as stated in the preface, to promote "a sober standard of feeling in matters of practical religion; and it is the happiness of the Church of England to possess in her authorised formularies an ample and secure provision for both." His object, he says, will be attained "if any person find assistance in bringing his own thoughts and feelings into more entire unison with those recommended and exemplified in the Prayer Book." The book has been criticised for some obscurity of diction, but its spiritual fervour has never been doubted. The late Principal Sharpe says: "Some of the poems are faultless of their kind, flowing from the first verse to the last, lucid in thought, vivid in diction, harmonious in their pensive melody." At the same time that he was preparing The Christian Year, Keble was also busy with his edition of Hooker, who was a great favourite with him.

After the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, Keble was one of the four members of the University who took a prominent part in what is known as the Oxford Movement. On Sunday, July 14th, 1833, he preached the assize sermon at St. Mary's, which was published under the title of National Apostacy; and Dr. Newman says of it, "I have ever considered and kept the day, as the start of the religious movement of 1833." Immediately afterwards appeared the first of The Tracts for the Times, of which Keble himself wrote eight. From 1831 to 1842 he was Professor of Poetry at Oxford in succession to Dean Milman. In 1835 he lost his father, and at the end of the year he married Miss Clarke, the daughter of a clergyman of a neighbouring parish to Fairfield. In this year also he was presented by his old pupil, Sir William Heathcote, to the vicarage of Hursley -with- Otterbourne-and- Ampfield, near Winchester. The profits of The Christian Year enabled him to rebuild, in a costly manner, the church of Hursley, and although the living was only £400 a year during Mr. Keble's incumbency, Otterbourne church was rebuilt, and chapels provided for the two hamlets of Ampfield and Pitt. He was not eloquent as a preacher, but very earnest, and he had a wonderful power of attracting both young and old. He was buried in Hursley churchyard April 6th, 1866. He left no children. His friends and admirers have perpetuated his memory by the magnificent Keble College at Oxford, where education may be had at a moderate cost, and where care has been taken that the religious influence shall be very definite.

Besides the Christian Year, which has gone through more than a hundred editions, Keble was the author of Lyra Innocentia, and, in conjunction with Newman, Froude, and others, of the Lyra Apostolica. In addition to his Oxford lectures on poetry, published in Latin [2 vols., 1844], he was also the author of pamphlets On the Admission to Oxford of Dissenters [1854]; On Profane Dealing with Matrimony; On Eucharistic Adoration, etc., &c.; A Life of Bishop Wilson; of some volumes of sermons, published partly in his lifetime partly posthumously, and of Occasional Paper and Reviews.

Keim, Carl Theodor [b. 1825, d. 1878] a German theologian and historical writer was born at Stuttgart, and educated a Tübingen, under Baur. He first came into note as an earnest and sympathetic preacher and his published sermons, Friendly Words to My Congregation [Stuttgart, 1862], delivered at Esslingen, of which he became Pastor in 1856, show that this character was well deserved. He then gave himself to the study of history, and published some works on the history of the Reformation. From 1860 till 1873 he held the Chair of Historical Professor at the University of Zurich; but ill-health caused him to resign this post. Here he devoted himself to the most important study of his life, that of the beginnings of Christianity. First came his inaugural lecture The Human Development of Jesus, and this was followed by other essays; but the greatness of his works was the History of Jesus at Nazareth in its Connection with the Life of II. Nation, of which an English translation was published in 8 vols., 1873-82. Though it will presently be seen, the line taken by him is a rationalistic one, the book is very valuable. He spared himself no pains to realise fully the settings and surroundings of the Saviour's life, and to show us the religious and social condition of the world at the time of His coming, the strength and weakness of Orientalism and of Paganism.
the Truth of the Christian Religion derived from the Literal Fulfilment of Prophecy; The Signs of the Times, which was an account of the prophecies in Daniel and Revelation; The Harmony of Prophecy, reply to Eliot's Horæ Apocalypticæ and to Stanley's remarks on prophecy in his Sinai and Palestine.

Keithians.—A sect which separated from the Quakers in Pennsylvania in the year 1691; they were named after their leader, George Keith, a Scotchman. In the year 1700 Keith left the sect, and took Holy Orders in the Church of England, being ordained as a missionary. About two hundred members of the sect followed their leader and joined the Church of England; others became Baptists, and from the fact of their retaining the peculiar dress of the Quakers were called Quaker-Baptists; the remainder returned to the main body of the Quakers. George Keith settled eventually in England, and became rector of Ediburton, in Sussex; he died in 1714.

Kelly, Thomas [b. 1769, d. 1855].—A hymn-writer of considerable excellence. He was brought up as a lawyer, but chose the ministry as his profession, and was ordained in the established Church of Ireland. The Archbishop of Dublin, however, disliking his fervency and enthusiasm, inhibited him, and he became a Congregationalist. He was a man of large means, and devoted them to the furtherance of his religious views, building several chapels. His hymns were published in 1804, the best known being "We sing the praise of Him who died."

Kempis, Thomas HEMERCKER, the supposed author of de Imitatione Christi, was born about 1380, at Kempen, near Cologne, where his father was a labouring man and his mother a village schoolmistress. He was sent to a religious community at Deventer, called "the Brothers of Common Life," where he studied grammar and plain chant, and afterwards entered as novice among the Regular Canons of Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, where his brother was prior. He received priest's Orders in 1413, and became sub-priest in 1429. He was an excellent copyist, and transcribed the Bible, the Missal, and several works of St. Bernard, and then began copying some pious and ascetic treatises, among which, according to some, was the Imitatio Christi, which gave rise, say they, to the erroneous idea that he was the author. He died in 1471. Nevertheless, a large number of critics have satisfied themselves that he was really the author of the book. [GERSON, JOHN.]

Ken, Thomas, Bishop of Bath and Wells, born at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, in July, 1637, the son of Thomas Ken, of Furnival's Inn. He was sent to Winchester College in 1651, and thence to New College, Oxford, in 1657. In 1666 Ken was elected a Fellow of Winchester College, and came under the notice of Bishop Morley, who made him his Domestic Chaplain and Rector of Brighth-stone, in the Isle of Wight, which living he held till 1670. He also held for a short time the rectory of Woodhay. In 1669 Morley made him Prebendary of Winchester Cathed-dral, and after giving up the rectory of Brighth-stone, Ken undertook the charge of St. John’s Church, near Winchester, in addition to the work of his chaplaincy. At the same time he was engaged in composing a Manual of Prayers for Winchester Scholars. In 1679, Ken, who was now one of the King’s Chaplains, was sent to the Hague as Chaplain to Princess Mary of Orange, with whom he became a great favourite, though he was looked upon with ill-feeling by the Prince. He returned to England in the following year, and three years later he acted as Chaplain to Lord Weymouth when the latter had command of an expedition for the demolishing of Tangiers. Ken settled down quietly at Winchester on his return, at a time when Charles II. was having a palace built there, and was in the habit of staying in the city with his Court. On one occasion Charles asked Ken to give Nell Gwynne a lodging in his house, and was decidedly refused, in a manner which made such an impression upon him, that when the See of Bath and Wells became vacant he declared that no one should have it but “the little man who would not give poor Nelly a lodging.” Before Ken had taken possession of the See he was called upon to attend the King’s deathbed, and did not go down to Wells till 1685. In the same year the Duke of Monmouth’s rebellion took place, and the Bishop received and treated with much kindness fugitives from the de-defeated army, numbers of whom made their way to Wells. He was also appointed to attend the Duke on the scaffold. On the accession of James II. Ken had signed a declaration, drawn up by several of the bishops, testifying to the loyalty and allegence of all members of the Church of England, in return for the goodwill which the King expressed towards the Church. In 1688 King James directed that a declaration for liberty of conscience should be read in every church, and copies of the declaration were sent to the archbishops and bishops for distribution. This was known to be intended for the benefit of the Roman Catholics, and a number of bishops and clergy, Ken among them, met to consider what was best to be done. They drew up a petition, signed by Archbishop Sancroft, Bishop Ken, and five others, beseeching the King not to insist upon its being read, and the petitioners them-selfs presented it, May 18th, 1688. They were sent to the Tower, and tried June 15th, when the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. Thanksgivings were held in all parts of the land, in token of the sympathy which the people felt for the prisoners. Later in the same year came the Revolution, when King James fled and the Prince of Orange came to England, in accordance with the invitation of Parliament. Many of the bishops protested against his election, and at his coronation refused to take the oaths of allegiance, preferring to be deprived of their bishoprics rather than act against their conscience. Bishop Ken was one of these Nonjurors, as they were called, and was accordingly compelled to leave Wells, and retired to Longleat, the residence of his former patron Lord Weymouth. Here he remained for over twenty years, undisturbed except on one occasion, when he was summoned before the Privy Council to answer to a charge of having usurped authority in appealing for alms for the maintenance of the non-juring clergy. It was proposed on the accession of Queen Anne that he should resume the charge of his diocese, in which he had been supplanted by Dr. Kidder; but he declined the offer, though he always maintained that he was the lawful bishop, and until Kidder’s death always signed himself “Tho. Bath and Wells.” Queen Anne settled upon him a pension of £200 per annum, which, as usual, he spent in charity. He died at Longleat, of paralysis, March 19th, 1710. His literary works, besides the prayers already mentioned, consisted chiefly of sacred poetry. Much of this was in the form of hymns, of which the Morning and Evening Hymns are the best known. These he used to accompany on his lute, and in the composition of them he passed most of the later part of his life.

Kennicott, Benjamin, a celebrated Hebraist, was born of humble parents at Totnes, in Devonshire, in 1718. He was appointed master of the charity school in his native town till 1744, when sufficient money was raised to enable him to go to Oxford. He entered at Wadham College, where he applied himself specially to the study of divinity and Hebrew. While still an undergraduate he published two dissertations: the first on The Tree of Life in Paradise, and the second on The Oblations of Cain and Abel, which was so well received that he was made a Fellow of Exeter College. He remained at Oxford till his death, which took place in 1783, having become D.D. in 1761, Radcliffe Librarian in 1767, and Canon of Christchurch and Rector of Culham, Oxfordshire, in 1770. Kennicott’s great work is his Hebrew Bible. In order to excite an interest in his plans he first published a work On the State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament [1753], and then in 1760 set about collating the Hebrew manuscripts. The plan was warmly approved by the clergy, and nearly ten thousand pounds were contributed towards the expenses. Several learned men were employed at home and abroad, among them.

Professor Bruns, of Helmstädt [d. 1814], who worked in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland. Six hundred and fifty Hebrew manuscripts, and sixteen manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch were collated. The work took nine years, during which time Dr. Kennicott published an annual account of the progress made. To the second volume he annexed a Dissertatio Generalis, describing and justifying his undertaking, and giving a history of the Hebrew text from the time of the Babylonian captivity. An important supplement to Kennicott's Bible was published by De Rossi, under the title of Variæ Lectiones Veteris Testamenti. These two writers are said to have collated together thirteen hundred and forty-six manuscripts.

Kentigern, St. ["Head Master"]).—A Scottish saint, called "the Apostle of Strathclyde," born at Culross early in the fifth century, the son of Thewaw, the daughter of a Pagan king. It is a curious change in a word that St. Thewaw has been transmuted into St. Enoch, a "saint" familiar enough to all visitors to Glasgow. Thenaw brought her child to St. Servan, who said, "He shall be my Mungo" ["dear one"], and had him educated. But the jealousy of his school companions induced him to go to Glasgow, where he attracted the notice of the King of Cumbria, and was by him consecrated Bishop of Glasgow, and the Cathedral is now familiarly known by the term of endearment, St. Mungo’s. The outbreak of war obliged him to retreat to South Wales, where he founded a monastery at Llanellwy consisting of nearly seven hundred persons. On his return to Scotland, about 560, he appointed Asaph as his successor in governing the monastery, which thenceforth became known as St. Asaph’s. He died in his See in 612, and is commemorated Jan. 13th.

Keys, Power of the. — This is the name given to the authority claimed by the Episcopal priesthood to administer the discipline of the Church, and to communicate or withhold its privileges, and is so called from Christ’s words to Peter, "And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven," etc. The expression evidently means the government of the Church. The power of the keys is ministerial, and also refers to the authority of spiritual rulers to "bind" their people by some ordinances, and to "loose" them from others. Roman Catholics interpret our Lord’s words as giving a greater right to Peter than to the rest of the Apostles. Against this Anglicans contend that Christ regarded Peter as the representative of the Apostles.

Kidder, Richard [b. c. 1635, d. 1703], was a native of Suffolk, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1658. He became rector of St. Martin’s Outwich, in London, and in 1681, being then a D.D., was made a Prebendary of Norwich; in 1689, Dean of Peterborough, and in 1691, Bishop of Bath and Wells, in the room of Dr. Ken, who had refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. [Ken.] On Nov. 26th, 1703, Dr. Kidder and his wife were killed in their bed by the falling of a stack of chimneys during the most terrific storm that ever fell on this country. He was the author of several works, the principal of which is a Commentary on the Pentateuch. He also wrote The Young Man’s Duty; Covetium Coeleste, a discourse on the right way of preparing for the Lord’s Supper; The Christian Sufferer Supported, and some other sermons. He was a great Hebrew scholar.

Kilian, Sr., was born in Ireland about the middle of the seventh century, and received a liberal and Christian education from his parents. From his youth he was devoted to the study of the Scriptures, and an ardent desire grew up in him to preach to infidels. Accordingly he crossed to Franconia with eleven companions in 685. He spent some time in Würzburg, where the Governor, Gosbert, and all the people were Pagans; but, finding that he needed authority, went to Rome, where he was consecrated Bishop by Pope Conon in 686, and received full permission to preach to the heathen. He diligently continued his work, and in a short time the greater part of the inhabitants were converted. Gosbert had married Geila, his brother’s wife, and when the Governor had become a Christian, Kilian attacked him for this, and entreated him to give up his wife as a proof of his sincerity. Gosbert, after great persuasion, yielded; whereasupon Geila caused Kilian and his companions to be assassinated July 8th, 689. It is said that the murderer, Geila, Gosbert, and his descendants, all died a violent death.

Kimchi, David [b. 1160, d. 1240].—A learned Jewish Rabbi, of great influence in his time, and author of many works on the Hebrew tongue, which have formed the bases of nearly all more modern works. He wrote a Commentary on the Psalms, which was translated into Latin, and on Zephaniah, which latter work was translated by the late Dr. McCauley into English.

King, Henry, eldest son of John, Bishop of London, was born at Wornal, in Buckinghamshire, in the latter end of the sixteenth century. He was elected from Westminster to Christ Church, in Oxford, where he took orders, and commenced Doctor in Divinity. After having gone through several considerable prebendaries in the Church, he was promoted to the See of Chichester in 1641. The Bishop was a great scholar, a celebrated preacher, and very remarkable for his hospitality and charity. He died at Chichester in 1669. His works are A Sermon preached at St. Paul’s Cross, November 25th, 1621, upon King, John, son of Philip King, of Wormal, and father of the preceding, was born in 1559, admitted student of Christ's Church, took the degree of Doctor in Divinity, was preferred to the deanship of Christ's Church in 1603, and nominated in 1611 to the bishopric of London by King James I., who used to call him the King of Preachers. He had the character of a great divine and a fine speaker, and was noted for his piety. He died in 1621, being fifty-two years of age, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. Soon after the Bishop's death, some Roman Catholics asserted that he died in their communion, but without truth [see preceding article]. Bishop King wrote Lectures upon Jonah, and several sermons preached at the University, at Court, and upon public occasions.

King, William, Archbishop of Dublin, was born in Antrim in 1650. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1688 became Dean of St. Patrick's. He was a staunch Protestant, which caused him to be imprisoned in Dublin Castle by James II. On his release he became Bishop of Derry, and afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, which post he held from 1702 till his death in 1729. His works are on metaphysics and theology. The chief are The State of the Protestants in Ireland in James II.'s Reign, Divine Predestination and Forreknowledge, and the best known, De Origine Mæli, translated into English by Bishop Law in 1731, which was an endeavour to show that the existence of evil is reconcilable with the goodness of God.

Kingdom of God.—It is plain at the very opening of any page of the four Gospels, that when Christianity was proclaimed in this world it was announced as a Kingdom. The opening verse of the New Testament calls Christ the Son of David, and every act and word recorded of the Saviour has reference to this Kingdom. The voice of the herald announcing Him cried, "The Kingdom of Heaven is at hand." Nearly every one of the Lord's parables is prefaced with "The Kingdom of Heaven is like . . . ." The superscription on the Cross called Him "a King." The Apostle caught up in the Spirit to see visions of heaven heard the angels sing "The kingdom of this world is become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ."

The language and acts of our Saviour best explain the nature of this Kingdom. It was not the counterpart of the Empire. The King was not a Caesar sitting in the clouds, or diffused through the universe, entirely separated from His worshippers. He declared emphatically that the Kingdom was within men; that it was like a grain of mustard-seed which was scattered over different soils, but that the right soil for it was an honest and good heart. He showed that a community had been opened between this visible and invisible world, and that the one was under the power of the other. This is the idea of the Kingdom all through the Acts of the Apostles and the different Epistles. The Apostles dwell on the great acts of Death and Resurrection as evidences that Jesus was the King and His Kingdom spiritual, that through them He fulfilled the promises of the Old Testament, expounding and consummating all the previous history of the Jews; and whilst the Apostles of the Circumcision bore witness that the same King who had spoken to Abraham was King of the New Covenant, and that there was no solution of continuity in the one Church and Kingdom of God, St. Paul also witnessed that He had freed the same Church from all national exclusions, and opened His Kingdom to all believers. The root of the Kingdom was the union of the Godhead with humanity; in that were contained the doctrines of reconciliation, of a Divine life in man, of justification by faith, of sanctification by the Holy Ghost. Not only the grand consolations of Christian hope, but the common every-day duties of life were declared by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Ephesians to rest upon that union absolutely.

The history of Christianity is to some extent the history of the various opinions which grew up respecting the nature of this Kingdom. The growth of the Papal power was the growth of the belief that the visible Church was modelled after the fashion of the Empire of the Caesars, with a visible head, who was Christ's representative. The Reformation cast aside that idea for the belief that the Kingship of Christ is His lordship over individual souls, which does not of course exclude the idea that, in proportion as this becomes extended, the kingdom may be more and more visible in a concrete form amongst men. The "Kingdom of God is among you," said Christ, and the Apostles spoke of it as set up in the world, and as fighting against the world. It is among us, and is opposed to the spirit of the world. For the spirit of the world is selfishness, as the Spirit of Christ is self-sacrifice. Christ's life was the perfect human life, and, therefore, His subjects must be conformed to that life of self-surrender, and His Kingdom progresses in proportion as mankind is learning to shape its career and its aims in accordance with that Divine and human ideal. Against all hat is false and foul and unholy the Spirit of Christ is ever making war. When the world hall have declared itself on His side, the Kingdom will have achieved the triumph which He promised to it. How far the ideal will be realised on this earth we cannot tell. God has kept the times and the seasons in his own power. All that man can do is to strive for the fulfilment of that perfect ideal, to believe that it will come, but to leave the time and manner in His hands.

Kingsley, Charles [4. 1819, d. 1875], was born at Holme Vicarage, on the borders of Dartmoor. Till 1833 he was educated at home, and then became a pupil of the Rev. Derwent Coleridge, at Helston; then, having been for a time student at King's College, London, he entered in due course at Magdalen College, Cambridge. Here he gained a scholarship and other distinctions, and took his B.A. in 1842, obtaining a First Class in Classics, and coming out as a Senior Optime in the Mathematical Tripos. The first bent of his mind, it is said, was towards the study of the law; but at the close of 1842 he was ordained Deacon by Dr. Sumner, Bishop of Winchester, to the curacy of Eversley, of which, the following year, he became Rector. In 1860 he was nominated to the Professorship of Modern History in the University of Cambridge, a post which he resigned in 1869 on being preferred to a canonry in Chester Cathedral. This stall he shortly afterwards exchanged for one in Westminster Abbey. Though Mr. Kingsley was not a Ruggesian, there is, perhaps, no writer of the present day upon whom Arnold exercised a greater or more salutary influence. There was life in his sermons, as there were practical sermons in his novels. Concentration of purpose was his most striking characteristic. There can be no question that his early career was more calculated to excite apprehension than hope among those who most appreciated his promise. His ready gifts made him a force for good or evil. He never hesitated to speak his thoughts, nor did he shrink from advocating the most subversive doctrines because he ignorantly might make a mischievous application of his words. He saw that there were errors to be redressed, and he came forward as the champion of the sufferers. The influence of Professor Maurice had much to do with his hanging the profession of his life. When Mr. Kingsley came to be ordained deacon, Mr. Maurice was in the zenith of his intellectual powers, and the influence which he always exercised over younger men was perhaps greater than at any subsequent time. The first page of the first work which Mr. Kingsley gave to the world bears remarkable testimony to the influence which the chaplain of Lincoln's Inn exercised over his intellect. He was but in his thirtieth year when he produced his Saint's Tragedy, a dramatic setting of the story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, which, although it has gone through several editions, has not received the attention from the critics which it unquestionably merits. Later on in life he published some other volumes of verse, and though he failed to attain the highest place, he will always take a high rank among poets of the second order.

Always restlessly eager in philanthropic schemes, he came to the front in 1847 and 1848 as the advocate of the working classes. Mr. Maurice's schemes of "Christian Socialism" excited his ardent admiration, and he gave of his best for their advancement. The first of his novels was devoted to this subject. In the hands of a writer untouched by the live coal from the altar of genius, such a hero as Alton Locke would have excited little interest, but Mr. Kingsley's story had a very remarkable success. On all sides the story of the tailor's apprentice, with its remarkable episodes in life, in the shops of the sweaters and in the hideous fever dens in which the slaves of a certain small section of the London tradesmen had their habitation, was received with something approaching to enthusiasm. What was of more importance was the fact that its author was able to carry out a philanthropic scheme for the amelioration of the condition of these unhappy drudges, the effects of which have even now not ceased to exist. The "Christian Socialists," with Mr. Kingsley as their guiding spirit, started a scheme for the introduction of what has since become known as "the co-operative principle" into the tailors' trade. Their first establishment encountered considerable opposition, and was attended by great difficulties, but in the end it prospered, and their place of business is, we believe, still in existence. But the evil against which he fought has deep roots, and it is to be feared that the cruel and iniquitous "sweating" system, against which Mr. Kingsley so vigorously wrote, is but little ameliorated, and the poor needlewomen are not much better off than when Hood wrote "The Song of the Shirt." Yet Kingsley's book is of great value. It roused hundreds of good people to realise and to hate an evil, and to pray and work that it may yet be undone.

For a while Charles Kingsley was commonly known as the "Chartist Parson." A little later he published Yeast, a curiously crude and imperfect statement of the difficulties of "the agricultural labour question," reprinted from Fraser's Magazine. He used to declare that it was the worst of his books.

After the publication of the first novel, Mr. Kingsley glided off into a more purely literary groove than that which he had up to the time occupied. In 1852 he produced Phaenon, or Loose Thoughts for Loose thinkers, a very clever Socratic dialogue on Christian evidence. His novel Hypatia appeared in 1853. It is probable that no novel ever went through a severer ordeal of criticism than this, and it is no small testimony to its genuine merits that, in spite of its admitted faults, it still maintains its ground with the reading public. The time chosen is one of which very few general readers know anything: the subject—the Church of Alexandria in the fourth century—is far from being one of a popular kind; while the theological character of much of the writing is to novel-readers eminently unattractive. But the vivid pictures of Alexandrian life, of the monks, of the struggle between the old faith and the new, are not surpassed in our literature.

The studies which had led Mr. Kingsley to the production of this novel resulted also in a volume of lectures on Alexandria and her Schools, a work which hardly advanced its author’s reputation. And his lectures on The Roman and the Teuton, which, in his capacity of Professor of Modern History, Mr. Kingsley delivered before the University of Cambridge, were somewhat bitterly, and, according to Mr. Max Müller (no mean authority), very undeservedly, attacked. With all his merits, Kingsley was not precisely fitted for the work of historical criticism. He was admirable in the open air, one of the most accomplished of salmon-fishers, with a marvellous eye for the picturesque, a great sense of humour, and an infinite store of manliness and good sense.

The most genuine and spontaneous of his books were the novels of Westward Ho! published in 1835, and Two Years Ago in 1837. He was the author of several volumes of sermons, all of which indicate an acquaintance and a sympathy with the views and doctrines of Maurice; and he was identified with some of Dean Stanley’s more pronounced efforts to introduce the representatives of Scottish Presbyterianism and secular literature within the walls of Westminster Abbey.

Apart from theological matters, there are probably few who would have found reason for differing from Kingsley’s general views, and fewer still who would object to his writings on purely literary grounds. His book about The Hermits of Egypt is in its way a model of style and of condensation. The Water Babies is a work of no common power, irradiated with rare humour, and with a depth of hidden meaning, while the story of the author’s Christmas in the West Indies—At Last—is, like some of his essays, one of the most graceful pieces of purely descriptive writing in the English language. His attempts to popularise science in his Glances, Town Geology, and Madame How and Lady Why, were all excellent works, and a scientific society which he started while Canon of Chester holds a very high place.

Even Kingsley’s novels are books to profit by; it is impossible to read them without feeling stronger and better; for their leading feature is their intolerance of all that is mean or weak; their scornful antipathy to indolence, cowardice, avarice, selfishness, all the vices that debase the mind or rust the faculties. The “muscular Christianity” with which his name has been identified (though he somewhat indigantly repudiated the phrase) was only the common-sense principle of the Christian religion in healthy, every-day, unostentatious action. He made it his aim to show that there was nothing incompatible between the Christian life, as its Founder taught it, and the innocent enjoyment of the best gifts of the Creator, and that it was the first duty of every conscientious man to make the very utmost of his powers for the service of his fellow-creatures.

Kirchentag (Church diet), an association of ministers and laymen of the Lutheran German Reformed, United Evangelical, and Moravian Churches in Germany for the promotion of the interests of religion, without reference to their denominational differences. The idea of such a meeting was brought forward by Bethmann Hollweg, Professor of Law at the Bonn University, in April, 1848, in a pamphlet; and in the annual conference of Sandhof, near Frankfort, in May, it was further discussed and approved of. The first Kirchentag was convened on Sept. 21st, 1848 at Wittenberg, more than five hundred delegates being present. From that time it was held yearly, the place of meeting being changed from year to year, till 1871, since which time no Kirchentag has been convened. Its discussions and resolutions have exercised a considerable influence over Germany. From it sprang the “Congress for Inner Missions,” which is held yearly in Germany, and whose leader was Dr. Wichern, till his death in 1881.

Kirk, from the Greek kyriakon [Church] “belonging to the Lord.”

Kirk Session.—The name of a petty ecclesiastical court of the Kirk in Scotland. Each parish is divided into several districts and each of these is supervised by its own elder and deacon. A consistory of the minister, elders, and deacons of a parish forms a kirk session. It regulates matters relative to public worship, elections, catechising, visitations, the poor’s fund, etc. It takes cognizance of the lesser matters of scandal, but the greater ones are left to the Presbytery, to whom in all cases an appeal lies from the kirk session.

Kiss of Peace.—This form of salutation, as a token of Christian affection, appear to have been an Apostolic custom, and is frequently mentioned in the New Testament. It was one of the rites of the Eucharist Service in the primitive Church. It was omitted on Good Friday, in remembrance of the traitorous kiss of Judas Iscariot. In the Roman Church the kiss of peace follows th consecration, and is, as Innocent I. wrote,
the "seal" on the whole of the sacred action.
It continued to be given literally in the West till the end of the thirteenth century, when it gave way to the use of the "osculatorium," "pax," or "frena," a plate with a figure of Christ on the cross stamped upon it, kissed first by the priest and then by the clerics and congregation. This was introduced into England by Archbishop Walter of York in 1250. Usually now the pax is not given at all in low masses, and in high mass an embrace is substituted for the kiss and given only to those in the sanctuary.

Kitto, John, D.D. [b. 1804, d. 1854], a prolific writer on Biblical subjects. He was born at Plymouth, of poor parents, and was a very weakly child. He was at the age of ten apprenticed to a barber, but he only remained with him a short time, and then assisted his father in his employment of journeyman mason. In 1817 he fell from a ladder into a court thirty-five feet below him, and the shock caused total deafness for the rest of his life. In 1819 things were at such a low ebb with his family that he had to go into Plymouth workhouse. Here he learned the trade of a shoemaker, and in 1821 was apprenticed to John Bowden, who treated him so cruelly that his case came under judicial investigation and his indentures were cancelled. He always had had a strong passion for reading, and used every opportunity of improvement,
and the gentlemen who had tried his case were so struck with his powers that they procured for him the post of sub-librarian at the public library of Plymouth. Here he had ample opportunities of reading, and he gave much time to the study of the Bible,
and formed the idea of becoming a missionary.
In 1824 he was introduced to Mr. Groves, a dentist at Exeter, who offered to take him into his house and teach him his profession.
Here he continued his reading, and in 1825 he published Essays and Letters by John Killo, which bear witness to his varied knowledge of literature. Mr. Groves, who was himself leaving England as a missionary, learned that the Church Missionary Society wanted printers for their foreign station, and he generously paid £100 to the Missionary College at Islington that Killo might there learn the art of printing. He entered that college July, 1825. From 1827-29 he worked for the society at Malta, but failing health oblige him to give up the life of a printer, and Mr. Groves took him, as tutor to his children, on a tour in the East, visiting St.
Petersburg, Astracan, the Caucasus, Armenia, Persia, and Bagdad. In these travels he gained the knowledge which produced those Biblical works which have immortalised his name. In 1832 he made a trip down the Tigris with Sir John M'Neill. At the close of the year he turned towards home, finding that his deafness was an insuperable bar to his becoming a missionary. From this time he gave himself up to authorship,
was liberally treated by his bookseller, Mr.
Charles Knight, and was a contributor to the Penny Encyclopaedia, published under his sponsorship. In 1835 he commenced his Pictorial Bible, which was published in 1838. In 1843 appeared his History of Palestine; in 1845 The Lost Senses—Deafness and Blindness; Daily
Bible Illustrations [1848-53], in some respects his greatest work. He also edited the Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature. In 1844 the University of Gissens conferred on him the degree of D.D., though he was a layman, and the Society of Antiquaries elected him one of their fellows in 1845. He died at Cannstadt, in Wurtemburg, whilst on a continental tour which had been advised for his health. His Life has been written by Dr. J. E. Ryland and Professor Edie of Glasgow.

Kloppstock, Friedrich Gottlieb, a German religious poet, was born in 1724 at Quedlinburg, at the gymnasia of which place he received his early tuition. In his sixteenth year he went to school at Naumburg, where his poetical character was first developed.
He perfected himself in classics, and determined to write a long epic poem, but could not make up his mind as to the subject, and rather inclined towards "Henry the Fowler."
In 1745 he went to Jena to study theology, and soon determined to take Christ as his hero. In 1746 he passed to Leipsic, and there became acquainted with the editors of the Bremische Beiträge, in which the first three cantos of the Messiah appeared in 1748.
They attracted great attention; by some the author was pronounced a religious poet of the highest order, while others deemed his poetical treatment of so sacred a subject profane and presumptuous. He was made much of by neighbours; thus the Danish minister Berneroff offered him a pension of 400 dols.
if he would come to Copenhagen and finish
his poem, and introduced him to the king, Frederick V., whom he accompanied on his travels. In 1771 he left Copenhagen and settled at Hamburg, where he completed his Messiah, and died in 1803.

Kneelers. [Genuflexentes.]

Kneeling.—The custom of kneeling during confession, prayers, etc., is of great antiquity, and is mentioned repeatedly in the Old and New Testaments. It was so common in the primitive Church, that prayers gained the name of "bending the knees."
Formerly, during Easter and Whitsuntide, all Christians, except penitents, who were denied the privilege, stood instead of kneeling during the prayers, and this custom was confirmed by the Council of Nice. In some countries, as Germany and Scotland, the people sit or stand during prayers, but in the latter country the practice is dying out.

Knobel, Karl August, a learned Hebraist, was born at Tschecheln, in Lower Lusatia, in 1807. He studied at Breslau University, and became professor of theology there in 1835, and at Gießen in 1839, which latter post he retained till his death in 1863. He contributed the commentaries on Isaiah to Hirzel's Short Commentary on the Old Testament. This led to a controversy with Ewald, and Knobel wrote Exegetical Vade mecum for Herr Ewald, in Tubingen. He also was the author of Prophecies of the Hebraists, Commentary on the Book of Ecclesiastes, Genealogical Tables of Genesis. His commentaries are notable for the learning, originality, and argumentative powers which they display, but also for a rationalism which prevented the author from grasping the whole meaning of the works on which he commented.

Known Man.—A name adopted by the Lollards in the fifteenth century. It is thus explained by Pecock, Bishop of Chichester: “The first of these texts is written I Cor. xiv., in the end, thus: ‘Sotheli if any man knoweth not or put not, in what he may, his business for to learn the writing of the Bible, as it lieth in the text, namely, the writing of the New Testament, he shall be unknown of God for to be any of His. And for this, that they busy themselves for to learn and know the Bible . . . they give a name proper to themselves, and call themselves known men, as though all other than them be unknown; and when one of them talketh with another of them of some other third man, the hearer will ask thus: ‘Is he a known man?’ and if it be answered to him thus, ‘Yea, he is a known man!’ all is safe, peril is not for to deal with him; and if it be answered to him thus: ‘He is no known man,’ then peril is casted for to much homely deal with him.”

The name “known men” was also applied to the Puritans of Henry VIII.’s reign.

Knox, John, born at Haddington, in East Lothian, 1505, died at Edinburgh, Nov. 24th, 1572. He was the son of a small landowner, and was educated at the grammar school of Haddington, whence he proceeded to Glasgow University, and is mentioned among the Incorporati in 1522. There is no mention of his taking any degree, nor does he appear to have made any mark as a scholar during the years of his education. He was ordained to the priesthood before 1530, and became Professor of Logic, and tutor in the family of Hugh Douglas, of East Lothian. Hitherto he had adhered to the Romish doctrines in which he had been educated, but about this time Patrick Hamilton, who had been at Wittenberg, and there adopted the Reformed views, brought them back with him to Scotland, and by degrees Protestantism began to make its way. Knox is said to have first heard the Lutheran doctrines from Thomas Guillaume, a disciple of Hamilton, but the most direct influence was exerted over him by George Wishart, to whom he attached himself till Wishart was seized and burnt as a heretic. Knox openly professed himself a Protestant about 1544, and in 1547 was called to officiate as Protestant minister at St. Andrew's, whether he had fled from the persecution which raged throughout Scotland. His ministry had only lasted a few months when St. Andrew's was attacked by the French fleet; the city capitulated, and Knox, with other Protestant refugees, was condemned for nineteen months to work at the galleys. His health was injured for life by the suffering which he endured, but he never abandoned the hope of returning to carry on his ministry. He was released early in 1549, and, finding that little good could be done in Scotland, he took refuge first in Berwick and afterwards in Newcastle, in both places preaching and working with untiring zeal. His fame having spread southwards, he was made Chaplain to Edward VI., in 1551, and was afterwards offered the Bishopric of Rochester, which he refused, as being contrary to his principles. During his stay in England Knox married the daughter of a gentleman of Northumberland, and in 1555 went with her to Dieppe and then to Geneva, where he visited Calvin. He undertook the charge of the Protestant Church at Frankfort-on-Main, but hearing in 1559 that the persecutions in Scotland were abating, he returned, and arrived at a critical time. Some Protestant preachers were on the point of being tried for their lives, and Knox, who had been condemned in the early days of the persecution, was again proclaimed as a heretic. The Queen-Regent was alarmed at the sympathy felt by the people for these clergy, and the trial was put off. Knox was appointed minister of the church of St. Giles, the parish church of Edinburgh, in 1560, and was there during the remaining years of his life. His wife died in the same year. On the accession of Mary Queen of Scots, Knox's fortitude was put to the test. He preached openly in his own church against the idolatry which a Roman Catholic Sovereign was seeking to enforce upon Scotland, and spoke in such bold terms on the subject of her marriage that he was sent for to Holyrood to answer for his conduct. The Queen desired that in future he would tell her privately of anything that he saw to be wrong, and on his refusal, finding him indifferent to her threats, she tried to conciliate him. Finally he was summoned to trial on a charge of treason, and was only acquitted after a long examination and by a small majority. It was a decided victory for the Protestants, though in 1564 Knox was forbidden to preach, in consequence of his having given offence by a sermon preached after the Queen's marriage with Lord Darnley. This prohibition, however, lasted only till her fall, in 1567, and the accession of King James. After three years more of active work he was seized in 1570 with a fit of apoplexy, and though he recovered sufficiently to be able to preach again from time to time, he became gradually worse, and died in 1572. Koran, from the Arabic kaara, "to read," hence Koran means the written book, or bible of the Mahometans, containing the revelations and doctrines of their pretended prophet. It is the general belief among the Mahometans that the Koran is of divine origin; that it is eternal and uncreated; that the first transcript was from everlasting by God's throne, written on a gigantic table, called the preserved table, in which are also recorded the divine decrees, past and future; that a copy from this table in a book bound in white silk, and adorned with gold and precious stones, was brought down to the lowest heaven by the angel Gabriel on the night of Al-Khadr, or night of power, in the month Ramadan. Portions of it were then revealed to Mahomet by Gabriel, some at Mecca and some at Medina, at different times during a space of twenty-three years as the exigency of affairs required, and once every year he was allowed to look on the book as a whole. They say that only ten chapters were delivered entire, the rest being revealed piecemeal, and written down by the prophet's amanuensis by the angel's directions in such a part and such a chapter, till they were completed. The first part which was revealed is generally allowed to be the first five verses of chapter xcvi. "Preach in the name of thy Lord, who has created all things." While the prophet lived the Koran was kept only in loose sheets. His successor, Abu Bekir, collected them into a volume, which he committed to the keeping of Haphsh, one of Mahomet's wives. There are seven principal editions of the Koran—two at Medina, one each at Mecca, Kufa, Bassora, and Syria, and the common or Vulgar edition. The first contains 6,000 verses, the others surpassing this number by 200 or 236 verses; but the number of words and letters is the same in all, viz., 77,639 words and 323,015 letters. The number of commentaries on the Koran is so large that the bare titles would fill a large volume. It is divided into 114 portions of very unequal length, which we should call chapters, but the Arabians call Swar, or in the singular Sura; or into thirty sections called Ajaza, singular Jas; or again into sixty equal portions called Ahzab, singular Hizb. There are twenty-nine chapters which have this peculiarity; they begin with certain letters of the alphabet which are supposed to conceal several profound mysteries communicated to no mortal but their prophet.

The great doctrine of the Koran is the unity of God, to restore which Mahomet said was the chief end of his mission; it being laid down by him as a fundamental doctrine that there never was, nor can be, more than one orthodox religion, though the particular laws or ceremonies are subject to alteration according to Divine direction; that whenever this religion became neglected or corrupted in essentials, God re-informed mankind thereof by several prophets, chiefly Moses and Jesus, till the appearance of Mahomet, who is their seal, and no other is to be expected after him. To engage the people to listen to him, a great part of the Koran is taken up with examples of awful punishments formerly inflicted by God on those who rejected his messengers, and these stories are taken many of them from the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha. The general design of the Koran was to unite in one religion the Jews, Christians and idolaters by whom Arabia was peopled.

The Koran is held in the highest reverence by the Mussulmans: they dare not so much as touch it without being legally purified. It is read with great care and respect, being never held below the girdle. They swear by it, take omsen from it on all weighty occasions, adorn it with gold and jewels, and will not knowingly suffer it to be in the hands of any unbeliever.

Kornthal. [PIETISTS.]

Kortholt, Christian [b. 1632, d. 1694].—He was born at Bourg, in the island of Fennern; studied at Rostock, Jena, Wittenberg, and Leipzig; became a Doctor of Divinity, and in 1666 was made Professor of Theology at Kiel. In 1680 the Duke of Holstein made him Professor of Ecclesiastical Antiquity and Vice-Chancellor for life of that university. He left behind him a character for great industry and ability. He was a very voluminous author, and wrote both in High Dutch and Latin. Among his tracts are De Persecutionibus Ecclesiae primitive [1660, reprinted in quarto, at Kiel, in 1689], De Religione Ethnica Muhammadiana et Judaica, De Origine et Natura Christianismi, &c.

Krantz or Crantz, Albert [b. 1445, d. 1517], Doctor of Law and Divinity. He studied at Cologne and Rostock. He was a man of great learning and piety, and sorely lamented the sins and disorders of his time, but discouraged the idea of Luther's being able in any way to cope with them. He published some theological books, but is more celebrated for his historical works, the principal of which are—an Ecclesiastical History under the name of Metropolit, wherein he treats of the churches founded or restored by Charles the Great; his history of the Saxons, in 13 books, and of the Vandals, in 14, and a Krummacher, Friedrich Wilhelm, an eloquent preacher, the son of Friedrich Adolf. A Reformed pastor, was born at Möss, on the Rhine, in 1796; studied at Halle and at Jena; became Assistant Pastor at Frankfurt in 1819; moved to Ruhrort in 1825. It was there that he delivered the lectures on Elijah and Elisha which are so well known, not only in Germany, but also in England and America. In 1834 he went to Elberfeld, and while there received a call as preacher to a German Reformed congregation in New York, but refused. In 1847 he succeeded Marheinecke at the Trinity Church, Berlin, where he preached boldly against Rationalism. In 1853 he was appointed Court Chaplain at Potsdam, where he died in 1868. He took a great interest in the Evangelical Alliance, and was present at the conference in London in 1851, and at each succeeding conference till his death. He was one of the ministers who preached at the London Exhibition in 1862. Many of Krummacher’s books have been translated into English. The chief, besides his Elijah, are Salomo and Sulamith, The Suffering Christ, and David, the King of Israel.

Kyrie Eleison, the Greek of “Lord have mercy.” The words are found in the Clementine Liturgy as part of the prayers for the catechumens. At the Second Council of Arles they were directed to be used, the custom of the Apostolic See and of all the Italian and Eastern provinces being assigned as the reason. Formerly, each of the three clauses, “Lord have mercy, Christ have mercy, Lord have mercy,” was repeated three times, and in accordance with this in the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., where they are placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, the figure iii, is prefixed to each clause. This practice is still adhered to in the Roman Church. The Kyrie Eleison is sometimes called the “Lesser Litany.”

Labadie, Jean de, the founder of the sect of the Labadists, was born at Bourg, in Bordeaux, in 1610. He was educated at the Jesuit College at Bordeaux, where he studied theology, philosophy, the Bible, and mysticism; but in 1639 he was dismissed, and became Canon and Teacher of Theology at Amiens. His sermons made a great impression; but he roused anger, especially among the Jesuits, by some of his teachings. Richelieu protected him, but Mazarin expelled him from Amiens, and he retired to the Carmelite hermitage at Graville. Here he read Calvin’s Institutiones, which caused him in 1650 to secede to the Calvinists. He was pastor at Montauban till 1669, when he was banished for exciting sedition, and went to Geneva, and in 1666 to Middelburg, in Zeeland. On his way he formed a secret union with Pierre Yvon, Pierre Dulignon, and Francois Menuret and others, and formed the nucleus of the sect of Labadists. He was suspended and expelled from Middelburg in 1668 for refusing to sign the Belgic Confession; but the Princess Patine Elizabeth, through the influence of the learned lady Anna Maria Schurmann, offered him refuge to many of his followers at Erfurt, where she was titular abbess. They were banished in 1672 to Altona, where Labadie died in 1674. His followers immediately removed to Wiewert, in North Holland, where they for a time rapidly increased in numbers; but the sect died out on the death of the original adherents, and in 1703 only about thirty remained. The Labadists in several respects were very similar to the early Quakers. They agreed with Schwenkfeld and the Anabaptists in attaching great importance to internal revelation, by which the external revelation is rendered intelligible, and from which it receives its authority. They also entertained very strong views as to the purity of the visible Church, maintaining that it ought not to consist of professing disciples of Christ, but of really sanctified Christians, striving after perfection in holiness.

Labarum. — The military standard of the Emperor Constantine, said to have been adopted by him after seeing in the sky a luminous cross with the inscription Ex touto nika, In this Conquer. It was itself in the form of a cross—a short transverse bar being fixed near the end of a long staff: above the bar was a crown of gold, within which was the monogram , and from the bar hung a small banner of silk, richly ornamented.

Labbé, Philippe [b. 1607, d. 1667], was a French Jesuit. He was teacher of philosophy and theology, but devoted most of his time to writing. He was the author of seventy-five different works, the most noted of which is his account of the Councils.

Laborantes. — A name sometimes given to an inferior order of the clergy who saw to the decent and honourable interment of the dead. Other names for the order were copiatae (copiatai), fossaee, and lectiæcrii.

La Chaise, François de [b. 1624, d. 1705], was a French Jesuit who taught philosophy and theology at Lyons and at Grenoble, and in 1673 became Confessor to Louis XIV. He was skilful and patient, and gained a great influence over the mind and conscience of the King, and played a chief part in the ecclesiastical affairs of the time, e.g. the Edict of Nantes, the difficulties between the King and the Popes, etc. His name is immortalised by the burial-ground of Paris laid out on the site of the villa in which he lived.

Lachmann, Karl [b. 1793, d. 1851].—A textual critic of the New Testament of high authority. His first edition of the Greek Testament was published in 1831, and marked an important epoch in Biblical science, for it was the first systematic attempt to substitute regular scientific method for arbitrary choice, and to construct a text from ancient documents without the intervention of any printed edition. The great defect of Lachmann's text was the too narrow selection of manuscripts from which he worked; but it was of the highest value as pointing succeeding labourers to the right method of proceeding.

Lachrymatories. — Small glass or earthen vessels into which the heathens put the tears wept for the dead by the surviving relatives. They were buried with the ashes of the deceased.

Lacordaire, Jean Baptiste Henri, the greatest of the modern French preachers, was born at Recey-sur-Ource, in the Department of Côte d'Or in 1802. He was educated and entered upon legal studies at Dijon, and, having taken his degree, passed in 1822 to Paris, where he began to practise as an advocate in 1824, and rose rapidly to distinction. At this time he was strongly inclined to libel, so it caused great surprise when he suddenly entered the College of St. Sulpice, and in 1827 received holy orders. His reasons for taking this step were that he was roused by Lamennais's Essai sur l'Indifférence, and came to the conclusion that Christianity was necessary for the social development of the human race. He soon became celebrated as a preacher, and in the College of Juilli, to which he was attached, formed the acquaintance of Lamennais and Montalembert, with whom he formed a close alliance, and, under the device of "God and liberty," contended for a union between the highest Church principles and the most extreme Radicalism. They published a journal called L'Arme, which was condemned by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1831. Lacordaire formally submitted, and withdrew for a time from all public affairs. In 1835 he became preacher at Our Dame Cathedral, and his course of sermons drew immense crowds. In 1840 he entered the novitiate of the Dominican order. From this date he devoted much of his time to preaching in various parts of France, and he attempted, with little success, to restore the Dominican order there. In 1848 he was chosen one of the representatives of the National Assembly, and took part in some of the debates on the Radical side; but he received a rebuke for declaring himself a Republican, so resigned in the following May and withdrew entirely from political life. He continued his sermons at Notre Dame till 1851, when his health began to decline, and he withdrew in 1854 to the Convent of Soraye, where he spent the remainder of his life and died in 1861. Lacordaire's sermons at Notre Dame have been published under the title of Conférences de Notre Dame de Paris, 1835–50. In 1858 he wrote a series of Letters to a Young Friend. Many of his sermons have been translated into English.

Lactantius, Licius Callius Firmianus. — A Christian apologist of great eloquence who lived at the end of the third and beginning of the fourth century. The country of his birth is disputed, some writers saying that he was a native of Africa, and others that he was born at Firmo in Italy. He was very famous as a scholar, and became the tutor of Crispus, the son of Constantine, while his eloquence gained him the name of the Christian Cicero. He was the author of several theological works, of which the principal are his Institutions and his treatise on The Death of Persecutors, intended to show that persecutors of the Church visibly fall under the judgments of God. His works are translated in Clarke's Ante-Nicene Library.

Lacticinia [lit. "dishes made of milk"]. — A name applied to milk, butter, cheese, and in which also eggs are included, by the Canons of the Church. These kinds of food are forbidden on fast days in the Eastern Church, and in some cases in the Church of Rome, but the rules in this case are made known by pastoralis. They vary from time to time, climate and other circumstances being taken into account.

Lady Chapel. — A chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, attached to cathedrals and large churches, generally at the eastern extremity.

Lady Day. — The Feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary [March 25th].

Lætare Sunday. [SUNDAY.] Lainez, James, was born in Castile in 1512. He studied at Alcuba, and then went to Paris, where he met with Ignatius Loyola, and formed one of the party who founded the order of the Jesuits [q.v.], and he, in 1557, succeeded Loyola as the leader. He exercised a great influence over the Roman Catholic Church by his activity at the Council of Trent, and strongly opposed those who wished to modify the doctrines of justification in favour of Lutheran views, and the supremacy of Papal power. Lainez did a great deal among the Jesuits to promote education, intrigue, and the inordinate ambition which the Society afterwards showed. He died at Rome in 1565.

Laity. — The people as distinguished from the clergy. While the whole body of Christian people are called by St. Peter a holy priesthood and a royal priesthood, and St. John describes them as "made" by the Saviour "kings and priests unto God the Father," as all possessing a spiritual character and spiritual privilege by virtue of their incorporation into the Church of Christ,—the distinction between clergy, the ordained ministers, and laity, who held no spiritual office, has existed from a very early period in the Christian Church. Whether or not it has existed from the very first is one of the points in dispute between Episcopalian (and some others) and those who hold other views respecting Church constitution and government. It is derived, no doubt, from the Jewish Church. In Ex. xix. 24 and Is. xxiv. 2 the Septuagint has λαός, as denoting the people in contradistinction to the priests, and St. Clement of Rome, writing in the first century, uses the same distinction. The elders whom St. Peter exhorts not to lord it over God's heritage (τον κληρον), were in this view, in the more restricted usage of the term, the clergy (κληρον). Wherever a congregation was formed with a regular ministry, some distinction would immediately arise. The laity, then, were those who were not set apart by authority for the discharge of any ministerial office: the clergy comprehended not only the orders of bishops, priests, and deacons, but, beside these, and, occasionally in distinction to these, the inferior orders of readers, acolytes, etc. But, though the laity have not ministerial office, there is no church which is not composed of laity as well as clergy, and the laity have their duties to the whole body, not less than have the clergy. Few phrases are more misleading and more meaningless than those of "entering the Church," or "taking up the Church as a profession," when used as equivalent to "being ordained"; ignoring as they do both the rights and the responsibilities of the laity, as very members incorporated in the mystical body of Christ.

The early Fathers generally adopted the Septuagint word, λαός, or people, to describe the general congregation. Origen uses the word ἄθικοι, "private men," i.e., not acting, like the clergy, in a public capacity. No man was accounted a complete layman unless he was in full communion with the Church. To distinguish such from the catechumens, the laity were called ἱεραπόται, or "the faithful." In like manner excommunicated persons, lunatics, and schismatics were not recognised among the Christian laity. To be in full communion with the Church meant, and still means, "a right to participate with the faithful in all holy offices, and especially in the Holy Eucharist, which was "the consumption of all," (το τελειον), and without which a man was only an imperfect Christian, and in an incomplete state." [Bingham.]

From the earliest times in the history of the Christian Church we have instances of devout and educated laymen assisting the clergy in building up Christ's Kingdom. In the Acts of the Apostles there are traces of this in viii. 4 and xviii. 25. Again there is the celebrated case of Origen, who, while still a layman, was asked to preach in the churches, and his conduct was defended on the ground that Christian bishops had already sanctioned the custom in previous instances. Again, the Fourth Council of Carthage, in 436 sanctioned lay-preaching in the following decree: "Let no layman dare to teach in the presence of clergy, except at their request." Moreover, Socrates, an early ecclesiastical historian, tells of two laymen, Frumentius and Aedesius, who, being carried captive into India, converted the nation; and again, how that the Iberians were first converted by a captive woman, who made the King and Queen of the nation preachers of the gospel to their people. Laymen also had an important part in the election of their clergy, but, while they possessed this right, they themselves were subject to ecclesiastical discipline, and were responsible to the ecclesiastical authorities for the way in which they exercised their power. In course of time both the rights of the laity, and Church discipline over them, have sunk into abeyance. It will, indeed, difficult to restore the one without the other, since, according to all ecclesiastical ideas, the laity, like the clergy, must be responsible to some higher power for the way in which they exercise any trust.

During the period when education was confined almost solely to the clergy, the number of laymen assisting the clergy in spiritual work would naturally be small; but as education spread, so the number of devout laymen qualified and willing to give the services to the Church increased greatly. In the Church of England many of the most devout and active members have laboured as laymen, e.g., John Evelyn, Robert Nelson, William Wilberforce, John Howard, Henry Hoare, and many another. Many posts of great importance are held by laymen, such as: Chancellors and Officials—Principal of Dioceses. As churchwardens, laymen may render most valuable assistance to the clergy by carrying on Church-work. In past ages the Church of England has been somewhat backward in availing herself of the service of her lay members, but now the tendency is to give to them an increasing share in the management of Church affairs. The laity are invited to consult with the clergy in Parochial Councils and in Diocesan Conferences; and a House of Laymen of the Province of Canterbury has been organised and assembled, in order to consult with Convocation itself: an account of this will be given later on. In the work of evangelisation much valuable help has been given by such societies of laymen as the "Lei Helpers" and the "Church of England Working Men." Without such help it would quite impossible for the present number of clergy to reach the great masses in our large cities, or to minister to the scattered country population. Laymen, too, have taken a most active and necessary part in all missionary and charitable works, both at home and abroad. But while all are agreed that the active sympathy and co-operation of the laity are most important and necessary for the welfare of the Church, yet there are some difficulties and necessities for caution in devising any new arrangements. A heavy responsibility is laid upon each clergyman at his ordination; and he cannot transfer this from his own shoulders to any layman, nor give a layman an independent theological post in his parish. The absence of all ecclesiastical control over the laity, already referred to, is another difficulty in the way. Thus, while the principle of giving a voice to the laity in the management of the Church has been tried in Ireland, in America, and in our Colonies, it has not been with altogether satisfactory results. Attempts have been made recently by the Church Boards Bill, and similar means, to give the management of Church affairs entirely into the hands of the ratepayers, subject only to the veto of the Bishop. Such attempts are based on the principle that the Church ought to represent the religious opinions of the majority. But the Church rather represents the truth of God as revealed and handed down from the first, and it is the duty of the Church to set forth and represent this Divine truth, and not the ever-varying opinions of fallible men. If, then, here be any truth or reality in the Divine commission of the clergy, the truth would seem to be that they cannot delegate this or set it aside, however much they need and value the active help of all laymen, in order to exercise their commission effectually. Lay preaching has been adopted widely in mission-rooms, and even in some churches, and the result has, we believe, given much satisfaction to all those who have tried the experiment. The late Archbishop Tait led the way in drawing up a form of service for the Institution of Lay Readers, and his example has been generally followed. One of these laymen was invited by the minister of his parish to assist at the Holy Communion by ministering the cup; but it is doubtful whether such an invitation was legal, and the prevailing opinion among the clergy is that lay ministers should be confined to unseated buildings. The House of Laymen is the latest advance in the direction of more directly representing lay views and interests in the public affairs of the Church. The project of such a house was first mentioned in Convocation in 1857; the subject was discussed from time to time, but the house was not fully constituted till 1886, when it met for the first time under the chairmanship of Lord Selborne. The Archbishop of Canterbury, in an address at their first meeting, said: "It is specially in regard to our most serviceable organizations, and to those legislative needs which have necessarily increased in proportion to the activity of the Church's vital and spiritual energies, that the desire for lay counsel has been manifested." The rules passed by Convocation, and which govern the House of Laymen, are as follows:—

1. That it is desirable that the House of Laymen, being communicants of the Church of England, be formed for the Province of Canterbury, to confer with Convocation.

2. That the members of the House of Laymen be appointed by the Lay Members of the Diocesan Conferences of the Province, and that they continue to hold their seats until the dissolution of Convocation.

3. That ten members be appointed for the Diocese of London; six for each of the Dioceses of Winchester, Rochester, Lichfield, and Worcester; and four for each of the remaining dioceses.

4. That, in addition to members, not exceeding ten, be appointed by his Grace the President.

5. That the House of Laymen be in all cases convened by his Grace the President.

6. That the said House be convened only, and sit only, during the time that Convocation is in session, and be opened by his Grace the President.

7. That the said House may be requested by his Grace the President to confer with Convocation upon such occasions, and at such place as his Grace the President may think fit.

8. That his Grace the President, in opening the House of Laymen, or at any other time at their session, may lay before them any subject on which he desires their counsel, and that the results of all the deliberations of the said House on any subjects, whether thus referred to them or originated by themselves, be communicated to the President.

9. That the subjects on which the House of Laymen may be consulted shall be subjects which ordinarily occupy the attention of Convocation, saving only the definition or the interpretation of the faith of the Church of England: but that in all matters requiring legislation by statute the opinion of the said House shall be taken previous to the application to Parliament.

Lama.—The name given to the Buddhist priests in Tartary, and especially to the Dalai-Lama, or priest of priests, who has full authority over the rest of the priesthood, and is regarded by them as a deity. He lives retired from the world, and is never seen except in one of the rooms of his palace, where the people come to worship him, though they are not allowed to approach him even to kiss his feet. The people are taught to believe that he was raised up from death and hell hundreds of years ago, and that he will live for ever. In order to keep up this illusion they conceal the fact of his death, and another Lama is secretly chosen to take his place. The lower order of priests in Tartary form about one-third of the population, and are under oaths of celibacy. They are partly supported by lands and revenues granted to them by the Government and by the offerings of pilgrims, but most of them are also engaged in some trade for the means of gaining their livelihood, and they are also the only physicians in the country. The Lamas excel in painting and sculpture, with which they adorn the walls of their temples.
Lambert, St., was born at Maestricht in the middle of the seventh century of a noble family who had been Christians for many generations. He was well instructed, and his education was perfected by Theodard, the Bishop, upon whose murder Lambert was called upon to fill the see in 670 with the approval of the King, Childeric II. In 673 Childeric was murdered, and Lambert, as one of his adherents, was ejected from his see, and retired to the monastery of Stavelo, where he remained for seven years. At the end of that time he was recalled to Maestricht by Pepin of Herstal, mayor of the palace. Some time after, hearing that the inhabitants of Zealand, called Jaxandri, were still idolaters, he went there and converted many to the Christian faith. St. Lambert was murdered on Sept. 17th, 608 or 609. Two accounts are given of the cause. One is that two brothers, Gallus and Rioddus, entered and plundered the church at Maestricht, which so enraged some of the Bishop’s relations that they murdered the intruders. Upon this Dodo, a powerful officer under Pepin and a relation to the brothers, gathered together a large force, and killed Lambert and his disciples at Liège. Others say that he was destroyed for having remonstrated with Pepin for living with a concubine, Alpäis. His body was brought to Maestricht, and buried in St. Peter’s, where many miracles are said to have been performed. His successor, St. Hubert, removed his remains to Liège [721], where a church was built to receive them.

Lambeth Articles.—These were nine short statements, or heads of doctrine, conceived from the Calvinistic point of view, which were drawn up at a conference held at Lambeth Palace in Nov., 1595. With a view to settle a controversy which was causing much disturbance in the University of Cambridge, Archbishop Whitgift invited some of the Heads of Houses to confer with him, and these articles were put forth with his sanction. But they were never of any authority, and are of no value except to show what were the tenets of the Calvinistic party at that time.

Lambeth Conference.—The trial and condemnation of Bishop Colenso in 1866 [Colenso] had very important results on the status of the Colonial Churches. For he appealed against this condemnation to the Privy Council, and the decision given was that the letters-patent by which the Bishop of Capetown claimed authority over him were of no power; that the Crown had no power to give such letters-patent, except with the sanction of the Legislature of the State where the Bishop resided. Consequently the Colonial Churches were placed on the footing of other voluntary religious bodies. One of the Colonial bishops, Dr. Lewis, Bishop of Ontario, then put forth the suggestion that the Archbishop of Canterbury should invite the bishops of the Anglican communion in all parts of the world, including those of the Scottish and American Churches, to meet for brotherly counsel. After conferring with his brethren, the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Longley, resolved to issue his invitations, and a large number of bishops accepted it. There were some who stood aloof, as the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Peterborough, and a few others. The Bishop of St. David’s consented on condition that the Colenso case should not be discussed. The conference assembled Sept. 24th, 1867. The proceeding commenced with Holy Communion, at which the Archbishop was the celebrant, and Dr. Whitehouse, the Bishop of Illinois, the preacher. Three archbishops, twenty-six bishops of the United Kingdom, twenty-four Colonial bishops, and twenty-three American bishops attended, and the first step was to issue a pastoral address to churchmen all over the world, a document pronounced by Cardinal Manning to be the most important manifesto produced by the Church of England since the Reformation. The address was written by Bishop Wilberforce, and approved by the body, with very few alterations. The discussion were in private, but the notes are preserved in Lambeth Library, and were, after some time, printed in the Guardian newspaper. Some general resolutions were drawn up and published in a pamphlet by Archbishop Longley. The Conference lasted four days. In 1878 Archbishop Tait was called upon by influential members of the Church to invite a second conference. Exactly 10 bishops met at Lambeth on Tuesday, Jul 2nd: thirty-five English, nine Irish, seven Scottish, thirty Colonial, and nineteen Americans. The conference lasted four days, an was then adjourned to Monday, July 22nd, the intervening time being occupied with committees held at Lambeth, London House, and Farnham. At noon on July 22nd the conference again assembled, and held deliberations till the following day. On Saturday the 27th the proceedings were closed by a stately service in St. Paul’s Cathedral, with a solemn Te Deum and celebration, at which upwards of ninety bishops were present.

The Conferences did much to promote brotherly feeling between the English-speaking races, and will probably be repeated at due intervals.

Lambeth Degrees.—Degrees conferred by the Archbishop of Canterbury. This is the right belonging to him since the days of Henry VIII., and was given to him when the like right was taken away from the Pope. In the words addressed by the Archbishop: the receivers of degrees we have: “Where the Archbishops of Canterbury, enabled by the public authority of the law, do enjoy, at long have enjoyed, the power of conferri degrees and titles of honour upon well desiring men, as by an authentic book of Taxations of Faculties, confirmed by authority of Parliament, doth more fully appear; we therefore, being vested with the authority aforesaid, and following the example of our predecessors, have judged it expedient, in consideration of your proficiency in study, uprightness of life, sound doctrine, and purity of morals, that you be dignified with the degree of [A.D.], and we do by these presents, so far as in us lies and the laws of the realm do allow, accordingly create [Here a chaplain invests the candidate, still kneeling, with the hood of the degree (which by custom is that of the University to which the Archbishop himself belongs), and if the degree to be conferred be the Doctorate, the Archbishop here places the cap on the head of the candidate and removes it again] you an actual [M.A., Doctor, etc.], and we do also admit [Here the Archbishop takes between his hands both the hands of the candidate] you into the number of the [Master of Arts, Doctors, etc.] of this realm." The candidate then stands up, and the Registrar reads the following proviso: "Provided also that these presents do not avail you anything unless duly confirmed by the Queen's Letters-Patent." The degrees thus conferred are, first, M.A., which—though formerly it was not so—is only given after a strict examination. (This rule was laid down by Archbishop Tait, and is followed by his successor.) Other degrees, B.D., D.D., D.C.L., and LL.D.; Mus. Doc. and M.D., are conferred for some special and acknowledged merit or public service. The fees for the letters-patent range, according to the degree, from about £40 to £100.

Lami, Bernard, priest of the Congregation of the Oratory, was born at Mans in 1640. He gave early promise of a great genius for learning, was a considerable linguist, and a good mathematician, philological critic, and philosopher. He taught philosophy at Saumur and Angers, but, making enemies among the Aristotelians by his leanings to the Cartesian, he was banished to Grenoble, where he gave divinity lectures. He was recalled to Paris in 1656; was re-established, and finally settled at Rouen, where he died in 1715. His first works were upon scientific and mathematical subjects. In 1696 appeared his Apparatus, or Introduction to the Bible, published in Latin and French, and, soon after, the Harmony, or Agreement of the Four Evangelists, which occasioned a great deal of controversy, and caused Lami to reply by a commentary on the Harmony. He also wrote a work on the Temple of Jerusalem, and A Demonstration of the Truth and Holiness of the Christian Rules of Morality.

Lami, Francis, a Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur, was bred to a military profession, and served in the French king's army. But afterwards, being weary of that way of living, he turned Benedictine. He had a wonderful genius, was a man of great piety, and went through all the stages of monastic discipline. By his application to study he became an excellent philosopher, a polished writer, and very skilful in his judgments upon the many phases of the mind. He published five volumes concerning the knowledge of one's self; a tract of the Truth of the Christian Religion, Modern Atheism Overthrown, Pious Reflections upon a Monastic Life, Lectures upon Wisdom, a collection of Letters upon Theological and Moral Subjects, The Unbeliever Concluded to Religion by Reason, Philosophical Letters upon Divers Subjects; a tract against eloquence, entitled The Rhetoric of the College betrayed by its Apologist; and, lastly, A Discourse concerning the Knowledge and Love of God. He died at St. Denis in April, 1711.

Lammas Day.—The most probable explanation of this name for August 1st is that which derives it from Hlammas or Loaf-mass, it having been customary to offer at the mass bread made of the new corn. Its coincidence with the feast of St. Peter's chains, or "St. Peter in letters" in the Romish Church, gave rise to the popular derivation of Lammas, St. Peter being regarded as the patron of lambs; an idea originating in the Saviour's commission to him "Feed my lambs."

Lamennais, Hugues Félicité Robert de, the son of a shipowner, was born at St. Malo in 1782. He received his first lessons from his elder brother, and then continued his studies alone; but in spite of all disadvantages he was able to read Livy and Plutarch when only twelve years of age. In 1794 he went to live with an uncle, and used to spend whole days in reading Rousseau, Malebranche, and other similar writers, which served to ripen his judgment and develop his religious fervour. He entered the Seminary of St. Malo as teacher of mathematics in 1807, received the tonsure in 1811, and five years later was ordained priest. He went to Paris in 1814, where he published an attack on Napoleon I., on account of which he had to leave France during the Hundred Days. He came to England, and was usher in a school kept by the Abbé Caron near London. In 1817 appeared the first volume of his Essay on Independence in Religious Matters, which made a great impression. It contains a denunciation of all compromise in matters of faith, and denounced Gallicanism, but adhered to the orthodox standard of Christianity, and upheld clerical authority in preference to private judgment. It brought about a revival all over France, and gave great support to the Ultramontanists. When Lamennais visited Rome in 1824 he was cordially welcomed by Pope Leo XII., who offered him a cardinal's hat, which he refused. Two years later appeared Religion Considered in its Relation to Civil and Political Order, which was almost revolutionary in tone, and the author was fined for it by the Cour Correctionnelle. The revolution of 1830 was the occasion of his declaring the people’s supremacy in matters of State, and he pointed out the temporal abuses of the Church while retaining his reverence for her spiritual authority. In September of the same year he started a journal named L’Avenir, of which the motto was “God and Liberty.” Among the contributors were the Abbé Lacordaire, M. de Montalembert, the Abbé Gerbert, Victor Hugo, and others, who had all adopted Lamennais’s opinions and spread them all over France. The paper did not last long, for the Jesuits and others took alarm at it, and, after it had been published a year, it was suspended by the Pope. Lamennais went to Rome to state his views, and to ask for a recall of the sentence. His wish was complied with; but in Sept. 28th, 1832, an encyclical letter was published condemning the liberty of the press in terms which implied a censure of the journal. Lamennais submitted and suppressed it, but in 1834 appeared his Words of a Believer, which finally severed his bond with the Church. The revolutionary party applauded him for his independence, and the book ran through eight editions in a few months. He died twenty years after, forgotten, unreconciled to the Church, and allied to the extreme Republicans. Among other works are The Affairs of Rome [1836]; The People’s Book [1837]; The Country and Government [1840], for which he was imprisoned for a year; A Voice from Prison [1848]; Sketch of a Philosopher [1840-46], etc.

Lamps were in symbolic use in the early Church. Thus they are found in the tombs in the Catacombs, probably having been placed there in symbolism of faith in the resurrection to life. In the Roman Catholic Church a lamp is always kept burning before the Reserved Sacrament in churches, the oil of which must be of olive, unless the bishop give leave for other oil to be used, and the alternative must never be mineral oil except in cases of absolute necessity.

Lance, The Holy.—According to early tradition, the lance which was presented by Rudolph of Burgundy to Henry I. of Germany was made out of the nails which were used to fasten Christ to the Cross, while in a later tradition it is said to be the spear with which His side was pierced. Innocent VI. established a feast in its honour in 1354. Another lance, discovered by the Empress Helena, was found at Antioch in 1093, and the sight of it much encouraged the crusaders. The iron with which it was inlaid was brought to Rome under Innocent VIII. and preserved in the Vatican.

In the Greek Church the name “holy lance” is given to the knife used to pierce the bread of the Eucharist.

Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born of a high family of Pavia, in 1005, studied law at that university and others in Italy, and practised with great success. It is supposed that in unsettled times his family was exiled. About 1039 he founded a school at Avranches, which gained distinction from his great capacity for teaching, and the culture of Greek literature. His thoughts, however, being turned to religion, he retired to Herluin’s Benedictine establishment at Bec in 1042. Though unlearned, Herluin won Lanfranc’s lifelong affection by his great piety. Lanfranc became teacher and, in 1046, prior of the monastery, Anselm being one of his pupils. By denouncing the Duke of Normandy’s marriage with Matilda of Flanders, Lanfranc incurred his anger; but it was turned into favour by Lanfranc’s spirit in requesting a nimmer beast than the sole and sorry horse of his community, on which to fulfil the Duke’s command of quitting the country. He went to Rome to obtain a dispensation for the Duke’s marriage, and was present at the Council held there in 1059, at which he disputed with Berengarius, who denied Transubstantiation. In 1066 Lanfranc reluctantly became Abbot of St. Stephen’s Abbey, Caen, refused the Archbishopric of Rouen in 1067, and was only under great pressure consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, amidst the ruins of its cathedral, on August 29th, 1070. Having secured his status by receiving the pallium at Rome, Lanfranc obtained a decree by which Church property was to be restored, and which enabled a lawsuit to be brought against Odo, the King’s brother. The cause was argued three days on Penenden Heath, and judgment given for the Archbishop. In 1076 he rebuilt Canterbury Cathedral, and in 1077 attached to it a Benedictine monastery. Lanfranc adjusted in 1079, the relations of the Sees of York and Dublin to the See of Canterbury, by claiming their canonical obedience to the Primate, while he supported the Royal Supremacy over the Church, and its independence of Rome, encouraging the King in his refusal of homage to the Pope. Six Councils were held from 1072 to 1086, which pronounced on points of spiritual, precedence, simony, and celibacy, the ruling on the last-named being that no prebendary should be married, and that, while those priests already married should not be obliged to part with their wives, those that were single should continue so, and that if future no person should be ordained till the had first promised not to marry. In conformity with the canons of the Laodician and Sarдинian Councils, prohibiting bishops’ sees in small towns, that of Lichfield was removed to Chester, Selsey to Chichester, Elmham t Thetford, Sherborn and Ramsbury to Old Sarum, all in 1075; Wells to Bath, 1088; Dorchester to Lincoln, 1095. The Use of Salisbury, compiled by Osmund, was sanctioned.
by the Archbishop, 1085. He also devised the separation of the civil and ecclesiastical courts [1085]. Lanfranc died, May 24th, 1089, of a fever, at the monastery, Canterbury, and was buried in the cathedral. Among his writings are, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini Nostri, a defence of Transubstantiation against Berengarius’ teaching, published by Dom Luc d’Achery, 1647, with Lanfranc’s Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul, Notes upon some Conferences of Cassian, A Book of Letters, etc. His Decreta pro ordine Benedicti is an adaptation of the Benedictine rule to the circumstances of his new monastery at Canterbury.

Langton, Joachim, a German Pietist, was born in Altmark in 1670. After studying at Quefflingen and Magdeburg, he went to Leipsic, where he met Francke [q.v.], whom he accompanied to Erfurt and Halle. He went to Berlin in 1693, and in 1709 became Professor of Theology at Halle, and died there in 1744. Lange is the author of several works, many of them controversial. While disputing with Löschner he wrote the Idea of Pseudo-orthodox Theology, Sincere News, Might, Middle Path, etc.; and against the philosopher Wolff, The Cause of God, A Modest Enquiry, etc.

Langton, Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury.—His birthplace is claimed by Lincolnshire (from the existence of Langton, near Spilsby), by Devonshire, and by Sussex. His parents, described as “fideles et devoti,” were possibly of the Yorkshire family of that name. Stephen studied at the University of Paris, gaining distinction for his learning, and becoming its chancellor, in power if not in name. At this time began his intimacy with Lorthario Conti, who, on his election as Pope Innocent III. in 1198, sent for Langton, and entrusted him with literary and political matters. In 1203, on the death of Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, a complication arose from rival nominations by King John and the monks of Canterbury. Each party referred the matter to Rome. Innocent caused Langton, now a Cardinal, to be elected [December, 1206], a step in accordance both with his scheme of securing the ascendency of Rome over foreign Churches, and also with his appreciation of virtue and talent. His appointment was resented by the King; and on his consecration by the Pope at Viterbo [June 17th, 1207], John expelled the Chapter of Canterbury, who had acquiesced in the election. A meeting between the King and Langton at Winchester failing to produce a reconciliation, Innocent laid an interdict on the country. Langton retired to Pontigny for six years, occupying himself with literary pursuits. During this period the King held unsuccessful negotiations with the Papal envoys and with Langton, was excommunicated and threatened with a crusade, and finally yielded, even consenting to be a vassal of the See of Rome. Archbishop Langton was sent for, when he absolved the King at Winchester and celebrated the Eucharist. Langton found two tyrannies dominant—the nobles and people oppressed by the King, and the rights of the Church usurped by the Papal Legate. His work now was to obtain freedom from both, and he showed singular independence in risking censure from Rome. Organising with great courage and wisdom the barons’ struggle for freedom, he forced upon the King the revival of the “Laws of the Confessor” and of Henry I. as embodied in the great Charter, signed June 15th, 1215. Innocent avenged this humiliation of his vassal by revoking the Magna Charta and suspending Langton, who, the same year, attended, as Cardinal, the fourth Lateran Council, hoping to make his case heard, but was coldly received by the Pope, and detained as a state prisoner. King John and Pope Innocent died in 1216. In 1218 Langton returned to England, further secured the recognition of the Charter, and eventually procured the recall of the Legate. In 1220 the Archbishop recrowned the young King Henry III., and caused the remains of Thomas à Becket to be translated from the crypt to a costly shrine in Canterbury Cathedral. A Council was held by him in 1222 at Osney, near Oxford, at which important canons were passed; and at another, at Westminster, 1226 an attempt made by the Pope to obtain certain prebends for the Church of Rome was defeated. Langton welcomed the Dominican and Franciscan Friars as missionaries to the wretched and criminal settlers in towns. His last years were passed in retirement at the Manor House of Siondon, in Sussex, his brother Simon, whom he had appointed Archdeacon of Canterbury, acting for him. The Archbishop died July 9th, 1228. That he was deeply read in the Bible is shown by his commentaries on Old Testament books, while his writings include, as subjects, a life of Richard I.; a Canticle on our Lord’s passion: a sermon on the Holy Virgin; and two other pieces said to be in the Duke of Norfolk’s library. One of the earliest Norman-French miracle plays, a Life of Mahomet, and a Life of Becket, are attributed to him. A list of his works is given by Cave, Hist. Lit., p. 703.

Laodicea, Council of.—The date of the Synod of Laodicea is uncertain. It has been thought by some to have been prior to that of Nicea, but it has now been proved to have taken place later than 344 A.D., probably about 363. It is said to have been summoned in order that the clergy of Lydia and Phrygia might meet together to censure some who were reviving the Homousian controversy, and to choose men of approved faith for the episcopate. They agreed upon sixty canons, which are still extant. The last of these contains a catalogue of the books of Holy Scripture, and this document is of great importance in the history of the Canon of Scripture. It omits the Old Testament Apocrypha. [See Westcott on the Canon.]

Lapse.—In the Church of England, if the patron does not present a clergyman to a benefice within six months of its falling vacant, the patronage lapses to the bishop; if he fails to present in six months, it further lapses to the archbishop; and six months afterward to the Crown. Thus if the archbishop be the patron, the sovereign can present six months after the first vacancy.

Lapsed.—Those who in time of persecution denied the faith. Such on their repentance were received back into the congregation, and it was held a grievous offence on the part of the clergy if they refused to receive and reconcile the penitent. But though reconciled, they were excluded from all ecclesiastical power and government, and remained classed among "the penitents." They could not be ordained, or, if they lapsed after ordination, they were not suffered to resume their office on their reconciliation. Some exceptions, however, were probably made to this strict rule, when it was deemed to be to the interest of the Church that it should be suspended.

Lardner, Nathaniel, an eminent English critic, was born at Hawkhurst, in Kent, in 1684. He belonged to a body of English Presbyterians who had become Unitarians. In early life he was a pupil of Dr. Joshua Oldfield, a Unitarian minister of eminence. Lardner spent more than three years at Utrecht, where he studied under Graevius and Burmann, and was then some time at Leyden. He returned to England in 1703, and continued his theological studies, but did not begin to preach till he was twenty-five. He became private chaplain to Lady Ireby, whom he accompanied to the Netherlands, and remained with her till her death in 1729. He then became lecturer at the chapel in Old Jewry, and died in 1768. Lardner was not a popular preacher, being defective in his eloquence and lacking the power to modulate his voice, on account of his deafness. But his Credibility of the Gospel History and his Jewish and Heathen Testimonies have gained him a place among the ablest apologists for Christianity that we have.

Lasco, John A., or Jan Laski, was born at Warsaw in 1499. He was the younger son of a noble Polish family, and was educated for the Church. He visited Louvain, Zürich, and Basle, where he resided with Erasmus, and on his return to Poland was promoted; but in 1536 he was offered the See of Cujavia, which he refused, stating that he agreed with the Reformers. He went to Friesland, where he founded and consolidated a Reformed Church; but on the introduction of the Interim there in 1549 he was compelled to seek shelter in England. Edward VI. appointed him Superintendent of the Congregations of Foreign Protestants (German, Belgian, French and Italian) in London, and the Church of St. Augustine's Monastery in Austin Friars, now the Dutch Church, was granted to him, and permission to use his own ceremonies. He published in Latin the service used by his Church, and this service contains a form of confession and absolution from which some phrases were added to the second Prayer Book of Edward VI. On the accession of Queen Mary, Lasco was obliged to leave England with his congregation, and after many hardships they arrived at Emden in 1554; but just as they were preparing to settle down, Lasco was re-called to his country, King Sigismund being favourable to the Reformation. He was appointed in 1556 Superintendent of the Reformed Congregations of Little Poland, and died there in 1560. The Bible was translated into Polish under his supervision.

Last Things, The Four.—Death, judgment, heaven, hell. [Eschatology.]

Lateran, St. John of.—The chief basilica of Rome, so-called from the name of Lateranus, who was put to death by Nero, and to whom the site formerly belonged. The palace belonging to it was given to the Pope by the Emperor Constantine, and was rebuilt by Sixtus V. Constantine built the basilica, adorned it richly, and gave large endowments for the maintenance of its clergy. It was rebuilt by Pope Innocent X.

The Lateran Councils were so called from being held in this church. The first of these (or Ninth General Council) was held in March, 1123, and dealt principally with the subject of investiture, in which it followed the decree of the Concordat of Worms. Twenty-two canons were drawn up by this Council; one of these forbade simony, and others forbade the marriages of the higher orders of priests.

The Second Lateran Council, held in April, 1139, was attended by 1,000 bishops, whom Pope Innocent II. had assembled to confute the doctrines of Arnold of Brescia. It put forth thirty canons: the first against lay-investitures; the second and ninth about excommunications; the fourth concerning ecclesiastical habits; the sixth against immoral priests; the seventh forbids the hearing of masses said by such; the eighth restrains priests and monks from exercising the professions of law and physic; the tenth is against laymen who take tithes; the thirteenth against usurers, whom it deprives of Christian burial; the fourteenth imposes a like punishment on those who fight only to show their bravery; the fifteenth excommunicates the strikers of priests; the seventeenth forbids marriages of near kindred; the twenty-first excludes the children of priests from the priesthood; the twenty-third is against Arnold of Brescia and his followers; the twenty-ninth against those who made warlike instruments for the infidels.

The Third Lateran Council was held by Pope Alexander III. in 1179 for the purpose of opposing the Emperor Frederick I., who had set up three Anti-Popes in opposition to the Popes of Rome. It was designed also to condemn the opinions of the Albigenses, or Cathari. It issued twenty-seven canons: the first concerns the election of the popes of Rome; the second revokes the ordination of anti-popes; the third regulates the age of bishops, curates, and archdeacons; he fifth prescribes that no clerk be ordained without a title to some benefice; the sixth orders prelates to give notice before excommunication, and forbids friars to appeal from the sentence of the chapter or their superior; he eighth forbids the expectation of benefices; the eleventh is against immoral clergy; the twelfth forbids meddling with temporal affairs; the thirteenth and fourteenth are against pluralities; the fifteenth orders that Church goods may only be employed for the use of the Church; the sixteenth regulates the resolutions of chapters; the eighteenth orders the erecting of preoccupatorial prebends in cathedrals; the nineteenth excommunicates secular powers that pretend to have a right over the Church; the twentieth forbids tournaments; the twenty-fourth forbids furnishing the infidels with arms; the twenty-fifth prohibits the giving of the communion to public assured; the twenty-sixth forbids Christians to live with Jews, Saracens, etc.; the twenty-seventh excommunicates the Cathari, Pateines, and other so-called heretics, and prelates with a like sentence those who defend or harbor them.

The Fourth General Lateran Council (called The Great because of the vast number of prelates who assisted at it) was convened by Pope Innocent III. in 1215. The Patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem assisted in person, and those of Alexandria and Antioch sent deputees, and besides them there were seventye-one archbishops, and 340 bishops, and above 300 abbots and priors, as well as ambassadors from most of the sovereign princes. The most important of the seventy chapters in which the decisions of the Council were formulated are as follows: the first approves the term "transubstantiation;" the second condemns the errors of the Abbot Joachim; he third to the ninth treat of the way of cutting out heretics, forbid preaching without the approval, and regulate the Inquisition; the seventh orders the establishment of prebends or scholars and divines; the twelfth orders the reformation of the religious orders, while the thirteenth forbids the founding of any new ones; the fourteenth is against the immorality of the clergy; the fifteenth ordains punishment to those wanting in sobriety, and the sixteenth regulates their life and behaviour; the seventeenth respects the divine office; the nineteenth forbids the exposing of profane household stuff or furniture in the churches; the twenty-first commands all persons to confess at least once a year to their curate, and to communicate at the feast of Easter; the twenty-second orders physicians to make their patients send for confessors; the twenty-fourth speaks of elections; the twenty-fifth and following are about election to benefices; the twenty-ninth forbids pluralities; the thirtieth hinders the sons of canons from succeeding to their father's benefices; the thirty-second and thirty-third are about the stipend of curates; the thirty-sixth is concerning appeals; the forty-sixth, concerning ecclesiastical privileges; the fiftieth and fifty-first, about marriages; the sixty-first forbids to expose lightly the relics of the saints; the sixty-fourth is against regulars who accept money for receiving persons into any religious order; the sixty-seventh and sixty-eighth are against the usury of the Jews.

The Fifth Lateran Council, though it lasted from 1512 to 1518, is not of great importance, as it was held chiefly in opposition to the Council of Pisa, which had been summoned under the joint auspices of Louis XII. of France and the Emperor Maximilian, to curb the ambition of Pope Julius II. His countermove was to summon a Council at the Lateran which annulled the decrees of Pisa. His death took place whilst the Council was sitting, but his successor, Leo X., took care that it should effect no ecclesiastical reforms.

Latimer, John, an eminent bishop and Protestant martyr, was born at Thurcaston, near Leicester, about 1490, the son of a yeoman. He was educated at the school of his native place till the age of fourteen, when he was entered at the University of Cambridge, where he took his M. A. degree in 1514, being afterwards ordained at Lincoln. At first he was a zealous supporter of the Roman Catholic faith, in which he had been brought up, and argued for it on the occasion of taking his B.D. degree in 1524; but Thomas Bilney going afterwards to his room and discussing with him in private convinced him of the truth of the doctrines of the Reformers, and he gradually accepted them. In the dispute concerning the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Aragon, Latimer took an active part on the side of the King, which was rewarded by his being made one of his chaplains, and appointed soon after to a living in Wiltshire. Other controversies in which he took part ended less happily, and he succeeded, by his outspoken plainness, in making numerous enemies. The Bishop of Ely was so displeased at a sermon he heard, that he forbade the Reformer to preach again at the University, and complained to Cardinal Wolsey on the subject.
Wolsey examined Latimer privately, and gave him full sanction to preach as he liked. He so exercised this privilege that he became the most celebrated preacher of his day, and his Sermons have retained their position among English classics, marvellous in their clearness and homeliness of expression. He was appointed in 1535 to the Bishopric of Worcester, which had been hitherto much neglected, so that the clergy there were more ignorant than in any other part of England, and Latimer devoted all his energies to effecting a reform of such a state of affairs, in spite of the opposition his efforts met with both within the diocese and at Court. In 1539 the King published the Act of the Six Articles, which enforced belief in Transubstantiation and other doctrines of the Romish Church. Latimer had come to London to obtain medical advice, and he now took the opportunity of publicly disclaiming his assent to the Six Articles. Immediately afterwards he and the Bishop of Salisbury resigned their sees, and, through the influence of Bishop Gardiner, Latimer was imprisoned for a short time in the house of the Bishop of Chichester. After being released he lived in obscurity, forbidden to preach, or to come within a few miles of London or of his old diocese, and in 1546 he was sent to the Tower, where he remained till the accession of Edward VI. With the opening of King Edward's reign Latimer began to preach again, refusing to accept his old bishopric, since he felt that his true mission was as a preacher. People crowded to the churches to hear him, and he often preached before the King, who was much under his influence. In 1553 King Edward died, and Latimer was again sent to the Tower, and was brought to trial to answer to various accusations of heresy. He was burnt at Oxford with Bishop Ridley, on 16th October, 1555.

Latin Church. [Rome, Church of.]

Latin Gate, St. John before the, [S. Ioannes Ecan. ante Port. Lat.].—A festival celebrated on May 6th, the anniversary of the supposed deliverance of St. John the Evangelist from martyrdom. It is related by Tertullian and St. Jerome that a persecution of the Christians took place at Ephesus under Domitian, and that St. John was seized and sent to Rome, where he was cast into a cauldron of boiling oil before the Porta Latina. When released he was not only uninjured, but seemed to be endowed with renewed health and strength. He was accordingly banished to Patmos. The legend is not mentioned by contemporary authors; and late criticism places the sojourn in Patmos much earlier than the reign of Domitian, probably in that of Nero.

Latin, Service in.—The saying of the prayers and services of the Church "in a tongue not understood of the people," was one of the first subjects to which the Reformer of the sixteenth century turned their attention. In fact we may say that the Reformation Acts of the reign of Henry VIII. were confined to this. The Bible was translated into English, and set up in churches; the Litanies also were translated into English, to be followed in the reign of Edward VI., by the abolition of Latin use, except in universities and other places of learning.

The Roman Church is professedly unwilling to allow the Mass to be said in other than dead languages, though Latin is not the only one. Thus in some places it is said in Greek, in others in Syriac, in Coptic, and in Slavonic. Latin is, however, by far the most common. It is not denied that the public worship was originally in the vulgar tongue of the various nations; but as a language gradually ceased to be the vernacular, as Latin did, the Church was unwilling to alter, and no instance is on record of a change in this respect being allowed by the Roman Church, though there are a few cases where newly converted nations have had the Mass in the vernacular. The Council of Trent declared the Mass in the vernacular to be "inexpedient." The reasons given for this prohibition are twofold. First it is alleged that the ancient rites should be most jealously guarded lest error might slip in unwares through change, the purity of doctrine be endangered, or the reverence of the people diminished. Secondly, it is said that the uniformity of language in all lands impresses upon war shippers everywhere the unity of the Church. And it is added that as each worshipper may possess a translation side by side with the Latin formulary, he knows what is going on.

That the rendering of the Latin into the vernacular, however, at the Reformation, gave a wonderful impetus to an intelligent use of the Bible and the Liturgy, is evident to any student of history. So entirely did it commend itself to the English nation, that when the nation returned for a while to the Roman obedience in the reign of Mary, no attempt was made to take away the English Bible though at first the translation had been fiercely opposed by the Roman Church.

Latitudinarians.—Bishop Burnet, in his History of His Own Times, thus defines this party: "They loved the constitution of the Church and the Liturgy, and could well live under them, but they did not think it unlawful to live under another form. They allowed a great freedom both in philosophy and in divinity, from whence they were called 'Men of Latitude.'" The Latitudinarians derived their peculiar tenets from the writing of Arminius and his pupil Episcopius, of the University of Leyden. The opinions of these two were introduced into England by John les in the seventeenth century. One great advantage of the Latitudinarian system was to unite all Christians, with the exception of Roman Catholics, into one communion; and in order to effect this, as John Hales writes in his tract on schism, "Liturgies and public forms of service" should be "so framed as that they admitted not of particular and private fancies, that contained only such things as those in each all Christians do agree." Again in the form tracts, he writes, "Remove from them, the Liturgies) whatever is scandalous to any party, and leave nothing but what all can see." Thus to please the Arians, the "head of the Saviour might be given up, and Nicene Creed revised; and indeed it is very difficult to see what part of the Christian faith could remain, if this system were to be adopted by the rule of the Church. Among the most eminent Latitudinarians were Chillingworth, a friend of Hales, Theophilus Gale, John Whitchet, Cadworth, Burnett, Arch- hop Tillotson, and in more recent times Arnold and Dean Stanley. Not indeed at these in all points would agree with the extreme opinions of Hales. One fundamental principle of this school of divines is the all-sufficiency of Scripture, explained by each man for himself, according to his own private judgment; hence they have been led to look on the system of the Church and many of its doctrines as little, if anything, more than matters of opinion. Thus, in the times of the Reformation, they looked upon Church government, which was then the great controversy of the day, as a thing in itself indifferent. The same opinion is expressed by Dr. Arnold in his volume On the Church: "The form of government is fixed by law, a law in its origin framed by man. . . The Church, as such, has no divinely appointed government." and, more generally, the same writer says: "The perfection of Christian doctrine consisted in early understanding that Christ's death had answered all priesthoods, sacrifices, and ceremonies, for the time to come, unimportant." Try to unite in one all who are striving for good, and fighting against evil, is a disreputable object; at the same time it could be remembered that no true or lasting ion can be looked for by the giving up of principles and convictions, or by looking on them as mere matters of unimportant detail. After the Restoration, in 1660, this school ceased greatly in influence, many of its members occupying high positions in the Church. In the present day the Latitudinians form a considerable section of the Church of England, many of their number being noted for great learning and piety.

Latria [Gk. latreia, "service"].—A word plied in theology to the service and worship only to God, and lawfully offered to Him alone. It is distinguished in the Roman Catholic Church from dulia, the veneration paid to saints and angels; and from hyperdulia, the special veneration due to the Blessed Virgin, who cannot, however, receive latria, because she is a creature of God.

Latria. [Ephesians, Robber Council of.]

Latter-Day Saints. [Mormon.]

Laud, William, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury, was born October 7th, 1573, at Reading, where his father was a clothier in good circumstances. He was educated till 1589 at the Reading Free School, where he gave promise of his future eminence. Thence he went to St. John's College, Oxford, in 1600, took holy orders, and in 1601 was ordained priest. The tone of Oxford was Calvinistic, but Laud was under the influence of Bucke-ridge, and through a course of studies based on the Fathers, the Councils, and Ecclesiastical historians, instead of the system of Geneva, he developed views on baptism and the constitution of the Church which, though in accordance with the scheme of the Anglican Reformed Church, ran counter to the Puritan theory, and excited the charge of Popery. In 1605 Laud solemnised the marriage of the Earl of Devon and Lady Rich, with whom the Earl was living while her husband was still alive; a step he afterwards deeply mourned, observing the anniversary as a fast, and alluding to it in his diary as "my cross about the Earl of Devon's marriage." He was given successively the livings of Stanford, 1607; North Kilworth, 1608, and Cuckstone, exchanging the latter for Norton on account of ill-health, from which he suffered much throughout life. He had previously exchanged North Kilworth for the living of West Tilbury, in Essex. In 1611 he was elected President of St. John's, in spite of Abbot's opposition. By Neile's influence he was appointed one of King James's chaplains, and in 1616 Dean of Gloucester. Here Laud attracted notice as a church restorer. The authorised externals of religion had been so neglected or destroyed, that Laud's zeal for order found continual occupation in bringing things, as the King said, "to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain." His acts were legal, but every step from Calvinism was held to be a step towards Popery, and was combated accordingly. Laud's opponents did not recognise his wish to defend the Church equally against Romanism and Calvinism, nor their own tendency to ignore the Church's teaching while professing to be its members. In 1617 he went to Scotland with the King, with whose project of strengthening the Episcopal Church Laud sympathised, though he does not appear to have taken an active part in it. He was consecrated Bishop of St. David's, Nov. 18th, 1621, and made visitations of the diocese in 1622 and 1625, when the fabric and service of the churches received his care and pecuniary help. He was employed to combat Fisher the Jesuit in his attempt to proselytise the Countess of Buckingham, and though in her case Laud's arguments were only temporar"ily successful, they confirmed the Duke of Buckingham's faith and remain a standard work on the subject. The charge of Popery was raised against Laud from his restrictions on preaching, the relaxation of statutes against Papists, and his intimacy with Buckingham at the time of the Spanish match. He had powerful enemies in the Lord Keeper Williams and Archbishop Abbot; their influence, however, did not disturb his favour with the King nor with Prince Charles, who, on his accession in 1625, appointed Laud to preach on the opening of Parliament. He was also called upon for a list of noted clergy with the distinguishing "orthodox" and "Puritan" to each name, as guide to the King in the customary appointment of new chaplains, and was made secretary to the committee who arranged the coronation ceremonial. In 1626 Laud was raised to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells and made Dean of the Chapel Royal, when he requested the King to attend the prayers as well as sermon on Sundays, and to permit the service to continue uninterrupted by his entrance. Laud admitted the accusation by Parliament that he was the author of certain of the King's speeches, saying, "Being commanded to the service, I hope it shall not now be made my crime that I was trusted by my sovereign." He was deputed to issue instructions urging the clergy to support the Loan for Denmark, and, in 1628, to answer the remonstrance from Parliament that alleged increase of Popery in Ireland, the secret Romanism of himself and Neile, and the abuse by Buckingham of his many offices. Laud's tone in the reply was not conciliatory. He had been made Privy Councillor in 1627, and in 1628, on the death of Buckingham, became the King's foremost adviser, and, in consequence, the numerous unpopular measures at this time were indiscriminately attributed to him. He was translated, July 15th, 1628, to the See of London, and his instructions to the province of Canterbury in reference to lecturers, created great discontent among the Calvinists, already exasperated by the declaration prefixed to the reprint of the Thirty-nine Articles, which the House of Commons protested they held only in the sense in which they had been established in Queen Elizabeth's reign. In 1630 Laud was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, in which he took the deepest interest throughout life. He caused its forgotten statutes to be searched for and set in order, established canonries in connection with the professorships of Hebrew and public oratory, and a professorship of Arabic. To St. John's College he added a new quadrangle, enlarged its library, and built a new one, presenting it with a great number of valuable papal books, and manuscripts in many languages. He also, in 1631, set on foot the rebuilding of St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1633 Laud accompanied the King to Scotland. The distinctions conferred on the Scotch prelates, honours, only increased the ill-will against them, and the Service Book with Canons, afterwards drawn up by them in correspondence with Laud, raised a storm of resistance in 1637, which culminated in 1643 in the Cxont. Laud succeeded Abbot as Archbishop on Sept. 19th, 1633, when a Cardinal's was also twice offered him from Rome whether as bait or snare is not clear. The propositions bought by the "feoffies" were discontinued to the Crown, and the Book of Prayer was reprinted with a declaration that people should be protected in their local recreations after the Sunday services. Two measures caused a great outcry. The Archbishop commenced a metropolitical visitation in 1634, and among other measures enjoined the removal of the sacramental table from body to the east of the churches, according an injunction of Queen Elizabeth, and addition of a railing to ensure its being longer perverted from its peculiar use to the office of parish table or school desk. His enmity that the Winchester, Hereford, and Canterbury Probendaries should, by bowing to the altar, "make due reverence to Almighty God," was construed as a belief in Transubstantiation, of which Laud declared, "I receive Transubstantiation is confounded with the Real Presence, whereas these have a very difference." As in 1623-24 Laud relieved the clergy throughout the country from pressure of subsidies, so he now alleviated poverty of those in London. In Ireland obtained the acceptance of the Thirty-nine Articles by the Church, and the restoration to her of the impropriations held by Crown, Strafford being his zealous confidant. The Archbishop enforced stringent regulations on English churches and military chaplain abroad, and endeavoured to attach to the Church all those who, though of Dutch French parentage, were born in England from 1635 to 1636, held the post of Lord High Treasurer. Pryme, Bastwick, Burton were, in 1637, brought before Star Chamber for seditious and libelous writings and sayings, and were barbarously punished. Laud was unfairly held to be author of these and other Star Chamber High Commission sentences. His habit of acquiescing in them is sufficiently deplorable and unjustifiable, but their excessive severity was in keeping with the intolerant spirit of those times. Laud's temper was quick, his manner not conciliatory, but he deals with reference to opponents, "I have so times forborne them a twelvemonth to ther," and with Bishop Hall and Halle...
Caution, antagonism was changed into friendship. In 1637 Laud thwarted the proselytising scheme of the Papal party, by procuring the expulsion of Montague and Mathew from the Court. He enforced an arbitrary censorship of the Press, and prohibited the importation of Geneva Bibles. In 1640, the Duke of Hamilton's embassy to Scotland having failed, he, with Strafford and Laud, advised the calling of Parliament. After a short and stormy session, occupied with complaints against the bishops, it was dissolved on the false information that no supplies would be voted for the suppression of the Scotch rebellion. The Convocation sitting simultaneously voted six subsidies and framed seventeen canons, including the "Et Cetera oath" and the declaration of the "Divine Right of Monarchy." These canons and Laud as their author, were condemned by the House of Commons in the Long Parliament, Dec. 15th, 1640, as "confirming the unlawful ad excitatorum power which had been usurped by His Majesty's subjects;" also the Scotch commissioners denounced Laud as the prime author of the pernicious innovations attempted in their country. He was accused of high treason, and committed to the custody of the Tower. As the Archbishop left Lambeth he was surrounded by hundreds of his poor neighbours waiting for him, and praying for his safe return. In Feb., 1641, he was summoned to hear the fourteen articles of impeachment, which in his address he said make me against God in point of religion, against the King in point of allegiance, and against the public in point of safety under his justice and protection of law." He was removed to the Tower, where Strafford was also imprisoned; but a meeting was not allowed, and Laud gave his farewell blessing to his friend from a window as he passed to execution. In 1643 the Primate's jurisdiction and patronage were sequestrated, and ten articles added to the charge against him. His trial began, March 12th, 1644. Prynne had seized his papers, and Laud had for reference only three out of the twenty-one packets taken from him. Prynne put a mutilated breviary of the Archbishop's diary into the hands of the peers. Laud was allowed counsel, and made an able defence; but the ordinance of attainer was passed, Jan. 4th, 1645, by the voice of six peers, and, in spite of a pardon granted by the King, Laud was beheaded, Jan. 10th, 1645—not only the first Archbishop, but the first man in England who had died by an ordinance of Parliament. His remains were interred in the Church of All Hallows, Barking, and transferred in 1683 to St. John's College Chapel.

Lauds. [Canonical Hours.]

Launoi, John de, one of the stoutest upholders of the privileges of the Gallican Church, was born in Normandy in 1603, was ordained priest in 1633, and became D.D. in 1636, but never held a benefice. He lived in retirement, devoting his time exclusively to literature, and died in Paris in 1678. He created many enemies, as he criticised the Breviary and denied the authenticity of many of the legends about the saints. He made himself obnoxious to the Pope by stating that "the Pope had no power to break through, or dispense with, the Canons of the Councils;" and to the Dominican order by writing against Thomas Aquinas. In 1678 he published a book in which he accused the Pope's Amates of committing simony, and confuted the Jesuit Azorius, who had written a book at the end of the sixteenth century to clear them from the imputation of the crime. Copies of these were seized and ordered to be burnt, but Launoi continued to write. His chief work was De Authentico Negantis Argumenti.

Laura.—When hermits lived in cells some little distance apart, each man providing for himself, the collection of cells was called a laura; when several lived under one roof, and had all things in common, their dwelling was called a cenobium.

Lavabo ("I will wash").—The first words of Psalm xxv. which in the Roman Missal the priest recites while the acolyte pours water on his hands after the oblation. This washing of hands is mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. There is great variety on this point in the old English rites; in the York use the washing was accompanied by a verse of the fourteenth Psalm, the Veni Creator, and a prayer; while in the Sarum use a prayer only was said.

Lavacrum. [Piscina.]

Lavater, Johann Caspar, born at Zürich in 1741, was the son of a physician. He early showed a depth of religious feeling, and determined to be a clergyman, with which view he travelled in 1763 with Fusch, the celebrated painter, to study theology under Spalding at Barth, in Swedish Pomerania. He also travelled through Leipsic and Berlin, and returned to Zürich in 1764. Here he attracted some notice as a preacher; but his reputation was chiefly founded on the publication in 1767 of his Swiss songs, and in the following year Aussichten in die Ewigkeit. In 1786 Lavater was appointed minister of the Church of St. Peter, in his native city, and held the post till his death. Having very keen powers of observation and discrimination of character, he had a theory that physiognomy ought to be raised to the rank of a science, for he maintained that by close observation men's characters could be discerned from studying their faces. He published this theory in 1775 under the title of Physiognomische Fragmente; but in after years he abandoned many of his ideas as fanciful. The mysticism which gave rise to these opinions formed a large part of his religious belief; he had a firm faith in the manifestation of supernatural powers, spiritualism, and anything approaching the miraculous. Nevertheless his evident sincerity and piety caused him to be held in depth veneration among his congregation.
Lavater hailed the French Revolution with delight at first, but was horror-struck at the excesses committed, and especially at the murder of the King. He was wounded at Zürich in September, 1799, when tending the dying soldiers at the taking of the city by Massena. After much suffering he died of the wound in January, 1801.

Law, Canon. [Canon Law.]

Law, William, an influential religious writer, was born at King's Cliffe, in Northamptshire, in 1866. He went to Emmanuel College, Cambridge, with a view to entering the Church, and was elected a Fellow in 1711;
but, refusing to take the oath of allegiance on the accession of George I., he was obliged to vacate his fellowship. He was for some time tutor of Mr. Edward Gibbon, father of the historian. In 1741 Hester Gibbon, sister of his pupil, and her friend Mrs. Hutchinson, determined to retire from the world and devote themselves to charity and good works.
They chose Law for their chaplain, and retired to King's Cliffe, where Law spent the last twenty years of his life, dying in 1761.
William Law was the author of many works which are deeply tinged with mysticism. The best known is A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, which is said to have been more highly praised than any other practical religious book in England, with the exception of the Pilgrim's Progress. It had a great influence on Dr. Johnson and also on John Wesley. With the latter Law was at one time on very friendly terms; but a rupture occurred between them, and in later life Law was an ardent admirer of Jacob Behmen [q.v.]. Among Law's other works are The Way to Knowledge, The Spirit of Love, etc.

Lawrence, St., one of the most eminent saints of the Church. While still very young he was ordained deacon by Pope Sixtus, and this was all the more remarkable as the number of deacons in Rome
at that time never exceeded more than seven.
Sixtus had such implicit faith in him that he was entrusted with the care of the Church
plate, and kept an account of the money,
which charge afterwards proved the immediate cause of his death. In the year 258 A.D.
the Emperor Valerian sent an order that all Christians were to be put to death, and Sixtus was the first to be seized. When Lawrence returned after the execution of his master he gave orders for the gathering together of the poor, and he proceeded to divide the Church money between them, and also what had been obtained by the sale of the Church plate. Having satisfied himself by this act that there would be no desecration after his death, he calmly waits for his sentence of death, which he knew would be passed in a few days. The Governor of Rome ordered that St. Lawrence should be brought before him, demanding that all Church property should be given up to the Emperor. Lawrence answered that if he might have a short time in which to collect and prepare his treasures, the Governor should be obeyed. He was allowed three days' grace, and at the end of that time produced the poor people whom he had relieved a short time before. The Governor was so angry that he ordered that the prisoner should be beaten with cords and then slowly broiled to death on a gridiron, both of which orders were rigorously carried out. The number of Churches dedicated to him is sufficient to prove the veneration in which his name was held, and his day [August 10th] has been kept by the Eastern and Western Churches

since the fifth century.

Lawrence, Archbishop of Canterbury,
a Roman monk, who succeeded Augustine
A.D. 604. He was a good man, and Augustine himself nominated him as his successor
but his Primacy was not a prosperous one;
for, upon the death of good King Ethelber Christianity almost expired with him. The prince was succeeded by his son Edibil who was but a boy, and who, on attaining his majority, had become a finished libertin.
Amongst other instances of immorality, he married his father's wife, and followed this up by declaring against Christianity. The people followed their prince's precedent, and Lawrence, perceiving that neither the King nor his subjects were the better for his remo-strances, resolved to quit Britain, and took Mellitus and Justus into Gaul, they havin lately been expelled by the East Angle.
The day before he was to set forward he saw St. Peter in a dream, who reprimanded him and scourged him for being unmindful both of St. Austin's orders and of his own duty, and for being so pusillanimous as dispirited as to desert his flock in time of danger, and resign it, as it were, to the wolves. This dream made so strong an impression on him that he immediately terished his resolution. Edibil, the King, like wise, on hearing what happened to Lawrence, was strangely affected with the relative, and asked Lawrence's pardon, and, disengagehimself from his scandalous marriage, as recollecting Mellitus and Justus, made it his business to promote the interest of the Christian religion. Lawrence died in 619.

Lawrence, Anti-Pope, was archdeacon the church of St. Mary the Greater at Rom and opposed to Symmachus, chosen Poi after Anastasius II. in 498, which schi as the cause of great disorders in the city of one. The decision was left to Theodore, king of the Goths, who was in favour of maenacus. Lawrence submitted, and was ade Bishop of Nocera; but afterwards using new troubles, he was banished, and ed in exile in 520.

Lay-Brothers in the Roman Church are lower order of monks who act as servants the monastery. A lay-brother wears a different habit from that of the religious, wears the choir, nor is present at the apts. He is not in any order nor makes a vow but that of constancy or obedience. an institution of lay-brothers began in the eventh century, at the Monastery of Vallombrosa, founded by St. John Gualbert. Afterwards the monks of Hirsau and the Carthusians adopted the practice, and now they e to be found in most religious orders, clading the Benedictines.

In the nunneries are also lay-sisters, which retained for the service of the nuns as the y-brothers are for the monks.

Lay-Clerks.—Singing men, so called in statutes of the cathedrals, founded or re-odelled by King Henry VIII. In general eir number was commensurate with that of minor canons.

Lay Communion.—When a cleric was mishandled by degradation and deprivation of orders, he was reduced to the status of a layman, and, if permitted to take part in the Holy Eucharist, it was as a layman that he communicated. The term has been incorrectly ed as equivalent to Communion in one kind.

Lay Elders.—Laymen admitted in the Presbyterian Church to take a share in the ministration of the affairs of the sick. This stem was in modern times first introduced Calvin at Geneva.

Lay Impropriation.—An ecclesiastical office or church in the hands of a layman.

Layman. [LAI TY.]

Lay Readers. [LAI TY.]

Lay Sisters. [LAY BROTHERS.]

Laying on of Hands. [IMPOSITION OF ANDS.]

Lazarists.—The popular name given to the "Congregation of the Priests of the Mission," founded by St. Vincent de Paul in 1524, re-established in 1832 in the College of St. Lazare at Paris. The objects of the society were to sanctify its own members, to carry on missions in country districts and in foreign countries, and to train young priests. At St. Vincent's death in 1600 there were twenty-four houses, and at the end of the last century numbered eighty-four. During the reich revolution many were massacred, o others banished and their property confis- ted, the college being turned into a prison for women. They were allowed to return to France under Napoleon I., and under the Restoration a house in the Rue de Sèvres was granted to them.

Lazarus. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Leaders. — All Wesleyan congregations are divided into various "classes," over each of which is a "leader"—that is, a member of experience and recognised personal piety—who must see all members of his class at least once a week, inquire into their spiritual condition, ascertain the cause if they are absent from the class-meeting, receive their offerings to the poor, etc. These class-leaders have great influence, as they are very numerous, and are resident, and therefore become better acquainted with their people than the ministers. No person can be admitted into the church if objected to by the class leaders. The leaders of the female classes are females. Once a quarter the leaders meet together and are examined by the director of their circuit. This meeting is called the "Leaders" Meeting.

League.—A party formed in France in 1576, in the reign of Henry III., for defence of the Roman religion. The first who laid the design of a general league of the Papists under another head than the King was the Cardinal of Lorraine, whilst he was at the Council of Trent. He represented to the chief men of that assembly, and by them to the Pope, that for the maintaining of the Roman religion it would be necessary to form a league of many princes and lords (of whom the King of Spain was to be one), and the Pope protector of it, which princes so leagued were to choose a head whom all Romanists should be bound to obey. This design being approved by the Council, they were about to choose the Duke of Guise as head, when the news was brought of his death. The Cardinal kept his design in view however, and waited patiently for eleven years till his nephew, the young Duke of Guise, should be old enough to be entrusted with such a charge. At the end of that time he again propounded his scheme to the Pope and the King of Spain, who both agreed to his proposal, though actuated by different motives. The Pope hoped by these means to exterminate the Protestants; the King thought he saw in it the means of gaining advantage to himself out of the disorders which the League was sure to produce in France. The Cardinal of Lorraine died before the enterprise was completed, but the Duke of Guise was unwilling to quit the design, and therefore in 1576 caused a project to be made of the League, which he got secretly dispersed amongst the most zealous devotees, or those who were known to be favourites of the House of Guise. He particularly confided in the Sieur d'Humières, Governor of Peronne, who, finding that the twelve articles of which the League consisted, attacked the royal authority too openly, made, instead, eighteen other articles, which were so worded that the League should appear to be designed expressly for the King's service. The substance of these articles was to this effect:—That all obedience should be rendered to the King; that they promised to maintain the exercise of the Romish religion; that the nobility and gentry should either serve in person or provide men, horses and arms; and that the clergy and commons should contribute to the expenses of the League according to the taxes that should be regulated for that purpose. This Act was signed at Péronne on Feb. 13th, 1577, by nearly two hundred gentlemen and officers of the province, and their example was soon followed in all the provinces of the kingdom. In November of the same year the States of the kingdom assembled at Blois prohibited the exercise of the Protestant religion, they of the League proving the strongest party there. But the King noticed that the Leaguers rather endeavoured to weaken his authority than to crush the Protestants, and, to their great consternation, declared that he would himself be master of the League. But in 1578 he granted the Protestants the Edict of Poitiers, which permitted them the exercise of their religion. The Leaguers, who had not felt strong enough to undertake anything with the King at their head, declared in 1581 that they would have the Duke of Guise instead of Henry, giving as an excuse that the King had made alliance with the King of Navarre, which, as he was a heretic, was contrary to the laws of the League. The Duke was joined by a separate league formed in Paris, and called the Seize. With them to help him, besides his own party, he drew up a treaty which arranged that the Cardinal of Bourbon was to succeed to the crown in the event of the King dying without children. War broke out in 1583, and the King was forced to revoke the Edict he had made in favour of the Protestants. In 1587 the Protestant princes of Germany raised a powerful army to assist their brethren in France, but these forces were defeated and obliged to retire, which made the Leaguers more peremptory and tyrannical than before. In July, 1588, the King published the Edict of Reunion, by which he undertook to root out Protestantism from France. At the Assembly of Estates at Blois the King perceived that the Duke of Guise was becoming very powerful, and would be a constant source of anxiety. He therefore took the desperate measure of causing both the Duke and his brother the Cardinal to be put to death. Their death infuriated the Leaguers, and the quarrel raged fiercely till Henry's death in 1589. He was succeeded by Henry of Navarre, a Protestant, who of course met with most determined opposition from the members of the League. In the following year this opposition resulted in war, and the battle of Ivry proved fatal to the League, for almost all its forces were destroyed. From that time it ceased to have any influence over the fortunes of France, but was not formally dissolved till July, 1591, when Henry abjured the Protestant religion and was reconciled to the Church of Rome.

League and Covenant, Solemn

Leander, Sr., Bishop of Seville, was born at Carthagena in the middle of the 6th century. The piety of his parents and his own inclination made him retire to a monastery while young, and he was thence recommended to the See of Seville, one of the most important in Spain. The Visigoths were at this time masters of Spain, where Arianism flourished under their protection. To avert this heresy was Leander's great aim and the subject of his writings. By his labours he gained several, the most important conquest of the sort being the conversion of Hermigild, eldest son of Leovigild, king of the Visigoths. This conversion drew down a violent storm on the Catholics, and Leander was obliged to fly from the country. He went to Constantinople to the Emperor Tiberius, and laid the case of the Catholics in Spain before him, beggimg him to use his interest with Leovigild to restore peace to the Church. While he was on the errand he became acquainted with Gregory the Great, then a deacon of the Church at Rome, and this acquaintance ripened in close intimacy; this meeting was in 586. The death of Tiberius frustrated all the hopes of Leander, for his successor, Maurice, was too busy with his own troubles in the East to attend to the grievances of the West. Leander, therefore, returned to Spain, where he found the persecution more fierce than ever, and Leovigild, fearing the consequences of his zeal, banished him and several other bishops in 585. During his exile he wrote two books against the Arians, which he had been lost. The story goes that Leovigild, in a fit of remorse at having ordered his son Hermigild to be put to death, gave his second son Recared into Leander's hands to be instructed by him. However that may have been, when Recared succeeded his father in 587, he abjured Arianism, a assisted Leander in the conversion of his heretical subjects. Leander was the moving spirit in the great Council of Toledo [589], which the King and Queen, the nobles of Court, and 62 bishops, Arian and Catholc were present, and the whole Visigoth nation abjured Arianism. In 590 Gregory made Pope, and there is evidence of his friendly and congratulatory correspondence between him and Leander. Leander, encouraged by his success against Arianism, proceeded to govern the Church with vigour, and to inculcate the great truths of the gospel—both by discourse and example.
he have still extant of his a letter to his sister Florentina, usually called St. Leander’s Rule, because it turns on contempt of the world, and is full of excellent instructions to men. The date of his death is uncertain; me give it as 507, others as 600. His name appears in the ninth century martyrologies, and his festival is kept in the Spanish Church on March 13th.

Lectern or Lecturn.—The desk or and in a church or cathedral from which the lessons of Holy Scripture are read. Formerly the antiphons and gospels were sung from lecterns. They stand at the west end of the choir, facing the congregation. They are of wood or brass, and are frequently made in the form of an eagle, probably on account that bird being the symbol of St. John. The eagle is used in foreign churches for the sanction of the service, but not for the lessons.

Lectionary.—This word in the Roman Catholic Church is applied to the book containing the passages of Scripture used in the Mass. It is of late years sometimes applied to the Table of Lessons in the Prayer Book. [Lessons.]

Lectors or Readers.—An inferior order of clergy; instituted in the third century. In some churches they were ordained with imposition of hands; in others they were admitted to their office by the bishop’s putting his Bible into their hands with the words: Take this book and be thou a reader of the Word of God, which office, if thou fulfil faithfully and profitably, thou shalt have part with those that minister the Word of God;” while elsewhere they simply received the bishop’s commission. Men of high worldly dignity sometimes filled the office, and there are instances of its having been held by children whose parents had dedicated them to the service of God, hoping that they would afterwards rise to higher offices in the Church.

Lecturer.—Before the Reformation this name was given to persons who were appointed to read lectures, chiefly on the Schoolmen, before the Universities. From these they passed into the monasteries, and eventually into parishes; where they received a stipend from some wealthy member or from voluntary contributions under the licence of the bishop. During the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Puritans held many lectureships, but there was no injunction respecting the office of lecturers till 1604, when Archbishop Bancroft issued directions for their conduct. In 1626 twelve persons were legally empowered to purchase appropriations belonging to laymen and expend the proceeds in providing lectures for parishes where the clergy were not qualified to preach. This led to abuses, as Puritans often appointed unorthodox preachers, and in 1633, Archbishop Laud procured a Bill appropriating the money for the King’s use, as it had been misused by appointing a violent Puritan to St. Antholin’s Church, London, where no preacher was required. (This church having been pulled down, and the parish incorporated with that of St. Mary’s, Aldermary, lectures are now given in the latter church.) In 1637 he went further, and ordered that all lecturers should say the Common Prayer in hood and surplice, which they refused to do. During the Commonwealth they were favoured and increased in numbers, but after the Restoration a heavy blow was inflicted on them by the Act of Uniformity. Lecturers of parishes are now generally elected by the vestry or principal inhabitants. Several lectures have been founded by private individuals, as Lady Moyer’s at St. Andrew’s, Holborn; the Boyle, at Chapel Royal, Whitehall; Bampton, at Oxford; and Hulscan, at Cambridge.

Lee, Samuel, D.D., an Orientalist and linguist, was born at Longnor in Shropshire in 1783. He was educated at a charity school in that village and at the age of 12 was apprenticed to a carpenter and joiner. In 1700 he determined to learn Latin, and though only earning seven shillings a week, contrived to buy books for the purpose. He soon added Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Persian, French, German and Italian. Archdeacon Corbet found out his studious habits and lent him books. In 1810 Lee became master of Bowdler’s foundation school in Shrewsbury, and in 1813 he went to Queen’s College, Cambridge, and took his degree of B.A. in 1817. He was ordained, and in 1819 became Arabic Professor at Cambridge, and Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Bristol in 1831. Halle University conferred on him the title of D.D. unsolicited in 1822, and Cambridge in 1833. He died Rector of Barley in Hertfordshire in 1851.

Among the more important of Dr. Lee’s numerous works are:—Hebrew Grammar; Travels of John Batuta, translated from the Arabic; The Book of Job, translated from the original Hebrew; Hebrew, Chaldee and English Lexicon; Events and Times of the Visions of Daniel and St. John, etc. He also translated the Bible into Syriac, Malay, Persian, Hindustani, Coptic and Arabic, for the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Legates.—Ambassadors sent by the Pope to foreign Churches. The name is of classical origin, and was first applied to the governors of the provinces composing the kingdom of the Emperor Augustus, B.C. 27. The name was afterwards given to the representatives of the Pope who attended the first Councils in the East. Legates are of three kinds: (1) Legati a latere, “from the side” of the Pope, who are always cardinals, with power little inferior to that of the Pope himself, and who have authority over all other legates. (2) Legati nati, whose office was hereditary, and to which class the Archbishops of Canterbury, with few exceptions, were considered to belong; the power of this class was very limited, and the office came to be reduced to little more than a title. (3) Legati missi, or Nuncii apostolici, who were endowed with absolute authority in the matter for which they were employed, though the authority went no further. The institution underwent a reform in the time of Leo X., but more changes came with the German Reformation, when three new nunciatures were established at Cologne, Lucerne and Brussels, in addition to those which already existed at Warsaw and Vienna. The Englishmen who have filled the office of Papal Legates are Archbishop William, 1127; Hoary, Bishop of Winchester, 1139; Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, 1150; Roger, Archbishop of York, 1164; Thomas Becket, 1166; Archbishop Richard, 1174; Archbishop Baldwin, 1186; William Longchamp, 1190; Archbishop Hubert, 1195.

Legends ["things to be read"]—A legend was originally a book used in the old Romish churches containing the lessons that were to be read at Divine Service. Hence the lives of the saints and martyrs came to be called legends, because chapters were to be read out of them at matins and in the refectories of the religious houses. In the first century the legends were not mere stories, but had a historical character. Thus the Acta Martyrum and Acta Sanctorum, Eusebius's book on the martyrs of Palestine, etc., are more or less authentic; but at a later period the legends became a mass of fiction. The first strong example of this degeneracy is the Golden Legend, a collection of the lives of the saints, composed by James de Varsae—better known as John de Voragine—Vicar-general of the Dominicans, and afterwards Archbishop of Genoa in the thirteenth century. This legend consists of 177 chapters, each treating of a saint or a festival. It was very popular, and remained so for 200 years, was translated into several languages, and passed through many editions; but is full of ridiculous and romantic stories, as the Roman Catholics themselves acknowledge. On this book was modelled Cappgrave's Legenda Anglica, a work of the fifteenth century, printed by Caxton. The Roman Breviary abounds in legends of saints, which every priest is bound daily to peruse. Alban Butler's English Work, Lives of the Saints, contains legends of over 1,500 saints. For the work compiled by the Bollandists, see Acta Sanctorum.

Legion, The Thundering.—The name given to a legion of Christian soldiers in the army of Marcus Aurelius. Eusebius, on the authority of Apollinaris and Tertullian, relates that the reason for this name was that when Marcus was marching against the Marcomanni in 174, his army were enclosed in a narrow pass of the Alps, surrounded by the enemy and suffocated by thirst. The Christians fell on their knees and prayed to God and were answered by miraculous showers of rain, accompanied by thunder which refreshed them and frightened the enemies. On the victorious return of Marcus to Rome he called the Christian Legion "the Thundering Legion," and ceased to persecute them. This is shown by Neander to be a mixture of truth and fiction. It is evident from the statements of Christian and Pagan authors, and from the relics of the column of Marcus Aurelius in Rome, that when the soldiers were in difficulties they were relieved by a shower of rain; which the Christians, of whom there probably were many in the army, ascribed to God, and the heathens to Jupiter; but it has been proved that the twelfth of the Roman Legions has borne the name "Thundering Legion" from the time of the Emperor Augustus, and also that there was no Christian persecutions going on at that time, for that at Lyons took place three years afterwards.

Legitimation.—According to the Canon Law of the Church of Rome, and the Civil Law of all countries in Continental Europe, children born before wedlock are rendre legitimate by a subsequent marriage; provided that at the time of birth the parent were free to marry, and that no legal obstacle stood in the way. If, for instance, the child born is the child of adultery, no subsequent marriage can in any case make it legitimate. By the common law of England, children born out of wedlock cannot be legitimate by any subsequent marriage, but are illegitimate all their lives and incapable of inheriting. The decision of the Council of nobles held at Merton in 1236, when requested to modify the English law on this point, was, "Nolumus leges Anglice mutari."

Leibnitz, Gottfried Wilhelm von [b. 1646, d. 1716].—One of the most wonderful scholars that ever lived; born at Leipzig and died at Hanover. In his philosophy he put forth the theory of monads, i.e., simple uncomplexed substances, without figure, without exterior, without divisibility, by the aggregation of which all bodies are formed, and into which they may be again resolved [Materialism.] These monads are created things, indestructible, and of two classes those destitute of consciousness, but possessing an internal activity which he calls perception; and those possessing consciousness which are souls. The difference between the higher and lower intelligences depends upon the degree of this consciousness. The primordia monad is God. Now, inasmuch as mai

A HARMONY PRE-ARRANGED BY GOD, SETS IN

MOST CELEBRATED WORK OF LEIBNITZ IS HIS

ARCHBISHOP THEODORE [Q.V.] IN 680, TO SUPPLY
HE NEEDS OF THE GREAT KINGDOM OF MERICA, RING, AS WELL AS WORCESTER, CUT OFF BY HIM
FROM THE SEE OF LICHFIELD. HE CONSECRATED LUTHWIN AS THE FIRST BISHOP OF THIS NEW SEE.
IN CUTHWIN'S DEATH IN 691 THIS SEE WAS ADMINISTERED BY WILFRED [Q.V.] OF YORK, UNTIL THE YEAR 705, WHEN IT WAS REUNITED TO LICHFIELD; BUT THEY WERE AGAIN DIVIDED IN 737.

LEIGHTON, ROBERT, ARCHBISHOP OF GLAS-ROW, BORN IN 1611. HE WAS EDUCATED IN LONDON UNTIL HIS SIXTEENTH YEAR, AND AFTER-WARDS IN EDINBURGH; SUBSEQUENTLY HE SPENT SOME YEARS IN FRANCE, AND WAS LICENSED IN 641 TO THE MINISTRY, WITH THE CHARGE OF THE ARIST OF NEWBATTLE, NEAR EDINBURGH. HIS CHARACTER HAS BEEN GREATLY MISREPRESENTED, AND IT HAS NOW BEEN PROVEN THAT HE WAS CAUSAL AND Earnest IN HIS WORK, STRIVING ALWAYS TO PROMOTE PEACE AND UNITY IN THE CHURCH, AND REFUSING TO TAKE PART MORE THAN WAS NECESSARY IN THE CONTROVERSIES WHICH ENGAGED MOST MEN'S THOUGHTS. THIS WAS HE MORE REMARKABLE AS HIS FATHER WAS ONE OF THE BITTEREST FANATICS IN THE CAUSE OF PROTESTANTISM, AND HAD BROUGHT UP HIS SON IN HIS OWN FOOTSTEPS. ROBERT LEIGHTON REMAINED AT NEWBATTLE FOR ELEVEN YEARS; BUT IN 1652
HE WAS SUMMONED TO LONDON TO DEFEND THE CONTRACT OF SOME SCOTTISH MINISTERS WHO HAD BEEN IMPRISONED FOR SUPPORTING THE ROYALIST CAUSE. HE PROCURED THEIR RELEASE, AND RETURNED TO SCOTLAND, WHERE HE WAS APPOINTED PRINCIPAL OF THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.
WHEN CHARLES II. TOOK STEPS FOR INTRODUCING EPISCOPACY INTO SCOTLAND, HE NOMINATED LEIGHT-ON TO THE BISHOPRIC OF DUMBELNE, AND SHORTLY AFTERWARDS TO THE ARCHBISHOPRIC OF GLASGOW, IN 1671. BUT, FINDING THAT HIS OPINIONS WERE MORE IN FAVOUR OF MODERATION THAN THOSE OF OTHER Bishops, WHO LOOKED ON HIM IN CON-SEQUENCE WITH SUSPICION, HE RESIGNED HIS SEE
IN 1674, AND RETIRED TO SUSSEX, TO THE HOUSE
OF HIS SISTER, WHERE HE SPENT THE LAST TEN YEARS
OF HIS LIFE. HE DIED IN LONDON IN FEBRUARY, 1684, HAVINGCOME UP TO TOWN, AT THE REQUEST OF SOME FRIENDS, TO HOLD A DISCUSSION WITH LORD PERTH ON RELIGIOUS MATTERS; BUT WAS BURIED IN A CHAPEL AT HORSTED-KEYNES, HIS SISTER'S RESIDENCE.

THE WRITINGS OF LEIGHTON ARE AMONG THE MOST BEAUTIFUL IN ENGLISH THEOLOGY. WE HAVE HEARD A GREAT CHURCH DIGNITY SAY OF HIS COMMENTARY ON ST. PETER, THAT IT IS "CAL-VINISM PURGED OF ALL ITS IMPERFECTIONS." COLERIDGE'S AIDS TO REFLECTION CONSISTS ALMOST ENTIRELY OF EXPANSIONS AND COMMENTS ON THE TEACHING OF THIS SAINTLY MAN. SEVERAL EDITIONS OF HIS WORKS HAVE BEEN PUBLISHED, AND THERE IS A VERY CHARMING LIFE OF HIM BY
C. F. SECRETAN.

LEIPZIG, DISPUTATIONS OF.—IN 1519 A DISCUSSION WAS HELD AT LEIPZIG BETWEEN JOHN ECK ON THE ONE HAND, AND LUTHER AND CARL-STADT ON THE OTHER, WHICH LASTED FROM JUNE
27TH TO JULY 13TH. DURING THE FIRST WEEK ECK AND CARLSTADT DISPUTED ABOUT FREE WILL; IN THE SECOND, ECK AND LUTHER CONCERNING THE POPE'S SUPREMACY; AND, IN THE THIRD, ON REPENTANCE, PURGATORY, INDULGENCES, AND PRIESTLY ABSOLUTION.
NO DECISION WAS COME TO, BUT THE DISCUSSIONS
WON MANY FRIENDS FOR LUTHER, AS JOHN Cella-RUS, PRINCE GEORGE OF ANHALT, AND OTHERS,
AND IT GAVE A NEW IMPULSE TO MELANCHTHON.
A SECOND DISCUSSION TOOK PLACE AT LEIPZIG
IN 1631, BETWEEN THE LUTHERAN AND REFORMED
DIVINES. IT LASTED FROM MARCH 3RD TO 23RD.
THEY DISCUSSED THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION, AND SET FORTH AN EXPOSITION OF THEIR DIFFERENCES;
BUT IT LED TO NO IMPORTANT RESULT.

LELAND, JOHN, D.D.—A WELL-KNOWN CONTROVERSIALIST AGAINST UNBELIEF, WAS BORN AT WIGAN, OF A PRESBYTERIAN FAMILY, IN 1691.
HE WAS EDUCATED IN DUBLIN, WHERE HE BECAME PASTOR OF A PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN 1716, IN WHICH SITUATION HE REMAINED TILL HIS DEATH IN 1766.
HE FIRST APPEARED AS AN AUTHOR, 1733, BY PUBLISHING AN ANSWER TO TINDAL'S CHRISTIANITY AS OLD AS THE CREATION.
IN 1737 APPEARED THE DIVINE AUTHORITY OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT, WRITTEN AGAINST DR.
MORGAN'S MORAL PHILOSOPHER. BUT HIS BEST WORK, ONE WHICH IS STILL USED, IS A VIEW OF THE PRINCIPAL DEISTICAL WRITERS OF ENGLAND IN THE LAST AND PRESENT CENTURY.

LE MAITRE, LOUIS ISAAC, BORN IN PARIS, MARCH 1613, WAS ORDAINED PRIEST IN 1648, AND became Director of Port Royal. He adhered to the doctrines of the Jansenists, and was therefore hated by the Jesuits, who caused him to be imprisoned for two years in the Bastile, and, after his release, compelled him, by their persecution, to retire to Pomponne, where he died in 1684. Of his numerous works the most important is his translation of the Bible, much of which was written during his confinement in the Bastile.

Lent, a Saxon term signifying Spring, is the name given to the 40 weekdays preceding the Easter Festival, which are observed as a special season of fasting and prayer. It is probable that a Fast of some duration previous to the commemoration of Our Saviour's Resurrection was kept from a very early date, but it is quite certain that its original duration was very considerably less than 40 days. Giving a somewhat restricted interpretation to the words, "The days will come when the bridgroom shall be taken away from them, and then shall they fast in those days," the early Christians sought to fulfil them by fasting from the afternoon of Good Friday to the morning of the Resurrection Day, and this space being about forty hours was termed Tessarakoste or Quadragesima. As time went on additional days were added, in some Churches more, in some less; but the two original days were more strictly observed than the rest. The precise number of 40, it is curious to observe, was not selected till the time of Gregory the Great, although the Fast was called the Quadragesimal Fast. Not only did the length of the Fast vary in different Churches, but the modes of observing it were many. Some made it last three weeks, some six, some seven; some excluded Saturdays as well as Sundays from the days they observed. Again, some abstained from all living creatures; others only from flesh: some would eat dry bread only, and others not so much as that. Some fasted a certain number of hours in each day, and then ate any kind of meat; others regarded the whole day as a kind of abstinence.

When the original space of 40 hours had been departed from, it was natural that the duration of the Fast should come before long to approximate with the 40 days of our Saviour's Fasting and Temptation, the 40 days spent by Moses and Elijah in the wilderness, and the 40 days' grace given in the preaching of Jonah to Nineveh. The name "quadragesima" would also have influence in determining the length of the season; and considerations of the worth and utility of a special time of prayer and self-denial spread over several weeks would exercise their weight. A particular reason for the Lenten Fast was found in the custom, which gradually prevailed among the majority of Christians, of communicating chiefly, and in many cases only, at Easter; it was hoped that there would be less danger of communicat a patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria being put under that of Constantinople. The Pope protested loudly against this canon, but nevertheless it was passed. The following year, Attila, having lost a great battle in Gaul, passed through Italy, ravaging the country as he went. As he was drawing near to Rome, Leo went out to meet him, and made such an impression on him by his discourse, that he persuaded him to return to his country. His officers asked him what made him comply with his will of a priest? and he is said to have replied that, whilst Leo was talking to him he saw a man standing by his side in an episcopal habit, threatening to kill him if he refused to obey the advice given him.

Leo was accused by some of not approving the Council of Chalcedon, and of favouring the doctrines of Eutychus; he wrote to the bishops to clear himself of the accusation, and also to the Emperor Marcian, to Eudoxia and plercheria. Geneseric, having been called in by Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, landed at the mouth of the Tiber in 455, took Rome, and gave it up to the pillage of his soldiers for seven days; but Leo prevailed upon him not to burn the city, and saved three of the principal churches from being plundered. He built a monastery near to the basilica of St. Peter, and he appointed some of the Roman clergy, whom he called Cubicularii, to take care of the sepulchres of the Apostles. He is said to have introduced the clause, hoc sanctum verificium, into the canon of the Mass. He died in 461. Du Pin says "that the Church of Rome never appeared in more true greatness and less pride than in the time of this Pope, and never was a Bishop of Rome more honoured and considered, and never was that see managed with more humility, charity, and discretion." His writings, especially his sermons and Epistles, are invaluable for the history of the times. His works were published at Paris in 1675 by Father Quezel, and his sermons were translated into French by the Abbé de Bellegarde in 1701. Dean Milman's criticism of his sermons is:—"Brief, simple, severe; without fancy, without metaphysical subtlety, without passion. It is the Roman Censor reminding with nervous majesty on the abuses of the people; the Roman Prefect dictating the law and delivering with authority the doctrine of the faith. They are regularly Christian—Christian as dwelling almost exclusively on Christ, His Birth, His Passion, His Resurrection: only polemic so far as called upon by the prevailing controversies to assert with especial emphasis the perfect Deity and the perfect Manhood of Christ."

Leo (619)

Les

Leontius of Byzantium, or Leontius Hierosolymitanus.—A rhetorician and scholar at Byzantium, who afterwards entered the monastery of St. Saba, near Jerusalem. The dates of his life are uncertain, especially as he has been confounded with others of the same name; but it appears that his chief work, De Sectis, was written about the close of the sixth century. He also wrote a treatise Contra Nestorianos et Eutychianos, which throws light on some of the difficulties of the Monophysite controversies.

Lerins, Convent of, situated on an island opposite Cannes, was founded about A.D. 400, by St. Honorat, Archbishop of Arles. The monks of the monastery which he built became very numerous, and had great influence over the Church of Southern France for some centuries. Its discipline afterwards relaxed, and Gregory the Great gave orders for its reformation. Its riches increased to such an extent that the island was many times attacked by plunderers—by the Arabs, Saracens, and Genoese. Nevertheless it still remained very wealthy, and Pope John XXII. and his successors gave it away in commendam, in order to get possession of its wealth. Finally in the fifteenth century, being too weak to retain its independence, it was united to the Benedictine Congregation of Monte Cassino. The abbey has since been secularised and the island sold.

Leslie, Charles, one of the Nonjuror divines. He was born at Dublin in 1650, the son of John Leslie, who was Bishop successively of the Isles in Scotland, and of Raphoe and Clogher in Ireland. Charles Leslie went to Enniskillen School, and afterwards to Trinity College, Dublin, took his degree, came to London to the Temple, and became a barrister for ten years. He then took Holy Orders, at the age of 30, and became curate at Glaslough, where the family estate was. Here he married Miss Griffith, daughter of the Dean of Ross, and a few years later was made Chancellor of the Diocese of Connor. At the Revolution he declined to take the oath to King William, was deprived of his preferment, and came to London, where he officiated as private chaplain to the second Lord Clarendon, and was a frequent preacher at the various places where the Nonjurors worshipped [Nonjurors], and was also much resorted to as a casuist. He never from that time took any regular cure. He lodged at the house of a Quaker, and thus acquired a full knowledge of that sect; was on friendly terms with William Penn, and won over several members of the body to the Church. He was fond of country sports, and well acquainted with the light literature and popular topics of the day, was very popular with his acquaintance, and always exercised his influence to the allaying of religious bitterness. But to his principles he was always firm, refusing offers of preferment from Burnet, and helping his distressed co-religionists out of his small means. Two or three times he visited James II. at St. Germain. In 1709 some of the Nonjurors, on the death of Bishop Lloyd, found themselves able to return to the established Church, but Leslie was not one of these. Next year he was outlawed for writing a pamphlet in answer to Bishop Burnet, and after hiding for a while, crossed to France, and ministered to the Protestants at the Chevalier's court. On the accession of George I. he was allowed to return to England, and devoted himself to theological writing. He died in 1722, and was buried at Glaslough. In accordance with his expressed wish when dying, his theological works were collected and published together; his political writings died a natural death. His theological works still live: first comes his Short and Easy Method with a Deist, which has been often reprinted, and is still in the catalogue of the Christian Knowledge Society; one of its chief merits is its admirable style. Many works had been written for the learned and for those who had leisure for ponderous disquisitions; but here was a work, short, full of matter, taking a vigorous turn of its own, and though close and acute in argument, yet most lucid.—"a reasoner not to be reasoned against," as Dr. Johnson called him. The main line of his argument runs thus: the doctrines of Christianity depend on the facts; let them be accepted as true, the doctrines will follow. The facts of Christianity have been attested by credible witnesses, who have handed down their testimony by means which cannot be gainsaid, not only by written records, but by usages and observances which have become public monuments, incapable of other explanation than that which they offer of themselves. Other works of his were the Short and Easy Method with the Jews; the Snake in the Grass and Satan Disrobed, both against the Quakers; and Regale and Pontificale, a treatise to justify the consecration of Non-juring Bishops.

Lesser Litany.—The term applied to three ejaculations, "Lord, have mercy upon us!" "Christ, have mercy upon us!" "Lord, have mercy on us!" which, it may be noticed, generally precede the Lord's Prayer, where it is intended to be used as a prayer rather than as a thanksgiving. The ejaculations are addressed severally to the Three Persons of the Trinity.

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim [b. 1729, d. 1781], was the son of a Lutheran pastor, first educated at the school of his native town of Kamenz, then at Meissen in Saxony, and from 1746-8 at the University of Leipsig. He was an insatiable and omnivorous reader almost from infancy, mastering the Latin, Greek, mathematics, and history of the curriculum, and reading other classics in his spare hours. He was intended for the ministry, and went to Leipsig with the full intention of studying theology; but there was no theologian there equal to the position of mastering him, and the love of classics and art gave him astron impetus towards the world, from which in his youth he had been quite shut out. Consequently he devoted himself to a literary life, and especially desired to purify the drama by writing plays of high moral tone. His time was spent, some at Berlin, some at Breslau. For the last eleven years of his life he was keeper of the Wolfenbuttel Library.

Lessing is a deeply interesting subject for meditation as regards his theological position. That he was sceptical is clear, but it was not the scoffing scepticism of Voltaire. He was a man of deep, earnest religious feeling, who questioned evidence severely, and hated fakery and prevarication. Probably he was unfortunately in the theologians with whom he came into collision, and was impatient and wearied of argumentation, when a simple faith an example of holy life might have conquered him. He used to express his longing to see the Saviour's miracles, that he might adopt and believe, but declared that the records did not suffice to teach him living belief in the Son of God. His faith, though not formulated, was really deeper than that of those who merely repeated formulas; it was eager to spring up and bear fruit in him, to be living and not a dead faith. He was caught hold, if only by the hem of the garment, that which he felt to be divine. And therefore his influence was probably good upon his countrymen, as he led them away from systems and theories, and shewed them in life the example of a true searcher after wisdom and after God.

Lessons.—The return of the Jews from captivity was followed by a provision for regular reading of the Scriptures to the people, and synagogues were set up throughout the land with this object. The Temp was for sacrifice and for the periodical meeting of the nation; the synagogues were for the reading of Moses and the Prophets every Sabbath day. In the time of our Lord the practice was most religiously observed, as He sanctioned it by attending [Luke iv. 14-21]. The Apostles kept it, first, attending the synagogue worship where they went; and as the Christian Church gradually became emancipated from the synagogue, the same practice was continued, a to the reading of the Old Testament in that of the New [see 1 Thes. v. 25 Col. iv. 16]. In the writings of the early Christian Fathers this is clear. Justin Martyr, writing a.d. 140, speaks of the reading of the memoirs of the Apostles and the writings the Prophets on the Lord's Day. The Apostolic Constitutions speak of four lessons, from the Old Testament, two from the Ne Later writers, e.g. Chrysostom and Augustine, give indications of a fixed system of reading Genesis was read in Lent and the Acts of the Apostles between Easter and Pentecost; John in Holy Week. In the Middle Ages extra-
From that date to the end of the year, the lessons, both morning and evening, are taken from the Apocalypse. (3) The lessons for festivals, instead of being selected as formerly from the Apocrypha, without any reference to the special occasion, consist of portions which have an appropriate fitness for the several days, and in most cases the second lessons are chosen to illustrate them. This is one of the happiest alterations [See A Companion to the Lectionary, by the Rev. W. Benham, in which the meaning of each selection is fully explained]. (4) There are alternative first lessons for Evensong on Sundays, so as to provide for a second evening service. This also gives an opportunity for a larger selection from the Old Testament. (5) Upon special occasions approved by the Ordinary, other lessons may be substituted. An excellent selection for such events as choir dedication, harvest festivals, etc., was published by the late Bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Wordsworth.

There is no settled rule to provide for the ambiguity which arises when a Saint's day falls on a Sunday, but the following seems best on the whole: the first Sunday in Advent, Easter Day, Whitsunday, Trinity Sunday, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Ascension Day, take precedence of all other days. In 1886 Easter Day was also St. Mark's Day, but no one thought of reading other than the Easter lessons. On other days, those days which have proper second lessons take precedence of those which have first lessons only. Thus, e.g., if St. James's Day fall on a Sunday, since the second lesson of the morning has a direct bearing on the first, it will mar its significance to separate the two, and both should be read, the Sunday lesson giving way. On other days, it is best, perhaps, to let the Sunday take precedence. The learned authors of "The Prayer Book Interleaved" have put forth a different rule, however, namely, that a lesson from the Canonical Books should always take precedence of one from the Apocrypha; according to the alternative rule, when All Saints' Day shall fall on a Sunday, the lessons from the Book of Wisdom would take precedence of two lessons from the minor prophets.

Letters Dimissory. [Dimissory Letters.]

Letters of Orders.—A document signed by a bishop, stating that he has ordained a clergyman. Churchwardens may demand to see the letters of orders before allowing any one to officiate in the church.

Letters Patent [Literæ Patentæ] are documents of the Sovereign to which the great seal of England is affixed, which enable a person to enjoy certain privileges which others have not; they are sometimes called letters patent, because they are not closed with the seal, but bear it depending from the document, so that it is always ready to open for inspection and confirmation of the authority. In France, such seals were affixed to bulls or briefs, &c., from Rome. The Canonists date this practice from the time of Louis XI. They were called letters-patent from their opening words: “Per presens publicum instrumentum cunctis patet evidentem:” “Let it be clearly made known to all by the present public instrument.”

“Let us Pray.”—It has long been the custom of the Church to recall the attention of the congregation by using this formula. Formerly the words “Let us pray earnestly,” or “Brethren, let us pray more earnestly,” were also used, but the simple form is the only one retained in the Episcopal Church. The use of the formula in the Litany is explained to be the marking of the transition from the alternate prayers of the minister and people to the collective prayers offered by the minister alone. In other cases it is simply a call to prayer after praise, exhortation, or the like.

Lensden, Johannes [b. 1624, d. 1699, at Utrecht], Professor of Hebrew in his native town, editor of the Scriptures in their original languages, and author of some commentaries upon them.

Leyden, John of. [Anabaptists.]

Libanius.—The most celebrated rhetorician of the fourth century, 6. at Antioch, in Syria, about 314. He studied and taught the art of rhetoric in Athens, and afterwards proceeded to Constantinople, whence he was expelled, probably by envious rivals, on a charge of dealing in magic. The same fate met him at Nicomedia, and after another short stay at Constantinople he returned to Antioch in 354, and remained there till his death, which took place between 395 and 400. His works were much admired and their style was imitated by the Emperor Julian, and among the more eminent of his disciples may be mentioned St. Chrysostom and Basil the Great. Notwithstanding this, Libanius was a firm upholder of paganism. His works comprise, besides his defences of heathenism, moral treatises on Greek history, and about two thousand letters.

Libation [from Lat. libare, “to pour out”].—Anything poured out as an offering in sacrifice. Such was the “drink-offering” of the Jewish Church. The practice was also found among heathen nations. The Romans at their meals made an offering to the Lares in the fire which burned upon the hearth. In fact the libation was a sort of “grace before meat.” No true worshipper presumed to touch the cup with his lips till the religious duty was fulfilled. So with the ancient Egyptians, a libation of wine was offered, together with incense. In 2 Tim. iv. 6 St. Paul alludes to this custom when he says: “I am already being offered and the time of my departure is come.” Literally it is, “I am being poured out as a libation.”

Libel.—In the Ecclesiastical Court, a term given to the declaration or charge committed to writing and presented on the part of the plaintiff in a suit.

Libellatici.—A class of persons among the Lapsed [q.v.], so called because they procured a libellus or certificate from a magistrate excusing them from compulsion to sacrifice in public. As this certificate was obtained either by denying their religion or by sending a friend or a slave to sacrifice in their name, or by a bribe, they were esteemed virtually guilty of apostasy.

LiberSeptimus.—Two books are known by this name. The first is a collection of Decretals from the pontificate of Gregory X to that of Sixtus V, arranged by Pius Matthieu of Lyons into five books, which was published in 1590, but is of no value. The second is a collection of recent Papal Constitutions and Conciliar Decrees, including those of the Council of Trent, which was published in 1598, but immediately suppressed as the Popes feared it would prevent the use from putting their own interpretation on the Decrees of the Council of Trent.

Liber Diurnus.—An ancient book of formularies used in the Roman Church, as supposed to have been compiled about 71. Fragments of it are found in the medized canonist, but as a whole it was long unknown. An edition was prepared at Rome in 1600, but forbidden by the Roman censors, and a first edition which actually appeared was that of the Jesuit Garnier.

“Libera nos,” etc. [i.] A responsive at the close of a funeral mass in the Roman Church, before the absolution is pronounced over the corpse. [ii.] It is the concluding petition in the Lord’s Prayer, and was so by the congregation, the preceding part of the prayer being said by the priest alone: the custom was retained in the Common of the first Prayer Book of Edward the Sixth, and still survives in the Roman Church, in the subsequent Prayer Books of the English Church. The present custom was adopted in place. In the canon of the Roman Mass, the words form also the beginning of another prayer added to the Lord’s Prayer; and are being inserted in this place, the “Libera nos” is termed also intercalaries. It is a prayer against temptation, and is found in slight differing forms in all the Western missals lat than the eighth century. Since the twelfth century the names of saints to be invoked have been added to the prayer.

Liberius, Pope. [Pope.]

 Libertines.—A religious sect which arose in Flanders in 1525, calling themselves spiritualists. Its chief founders were Quintin, a tailor of Picardy, and Coppin, of Lille, aid.
It made its way into France through the favour and protection of Margaret, Queen of Navarre and sister of Francis I., and found patrons in several of the Reformed Churches. Calvin devoted a treatise to the exposure of the errors of the Libertines, which checked their progress in France, and limited their influence to the country which gave them origin. The tenets of the Libertines were that God was the sole operating cause in the mind of man, and the immediate author of all human actions; that, consequently, the distinctions of good and evil, which had been established with regard to those actions, were false and groundless, and that man could not, properly speaking, contrive sin; that religion consisted in the unity of the spirit, or rational soul, with the Supreme Being; that all those who had retained this happy union, by sublime contemplation and elevation of mind, were then allowed to indulge, without exception or restraint, their appetites or passions; that all their actions and pursuits were then perfectly innocent, and that, after the death of the body, they would be united to the Deity.

The Libertines of Geneva were those whorose against the rule of the Bishop and the Duke of Savoy, established their independence, and invited Calvin to introduce the Reformation; but they found the reforms too strict, and became licentious and profane, making no pretence to any religious system. To this class belonged one Gruet, who denied the divinity of the Christian religion, the immortality of the soul, and the difference between moral good and evil, for which he was brought before the civil tribunal in 1550 and condemned to death.

Licence.—A document given by the bishop, authorising the person named therein to officiate on the conditions set forth in it.

Lichfield, Bishopric of.—The name "Lichfield" means "field of the dead," and is said to commemorate the slaughter of a number of Christian converts by the Roman soldiers during the Diocletian persecution. Lichfield, though not without some interruption, has been the seat of a bishopric since about 656. It was the great bishopric of Mercia, from which many sees afterwards sprang. Hereford was divided from it in 676; Lindsey in 678. Leicester and Lichfield were re-united in 706, but parted again in 737. Leicester became merged in Dorchester about 888, which again in 1072 became the See of Lincoln. Lichfield for a while became joined to Chester [1075], and to these was joined Coventry [1102]. In 1541 Chester was joined to the province of York.

St. Chad [q.v.], Bishop 669-672, is the patron saint of Lichfield. He lived at Stowe, about a mile from the present cathedral, and from thence ruled over his enormous diocese. A church had been built at Stowe by his predecessor Jarunman. Bede tells us that St. Chad was buried near the Church of St. Mary, the first in Lichfield, and that his remains were translated to the new church of St. Peter; this must have been completed before 735, when Bede died. After the Conquest, it was replaced by a Norman church, which was swept away after about a century, and gradually the present cathedral was built on its site. The oldest part (the western choir) was probably commenced about 1200. The north and south transepts followed, then the nave; then the west front, which does not appear to have been constructed quite continuously with the rest, for it is dated 1275; afterwards the eastern part of the choir was taken in hand, destroying the work done at the beginning of the century. The present Lady chapel and presbytery were erected and completed about 1325. Walter Langton, 1296-1321, did most of this, and constructed a splendid shrine for the relics of St. Chad, as well as building an episcopal palace. Since then nothing has been done except by way of restoring and improving the building. The great event in the history of Lichfield Cathedral was the siege which it sustained in 1643 against the Parliamentary army, headed by Lord Brooke. The cathedral close had been fortified by Bishop Langton in the thirteenth century, and so was calculated to sustain a siege. Injured by the cannon shots, the central spire fell and crushed in part of the roof; the cathedral was wrecked by the victors, who defaced the monuments, hacked down the carved woodwork, shattered the stained glass, and destroyed the records of the cathedral and of the city. After the Restoration, John Hacket was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (1661), and at once began the repair of his ruined cathedral; the great spire was rebuilt from a design by Sir Christopher Wren, and in 1669 the building was reconsecrated. In the latter part of the eighteenth century, Wyatt made some destructive alterations which it has cost much to undo. In 1860 Sir Gilbert Scott took the true restoration into his hands, and in the spring of 1884 the completion was signalised by a great ceremonial, when the west front was rededicated, in the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury and others.

Lichfield is one of our smaller cathedrals, being only 319 feet in length, but it is one of the most beautiful. Most of the old manuscripts belonging to the cathedral library were destroyed at the time of the siege, but one or two were saved, the chief being the Gospels of St. Chad; it contains the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Mark, and part of St. Luke: tradition says that Gildas was its scribe, and the Welsh notes on its margin bear out that supposition.

The cathedral body consists of the dean, three archdeacons, four canons residentiary, four priest vicars, and nineteen prebendaries.
Lichfield had 691 benefices, but part of the diocese has been taken to form the bishopric of Southwell. There is at present an assistant bishop for Lichfield. The income of the diocese is £4,200.

Lightfoot, John, D.D.—One of the earliest English Hebrew scholars, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent in 1602. He studied at Christ College, Cambridge. In 1621 he became B.A. and Assistant Master at Repton, Derbyshire: two years afterwards he was ordained and obtained the curacy at Norton-upon-Hales, Shropshire, and afterward became chaplain to Sir Rowland Cotton, who, being a good Hebrew scholar, inspired Lightfoot with a desire to become one also. In 1631 Sir Rowland presented him with the living of Ashley, in Staffordshire: subsequently he moved to London, and in 1642 was chosen minister of St. Bartholomew's. He was one of the Assembly of Divines who met at Westminster, and spoke much and eloquently, showing strong Presbyterian leanings. In the same year he became master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, and in 1644 rector of Much Munden, Hertfordshire. In 1655 he was made Vice-chancellor of Cambridge. At the Restoration he conformed to the Act of Uniformity, and was made Prebend of Elly where he died in 1675.

The work by which Lightfoot has made his name famous is Horne Hebraico et Talma dice, containing Hebrew and Talmudical comments on the four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, and 1 Corinthians. He also wrote Ernhabim, or Miscellanea Christiana et Judaica; A Handbook of Gleanings out of the Book of Exodus; The Harmony of the Four Evangelists, etc.

Lights on the Altar.—The custom of having lights and candlesticks on the altar dates from very early times, and Theodoret and Jerome speak of it. It seems probable that Archbishop Theodore introduced the practice among the Anglo-Saxons from the Eastern Church. There are many proofs that they were used in the English Church since the Reformation, though they have been long discontinued until late years. Queen Elizabeth, though opposed to superstition, had a crucifix and two candlesticks, and two tapers burning on the altar of her chapel. The present rubric states that "such ornaments of the Church shall be in use as were in this Church of England, by authority of Parliament, in the second year of the reign of Edward VI." In the injunctions of King Edward VI., set forth in 1547, it is ordered that there shall be "only two lights upon the high altar before the sacrament, for the signification that Christ is the very true light of the world." The two lights are a symbol of Christ's two fold nature. It is also said by the advocate of lights that they symbolize the need of more than natural light. Some object to any light on the ground that we have no "high altar," while others affirm that the "sacrament" signifies the consecrated wafer which was suspended in a pyx on the altar, and that it is this taken away the lights must also be removed. The use of lights has much in creased lately. In 1879 they were used in over two thousand churches. The last Ritual Judgment pronounced them illegal. [Folkestone Judgment.]

Liguori, Alfonso Maria de [b. 1696 d. 1787].—A saint of the Roman Catholic Church, and founder of the Redemptorists. He was born of noble parents in Naples, and having been educated by the Priests of the Oratory, he took up law as his profession, and won great success in it, but soon gave it up to lead a religious life. He was ordained priest in 1726, and in 1732, in consequence, he said, of a revelation, founded "the Congregation of our most Blessed Redeemer." In this he was joined by twelve companions. [Redemptorists.] In 1762, much against his will, he was made Bishop of St. Agatha of the roths, in the kingdom of Naples, but relinquished his See in 1775, and retired to lead the more an austere life with his own order at Nocera, where he died. He was solemnly anointed in 1839 by Gregory XVI., and in 1871 Pius IX. raised him to be a Doctor of the Church. He was one of the most voluminous and popular writers of the Roman Church, his publications extending to 70ols.; and this dignity was conferred on him a account of the distinct way in which he cuts forward the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin and the Infallibility of the Pope. His works are further noticed in the article on PROBABILITY.

The moral theology of Liguori has been received with more antagonism among protestants than that of any Roman archer on this subject. In fact his name among opponents of that Church is regarded a synonym of all that is crafty, shuffling, and immoral. It has been said that his system "not only destroys the soul, but even the fairest temporal interests of mankind ... the very masterpiece of the devil." The volume from which we quote these words consists of a collection of extracts from him: proof of these assertions. These extracts are grouped under such heads as "The Infallibility of the Pope," "Prohibition of Books," "The Lawfulness of Dissembling or Concealing," and "of Doing Evil that Good may come," of "Equivoication," "Obedience of children to the Church in Opposition to their Parents," "Theft and Restitution," "The acquisition," "The Confessional," and so on.

work which was published on this last subject a few years ago, and which gave such a force to the expression it is was suppressed, was largely taken from Liguori. In the controversy between Kingsley and Dr. Newman, the former resented his antagonist on the subject of quivocation as taught by Liguori, and drew from him the confession that he did not agree with Liguori in holding that an equivocation allowable in special cases and may even be confirmed with an oath. For Liguori says that if you are asked a question to which yes" would be the true answer, you may in certain circumstances reply, "I say no," meaning that you say the word "no" without reference to the question asked. "I plainly ad positive state, and without any reserve," writes Dr. Newman, "that I do not at all follow his holy and charitable man in this portion of his teaching." [Apologia, p. 424. See the whole passage from p. 417.]

Limborch, Philip van, Divinity Professor among the REMONSTRANTS or ARMINIANS [q.v.] at Amsterdam, was born there in 1633. He studied at Amsterdam, Leyden, and trecht. He became pastor of the Arminian church at Ganda, and in 1668 at Amsterdam; here he was also Divinity Professor. He died 1712. He published several manuscripts and letters belonging to Episcopius (his predecessor in the divinity chair) which form almost a complete history of the Arminians down to the Synod of Dort. He himself wrote De Veritate Religionis Christianae, the result of a discussion with a Jew; A History of the Inquisition; Christian Theology, etc.

Limbous or Limbo [Latin, "fringe" or "border"].—According to the Roman Catholics, besides the hell in which infidels and sinners are shut up for ever, and purgatory, in which the souls of the faithful are purified, there are two places on the outskirts of hell, "limbus patrum" and "limbus infantum." The limbus patrum is the Paradise of which Christ spoke to the thief, and the "Abraham's bosom" in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, the place where the souls of the patriarchs remained until the advent of Christ, who before His resurrection appeared to them and opened the doors of heaven for them. It is not known for certain when the word limbus first came into use, but it is first found in the writings of Thomas Aquinas. As inferi (hell) seemed to convey the idea of the place of eternal damnation, the milder term was adopted. The limbus infantum is for infants who die without baptism. It was stated by the Council of Florence that they could not enter heaven, so theologians adopted this and other theories. These infants were not supposed to undergo any suffering, but to be in a sort of passive state, though some theologians held it to be susceptible of a lower degree of blessedness.

Lincoln, BISHOPRIC or.—Lincoln was originally by far the most extensive diocese in England, being composed of three Anglo-Saxon bishoprics, Lindsey or Sidneyester, Leicester, and Dorchester, which will each be found under their respective heads. Lincoln became a separate See about 1072, when Remigius or Remi of Fecamp, its first Norman Bishop, removed it hither from Dorchester-on-Thames.

Ely was separated from Lincoln in 1109, and Lincoln was further divided into Osney, 1542 (afterwards Oxford, 1543) and Peterborough, 1541.

Remigius built the original cathedral, and from the portions which remain at the west end, it must have been of the severest Norman style, with no ornamentation; it terminated in a short apsidal eastern limb, and was built on the plan of a church at Rouen. A fire occurred in 1141, by which the roof was burned, and Bishop Alexander caused the whole church to be vaulted in stone. In 1185 a great earthquake did severe damage to the cathedral: as Roger of Hoveden says, "it was rent in two from top to bottom." The following year, 1186, Hugh of Avalon or St. Hucou [q.v.] became bishop, and at once commenced the present cathedral, the first stone of which was laid in 1192. It is dedicated to St. Mary. Hugh died in 1200, and by that time the ritual choir and eastern transept were completed, and the western transept commenced. This portion is of pure Lunet Gothic, without any admixture of Norman. Hugh was buried at Lincoln, and in 1280, in the time of Bishop Sutton, his body was translated to the "Angel Choir," which was built beyond the original eastern portion on purpose to receive his shrine. In 1233 the celebrated Robert Grossetête [q.v.] became bishop of Lincoln. The central tower of the cathedral was built by him, and probably the roofing of the nave. The Angel Choir completed the main fabric of the cathedral. The cloisters in the Geometrical Decorated style were commenced in 1296. In the third arch of the south choir aisle are the remains of the shrine of Little St. Hugh, a Christian boy said to have been crucified at Lincoln by the Jews in 1255; this was during the episcopate of Bishop Lexington. The seats of the choir have some very curious carvings, which probably illustrate some once popular but now forgotten poem. The Chapter House also belongs to the thirteenth century. The Galilee porch was probably built early in this century, in the time of William of Blois. The south end of the great transept dates from the episcopate of Thomas Bek [1342–1347], and the upper part of the western towers is in the Perpendicular style of about 1450. The cathedral is built in a commanding position on the top of a very steep hill. Its central tower contains the famous bell, "Great Tom of Lincoln," first cast in 1610, and recast in 1835. The cathedral library contains a valuable collection of manuscripts and early printed books. The façade of the cathedral is terminated by stai r turrets, with tall spires; that to the south is adorned with the mitred effigy of St. Hugh, the founder of the church, and that on the north has the figure of "the Swincher of Stow," who gave a peck of silver pennies towards the building.

Richard Fleming [1420–1431] had to carry out the sentence of the Council of Constance in 1425 for exhuming the body of Wycliffe, burning it to ashes, and casting them into running water, which was done at Lutterworth.

Robert Sanderson [1669–1683] [q.v.] was one of the most celebrated bishops of Lincoln. Bishop Barlow [1675–1691] is said never to have visited his cathedral, and, though he defended James II.'s strongest measures, he was equally ready to do homage to William III.

The cathedral body comprises the bishop, dean, two archdeacons, four canons residen tiary, four minor canons, and fifty-two prebendaries. Until lately it comprised 812 benefices, but part of it and part of Lichfield have been taken to form the new diocese of Southwell.

The Bishop of Nottingham is Suffragan for Lincoln.

The income of the see is £4,500.

Lindisfarne, Bishopric of.

The rocks of the great and almost royal See of Durham were originally planted in a small island of the name of Lindisfarne, lying off the northern coast of Northumberland. This island had been given to St. Aidan by Oswald, King of Northumberland, as a token of his victory at Hexham had secured him the sovereignty of Bernicia, the territory now known as the counties of Northumberland and Durham [Aidan]. This island became the seat of the bishopric, to which it gave its name in 635. From the time when Aidan first took possession of the island until 875, when his successor Eardulf was driven out of it by the Danes, there was a regular succession of bishops of Lindisfarne. Eardulf died a.d. 899, when the See was transferred to Chester-le-Street, a few miles north of the site occupied later by the city of Durham [Chester-le-Street]. The greatest of these bishops of Lindisfarne was St. Cuthbert [q.v.] [Durham, Bishopric of].

Lindsey, Bishopric of.

Paulinus, Archbishop of York in 627, spread Christianity over Lindsey, the northern part of Lincolnshire, of which Lincoln was the capital. This province was dependent on Mercia, at or a time it formed part of the Moreian bishopric of Lichfield, established in 656; but a 678 it was detached by Egfrid of Northumbria, who had defeated the King of Ferria, and constituted a separate See which was fixed at Sidnacister, doubtless the same as the present Stow, which has a fine Norman church. Its first bishop was Etheldred; it was nited to the See of Dorchester about 958 by Ethelwin, and then to Lincoln in 1072 by temigius.

Linen Cloth.—For at least 1,300 years has been customary to use a white linen cloth for covering the elements on the altar at the Holy Communion. In agreement with his custom the rubric of the Episcopal Church requires that the altar at the Communion time shall have a "fair white linen cloth upon it," and also that after all have received the Communion, the consecrated elements that remain shall be covered with a fair white linen cloth.

Lingard, John, D.D. [b. at Winchester, cb. 1771, d. at Hornby, Lancashire, July, 851]. He was educated as a Roman Catholic at the English College at Douai, in France, or eleven years, leaving it in 1793 to becomector in the family of Lord Stourton. In 1791 he went to Crook Hall, near Durham, here, as the Douai College had broken up, some of the students had assembled. Here Lingard completed his studies, and, having been ordained Priest in 1798, became Vice-president of the College, and Professor of Moral and Natural Philosophy. He was made resident in 1810, but only held that post for a year, and accepted a small church at Hornby in order to give more time to literary work. He visited Rome in 1817, and again in 1821, when Pope Pius VII. made him Doctor of Divinity and Doctor of Laws. Pope Leo XII. honoured to make Lingard a Cardinal, but he declined on the same ground as that on which he had resigned his post at the English College. He was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1824, and some years later a pension of three hundred pounds was granted him by the Government. He is chiefly known by his historical works, The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, published in 1816, and History of England (1843), the value of which is very great for his knowledge of constitutional history, though of course it is biased throughout in favour of Roman Catholicism. He also published various controversial writings—A Catechism on the Doctrines of the Catholic Church, a collection of Tracts on the same subject, and a New Version of the Four Gospels.

Linus, St., Pope.—According to Roman tradition, when St. Peter and St. Paul had founded the Church at Rome, and brought it to a flourishing condition, they appointed ministers capable of governing it during their absence from the city. Linus, Anacletus, and Clement were chosen, and, it is said, received the episcopal character at the hands of the Apostles. Linus is supposed to be the same whom St. Paul mentions in his Second Epistle to Timothy. Some authors tell us that St. Peter chose Clement to succeed him, preferably to his two fellow labourers, but that Clement, to avoid disputes, declined governing the Church, as also probably did Anacletus, for we find Linus placed immediately after St. Peter by the most reliable writers of the early Church, such as Jerome, Irenæus, Eusebius, and Rufinus. It is said that Linus governed the Church for twelve years, which some count from St. Peter's martyrdom, and others from the time of his being chosen coadjutor with the Apostles. Bishop Pearson takes, with Rufinus, the latter view. It is impossible to fix the exact date of his episcopate. Eusebius gives it differently in his History and his Chronicle, Baronius gives it as 67—78, while Bishop Pearson and Baratarius give it as 55—67. Some say that Linus suffered martyrdom under Vespasian, but there seems to be no proof of this. He is honoured by the Western Church on September 23rd, but the Eastern Church celebrate him on November 5th, in conjunction with others whom they reckon among the seventy-two disciples of our Lord. Dean Milman, in speaking of the obscurity of the early Roman Church, says: "The names of the earlier Roman bishops are known only by barren lists, by spurious decrees and epistles, inscribed centuries later with their names; by their collision with the teachers of heretical opinions, almost all of whom found their way to Rome; by martyrs, ascribed with the same lavish reverence to those who lived under the mildest of Roman emperors as well as those under the most merciless persecutors." [Lat. Christ., vol. i. p. 23.]

Lis. [Military Orders.]

Litania Septena. [Processions.]
a litany. The idea was retained as late as the first English Book of Prayer, the Primer, in the reign of Henry VIII. In that book the Litany is called the Common Prayer of Procession. But we have no reason to think that there was any intention of returning to the old practice. Since that time the word “litany” has been stripped of that accidental portion of its meaning, and passed into its present use.

In dealing with the history of the Litany we naturally ask, What led to those processions? With what facts in Church history have they been connected? The first Litany in this sense of the word is found in Joel ii. [Epistle for Ash Wednesday]. That was apparently a time of famine. The people were bidden to show their repentance by solemn fasts. There is something in that solemn confession by public and national acts which adapts itself to certain states of feeling, such as fear and repentance. We might expect, especially in Eastern nations, that, as other usages found their way into the Christian Church, so would this. But the persecutions of the second and third centuries, by driving the Christians to take refuge in secret chambers, catacombs, and caves, would tend to stop solemn processions. Perhaps the only exceptions would be found in times of great public suffering, when Christians found themselves fellow-sufferers with others, who would be too much alarmed for themselves to feel disposed to attack or interfere with the Christians. Tertullian, who represents, in his Apology, the state of the Church in the second and third centuries, speaks of the Christians of his time, in seasons of general distress, as publicly joining in supplications and intercessions in coverings of sackcloth and ashes. He uses this phrase again and again, “Si procedendum erit,” acts are therefore implied as not confined within walls, but as taking place in public. There is a memorable event in the life of Chrysostom. He found himself opposed by a rich and influential party of the Arians. They appealed to the devotional feelings of the people, marched with great splendour through the streets of Constantinople, passed out of the city singing heretical hymns and stirring the people up against Chrysostom. He met them by starting more solemn and more grand processions, with stately silver crosses and finer hymns; the Arians were defeated, and the people were drawn off to hear Chrysostom’s surpassing eloquence.

The history of the latter part of the fourth and fifth centuries shows that processional litanies had now come to be used in times of famine, wars, and pestilence. From the Eastern Church this practice passed into the West. The very fact of a Greek name being used for it, and of the chief prayer used in these Litanies being expressed in Greek, “Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison,” shows that it was of Eastern origin. It is interesting to trace it in this connection. It appeared at first, not in Rome, but in Gaul. There was a more continuous intercourse between Gaul and Asia than with Rome; and in the south of Gaul, at the end of the fifth century, under the government of one of the great pastors and organisers of that Church, Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, we find these processions. The barbarians were laying waste the cultivated land, bringing desolation, famine, and pestilence. When men were almost driven to despair, he introduced this, calling it, not litany, but by a Latin equivalent. These were, he said, days of rogationes, and in order that there might be standing memorial of that help which the Church was solicited, the Rogation days were set apart. They have always been kept up since then. Passing from Gaul to Rome, we find both the name and the practice under Gregory the Great, the organised government and of the worship of the Church. His was also a time of great suffering: the Empire was laid waste, and therefore the need was felt of penitence and prayer. I divided the city into seven groups, and the inhabitants of each went about with the cry “Kyrie eleison!” and at last all met together in the great litany. In the account of an event more closely connected with the history of our own Church, we find an instance of the same practice. When Augustine landed in Thanet to convert the Saxon and Ethelbert allowed him, with his monks, to enter Canterbury, he reproduced that procession with which he had been familiar in Rome, singing the Litany, looking on the heathen city as under condemnation, and praying to its deliverance. We cannot wonder, when we look at the history of the dark ages—do not more with the darkness of ignorance but with the gloom of misery—that Litanies should have become more and more respectable, that the minds of men turned them as a refuge and a help. The Council of Toledo, at the end of the seventh century, ordered them to be used every month.

The use of the Litany on Sundays below the Church of England. The idea was that of a penitential service, but with progress there was also corruption. Litanies came full of invocations to human mediators in consequence of the miseries as well as ignorance of the times. Men who had their full trust in Christ turned to any saint, martyr, or confessor whose name they revered and whom they had reason to love. So in the eighth and ninth centuries the “Sancta Maria pro nobis!” came into use, and, later, the same formula was addressed to the Apostles and saints. When we take the Litany as at the time of the Reformation, we find it as much as it is now, but disfigured by the supplications. In the reign of Henry VI the Reformers thought these, first needly, then corruptious, and later idolatry. Litanies were not used, and the first step was that of translating it into English.
The long series of supplications to saints was omitted, but the principal ones were at first stated—one to the Virgin, one to the apostles, and one to saints and martyrs. In the Prayer Book of 1549 these were omitted and the Litany was much as it is now. It is, as much as any part of the Prayer Book, a striking instance of Cranmer’s Christian discretion in keeping what was old and rejecting what was new. [See Proctor, comparison between the Romish Litany and that of the Archbishop of Cologne.] There are a very few points in which they differ—e.g., the Litany of Edward VI. [1st Book] has a prayer against the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable [2nd Book, abominable] enormities. In Elizabeth’s Prayer Book detestable was restored; but as she wished, if possible, to conciliate the Romanists, that petition was dropped in 1559, and has never since reappeared. Again, the petition for the clergy, “That Thou wilt be pleased to preserve the apostolic see and all orders in the Church in holy religion.” So it continued till the last revision, when one of the great questions at issue turned on the validity of Presbyterian orders. Those who took part in the controversy set themselves strongly against admitting these orders, and expressed their feeling by changing to the words “Bishops, priests, and deacons.”

The original intention of the Litany was that of a separate service to be used as a prelude to the Holy Communion. It was the general practice to divide the morning prayers from the Communion Service. The first sanction to read on without any break was given by Grindal in the days of Elizabeth; since then it has been common to do so, but no Rubric or Canon obliges that union of services, and all ministers have liberty in this respect.

LITERE FORMATAE.—Letters from one bishop to another, of a particular form and shape to render them distinguishable from counterfeits. They were of a commendatory character, giving clergy or laymen who were travelling introduction to the bishop whose diocese they visited, or certifying that the cleric named in them had his bishop’s leave to remove from his diocese and seek a cure in another. The granting of such letters was jealously confined to the bishop: several local Councils noticed with censure the infringement of this rule.

LITERATE.—A name given to one admitted to ordination without an university degree.

Liturgy [Gr. leitourgia].—This was originally the name of a public duty or office, which, in Athens, the richer citizens had to discharge at their own cost. It consisted of providing for the benefit of the people generally some form of public amusement, consisting usually of dancing or games. Leitourgia thus became the name of any service or functions of a public character, and hence in the Septuagint it is used of the public service of God, of Divine worship of the congregation. In ecclesiastical phraseology it was originally restricted specially to the Eucharist, as being the highest of public offices; but has now obtained a wider signification, and is commonly applied to the whole form of public worship of the congregation. We shall consider the subject, therefore, under this twofold division.

It seems probable that some Liturgy was drawn up by the Apostles at the very beginning of the Christian Church, for the use of the first converts to Christianity, who, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles, continued steadfastly in the Apostle’s doctrine, and in breaking of bread—i.e. in partaking of the Holy Communion—and in the prayers.” In that case this would be the original Liturgy from which the succeeding ones were derived. Hence in very ancient Liturgies the bulk of the service is identical, and the variations, comparatively speaking, unimportant. In order to classify the numerous Liturgies that have been used in different parts of the world, it will be well to divide them into five principal groups. These are connected with the names of Churches, and also with the names of certain Apostles, and they are as follows: [i.] The Liturgy of St. James, or Jerusalem; [ii.] The Liturgy of St. Mark, or Alexandria; [iii.] The Liturgy of St. Thaddæus, or the East; [iv.] The Liturgy of St. Peter, or Rome; [v.] The Liturgy of St. John, or Ephesus. The Jerusalem Liturgy consists of three divisions: the Clementine, Caesarean, and Antiochen or Hierosolymitan Liturgies. From the Caesarean Liturgy, which is connected with the name of St. Basil, came the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom and the Armenian.

The many branches which have sprung from these norms would require a volume to expound. There are no less than 43 existing, all Monophysite, branching-off from the Hierosolymitan.

The third group, consisting of Liturgies of the Far East, is smaller in number: most of them are Nestorian. That of Malabar or St. Thomas belongs to this group.

The fourth division consists of only one Liturgy; the Roman.

The fifth group, viz., those allied to the Liturgy of Ephesus, consists of two divisions [i.] The Mozarabic and [ii.] The Gallican.

It will be observed that four of the five groups are Eastern; and the remaining one, the Roman, Western. The principal distinctions between the Eastern and Western Liturgies are as follows:—The Invocation of the Holy Spirit before the words of consecration which is in the Eastern, is absent in the Western. There are Proper Prefaces and varying Collects, Epistles, and Gospels for Holy Days in the Western, and not in the Eastern, with the exception of the Liturgies.
derived from Ephesus. Later alterations in the Roman Mass, such as the denial of the cup to the laity, have further increased the differences between that and the Eastern Liturgies.

Every ancient Liturgy consisted of two parts; the pro-anaphoral and the anaphoral. [ANAEHORA.] The first part consisted of a prayer; an introit; the prayer of little entrance—that is, the bringing in with much ceremony the Book of the Gospels; the trisagion; the lessons (in some, prophecy, epistle and gospel; in others the last two only); a prayer. At this point the catechumens were dismissed from the church. Then followed a further prayer for the faithful; the great entrance—i.e., the carrying the elements to the altar; the offertory; the kiss of peace; the creed. This ended the first or pro-anaphoral portion of the service. The second, or anaphoral part, began with the Sursum Corda and preface; the canon, consisting of prayer commemorative of our Lord's life and of the institution of the Eucharist; the Oblation; prayer for descent of the Holy Ghost, for the consecration of the elements. Then follows intercession for quick and dead; the Lord's Prayer; the "Libera nos" or prayer against temptation; adoration, "Sancta sanctorum" [SANCTA SANCTIS]; confession and absolution; the Communion, thanksgiving, and dismissal.

The best account of the ancient Liturgies, displaying their points of union and their variations, is Mr. Hammond's work, published by the Clarendon Press.

How the Communion Service of the Church of England is related to the ancient Liturgies has been fully considered in an article on the COMMUNION SERVICE. We have next to consider modern Protestant Liturgies. And, first, it must be noted that while the ancient Liturgies make the Lord's Supper the central object round which all other parts of the service are grouped, the Protestant idea is rather to group all round the sermon, as expressing the conviction that teaching is the main object of assembling together. The early Liturgies do not include any preaching, nor are there any forms for special occasions.

When the Reformation came, the great leaders, Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, recognised the usefulness of a form of prayer, and each country that accepted the Reformed doctrines provided its own Liturgy. Our own is considered under the head COMMON PRAYER [q.v.]. But the Continental Reformers left more opening for the exercise of free prayer, to be suited to special circumstances. So did the DIRECTORY [q.v.] of the Puritans at the time of the Great Rebellion. The bitter feeling which followed that event led to a breach so wide, that for a while liturgical services were eschewed by the non-Episcopal party, and extemporaneous prayers were substituted. Of late years, however, a more catholic feeling has prevailed. In the Presbyterian Church of Scotland since 1858 a change has been going on, and the Book of Common Order has reached a fifth edition. Many Church belonging to the chief Nonconformist bodies accept the idea of some liturgical form to be used of free-will. Thus Mr. Newman, who uses much of the Church Service; the use of the Lord's Prayer and General Thanksgiving is becoming very common, and on the late occasion of the Queen's jubilee many Nonconformist Churches in London used the college given in the Prayer Book. The argument for the two systems will be familiar to most readers, one side pleading for the spontaneous and unrestrained impulses of the religious mind, the other for the long custom of the Church, and also for the need of precaution against form and words with which the minds of the people may not be in harmony. The needs of the individual soul must indeed be supplied by individual private prayer. But the facts above given show that "the most excellent way" of charity is doing much and will yet do more, for removing differences on this subject. It should, in conclusion, be pointed out that even the singing of hymns involves the essence of a liturgical form since it is the acceptance for congregational use of already written words.

Liverpool, Bishopric of.—This has only existed since 1880; it comprises a part of Lancashire, and has 182 benefices. A present it has no cathedral, but steps are being taken to provide one. Until 1699 Liverpool was a chapelry of the parish of Walton-on-the-Hill, but in that year became a separate parish by Act of Parliament. I was at once resolved to erect a church, to thenceforth the parish church of Liverpool this was finished in 1704 and dedicated to St. Peter. And here the throne of the first Bishop of Liverpool, John Charles Ryle, is set up. The church presents no special object of interest. Funds do not allow the formation of a regular cathedral body, nor regular cathedral service. There are tw archdeaconys and twenty-three honorar canons. The income of the See is £3,500.

Livesey. [TEETOTALERS.]

Living.—In the Church of England a ecclesiastical benefice or pastoral charge [BENEFICE.]

Livingston, John Henry, D.D.—The father of the Dutch Reformed Church in America, was born at Poughkeepsie, New York, in 1746, studied at Yale College and in 1766 sailed for Utrecht to study theology. He became a D.D in 1772 and on his return to America in the same year took his place as second preacher in the Reformed Dutch Church in New York. The Revolution drove him from the city, and visited many places, returning to New York in 1783. In 1810 he opened a theological seminary in New Brunswick, and was elected president of Queen's (now Rutgers') College. He died in 1825.
Liv (631) Lla

Livingston won the respect of both parties in the Church, and under his management the "Conferentie" and the Cactus were united. [Dutch Reformed Church]. He principally formed the constitution of the Church, and prepared its first psalm and hymn book. As a preacher he was much admired. His theological lectures, of which an abstract was published in 1832, "still form he basis of didactic and polemic instruction n the theological seminary of which he was he founder and father."

Livingstone, David, the great African missionary and explorer, was born at Blantyre, near Glasgow, in 1813. His parents were of the working class, of the highest moral and Christian worth, and deeply interested in Christian missions. In 1823 David worked as a piece worker in a cotton mill, attending a night school in the evenings. At the age of nineteen he began to attend the medical and other classes in the winter months at Glasgow, and in 1838 he received a surgeon's diploma. He applied to and was received by the London Missionary Society, and went to Chippins Ongar in Essex to continue his studies. In 1840 he met the Rev. Dr. Moffat, the celebrated African missionary, who was on furlough in England, and at the end of the year accompanied him to Kuruman. He did not settle down there, but was determined to carry the missions further north than had yet been done, and settled at Mabotsa, among the Bakhatla tribe, where he had a remarkable escape from a lion. He next attached himself to the tribe of the Bakwains, whose chief, seethole, was converted and baptised. He remained with them till 1859, making many conversions and teaching them civilised arts, his wife—be had married Mary Moffat, eldest daughter of Dr. Moffat, in 1844—teaching the women and girls. While here he made several expeditions among the Boers, who had settled in the border of the Bechuana territory and were very hostile to Livingstone, and he had discovered Lake Ngami and the River Zongu and Tamunakile. Several of the Bakwains living now learnt to read, and promising to act as missionaries to the rest, Livingstone determined to move northwards. He set out, accompanied by two Englishmen, and after many difficulties reached the river Chobo, and met the great chief Sebituane, who received him very cordially, but died a few days after his arrival. Livingstone's great object now was to make a way for Sebituane's people to be connected with the sea. They were friendly to him, and to put them in communication with the world would be to further the great cause of civilisation. He determined therefore to devote himself to this object, and, having shipped his wife and children for England, he set off on his quest. After a great many difficulties, he reached Quilimane in 1856, having made many important discoveries, the chief being the healthy table-land in Central Africa. He then paid a visit to England, where he wrote and published his first work, Missionary Travels. It was received with intense interest, for it poured a flood of light upon a land hitherto quite unknown. Having severed himself from the London Missionary Society, he was appointed commander of an expedition sent by Government to explore the Zambesi River. This was rendered more than usually difficult by the conduct of the Portuguese slave-traders, but it was signalised by the discovery of the Lake Nyassa and much important territory. Livingstone rightly deeming this to be the key of Central Africa, an Universities' Mission from Oxford and Cambridge was planted there; but it failed, chiefly through the death of its bishop and of Mrs. Livingstone. Nevertheless Livingstone remained some time longer to further explore the country, but at last saw it was desirable to return to write a book against the Portuguese traders, and to obtain means to establish a colony at the head of the river Rovuma. He arrived in England in 1864, and stayed at Newstead Abbey, where he wrote Zambesi and its Tributaries. Though determined still to make the preaching Christ to the natives and the promoting lawful commerce instead of the slave trade his chief object, he agreed to explore Central Africa, to endeavour to discover the sources of the Nile. During his journeys he discovered Lakes Mocro and Bangweolo, and then was unheard of for some time, till, in 1871, Mr. Stanley discovered him, in great want and destitution, at Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika. Stanley came to his relief, gave him supplies and better men, and Livingstone continued his journey; but fell ill and died in Ilala, on the banks of Lake Bangweolo, May 1st, 1873. He was found on his knees, his Bible in his hand. He was brought to England by his servants, and buried in Westminster Abbey, April, 1874. Since his death many missions have been formed in Africa, and David Livingstone has given a new impulse to the cause of African evangelisation and civilisation.

Liwin, St.—An Irish bishop of the seventh century. He placed himself under the discipline of St. Augustine, who was at that time converting England to Christianity. After Augustine's death St. Liwin went to Ireland, and was consecrated bishop there. Having a strong desire to carry on the work of evangelisation, he set sail for Brabant, where he suffered martyrdom after a short period of missionary work AD 656.

Llandaff, Bishopric of.—This claims to be one of the most ancient Sees in England;
its founders were St. Dubricius or Dyfrig, who had resigned the See for some time before his death in 612, and his successor St. Teilo, the date of whose death is unknown. The “Book of Llandaff,” compiled about 1133, gives the names of many bishops between the time of Teilo and Urban, the first Norman bishop 1107, but it is not to be relied upon. Urban replaced the British church of Dubricius and Teilo by a cathedral of very small size; there is no record of the time when it was completed, nor indeed any certain records of its architectural history. The Lady Chapel was probably built by William de Bruce [1266-1287]. The Perpendicular tower on the north is simple and massive; it was built by Jasper Tudor, uncle to Henry VII., and replaces an Early English one. About the middle of the sixteenth century the cathedral was allowed to fall into decay under Bishop Kitchin, alias Dunstan, who alienated many of the lands belonging to the See, and disposed of others on long leases—for instance, the episcopal residence was leased for 99 years. Bishop Godwin [1601-1617] speaks of Kitchin as “Fundi nostri colamitis.” For the works of this Bishop see GODWIN, Francis.] The cathedral was in a state of absolute ruin in 1575. In 1721 a great part of the ruins, which were roofless, were blown down in a storm, and at length an appeal was made to the country for help. Accordingly the Lady Chapel was repaired sufficiently to carry on the service, but the nave was left open to the sky till the restoration was begun in 1857.

About 1836 it was seriously proposed to unite Llandaff with Bristol, but it was saved from this, and under Bishops Coplestone and Ollivant a new era began. In 1840 and 1843 two important Acts were passed, which resuscitated the dean’s office, which had been done away with, and under its first three deans, Bruce-Knight, Conybeare, and Williams, the restoration was completed. The eastern portion of the cathedral was opened for service in 1857, and for the first time since 1691 clerical service was heard in Llandaff Cathedral. The nave and remainder of the restoration was completed by July, 1869. Practically the bishopric and its cathedral and cathedral body are alike new. No bishop had resided there for 300 years, and for about six centuries there had been no dean; the chapter was merely a nominal one. Bishop Ollivant gave a vivid description of the state of the cathedral at his enthronement in 1859, in his charge of 1869.

The cathedral stands on low ground, near the river Taff (hence its name Llan-daff, the church by the Taff). The cathedral body consists of a dean, two archdeacons, four canons residentiary, two minor canons, and five prebendaries. The diocese comprises the best parts of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire, and contains 227 benefices. The income of the See is now £4,200.

Lloyd, WILLIAM [b. 1627, d. 1717], graduated at Oxford, and became Fellow of Jesus College. After various other appointments he became successively Bishop of St. Asaph [1680], of Lichfield and Coventry [1692], and of Worcester [1699]. Bishop Lloyd is famed as being one of the seven bishops who refused to read the Declaration of Indulgence, King James II. ordered in 1688. They were sent to the Tower for sedition, but acquittal was the author of many pamphlets, tending to the Chief being An Historical Account of Church Government as it was in Great Britain and Ireland when they first received the Christian Religion.

Local Preachers in the Methodist Church are laymen who are licensed to preach by the district and quarterly congregation. They are the opposite of "travelling preachers." They must have a regular pastor’s charge. After four years’ service they become "local deacons," and four years after "local elders." This formal and wholesome adoption of lay ministry is in many respects the very groundwork of the Methodist system [METHODISM]. By far the large number of the regular or travelling preachers have served an acceptable probation as local preachers, in which their capacities are fairly ascertained. But, besides this, without an noble army of local preachers, drawn from the people themselves, the work could not possibly be done; in fact Methodism is in one aspect of it the most impressive example in the world of enormous results accomplished by a rank, wholesale, and official adoption of laygence in the pulpit and otherwise.

Loci Theologici.—The sources from which theological arguments are drawn. Melancthon gave this name to his view of evangelical dogmatism in distinction to the ententio of the Schoolmen. It was retained by the Lutherans to the middle of the seventh century.

In the Roman Church the name became familiar by the celebrated work of Melchior Canus [†, 1523, d. 1560], Bishop of the Canaries, in which he discussed the use to be made by theologians of Scripture, Councils, philosophy, fathers, etc. It forms a scientific introduction to Dogmatic Theology.

Locke, John, an English philosopher b. 1632, d. 1702], was born at Wrington, near Bristol, the son of a captain in the Parliamentary army. Locke was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford, and became proficient in classical literature; but gave his chief attention to the works of Bacon and Descartes, which he preferred to those of Aristotle. In 1664 he went to Berlin as secretary to Sir W. Swan, the British envoy; but after a year he returned to Oxford, where he made the acquaintance of Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, who lived in his house, and when, in 1672, Shaftesbury was made Lord Chancellor, Locke was appointed Secretary of Presentations, which post he exchanged for that of Secretary to the Board of Trade when Shaftesbury regained the Great Seal. In 1675 Locke visiting France for his health, became acquainted with the Earl of Pembroke, to whom his essay is dedicated. In 1679 he was recalled by England by the Earl of Shaftesbury, who had been restored to favour, but six months afterwards was again disgraced, and after a short imprisonment in the Tower, fled to Holland in 1682 to avoid a prosecution for high treason. Locke followed him, and so shared the hostility of the Court as to lose his name erased by royal mandate from the list of students of Christ Church. He was one of the eighty-four persons demanded of the States of Holland on the charge of being in the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, at his own personal risk for his sake was tried. In 1687 he completed his Essay on the Human Understanding, and the next year published his first letter on Toleration, and obtained the situation of Commissioner of appeals, with a salary of £200 a year. In 1690 his Essay was published, and in the same year appeared his second letter on Toleration, and two treatises on Government. In 1691, finding that the London air did not suit him, he retired to the house of Sir Francis Masham at Oates, in Essex, where he spent the remainder of his life. In 1692 appeared the third letter on Toleration, and soon after his Thoughts on Education. In 1695 King William appointed him a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations, which he had to resign on account of his health. He gave himself up to the study of the Scriptures, and wrote several theological works, Discourse on Miracles, etc., which were published after his death.

The influence of Locke upon English moral and religious thought has been very great. Though, as we have said, he was a student of Descartes, his method is different at the very foundation. The former assumes innate ideas as the centre of all knowledge. The overthrow of innate ideas is the starting point of Locke. He has been called the philosopher of sensation, for he tries to trace all notions, opinions, judgments to their beginning; starts from the first acts of a child, and so contemplates the impressions made on the senses, rather than the objects with which the senses converse. But such a method did not bring these objects any more clearly before the understanding than they were before; he did not get beyond human ideas of them; his nearest approach to the root of all faith and knowledge is to tabulate all that men are able to think about them. His business is with the "Human Understanding," and so he repudiates the search into Being and first principles. It may therefore be doubted whether he did not really lower the principles of morality. For, instead of holding up righteousness and justice as absolutely good, he threw aside these ethical principles, and proclaimed "Things are good or evil only in reference to pleasure or pain." He did not apply such sentiments unworthily in his own personal character, for they were necessary parts of his philosophy, and practically modified, or, we may say, relinquished it in favour of Christian belief in absolute righteousness. In fact, he raised questions which he did not settle, but which inaugurated a new era of study. The questions which he asked but did not answer, respecting the Nature of the Mind, the Principles of Government, Toleration, Education, the Reasonableness of the Christian Religion, were taken up in the eighteenth century and discussed in the gossip of salons, with pens, with swords—with tears also and prayers. Not only his contemporaries, who were his pupils, Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, but English moralists for fifty years more, regarded him as having laid down principles which could never again be called in question. But this acquiescence came to be rudely shaken. The Methodist movement was a sign that his theory of "paternal governments," with the decrees of which the masses of the people should acquiesce, would not stand; that poor as well as educated men needed real belief, and not mere acceptance. And men with his theory of Toleration on their lips, were not hindered by it from very intolerant acts towards these disturbers of slothful calmness. Yet it was largely owing to Locke’s teaching that England was spared from the terrible agony which came on France at the Revolution. Deism, and even Atheism, appeared here even earlier than in France. But in France the Jansenists were suppressed and the Protestants expelled by Louis XIV. In England the cause of God was not snatched out of His hands as though He were unable to take care of Himself. The preaching of Wesley was one cause of our deliverance, for he taught thousands of the people to fear God; and Locke’s teaching on Toleration was certainly another.

Lockers.—In ancient English churches these are cavities hollowed out of the substance of the wall, sometimes on the north side of the altar. They are usually square, and have no basin at the bottom. They had formerly small doors, and contained the cruets of wine and water, the towels, and other things needed in celebrating mass.

Logos.—This Greek word, derived from the perf. of logos, “to speak,” means literally “a word,” and is used in that sense in Matt. viii. 16, etc. In I John iii. 18 it is opposed to deed and truth. Other meanings are Commands or Precepts [Matt. vii. 24], Prophecies [Luke iii. 4, John ii. 22], Promises [Rom. ix. 6, Heb. vii. 28], Threats [Heb. iv. 12], Arguments [Acts ii. 40], Reports or Rumours [Matt. xxviii. 16]. In a higher sense it is used for the word of God, whether expressed by the Law or in the Gospel [Matt. xiii. 19, etc., etc.]. In a heathen sense it was used constantly for the reason, but it is only used once in that sense in the New Testament, and then it is by a heathen speaker [Acts xviii. 14]. But the highest theological sense which the word bears is that in which it is applied to the second Person of the Holy Trinity. The word is traceable to Philo [q.v.], the Alexandrian Jew, whose speculations aimed at reconciling the teaching of Plato with that of the Jewish prophets. He saw that there was One Who was spoken of in the Old Testament under the name of “the Word and the Voice of God,” and that He was the Revealer of God’s attributes and will to mankind. The Personality of this Logos became more and more distinct in the later writings of the Old Testament. Philo, therefore, identified this existence with Plato’s doctrine of the Divine Nous, or “Mind,” though he hesitated to assert a distinct Personality. His doctrine was taken up by the Christian Alexandrians, and the Gnostics adopted it in a confused and tentative manner. In consequence some cried out that they were endangering the doctrine of the Unity of God; the Jewish sects of Gnostics replied that the Christ was a demigod or superior angel, half human, half divine. Then St. John taught how the teaching of the past was in union with the Gospel, how the Word was in the beginning with God and was God, was the Light of men, shining in darkness and not absorbed by it; and in the fulness of time was made Flesh—a distinct Personality very God, yet not the less very man. It was for this that St. John was named the Theologus, translated in our authorised version “the Divine” [i.e. Theologian]. The teaching thus set forth became the basis of the teaching of the great Alexandrian divine Justin Martyr, first of Patristic philosophers, dwells earnestly upon the prehistoric Logos, the Divine Reason, spoken of not only by prophets, but by wise heathen such as Socrates, distinct from the God Whom Moses knew, yet not separable from Him. This doctrine was the essential doctrine which united the Church together until it was formulated in the phrases of the Nicene Creed [Homoousion].

Logothete [Gr. “an accountant”].—An officer in the Greek Church who is interdictor of the Patriarch’s household. The logothete ecclesiasticus was a kind of inspector-general of the Church, corresponding to an episcopal chancellor in the Western Church.

Lollards.—The followers of Wycliffe [q.v.]. The name, which probably means “idle babbler,” was given to them by their enemies. Others explain it as coming from the same root as “Lullaby,” from the fondness for singing. Wycliffe had set out preachers and gained many followers chiefly at Oxford University. He had been supported by the Lancastrians; but the Peasants’ Revolt, under Wat Tyler, in 1381 brought about a great change in men’s feelings. The reaction against all projects of social reform produced an equal dislike of religious reform. He began to be looked upon as a “sower of strife,” and his followers as missionaries of Socialism. This feeling rose to its height when Wycliffe formal denied the doctrines of Transubstantiation. The University of Oxford at once condemned him, and he, finding it useless to look any longer to the wealthier classes, turned to the people, and a few years later his followers abounded everywhere. In 1382 Archibishop Courtenay summoned a meeting at Blackfriars to condemn his doctrines. Nichol Herford, one of the Lollards, had asserted the in a sermon at Oxford, and was silenced but the Chancellor appointed John Repyn don, another Wycliffe. The Archibishop supported by the Crown, and a royal warrant was issued in Oxford, proclaiming banishment of all Lollards, with the destruction of the books, on pain of forfeiture of the University privileges. It had its effect, and Herford a Repyn don submitted. After the death of Wycliffe, Lollardism crumbled into a gene... spirit of revolt. It penetrated into all classes of society, had its own schools, books, pamphlets, etc. London, in its hatred of tyranny, became fiercely Lollard. But out of the mass of opinion which bore the name of Lollardism came one faith—namely, faith in the sole authority of the Bible as the source of religious truth. This stirred up the Church against it, but the result of persecution was that the Lollards were raised into fanatics, and caused riots by their preaching against the friars.

In 1395 a petition of the Lollards was laid before Parliament, attacking the Church, and stating their views. They violently denounced the riches of the clergy, and contended that with the superfluous revenues of the Church the King might maintain 15 earls, 1,500 knights, and 6,000 squires, besides endowing 100 hospitals for the relief of the poor. Archbishop Arundel, who succeeded Courtenay, was eager to put down the Lollards, and in 1401 drew up a set of opinions out of Wycliffe's writings, on the strength of which a clause, "De hereticorum comburendo," [خيرتيك كومبريندو], was inserted in the statute for the year, declaring them to be heretics, and under it John Badby was burned. But this did not crush them. On the death of the Earl of Salisbury, Sir John Oldcastle [q.v.] stood forth as the leader of the Lollards. At the accession of Henry V. they hoped to gain him over, and when this failed, met together to murder him. This conspiracy was discovered, and thirty-seven were executed. Four years after Oldcastle was captured and put to death.

In 1414 the final statute against the Lollards was put forth, ordering all justices to inquire after heretics, and hand them over to the spiritual courts. In spite of repression Lollardism still lived on, and in 1431 we find the Duke of Gloucester endeavouring to hinder their risings, and the circulation of their invectives against the clergy. At the accession of Edward VI. the legal prohibitions against them were rescinded.

Lollardism took deeper root in Bohemia than in England. It was carried there by the Oxonians who fled when Courtenay first denounced them.

The chief writers against the Lollards were Thomas Netter, of Walden, and Reginald Sceock.

Lombard, Peter, one of the most famous of the Schoolmen [q.v.], was born at Novarra, in Lombardy, early in the twelfth century. He studied at Bologna and Rheims with the help of Bernard of Clairvaux, and then went to Paris, where he was a pupil of Abelard. Peter became a distinguished teacher of theology, and in 1159 was appointed Bishop of Paris. Bayle says that he was the first who obtained the title of Doctor of Theology in the University of Paris. He died at Paris in 1164.

He is generally called Magister Sententiarum, or Master of Sentences, from his great work, The Four Books of Sentences. This work is an arranged collection of sentences from Augustine, Anselm, Abelard, and others, on points of Christian doctrine, with objections and replies also collected from authors of repute. The first book treats of God; the second of created things; the third of the incarnation, redemption, and the virtues of human character; and the fourth of eschatological subjects and the sacraments. Two other works, A Commentary of the Psalms, and Commentaries upon All the Pauline Epistles, have been published under his name, and are regarded as genuine.

London, Bishopric of.—The first Bishop of London was Mellitus [604], one of the companions of St. Augustine. Æthelbert, King of Kent, founded and endowed for this diocese a church which he dedicated to St. Paul, on the site, it is supposed, of a Roman temple dedicated to Diana. Of the details of this church we are ignorant; it was destroyed after the Norman Conquest by fire, somewhere about 1087 or 1088. St. Erkenwald [q.v.], who was bishop in 675, is said to have greatly adorned the church. Maurice, who became bishop in 1086, at once began to rebuild his cathedral, and his successor, Richard de Beaumes, devoted the whole of the revenues of the See to that purpose. After the forty years which the episcopate of these two prelates embraced, it was still unfinished, and in 1136 it was greatly injured by another fire; at last, however, it was completed, but in the thirteenth century the central tower was rebuilt, and the whole of the choir, which was finished by 1240. The Cathedral of St. Paul was one of the finest in England. Its plan was cruciform; its length was 596 feet. The nave was a fine Norman building, not unlike that of Gloucester; the transepts and choir were rich examples of the Decorated style. The choir, as at Canterbury, was raised on a crypt, the vaulting of which was above the ground level; part of this, after 1256, was dedicated to St. Faith, and used as a parish church, the church of that name having been destroyed to enlarge the cathedral. A wall and gates surrounded the building, and at the north-east angle stood the famous Paul's Cross, where the most learned and eloquent preachers of the day delivered their sermons. Thus the cathedral remained till the fifteenth century, when in 1444 the steeple was struck by lightning, and so injured that it took eighteen years to repair it. In 1561 it was again struck, and this time set on fire and the roofs burnt. For a time it was subject to all kinds of desecration; then a partial repair was effected, but it still had a ruinous appearance till the restoration of it was committed to Inigo Jones by James during the episcopacy of Laud. Then, in 1666, the great fire of London broke out, and reduced it to a heap of ruins. These were not long suffered to remain untouched; Dr. Christopher Wren was appointed one of the "Commissioners for the repairation of St. Paul's," and after much debate, seeing it was useless to attempt restoration, it was decided, in 1670, to clear away the foundations of the old cathedral and build a new one. Wren made a design at the request of Dean San croft; it is described as "in the best style of Greek and Roman architecture;" a model of it was made, which may be seen in the South Kensington Museum. The design was approved by the King, but Wren had power to make any alterations he wished—a permission he availed himself of so largely that the present cathedral has little resemblance to the original design. On the first of May, 1674, Wren began the work of clearing away the old foundations, but it was not till more than a year after that the first stone was laid. The present building is shorter than the original one by ninety-six feet. The choir was opened for Divine service on the Thanksgiving day for the peace of Ryswick, December 2nd, 1697, and the dome was completed in 1710, in the time of Bishop Compton. Since then much has been done in the way of decoration, but the fabric remains as the great architect left it. Till 1796 no monuments were allowed to be erected within its walls, but since then they have become very numerous. The So vereigns of England have never had St. Paul's as their burial-place.

There have been many notable bishops of London, a short notice of whom will be found under their separate names.

The cathedral body consists of the dean, two archdeacons, four canons residential, eight minor canons, and thirty prebendaries. There is a bishop suffragan of Bedford, who presides over East London.

The diocese of London now consists of—
1. The city of London.
2. The city of Westminster.
3. All other parts of the county of Middlesex, except a portion of Stanwell civil parish, now included in the parish of Cobham.
4. Part of Herts, viz., a district now included within the parish of Northwood.

The diocese is divided into the two archdea conies of London and Middlesex, which are subdivided into twenty-five rural deaneries. Either as parishes or ecclesiastical districts, there are between 500 and 600 distinct minis terial charges. The number of beneficed clergymen—i.e. rectors, vicars, incumbents of new vicarages, perpetual curates, and ministers of ecclesiastical districts—is 492. The number of unbefitted clergy, consist ing of ministers of chapels of ease, of proprietary chapels, of temporary churches, lecturers, stipendiary curates, chaplains of workhouses, prisons, asylums, hospitals, ceme teries, etc., is 771.

The income of the See is £10,000.

Longinus.—There is an ancient legend—which, however, is rejected by Tilllemont and other critical historians—that the centurion who exclaimed "Truly this man was the Son of God," when he saw the signs that attended the Crucifixion, and the soldier who pierced Christ's side, were the same man, and that his name was Longinus. The legend goes on to add that he had been suffering from weakness of sight, but the blood which flowed from the wound fell on his eyes, and he was restored. This miracle led to his conversion; he for sok his military career, associated with the Apostles, and went to live at Caesarea.
ppadocia, where he converted many to the th; but was condemned to death by taurus, the Governor, and died on March 15th. taurus afterwards became a Christian. This end is found in mediaeval manuscripts, in tin and in other languages. The day of his th was commemorated in the ancient calen- s both in Rome, England, and Germany.

Longley, Charles Thomas, Archbishop Canterbury [b. 1794, d. 1868], the son of a tleman of Rochester, a friend of Dr. John- was educated at Westminster and Oxford, came Master of Harrow in 1829, and first bishop of Ripon in 1836. His organisation of a new See was admirable, and it was largely ring to his vigour and goodness that the arch is strong in the West Riding. He made Bishop of Durham in 1856, Arch- of York in 1860, and Archbishop of Cantebury in 1862. Along with his firmness wisdom in action was always combined a markable sweetness and grace of manner, d by all parties in the Church he was re- with marked respect and affection. The most remarkable act in his primacy was summoning the first Lambeth Conference 1867, and his skilful management of it. [LAMBETH CONFERENCE.] His publications are limited to Charges and separate sermons.

Lord's Day.—Traces of the observance the first day of the week, the day of the resurrection, as a day of special sanctity, duously peculiar for public worship, a found in the New Testament [Acts ii. 7, 1 Cor. xvi. 2, and Rev. i. 10], and a designation, "The Lord's Day," cannot reasonably applied to any other day at that on which the Resurrection took ace. On this day the Risen Lord manifested bimself the second time to the assembled disciples, and greeted them with the saluta- on of peace [John xx. 26], and it is pro- that this circumstance was regarded as ving Divine approval to meetings for wor- on that day. Together with the practice assembling for worship, and especially for e Holy Eucharist, on this day, there grew the custom, supported by Imperial legisla- of abstaining from business and labour, icts of successive Emperors forbade pro- edings at law, except such as were of absolu necessity, or of a charitable purpose— the, the emancipation of slaves, appointment guards to orphans, supply of foreign mn to Rome. Manual labour was also re- cted, exception being made in favour of aicultural work at the seasons of sowing nd harvest. Public games and shows were radually prohibited, while care was taken, as the same time, to mark the religious cere- es of the day with tokens of joy and cheer- ness. Fasting was forbidden, and the orshippers offered their prayers standing, at kneeling. The distinction between the Jewish Sabbath and the Christian Lord's Day was at first jealously maintained, and though the Saturday was generally regarded, as we might naturally expect, remembering the Jewish origin of Christianity, as a day of peculiar solemnity, those who so observed it were careful to defend themselves against the charge of Judaising. Gradually, however, the observance of the Lord's Day came to be grounded on the fourth Commandment, and Sunday was kept with an austerity unknown even to the Sabbath. In the history of the observance of the Lord's Day in England an epoch is marked by the reproclamation by Charles I. of the Book of Sports, first issued by James I. During the Common- wealth it is needless to say that strictness and austerity were in the ascendant, while at the Restoration the sanctity of the day was almost put out of sight. Considerable difference of opinion exists at the present time among those who agree in regarding it as the special day of the week for public worship and religious exercises, as well as a rest from the ordinary occupations of business and trade. While some deprecated attention being given to any other subjects than those of worship and devotion, others think that it is compatible with due reverence to God and attention to the needs of the soul to endeavour to enlarge and instruct the intellectual powers of the mind, and provide healthful recreation for the body, believing that, if opportunities for the latter are provided, and have the sanction of religiously inclined persons, not only will the day be less desecrated by drunken- ness and purposeless lounging on the part of those who have no regard for the claims of worship, but its religious associations will in time appeal with success to a larger and ever increasing number. With this object they advocate the opening, during the latter hours of the Sunday, of museums, art collections, picture galleries, concert rooms in which sacred music may be performed, horticultural gardens, etc.

Lord's Prayer.—The prayer taught by our Lord to His disciples in answer to the request preferred by one of them, "Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples." Put before them under these circumstances, and prefaced by the words "When ye pray, say," it does not admit of doubt that our Divine Master intended that this prayer should find place in the devotional exercises of His disciples. And this was the universal practice of the early Church. It was not taught to candidates for baptism till a few days before their admission to that Sacrament, for it was held that none but those who were made sons of God by regeneration had a title to address God in its opening words, "Our Father." But among the bap- tised there was no prayer more often used or highly esteemed. It was called the prayer of the believers (oratio fidelium), as being their birthright. It was the oratio quotidiana, the daily prayer. It followed the prayer of consecration in the Office of the Holy Communion. Its use was enjoined in private devotions. An examination of the Prayer Book of the Anglican Church reveals that no Office is deemed complete without this prayer. Alterations in the structure and arrangement of the various services have here and there caused its recital to be made more than once on the same occasion of public worship, but it will be found that each separate Office contains it at least once.

But, while in answer to the request of His disciples, our Lord taught this prayer as a prayer to be offered by them, He also set it forth in the Sermon on the Mount as a model or pattern to which the supplications of Christians should conform, avoiding alike the vain repetitions of the Gentiles and the sanctimonious effusions of the Pharisees: "After this manner therefore pray ye." The characteristics of the model are that out of seven petitions three, and those the first three, relate to God—and of the four relating to man one only concerns his body—while through the whole, by the use of the plural, intercession for all sorts and conditions of men is combined with personal supplication.

Lord's Supper.—This name is chosen by the Church of England in her Liturgy as the principal name for the highest act of her worship. Other names, considered in their respective places, are the Eucharist, the Communion, the Mass (Roman Catholic), the Sacred Mysteries, the Liturgy. The name "Lord's Supper" is directly from the Bible, being used by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xi. The controversies of the Christian Church on the subject of the Lord's Supper are greater than on any other question. On them, more than on any other point that could be named, the divisions of Christendom have turned. The Roman Catholic view is that, by a miraculous change, the bread and wine of the Sacrament are transubstantiated into the Body and Blood of Christ. [Transubstantiation.] The Lutheran view, insisting on the literal interpretation of the words, "This is my body," holds that the Body and Blood are supernaturally united with the Bread and Wine by the special powers of Christ. [Cons-ubstantiation.] The Reformed view, as it is called, is that of Zwinglius, and declares that the words "this is" are equivalent to "this represents," an opinion which is defended by those who hold it by the addition of other passages, in which undoubtedly our Lord spoke figuratively, e.g. "I am the door," "I am the true vine." It forms no part of our duty to argue out these views, but it is a happier work to quote the learned and wise Hooker in his endeavour to show Christian men, not where they differ, but where they agree. "Some did exceeding move fear, lest Zwinglius and Oecolampadius could bring it to pass that men should account of this Sacrament but only as of a shadow destitute, empty and void of Christ. But seeing that by opening the several opinion which have been held, they are grown, taught I can see, on all sides at the length a general agreement concerning that which alone is material, namely the real participation of Christ, and of life in his body and blood by means of this Sacrament; wherefore shoul the world continue still distracted and rush with so manifold contentions, when they remaineth now no controversy, saving onl about the subject where Christ is! Yea, eve in this point, no side denieth but that the son of man is the receptacle of Christ's presence, whereby the question is yet driven to narrower issue, nor doth anything rest doubt ful but this, whether when the Sacrament administered, Christ be whole within mi only, or else his body and blood be al externally seated in the very consecrate elements themselves, which opinion they the defend are driven either to consubstantiate an incorporate Christ with elements sacramental or to transsubstantiate and change their sub stance into His; and so the one to hold it really but invisibly moulded up with it substance of those elements, the other to hit him under the only visible show of bread an wine, the substance whereof, as they imagin is abolished, and is succeeded in the same room. All things considered and compare with that success which truth hath hitherto had by so bitter conflicts with error in th point, shall I wish that men would more gi themselves to meditate with silence what w have by the Sacrament, and less to dispus of the manner how. If any man suppose th this were too great stupidity and dulness, let us see whether the Apostles of our Lord then selves have not done the like. It appeare by many examples that they of their ow disposition were very scrupulous and inquiet, yet in other cases of less important and less difficulty, apt to move question. How cometh it to pass that so few words, so high a mystery being uttered, they receiv with gladness the gift of Christ, and maker show of doubt or scrupul? The reason there is not dark to them which have anything all observed how the powers of the mind as wont to stir, when that which we infinite long for presenteth itself above and best expectation. Curious and intricate specul ations do not hinder, they abate, they quench such inflamed notions of delight and joy divine graces use to raise when extraordinarily they are present. The mind, there fore, feeling present joy is always marvellous unwilling to admit any other cogitation, as in that case casteth off those disputes when unto the intellectual part at other time easily draweth."
Loretto [properly Loreto].—A city a few miles south of Ancona, in Italy, chiefly famous as containing the Santa Casa, or Holy House, the sanctuary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, it is commonly believed by the inhabitants and by Roman Catholics to have been the house in which the Virgin lived at Nazareth, and he scene of the Annunciation of our Lord's childhood. It is built of a dark reddish tone, and has one door and one window, and is about 81 by 13 feet. The house gives its name to the Church of the Santa Casa, within which it stands, encased in white marble, sculptured with designs from the Virgin's history. The famous image of our lady of Loretto stands at the eastern end of the house. The legend concerning the Santa Casa says that when the Holy Land was taken by the Infidels the house was miraculously brought to the hill of Tarsatto, near Fiume, during the May of 1019, 1291. In December, 1294, it was again removed, and carried to Recanati; thence it was carried to a spot not far from that where it now stands, being deposited in a piece of ground belonging to two brothers, who quarrelled as to the possession of it. It was therefore brought to its present site in December, 1295, and received its name [Domus Laurentana] from the name of the lady to whom the land belonged. The Blessed Virgin afterwards appeared to a hermit of Recanati, and declared to him that his was indeed her house; he related it to others, and the Santa Casa was soon thronged with pilgrims, who have ever since flocked to visit it.

Lorinus, John, a Jesuit, b. at Avignon, 559. He was a scholar of divinity, and the author of Commentaries on Numbers, Deu- eronomy, the Psalms, Ecclesiastes, the Wis- tom of Solomon, the Acts of the Apostles, and the General Epistles.

Lots.—The custom of foretelling events by means of previously understood signs was not without Divine sanction in the time of the Sacred History. Even the Apostles cast lots when they filled up the gap in the Apostolate [Acts i.]. In the early Church the practice continued, though it was discouraged on account of the superstition which it was in danger of fostering. A favourite plan was to prepare by previous prayer and fasting, and then to open the Psalms or the Gospels, the first passage lighted upon being taken as a word from Heaven. And a variation on this was to go into church and listen for the words of the Psalm which was being sung at the moment of entrance. A celebrated passage in the life of St. Augustine tells how, when he was in keen distress of mind, he seemed to hear a voice which said to him "Tolle, lege," 'Take up and read," and he resolved to open the Scriptures and rest his case on the first sentence that he lighted on, and so found the passage which led to his conversion. At a subsequent period he expressed his disapproval of this plan of "sortes." But from time to time all through the ages the practice has found persons to practise it. It was used by the Puritans, and Swift takes occasion to ridicule them. By lot the Bohemians, when no way seemed open to them of carrying on the visible Church, chose new bishops [BOHEMIA], and it is still practised among the Moravians.

Louis IX., or Saint Louis [b. 1215, d. 1270]. King of France, succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226. He was born at Poissy. His mother was Blanche, daughter of Alfonso IX., King of Castile. She was regent during his minority, and herself undertook the education of the young Prince, whom she trained in great piety of heart, which afterwards regulated his actions when he was old enough to govern his people. He married Margaret of Provence in 1234, and made his Court a model of domestic simplicity and Christian life. When he came of age in 1256 he continued to his mother a share in the administration of the government; he applied himself diligently to reform the abuses of the State and the evils occasioned by the gross licentiousness of the clergy. He became involved in a war with Henry III. of England, who was assisting Hugh, Count of Marche, in a revolt against Louis, but he defeated him in 1242. Soon after this the King fell dangerously ill at Pontoise, and during his sickness he made a vow that on his recovery he would lead another crusade for the liberation of Palestine from the Mohammedans. The Queen- dowager vainly attempted to dissuade him from the enterprise; she only prevailed on him to delay till he had made the preparations most likely to ensure success. Three years were spent in doing this, and at last, having appointed his mother regent, and received the Papal benediction, he sailed from Aiguemortes, on the coast of Languedoc, August 25th, 1248, and landed at Cyprus, where he passed the winter awaiting the rest of his forces. He left Cyprus in May, 1249, for Egypt, justly believing that the conquest of that country was necessary to open the way to Palestine. He laid siege to Damietta, whose inhabitants surrendered almost without resistance. Louis then crossed the Nile and gained two battles over the Infidels. Robert, Earl of Artois, his brother, was killed in his inconsiderate pursuit of the enemy, February 8th, 1259. Malek Saleh Najmoddin, the Sultan of Egypt, was besieging the city of Emessa, when he heard of the fall of Damietta. He hastily turned towards Egypt, but died on the way, and was succeeded by his son Saleh Moadam, who came and surrounded the Crusaders at Man- surah with a great army, stopping all passages by which provisions could reach the Christians, who were thus reduced by famine and scurvy to a most deplorable condition, and soon after the whole army was defeated, and the King and his two brothers taken prisoners, April 5th, 1250. Louis was obliged to give up Damietta, and pay 800,000 double ducats of gold for his own and his men's ransom. In May, 1250, he embarked with the remains of his army (6,000 men) for Acre, where he was received with great joy. He took Tyre and Cesarea, and fortified the towns belonging to the Christians in the Holy Land; but hearing of the death of his mother he returned to France in 1254, after a five years' absence. He then spent his time in diligent government and reform of his kingdom. For some years he had been secretly preparing for a new crusade, and had obtained from Henry III. of England a promise of a powerful auxiliary force under the command of Prince Edward. Having arranged for the government of the country in his absence, and made his last will, he embarked once more, July 1st, 1270, and landed at Sardinia, from whence he made his way to Africa, took Carthage without much opposition, and laid siege to Tunis; but here he fell a victim to the plague, and died August 25th, 1270, being at his own request laid on a bed of ashes. His remains were buried in the Abbey of St. Denis. He was canonised by Pope Boniface VIII. in 1297.

Lourdes. — A place situated in the Pyrenees, which has become celebrated in the Roman Catholic Church for a so-called appearance of the Blessed Virgin. The story told is that, in 1858, a little untaught shepherdess named Bernadette Soubirons, aged fourteen, the daughter of a poor miller of Lourdes, was gathering firewood on the banks of the Gave, close to the grotto of Massabielle, when she heard a sound of rushing wind, and saw a beautiful lady in white, with a blue girdle round her waist, standing in the niche, with her feet resting on a wild rose-bush, and smiling at her. Her sisters, who were with her, saw nothing. On Sunday, February 14th, Bernadette went again to the grotto with many of her companions, and again saw the vision, and was told by the lady to come every day for a fortnight. The story of the vision spread far and wide, and on the third day of the fortnight 1,000 persons assembled at Massabielle. Bernadette seemed as one entranced, unheeding all that passed, while she gazed at the apparition. The civic authorities interfered to put an end to the thing, and the child was taken before the police and forbidden to go to the grotto; her parents also forbade her, and for a few days she obeyed, but was irresistibly drawn to the place; and then, after the lady had told the child some secret, she led her go to the priest and say that she desired to have a chapel built there to her. When charged by the priest with inventing the vision, she affirmed unwaveringly that it was as she had said, and delivered her message. On the next occasion she was commanded to mount on her knees to the end of the grotto, a steep ascent of fifty feet, crying out the word "Penance" three times, while she prayed for sinners, and then to wash in the fountain. There was no sign of water, but on Bernadette's scooping out the earth with her hands a stream of water trickled out and flowed down in a narrow thread to the river. On March 25th Bernadette asked the lady to tell her who she was, and she replied, "I am the Immaculate Conception," and disappeared. On July 16th, the Feast of Our Lady of Carmel, she appeared to the child for the last time. Before this, the grotto had been closed by the civic authorities; but some month after pilgrims were allowed to come there to their devotions. Bernadette was once more arrested, but released, and educated by the nuns, and in 1867, when twenty-four years old, entered the convent of Nevers. She always adhered to having seen these visions and now a church has been built over the grotto, and a figure of the Virgin, made after the description of Bernadette, placed in it. Many miraculous cures are said to have been wrought by the waters which still flow from the rock. The Bishop of the diocese, in a pastoral says, "We pronounce that Mary the Immaculate, Mother of God, did really appear to Bernadette Soubirons, on February 11th, 1858, and on subsequent days, to the number of eighteen times, in the grotto of Massabielle, near the city of Lourdes; that this apparition possesses all the characters of truth, and that the faithful are justified in believing it with certainty."

Love-Feasts or Agapes. — In Apostolic times it was the custom for all the Christians in a place to meet together, probably on the first day of the week, for a common meal. It was probably not current when St. Paul wrote his first Epistle to the Corinthians, but it must have arisen soon after, and spread through the Eastern and Western Churches. St. Chrysostom is of opinion that when the practice of having all things in common ceased, this arose to take its place. It was in fact, a meal provided by the rich to feed the poor. The materials that composed the meal were certainly bread and wine, and probably also meat, poultry, cheese, milk, honey and fish. It is not known for certain whether the Communion was administered before or after the meal, but it is generally thought that the feast came first, in imitation of our Lord's institution. Then epistles from their bishops and from other Churches were read, collections were made for the poor, and the salutation or "kiss of love" was given.

At first the feasts were very simple, but afterwards, especially at Alexandria, they became sumptuous banquets, and from Clement's protest, secular music seems to have n used instead of psalms and hymns. When the Christians began to have special buildings set apart for worship, they felt it profanation to sit down to a meal in m. Also in the Third Council of Carthage it was ordained that the Eucharist should be received fasting, and the time of its celebran was changed to the morning. All these es resulted in the extermination of the ve-feasts. An attempt was made to re-re them by connecting them with the com- moration of the death of martyrs, and justine mentions that his mother Monica it to them. Ambrose supported them in northern Italy, and traces of them are to be nd in the practice, prohibited by the Coun- of Trullo [692], of bringing honey, milk, pes, joints of meats, etc., to the altar, that priest might bless them before they were en. So-called "love-feasts" are practised on both Methodists and Moravians, but ugh apparently founded upon the agape of primitive Church, they differ from them in essential respects. They will be described the accounts of those bodies.

Low Church. - A term applied in the enteenth century to those who desired to ng the Church into harmony with the ws of the Nonconformists, identified at time with the LATTIDINARIANS [q.v.]. Underlying all controversies between High, w, and Broad Church, is the question, hat is the Church? We will endeavour to tinguish the views which have been held the various parties, first setting forth the tements which they would all agree to ac- st. First, then, there is an invisible or ritual Church, comprising those who love Lord Jesus Christ, and desire to have ion with Him. There is also a visible or cernal Church; it is a necessity to have t which can be seen as well as what is—a demonstration of the Spirit, as well as power. But the connection of the two, again their relation to the State, brings ivgence of view. The Low Churchman rds the visible Church as a variable acci-, the creature of circumstances and ex- liency. His opinion is a protest against malism and idolatry. The High Churchn pronounces the Church essentially visible, ving a definitive form, not, indeed, invari-, but permanently identical, and involved the original structure. His protest is acted against individual variation, against difference and infidelity. By each of these union of Church and State has been different periods favoured and opposed. Low Churchman takes for his watch- Protestantism, the High Churchman tholism. The tendency of the former is individualise, of the latter to generalise, igious truth. The one realises the faith Christ as a subjective act, the other sub- niates it as an objective reality. The first deals with men, the other with man. With the one grace is a particular, with the other a universal, boon; one asserts: the other limits, the right of private judgment. The Go-pel comes to the first through the medium of Scripture, by the second it is found in the living body of the Church: the one sets forth the Word, the other the Sacraments; the one urges the necessity of a spiritual, the other of a fixed and outward service.

But meanwhile there are those who maintain that the two principles we have stated are ideally correliative, and ought to unite in every Christian person; that when this interdependence is destroyed, and they are put forward separately, each becomes ex-aggerated, disguised, and distorted. But far from cohering in the same subject, they are actually at war with each other, so that whatever be the outward occasion of feud in the Christian body, the real opposition is between those who would have every man stand out as an individual, and those who would merge all individuality in a common union. This struggle has always been carried on more or less energetically in the Christian Church; of course it implies imperfection, but it has been made, under Providence, the means of preserving a healthy balance. In the first three centuries the two forces are to be distinguished in Christian literature, keeping each other in check. Then the "Catholic" view prevailed for many ages, not without indications that the antagonistic prin- ciple, though in subjection, was not extinct; at the Reformation the latter reasserted its power. Since that era the two principles have struggled with varying success. It is sometimes asserted that the "Low Church" view is that of the Reformers; but the assertion cannot be accepted without qualification. The life and death struggle in which the English people engaged against Roman usurpation, naturally forced the Reformers to bring forward earnestly the freedom of the conscience and the responsibility of the individual. But it is no less true that men like Ridley and even Cranmer were also alive to the necessity of preserving the historical continuity of the Church, and the English Liturgy is a proof how eager the Reformers were to preserve the doctrine of primitive times, and the forms and rites which had become hallowed by the use of ages.

The Low Church party in the first days of the Reformed Church of England were represented by such men as TRAYERS, CART- Wright, JEWEL, and ARCHBISHOP GRIN- DAL [q.v.]. Its second period was the Latitudinarian movement in the days of Whig ascendancy. The Church was re-established, Episcopacy was accepted as a fact; but it was sought to remove certain phrases and ceremonies from the Prayer Book, and to unite broken parties in a scheme of comprehension. But this period saw a marked change in Low Church theology. Hitherto it had been Calvinistic; it was now assertive of Universal Redemption, from which none was excluded save by his own free will. But in the relaxation of the old dogmatism, it became somewhat lax, and may be fairly represented by saying that it declared no truth absolute, but allowed liberty of interpretation, and made conscience the ultimate arbiter. The best exponent of this phase of Low Church divinity was Tillotson, and its danger was the watering down of the Church formularies till Arianism obtained a foothold within the Church. Samuel Clarke, and, still more, Hoadley, were decidedly Arian in their tendencies. The preaching of Wesley was a new departure, and the Evangelicalism which was the result of his preaching was the new phase which the Low Church movement assumed. [Evangelicalism.] With the decline of that movement, the Protestant party in the Church took a fresh line. The Low Churchman of the present day is not he who preaches justification by faith only, or the paramount authority of the Scriptures, but rather the assenter of the freedom of the conscience and the non-essential character of Church ordinances.

Low Mass, in the Roman Church, is one performed by a single priest with a server.

Low Sunday.—The first Sunday after Easter, or, as it is commonly called, the Octave of Easter. The derivation of the word "Low" is doubtful, but probably the writer of the following letter [Guardian, April 16th, 1884] has hit upon the correct theory:—

"The usual derivation of the name Low Sunday has always seemed to me a very unlikely one, and I venture to suggest another. It is generally said that the services of the Sunday seem 'low' in distinction with Easter Day. But as the services on the octave should as nearly as possible equal the services of the day itself, this derivation would scarcely commend itself if there had been another at hand."

"In Gaul and England the Sunday in the octave of Easter was called 'Clausum Paschae' (cf. Galllican Liturgies, Naile and Forbes, p. 108), and this was used commonly as a date in Gaul and England both in Latin and in French. Thus, St. Gregory of Tours, speaking of children who had been baptized at Easter, writes:—"Nulius ad Clausum pertingere potuit vivens' (De Gloria Confess., 46). The first Westminster statute of Edward I. is dated, 'Feast of a Westm. Lindsey de la cluse de Pascha' (Magana Charta, Ed. I., 1329, fo. 21). Again, in a MS. in the British Museum (Bibl. Har., 1701, fo. 190) we have the date, 'Inquisitio capti in England post Clausum Pasche, anno Regis Henrici quinti, post conquestum sexto.' Du Cange cites from a Charter, 'Le jour des Closes Pasques.' These quotations will show that the phrase was not uncommon, to say the least."

"I would suggest that 'Low Sunday' is a corruption of 'Close Sunday.'"

The abbot at the end of Close would easily disappear in common use before the S of Sunday. The hard C has always a tendency to disappear, especially before a liquid. Lacrima becomes larmes, Sacramentum, serment, and before 1 Cladovics becomes Lonis, Chlotarins becomes Lothaire. There is, therefore good ground for thinking that Lowdew, Charles Fuge, M.A.—A markable mission priest of the Ritualistic party in the Church of England [2. 1820, d. 1888] After serving as a curate in the West End for eight years, he became curate at St. Barnabas', Pimlico, in 1851, one of first churches of the Ritualistic type. 1856 he undertook a mission to St. George's, in the-East, and worked among the dock-yards population with wonderful zeal. At first was fiercely opposed, not only by members the Protestant party who were opposed to ritual, but by the keepers of brothels; other bad houses, who found their evil ga interfered with. Once an attempt was made to throw him over the dock bridges and Mission Chapel was mobbed. He did not, however, lose heart, and in 1866 a new church which he had founded (St. Peter's, Long Docks) was consecrated by Bishop Tait. In twenty-four years Lowder worked among the rough and long untended masses of population, and gradually so won them his brave unselfishness, and by his love of gentleness, that before his end came hundreds of those who would once have killed him or themselves have died for him. He was known familiarly as "Father Lowder," and was day long walking about among them in cassock, sometimes leading processions with cros and banners through the slums, singing hymns and preaching in the street. There are a few places in England where Church is stronger than in the neighbourhood where Lowder lived. Though always Ritualist, he never yielded allegiance to Papal claims, but was a firm believer in Papacy. He died in Tyrol. His body was brought to England and buried at Chislehurst, and 3,000 people, including many children, came from St. Peter's to his funeral, many them walking the whole way.

Lowth, Robert, a writer on Hebrew, and successively bishop of three Englishees, was the son of William Lowth, rector of Burton, in Hampshire, and was born at Wchester, Nov. 27th, 1710. He was a student at Winchester School, whence, with a reputation both as a scholar and poet, he went New College, Oxford, in 1730. He took M.A. degree in 1737, and four years la was appointed Professor of Poetry. Bishop Hoadley was a kind patron to him, conferre on him successively the living of Ovingde, the Archdeaconry of Winchester, and rectory of East Woodhay. He afterward received from the University of Oxford M.A. degree of D.D. in 1754, became Prebends of Durham and Rector of Sedgefield in 17 a Fellow of the Royal Societies of Lond Göttingen in 1765, Bishop of St. David's 766, of Oxford a few months later, and London in 1777. King George III. offered the Archbishopric of Canterbury in 1783, he refused. He died in 1787.

ishop Lowth's greatest works are his of William of Wykeham, his Lectures on Poetry of the Hebrews, and the Translation of Prophecy. The lectures on Hebrew delivered by him at Oxford when was professor of poetry. They opened up almost new subject, as little attention had riously been paid to the fact that a great of the books of the Old Testament are.

They were received with great act, not only in England, but also on the tinent, where they were reprinted by D. Michaelis. They were published in n, in which language they had been ered; but Dr. Gregory brought out an Irish version in 1787. The translation the Prophecy Isaiah is of great value in setting the Authorised Version, in showing how thoroughly literal and stic is that section of Hebrew poetry which named prophety.

loyola, IGNATIUS [Inigo Lopez de Re- o], the Founder of the Society of Jesus, descended from one of the most consider- families in Spain, and was born at the of Loyola, in Biscay, in 1491. He brought up as a page in the Court of inand Isabella, and took to the pro- of arms under the auspices of his tive, the Duke of Najura. He acquired reputation of a man of honour and worth, all the irregularities of his life were looked innocent gallantries, inseparable from his tary profession. He lived in full pursuit worldly pleasures till he was thirty years in that year [1521] Pampeluna, the of Navarre, then in the hands of the niards, was besieged by the French, and atius, with others, was posted at the castle its defence; one of his legs was fractured a cannon ball, and the other injured by a ter of stone; and it was found neces- to remove him to Loyola. The anguish ed by the necessary operations was so ere that it produced a violent fever. life was despaired of, and on the eve St. Peter's Day he received the last sacra- ts. The next day the fever left him, he ascribed it to the intercession of the stle; but this did not yet turn his heart better things. His leg had been badly set caused a deformity, so he had it rebent.

To soothe the tedium of his con- he read all the romances that came his way, and when they were exhausted friends brought him any books which they fand, and amongst them he got The Life and The Lives of the Saints. His was so corrupted that it was some time he relished them, but having no other entertainment he continued to read them, until they wrought in him a complete con- version. The glories of St. Francis and St. Dominic inspired him with a desire of tread- ing in their steps, and he resolved, as a penance, to begin his new life by travelling as a pilgrim to the Holy Land. Accordingly, he went to the celebrated monastery of Montserrat in Catalonia, where, having made full confession of his sins, he hung up his armour over the altar of the Virgin Mary, and assumed the dress of a beggar. On the Feast of the Annunciation, 1522, Ignatius left Mont- serrat barefooted, and went to Manresa, in Barcelona, where he lived about a year among the poor in St. Lucy's hospital, practising all sorts of austerities and mortifications, and here it was that he wrote his book of Spiritual Exercises. While at Manresa his zeal and devotion attracted so much attention that he feared the praise of men might tempt him back to the world, so he hid himself in a cave under a desert mountain, and practised such austeri- ties that he was found senseless at the mouth of the cave, and carried back to the hospital.

More severe trials were in store for him. As soon as he recovered his health he lost his peace of mind; he had no satisfaction in his prayers nor comfort in his mortifications, his soul was racked with scruples and harassed with imaginary sins. The Dominicans of Manresa, moved with compassion for his miserable condition, took him in their house and tended him till he recovered from his mental depression.

From Manresa he went to Barcelona, and set sail in pursuance of his pilgrimage to the Holy Land; he reached Cajeta in five days, and then travelled on foot to Rome, where he arrived on Palm Sunday, 1523. After Easter, having received the Papal benediction from Adrian VI., he went to Venice, where he embarked in July, 1523, and arrived at Joppa on the last day of August, and four days later reached Jerusalem. Here he remained till January, 1524, and then returned by way of Venice to Barcelona, encountering many dangers on the way. Here he began to study Latin under Jerome Ardebal, and then proceeded to Alcala, where the oddity of his dress and his mendicant way of living, and the instruction he gave to those who crowded about him, caused his arrest, and he was put into the hands of the Inquisitors at Toledo, who found him quite orthodox, and referred him to the Grand Vicar of Alcala for further trial. He was forbidden to explain the mys- teries of religion till he had studied divinity for four years. He then retired to Salamanca, where he continued his discourses on Devotion; here he was again imprisoned and re- leased on no better conditions than those of Alcala. He then resolved to go to Paris to prosecute his studies, but he was so poor that he had to beg in the streets for his living; and afterwards put himself into the hospital.
of St. James. He then removed to that of St. Barbara. Here he had many discouragements, but pursued his course of philosophy and divinity. From this time dates the foundation of the Society of Jesus. [Jesuits.] The first person to join this new order was Le Fevre, then Francis Xavier, and then four Spaniards, James Lainez (afterwards General of the Society, who attended in that capacity at the Council of Trent). Alphonse Salmeron, Nicholas Bobadilla, and Simon Rodriguez. They all vowed in the Church of Montmartre, outside the gates of Paris, either to go on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, or to throw themselves at the Pope's feet and ask him to make use of them how and where he pleased. Loyola returned to Spain, 1535, where he declared against libertinism, and preached repentance to vast crowds. He then, in 1537, went to Venice, where he made the acquaintance of John Peter Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV. The pilgrimage to Jerusalem could not be carried out, so, leaving the others to proselytise in the universities of Italy, Ignatius, accompanied by Le Fevre and Lainez, went to Rome and offered their services to Pope Paul III. This was at the close of 1537. The Pope accepted their proffered service, and placed Lainez and Le Fevre in the College of the Sapienza, where the former taught scholastic divinity and the latter expounded the Scriptures, while Ignatius gave public instructions. At length he considered the time had come to establish his disciples in a regular body, and they all arrived in Rome a little before Easter, 1538. He had some difficulty in getting the Papal sanction to a new Order, but at length obtained it, and it was confirmed by a Bull dated September 27th, 1540. Ignatius became the first Superior on Easter Day, 1541; his disciples were then dispersed into various parts of Christendom to spread the new Order, and he remained at Rome working for the conversion of the Jews and others. He had the satisfaction of seeing his Order grow and flourish in many countries. He died July 31st, 1556. He was buried in a church at Rome; but in 1597 his relics were removed to the celebrated Jesuit Church of which Cardinal Farnese had laid the stone in 1568. Ignatius was beatified in 1609 by Paul VI., and canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622. His festival is kept by Roman Catholics on July 31st, the same day as that of St. Germain.

Lucian, a famous satirist [about A.D. 120-200], was a native of Samosata in Syria. He was brought up as a sculptor, but abandoned this profession and wandered about Greece, Italy, and Gaul, teaching rhetoric until he was about forty years old, when he returned to his native country and became a writer. One account of him states that he was an apostate from Christianity, but it is not probable. He knew much about Christianity, no doubt, but he was a man of sharp wit, of railing spirit and without depth of feeling. He wrote satire against the Christian Church which the Council of Trent placed on the Index the work of a fiend. It is, however, contemptuous rather than written in fierce hostility. Lucian seems to have regarded Christians not as criminals, but as fools—enthusiasts—just in the spirit, in fact, which careless and ungodly men view religious earnestness to this day.

Lucian, St.—St. Lucian was born in Syria of heathen parents. He was from his early youth devoted to study, and loved to live retirement. On the death of his parents he gave away all his fortune to the poor, and determined to live quietly by himself. He have no account of his conversion to Christianity, but at this time we hear of him diligently studying the Bible. He was a great Hebrew scholar, and was therefore able to correct any errors that had sprung up by careless translation. At the time of the persecution begun by Diocletian, Lucian was at Antioch. He was soon made prisoner and taken to Nicomedia, where he was kept in confinement nine years. He employed his time in writing letters to his flock at Antioch. When Maximin succeeded Diocletian as Emperor of the East, persecution raged more fiercely than ever. Maximin tried first to make Lucian give his faith by speaking kindly and persuasively to him. Finding that this mode of treatement made no impression, he had recourse to more severe means, and ordered that he should suffer all sorts of torture. He still remained firm, even when made to sleep naked on pieces of broken earthenware, and when for days without food. When food was brought him, it was meat that had been offered as a sacrifice to idols, and Lucian therefore, refused to touch it. He was to prison again for a few days, and was martyred in the year 316. The manner of his death is uncertain, but his body was afterwards thrown into the sea in order to prevent the possibility of his followers saving relics of his master.

Luciferians.—The followers of Lucifer, who was Bishop of Cagliari, in Sardinia, the fourth century. He was one of the upholders of the Nicene Creed, and directly opposed to Arius. When Athanasius was condemned at the Council of Aries in 336 Lucifer and others went to Rome to plead for an impartial judgment, but the Council at Milan confirmed the condemnation, and Lucifer was banished. He remained in exile until the death of the Emperor Constantius [361] but on his return, not agreeing with Eubius and others, who decided to forgive a readmit those bishops who had not opened with Arius, but had only yielded under the pressure of Constantius, Lucifer left arch with his followers. They were few in number, and though causing considerable disturbance for a time, disappeared in about half a century. The schism found its way into Italy, Antioch, Spain, and Egypt, and a pop of the sect was ordained for Rome.

lücke, Gottfried Christian Friedrich

at Egeln, near Magdeburg, Aug., 1791, Götingen, Feb., 1853). After studying at Le and Götingen, this well-known scholar, who left Berlin in 1816 to lecture on theology, became, two years later, professor of theology in Bonn. He afterwards carried on some work at Götingen. Rücke endeavored to hold a middle course between extremes of theological opinion, and had much influence on the theology of the age. He was a disciple of Schleiermacher, under whom he had formerly studied. He wrote various works upon the New Testament, is chiefly known by a Commentary on writings of St. John [1820-32].

judger, Sr.—First Bishop of Münster.

was a native of Friesland, and born about middle of the eighth century. At the age of thirteen he was sent to Utrecht, and studied as a missionary named Gregory, at whose death he afterwards received the tonsure and anastic habit. Gregory sent him to England, and he was ordained deacon at York. The Archbishop Adelbert. Here he made acquaintance of Alcuin, and studied under him for about a year, returning to Utrecht in 68; but he soon came back to England, attended Alcuin's lectures for three years and a half. Some time after his return to Utrecht he was sent to revive the Church Deventer, in Overyssel, which the Pagan forces had overtaken, and was very successful in this mission. He then assisted for ten years in the government of the monastic states of Utrecht and in missionary work in Friesland; during this time he built several churches. Witikind, Duke of Saxony, led a persecution against the Christians of Friesland, burned their churches, and drove Jünger and other priests from the country in

He then went to Rome, and was favorably received by Adrian I.; he came to Utrecht in 787, and was brought as the notice of Charlemagne, who employed him in instructing the Christians of Friesland. While thus employed he built a monastery of Werden, in the diocese of Osnabrück, gave the monks the Benedictine rule, and became their first Abbot. Then Charlemagne sent him to Westphalia, where he built several churches, and preached so successfully that the Archbishop of Cologne assisted on making him a bishop, and gave him the See of Münster. He was consecrated in 802. Charlemagne gave him the command of the monastery of Leuze, in Friesland, and he built another at Helmstadt, in Lower Saxony. He died March 26th, 809, and was buried in his own monastery of Werden.

Lullards.—A sect which arose in Antwerp, so called from the funeral dirges which they sang when following the remains of any of their number to the grave. They were also called Alexians, from their patron saint Alexius, and Cellites, from the cells in which they lived.

Lulli, Raymund [b. 1236, d. 1315], called "the enlightened doctor." He was born at Palma, in the island of Majorca. Until the age of 30 he lived wholly in the world, and occupied the post of Seneschal in the Court of the King of Aragon. He led a sensuous life and wrote much amorous poetry. He says that on several occasions while writing love-songs, the image of Christ on the cross appeared to him, and after many mental struggles he became convinced that it was God's will that he should forsake the world and consecrate himself to the service of Christ. He sold all his property and divided it among the poor. He then resolved to devote himself to the work of preaching the Gospel to the Mohammedans. In pursuance of this object he began to study theology and philosophy, and, purchasing a Mohammedan slave, he made him his instructor in Arabic. He employed himself in tracing the leading outlines of a universal formal science, and wrote his Ars major, or generis, a work of the preparatory work to a strictly scientific demonstration of all the truths of Christianity, which were to be so clearly proven that every reasonable mind would be forced to admit their truth. This work was afterwards known as the "Lullian method," and was a kind of mechanical aid to the mind in acquiring and retaining knowledge. He translated this book into Arabic; this was about nine years after his conversion. In 1275 he prevailed on James, King of Aragon, to found a monastery in the island of Majorca, where thirteen Franciscan monks were to be taught Arabic, with a view to becoming missionaries to the Mohammedans. In 1286 he went to Rome to persuade Pope Honorius IV. to approve his plan of establishing such missionary schools in all the monasteries; but this Pope died before Lulli arrived there, and, getting very little encouragement from his successor for a plan of united effort in this mission, he resolved to proceed alone. In 1291 he embarked at Genoa and reached Tunis, and calling together the learned among the Mohammedans, made a comparison between Christianity and Mohammedanism, declaring himself ready to embrace their religion if they could find stronger reasons for it than for his own. They crowded around him in the hope of converting him; but one of them, more fanatical than the rest, directed the attention of the King to the danger threatening the Mohammedan faith by Raymund’s zeal in making converts, and he was thrown into prison and sentenced to death, but was saved by the intercession of one of the learned men, and the sentence was changed to one of banishment. He then went to Naples, where he delivered lectures on his new system, and next to Rome; but meeting with no help there, he returned to his native island, Majorca, and worked for the conversion of the Mohammedans and Jews. Next he visited Cyprus, and then Armenia, striving to bring back the schismatics of the Eastern Church to orthodoxy. In 1306 and 1307 he again went to Africa, and visited Bugia; a tumult arose and he was thrown into a dungeon, where he remained a close prisoner for six months. Meanwhile many attempts were made to convert him to Moslemism, and the highest honours and great riches were promised him if he would change his religion. He was again banished, and took ship and landed at Pisa, after being shipwrecked; he was received with great honour, and here he continued his literary labours with unremitting zeal. He tried to found in Pisa and Genoa a new order of spiritual knights who should be ready at a moment’s notice to go to war with the Mohammedans for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre, but he got no help in this from the Pope. Then he went to Paris and attacked the principles of the philosophy of Averroës, which he hoped to crush at the Council of Vienne, held in 1311. He wrote a new book for this purpose. He also, at this council, succeeded in effecting the establishment of professorships of Oriental languages in the universities. In 1314 he determined once more to go to Africa, and laboured secretly at Bugia for a time; but a longing for martyrdom made him stand forth publicly, and this so exasperated his enemies that he was dragged out of the city and stoned to death, June 13th, 1315. [Neander’s Church History, vol. vii., pp. 83-96.]

Lupus, Sr.—Bishop of Troyes in the fifth century. He was born at Toul, A.D. 383, and married Pimeniola, sister of St. Hilary, at Arles, from whom he separated after seven years, in order that both might devote themselves to the monastic life. St. Lupus retired to the monastery of Lerins, whence he was called to the bishopric of Troyes in 426. He was twice chosen by the Churches of France to accompany St. Germanus of Auxerre to Britain, on a mission against the Pelagians. In 453 the city of Troyes was attacked by the Huns, under Attila, but successfully defended under the command of the Bishop, who went out to meet the invader, and addressed him as the “Scourge of God, sent to punish the sins of the people.” He died on July 20th, 479.

Luther, Martin [b. at Eisleben, in Saxon Nov. 10th, 1483], was the eldest son of Hans Luther, a miner. His parents removed Mansfeld soon after his birth, and here he was sent to school. The strict discipline which he endured both at home and school seems to have had much effect upon his after-life and on his early ideas of religion. He was sent to Magdeburg at the age fourteen, and afterwards to Eisenach, where he endured many hardships, and was often obliged to wander through the streets singing in order to gain a livelihood, till Ursula Cot, a lady living at Eisenach, took pity upon him and received him into her household. 1501 Luther became a student at the University of Erfurt, and devoted himself earnestly to the study of philosophy and the classics while at the same time he was popular among his companions for his love of pleasure. Dissatisfied with this mode of life, he became an inmate of the Augustinian monastery, hoping that a life of mortification would bring him the peace which he desired. He was disappointed, and fell into a state of despondency, from which he was roused by Staupitz, the Vicar-general of the Augustinians, who expounded to him the words “The just shall live by faith,”—a text on which Luther afterwards based all his teaching. In course of time he became Doctor of Theology, and Professor at the University of Wittenberg, which place his fame attracted many students. Hitherto he had been a faithful member of the Church of Rome, though he saw a deeply regretted the abuses which had grown up in it; but in 1517 he was roused to indignation against the traffic in indulgence, carried on by Leo X. for the purpose of raising money to build the Cathedral of Peter’s at Rome. A Dominican monk named Tetzel brought the indulgences to Wittenberg, giving full pardon to all who would pay a certain sum. Luther was shocked by such proceedings, and preached against Tetzel’s traffic; then he took a more decided step, a fastened to the door of the Castle Church of Wittenberg a document containing nineteen theses against indulgences. He did not deny the Pope’s power, but declared that pardon for sin was to be obtained from God only, and not by the payment of money. The sympathy shown by the people proved that the Papal authority was in danger, after various attempts to conciliate Luther the Pope issued a Bull of excommunication against him. Luther replied by burning the Bull publicly outside the gates of Wittenberg and was accordingly summoned by the Emperor to appear before the Diet of Worms, March, 1521. A safe-conduct was granted him, and he set off for Worms without delay, only stopping on the way to preach in towns through which he passed. On appearing before the Diet he was requested to retract what he had written, but refused, though Luther was summoned to make peace between them; but he was taken ill soon after obeying the call, and died on Feb. 18th, 1546.

Lutheran Church. The, received its foundation in the Confession written by Martin Luther in 1530, and the whole system at the present day is governed by his teaching as set forth in his Confession of Faith, which is to this effect:—"I believe with my whole heart the chief article—in Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three undivided Persons in one true God, Creator of heaven and earth and all things—which faith has up to this time been held by the Christian Church in all the world. I believe, as the Bible teaches us, that the middle Person of the Godhead, namely, the Son, has become Man, conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary, as clearly described by St. Luke and foretold by the Prophets; and not that either Father or Holy Ghost have become man, as set forth by some heretics. Also that God the Son took upon Himself, not the body without the soul, but the soul also—that is, a fully perfect humanity, the promised Seed or Child of Abraham and David—that He was born the Son of Mary, in form and other ways very man, as I and all others are; that through the operation of the Holy Ghost He was born without sin; that the Virgin Mary is the mother not only of the Man Christ, as taught by the Nestorians, but of the Son of God, as St. Luke says, 'The holy thing that shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God,' the Lord Jesus Christ, the one natural Son of God and Mary, very God and very Man.

"Also I believe that this same Son of God and Mary has suffered for us poor sinners, was crucified, dead and buried, in order that He might, through His precious blood, save us from our sins, death, and the everlasting anger of God; that on the third day He rose again from the dead, ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty, Lord of all Lords, King of Kings, and of all creatures in heaven and earth and under the earth, of death and life, of sin and righteousness.

"I believe in the Holy Ghost, who proceedeth from the Father, and with Him and the Son is one living God; Who endows us with faith and other spiritual gifts, saves us from death and sin, and makes our conscience free. Then I know that as there is only one Gospel and one Christ, so there is only one Baptism, which, with the Gospel, is a Divine institution. Also I maintain and confess the Sacrament of the Altar, that there the Body and Blood of Christ are verily received by mouths in the bread and wine, although the priest who celebrates or those who receive it may be unworthy, or may otherwise misuse it, for it does not rest on the belief or unbelief of man, but on the word and ordinance of God. I make exception to those who alter the words of consecration, as some enemies of the Sacrament do at the present day; they receive merely bread and wine, for they have not the word and established ordinance of God, but the same altered and adapted according to their own ignorance. I believe that there is one holy Catholic Church on earth, composed of the Christians in all the world, the bride of Christ, the spiritual body of which He is the only Head. Where this Christianity is there is forgiveness of sins—i.e., a reign of mercy and the exercise of lawful indulgence. And outside such Christianity there can be no salvation nor forgiveness of sins, but everlasting death and condemnation, and although there may be much appearance of righteousness, and even good work done, this will be of no avail. Lastly, I believe in the resurrection of the dead at the last day, both of the righteous and wicked, when all will be judged according to their deserving—the righteous to live with Christ for ever, and the wicked to have their habitation with the devil and his angels. I do not agree with those who teach that the devil and his company shall at last come to salvation.” Luther then denies several doctrines taught by the Roman Catholic Church, such as the sale of indulgences, masses for the dead, Purgatory, the invocation of saints, extreme unction, etc. The fundamental doctrine on which the whole Church rests is that of justification by faith, proved by a righteous and upright life.

In the course of its existence the Lutheran Church has had formidable opponents to struggle against. It was inevitable, under the circumstances, that there should be divergence of opinion and consequent divisions. The abolition of obedience to the central power of the Papacy caused Luther to rely on the power of princes to preserve order. Melancthon had foreseen that there was here the danger of a tyranny as great as ever the Papacy had been. And this danger was even increased by reason of the number of petty princes. When peasants dared not even leave their village for a night without permission, nor fire a gun to scare the wolves that prowled by their doors, and when the authority to which they were thus tied and bound was liable to change its creed, and to expect subjects to change with it, great evils were to be anticipated. The Rhenish Palatinate underwent ten changes of creed in one century, and the bewildered peasantry could hardly be expected to retain much faith in any. It was impossible to have a united Protestant Church in a land broken into innumerable States. And the opposite views taken by Luther and Zwingli with respect to the Sacrament at once made a hopeless division. When Luther died three-fourths of Germany was Protestant, and his creed had been adopted in Scandinavia and Denmark. But the cause we have named prepared the way for a battle of dogmas in Germany alone without parallel in the history of religious controversy; and the result, as might have been foretold without hesitation, was a terrible falling off in morals. Antinomianism reigned triumphant. “Humanity,” said Luther himself, “is like a drunken peasant—he soon gets up one side of his horse than he falls off on the other.” The Thirty Years’ War broke out in 1618, and Lutherans preferred joining Catholics to helping Calvinists. When it ended, lessons for good had no doubt been learned. There were those to whom the Gospel had been more than an intellectual exercise—even life itself—and they had kept alive that Faith which otherwise would have perished in controversy and verbal niceties. When it was over, bitter strife about the Sacraments had ceased, and a dull orthodoxy had succeeded; rapid morality and pedant dissertations. Spiritual life seemed dead. The names of Calixtus and Gerhardt stand out in that darkened time as men who laboured and prayed to unite all Christians in spirit, if not in doctrine. [SYNCRETISTS.] Another pow of revival was that of the Pietists, the for most among whom was JACOB SPENER [q.v.]. The Pietist movement began in Germany 1674, and, like Methodism in England, strove to bring life out of death. Purity of life, charity, alms-deeds—these things were declared to be better than knowledge. Soci prejudices broke down before it; the Bible which had become so neglected that it was recorded that in the greatest book-fair Germany not a single copy was to be found became the peasant’s friend again, and mission to the heathen was organised. But, as usual, there came extravagances—strict registers of frames of mind and change of emotions, interpretations of dreams, sortes of the Bible [Lob] and manifestations of hysteria; those who played at cards or danced were excommunicated. Then came the inevitable reaction the form of Rationalism. It was not hate of the Christian religion, but of irrational emotionalism, which gave birth to it. The first Rationalists aimed at showing that reason is confirmed Scripture. [LEIBNITZ, WOLF.] B The progress of the movement led to a fear of development of unbelief, and Germany suffers from as much as any nation from the neglects of the Saculum infidele, as Coleridge called it, in the eighteenth century. But a better time was at hand. The patriotism evoked by the tyranny of Napoleon and his warfare against the liberties and nationalities of Europe, had deep influence upon the religious life of Germany. The theology of men like Bengt Olshausen, Hengstenberg, furnished a noble proof of the good which lay beneath the rationalistic search after Truth, when joined to reverence and to the fear of God. German Biblical criticism took the lead from that time.

It was this revival of religious life which moved Friedrich Wilhelm III. of Prussia to attempt the Union of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches in 1817. His well-meaning opinion was that it could be done by making brotherly love the end-point and common ground of faith; but most of the clergy argued that Luther's difficulty still held good; that with two such utterly different ways of looking at the Holy Communion no permanent union was possible. He result was that in 1830 Prussia and Holsen, for the most part, accepted the union, but the rest of North Germany preferred keeping their Church and service as it had been handed down to them by Luther. They may be remarked here that the clergy of this district particularly look upon Luther as a sort of demi-god, and are inclined to keep severely every letter of the laws he made for the regulation and government of the church. The system of government is for a part very simple. The whole is presided by the Culs Minister in Berlin, but each State manages its own affairs. A clerical council, presided over by its inco or grand duke, or whatever rank he may hold, and they are generally appealed to by the first instance when a dispute or any difficult question arises. The head clergy are called superintendents, and represent to the bishops what duties do to Episcopal churches, inasmuch as they, and they only, have the power of ordaining the clergy. No power of confirmation, however, is not confined to this order, but can be performed by any parish pastor. The law of patronage is not at all complicated. When a vacant is vacant, the clerical council men- nes before choose three pastors, each of them has to preach before the congregation, and with them the final decision rests. With regard to the service, the arrangement in minor particulars in the different parishes and provinces. The sermon is the centre-point of all, and the result aims to be that in a town where there are several churches and preachers of the congregation do not think it necessary to go to church unless a popular preacher, or one according to their taste, is to occupy the pulpit; while in the country, where there is no chance of getting another service, and the pastor cannot say anything worth listening to, it must follow; it church feeling and life become dead. The rest of the service is composed chiefly of hymns—some of which are very beautiful—reading of Epistle and Gospel, which correspond exactly to our own, and one or two prayers. The congregation are, therefore, mostly dependent on hymns and the singing of the pastor, who is bound to preach on the Epistle or Gospel for the day. A consequence is that the uneducated get to know those few extracts from their Bibles nothing else, as they never by any chance hear any other parts read. Luther's idea was to retain as many of the outward forms and ceremonies to which the people had been accustomed in the Roman Catholic Church as he could consistently with his conscience, and since his time many things have been discarded by his followers as Romish which he did not consider so—notably the practice of kneeling in prayer. In every church there is a crucifix, if not more; the pastor makes the sign of the cross in pronouncing the blessing at the end of the service, and candles are always lighted for the Celebration, in some places all through the ordinary morning service. The hymns are sung to beautiful chorales, some of them very old, and, if well sung and well accompanied, the effect is very fine and impres- sive.

Lych-gate or "Corpses-gate" [A.S. lie or lie, "a body"].—A churchyard gate covered with a roof, where the bearers sometimes paused and rested when bringing a corpse for interment. Lych-gates are to be found in some parts of England, but are very rare in Scotland.

Lychroscope.—A narrow window near the ground, frequently found at the west end of the chancel, and sometimes in other parts of the church. It was so named because it was supposed to be used to watch the pasch light from without the church, but it is now generally supposed that lychscopes were confessionals.

Lyons, Martyrs of.—Early in the second century the Church of Asia Minor, under the direction of the venerable Polycarp, sent missionaries into Celtic Gaul. Pothinus and Irenaeus were of this band, and they made Lyons the See of the province. Pothinus became Bishop, while Irenaeus, being younger, was the most honoured Presbyter, of Lyons. Sanctus, a deacon under them, made his home at Vienne, near by. Through the labours of these devout men the number of Christians increased to such an extent as to attract the hostile attentions of the heathen; then arose the fifth persecution of the Church. The account of the Lyonnese martyrs is supposed to have been written by Irenaeus, as he survived this fierce persecution. The half-barbarous, semi-civilised inhabitants of Gaul first desired the Christians merely as contributors to the sports of the amphitheatre, for the bloodthirsty mob were not satisfied with the fights of wild beasts, nor even with the gladiatorial contests, but were ever clamouring for more excitement. The Christians were seized, brought to trial, mocked, scourged, and subjected to every indignity before being permitted to die. In the words of the narrator, "The devil himself went to and fro through the streets in the shape of a savage beast, and stirred popular excitement into ungovernable fury, so that the Christians were hooted at and pelted whenever seen." The sufferings of the martyrs are beyond description. They were torn, mangled, bound to red-hot iron chairs, tossed in nets by wild bulls, burned, bruised and distorted until their bodies were past recognition. Blandina, a female slave, received strength to endure more of these brutal atrocities than any other martyr. [BLANDINA.] The deacon of Vienne, Saturnus, also suffered excruciating torture, yet only one expression escaped his lips, "Christianus sum." Then the aged Bishop Pothinus, who had passed more than ninety years in God's service, was brought to the tribunal, tortured, insulted, and cast into prison, where the lamp of life, being nearly spent, was soon extinguished.

Lyte, Henry Francis, English hymn writer, was born at Kelso in 1793, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he distinguished himself by writing several prize poems. He was ordained to the curacy of Wrexford, and about four years after removed to Lyminster, in Hampshire, where some of his hymns were written. His health was always weak, but he devoted himself to his parish duties and to his books. In 1823 he went to the living of Lower Brixham, in Devonshire, which he held till his death, in 1847. His hymns are chiefly taken from his books, Poems Chiefly Religious [1833], and The Spirit of the Psalms [1834]. The best known are "Far from my heavenly home," "Pleasant are Thy courts above"; "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven"; and, the favourite of all, "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide": this was written on the day when he gave his last address to his parishioners before going to Nice to die.

Lyttelton, George, Lord, was born at his father's seat of Hagley, in Worcestershire, Jan. 17th, 1709. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, entered Parliament in 1730, became a Lord Commissioner of the Treasury in 1744, and Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1755. He went out of office at the dissolution of the Ministry in 1759, and his father being dead, was raised to the peerage as Baron Lyttelton of Frankley. From this time till his death, in 1773, he devoted himself chiefly to literature.

Lord Lyttelton's chief work is Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul. It is based upon the proposition that "the conversion and apostleship of St. Paul alone is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove the truth of Christianity." He also wrote Dialogues of the Dead, History of Henry II., and an Account of a Journey in Wales. His poetry, though it has gained for him a place in Johnson's Lives of the Poets, is not above mediocrity.
Macbride, John David, D.C.L. [b. 1788, d. 1868], Principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and Professor of Arabic. Author of a Diatessaron, which was a standard work in the University for many years, and of other works on Biblical exposition.

Macedonius, the reputed founder of the eccedonian sect of heretics, was raised to the episcopate of Constantinople, A.D. 342, by the ians, in opposition to Paul, whom the heretical party had canonically elected. A riot disturbance was caused in the city by quarrels of the rival bishops, and a party of soldiers was sent by Constantius to restore order; but the excited mob set fire to the house of Hermogenes, the commander, dragged him thither, and killed him. The rivalry lasted for years, during which time Paul and Macedonius were in alternate possession of the see; but in A.D. 351 it was terminated by the murder of Paul in Armenia. Freed from rivalry, Macedonius began to act with great alacrity to all who opposed him, fining, imprisoning, branding, and even putting to death. The Emperor's displeasure, aroused by these proceedings, was increased by his ringing out of the body of Audace the Great from the church where it had been buried to a newer one. The naval led to serious riots in the city, and Macedonius was deprived of his bishopric on charges of misconduct. He then joined the Arians, and gave his name to a sect which sprang out of these, though his career in its foundation is uncertain. He died soon after. The Macedonians allowed the Divinity of the Son, but denied that of the Holy Ghost. They were not agreed among themselves whether the Holy Ghost was a creature or an influence. The spread of Macedonianism led to the meeting of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, at which the heresy was condemned, and the Nicene Creed brought to its present form by the action of the clauses following "I believe in the Holy Ghost" (except the "Filioque" clause).

Tachutus, St., or St. Malo, was probably born in Wales early in the sixth century. He preached at first in Cornwall (then West Wales) to the Britons who had driven thither by the Saxons; he then went over to Brittany, and preached to his kinsmen who were pagans, and became the first bishop of Alette, about 541. He laboured long among them, and, as it seemed, in vain; so that them and went to live as a hermit on an island, spending his time in prayer with them. They besought him, after a while, to return, but he refused, saying he could do more for them by prayer than by his presence. He died about 565, on Nov. 15th, which is his festival. The See of Alette was raised to St. Malo, which was so named in honour.

Mackenzie, Charles Frederick [b. 1829, d. 1862], accompanied Bishop Colenso to Natal in 1855, and in 1861 was consecrated as a missionary bishop under the Universities Mission. But he died next year of fever, and the mission came to an end. Nevertheless, his great zeal and piety will always cause his name to be held in honour in the history of missionary enterprise.

Macknight, James, D.D., an eminent Scotch divine, was born at Irvine, in Ayrshire, in 1721. He studied at Glasgow University, and finished his education at Leyden. In 1753 he became pastor of Maybole, in Ayrshire. Here he remained for sixteen years, when he removed to Jedburgh, and in 1771 to Edinburgh, where he died in 1800.

Dr. Macknight was a superior scholar, an energetic minister, and a good writer, but not a very attractive preacher. His principal works were A Harmony of the Gospels, which has passed through many editions; The Truth of the Gospel History, and A New Translation of the Apostolic Epistles.

Macleod, Norman, D.D., a famous Scotch preacher and writer, was born at Campbellton, Argyllshire, June 3rd, 1812, the son of a Scottish minister, and descended from an ancient Highland family, of which, at the time of Norman's birth, his grandfather, the minister of Morven, was the chief representative. In 1823 his father was translated to the church of St. Columba, Glasgow, and Norman entered Glasgow College in 1825, proceeding two years later to the University. At neither period did he make much mark in scholarship, and he spoke in after-life with self-reproach of his want of industry during his college days; but he spent much time in varied reading, and studied especially the poetry of Shakespeare, Coleridge, and Wordsworth. In 1831 he entered the University of Edinburgh, in order to study theology under Chalmers, and afterwards spent three years in the family of Mr. Preston, of Moreby, Yorkshire, as tutor to his son, travelling with them on the Continent, and staying for some time at Weimar. At the close of this period he received his licence as a minister, and took charge of Loudon, in Ayrshire, where he remained for five years, giving himself up heartily to the care of the agricultural population. In 1852 he was removed to Dalkeith, in the centre of a colliery district, and surrounded on all sides by poverty and misery. His powers of organisation in parish ministry, his eloquence in preaching, and his power of sympathy with the feelings of all his parishioners, and especially the poor, were brought prominently forward upon his appointment to the parish of the Barony, Glasgow, in 1851. This charge involved the care of eighty-seven thousand people, and Dr. Macleod worked with untiring zeal and energy. He started services exclusively for working people, in order to attract those whose poverty made them ashamed to come to church with those richer than themselves; and any time he could spare from parochial work was devoted to the editing of Good Words. Macleod also took part in many works in the cause of the Scottish Church. He was one of a deputation which visited the Scottish churches in Canada in 1845, and he went to India in 1868 in his capacity of Chairman to the Committee of Foreign Missions. A complimentary dinner given to him at Willis's Rooms on the eve of his departure for India was a very remarkable scene, owing to the great number of eminent persons of all schools of thought who attended it. He was much admired and esteemed by the Queen, and was her Chaplain in Ordinary for Scotland, besides which he held the appointments of Dean of the Thistle and Dean of the Chapel Royal. In 1869 he was unanimously elected to be Moderator of the General Assembly, a post for which he was eminently fitted. He died at Glasgow, June 3rd, 1872. His literary work comprises some beautiful short stories, and an account of his family and early boyhood, entitled Reminiscences of a Highland Parish. His published Sermons show a very deep spirituality.

Macrina, Sr., was one of a family which has produced many saints, and Peter of Sebaste, Basil the Great, and St. Gregory of Nyssa were her younger brothers. She was born about 327, at Neocaesarea, in Pontus. She was named Macrina after her maternal grandmother (who brought up St. Basil, and is commemorated on Jan. 14th), and received the second name of Thecla after the virgin martyr. She was carefully educated by her mother Emmelia, and was taught to study diligently the sacred writings, especially the books of Solomon and the Psalms, for which she retained a preference all her life. As she grew older her great beauty and large fortune brought her many suitors, out of whom her father chose one, a young advocate, to whom she was affianced. He immediately began to study earnestly, in order to make himself more worthy of her, and had already established a reputation for himself when he died. Macrina took the resolution of remaining a virgin, declaring that her betrothed husband was still living, and that there was only a short journey between them, which would soon be accomplished. From that time she continued to live with her mother, whom she aided in the administration of the estates and with counsel, and when Emmelia had provided for all her children, the mother and daughter retired to one of their estates near Ibora, in Pontus, where they built two monasteries, one for men and one for women. Macrina governed the latter, and St. Basil was the first Superior of the former.

His brother Peter who succeeded him in the charge, owed his whole education to Macrina who fulfilled her task with wisdom, piety, and application.

Macrina's monastery was at first so poor that with a small number of her own friends and domestics, who were afterwards joined by several others, and became a large and flourishing community. The discipline was strict and regular, and the whole society lived in an exact equality. After Emmelia's death Macrina disposed of the remaining part of her estate to the poor, and lived on the labour of her hands. Her brother Basil died in the beginning of 379, and about eleven months afterwards she was taken with her last illness. St. Gregory, who had been absent from the country for some years, driven away by the violence of the heretics, came to visit her, not knowing of her illness. A very touching account is given of the interview. Gregory was in great distress from the loss of his brother, but Macrina spoke so earnestly on the state of the soul, and the life of the world to come, that the Bishop on his return to Nysa recorded it in a treatise On the Soul and its Resurrection. Macrina died, it is said, in December, but is commemorated on July 19th.

Madonna.—Italian for My Lady, a title given in the Roman Church to the Virgin Mary.

Magdalens.—An Order of nuns in the Roman Church established by Pope Leo 2. They consist chiefly of women who have been rescued from an evil life.

Magee, William, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin, born in County Fermanagh, 176 died in Dublin, 1831. He was ordained 1790, became Dean of Cork in 1814, Bishop of Raphoe in 1819, Archbishop of Dublin in 1822. His noted work, called Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of Atonement and Sacrifice, puts forward the theory of substitution which was for some time a standard doctrine among what we called "orthodox Christians," so much so that a few years since few divines of the Church would have thought of questioning it. This acquiescence must at present be regarded as somewhat modified. [Work of Christ.

Magi.—The priestly caste of the mountain regions of Armenia, who gave the name to a branch of the Parsees (q.v.). According to the ancients, the Magi were three classes: the first devoted themselves to the study of nature, the second composed of cure diseases by means of charms and incantations, and the third were the invokers of spirits. The wise men who came from the East to worship Christ at His Nativity were Magi, and are said by tradition to have been descendants of Abraham.

Magic.—A science dependent on influence over powers usually beyond man's con-
as believed in at a very early date, and described to evil spirits. Magic was much practised by the Jews; but in the days of the urly Christian Church all who were convicted were obliged to burn their magical books. Many canons were issued against it, and the Council of Ancyra prescribed five years' penance for any one who received a magician into his house. There were two kinds of magic, natural and diabolical, otherwise known as the "white" and "black" arts. They were both practised during the fiddle Ages; in the Inquisition many were put to death on suspicion of practising the latter. Both were put down by statute in the 7th century, and the practice renders a person who takes money for it liable to disfranchisement as an impostor. But the impostures perpetually takes new forms, and is therefore difficult of suppression.

Magister Discipline.—A presbyter, nerged with the education and training of children dedicated by their parents at a certain age to the service of the Church.

Magister Ecumenicus was the name of the director of a famous college which consisted of the Great founded at Constantinople. That name was given to him either because he knew all that a learned man ought to know, or because his office was to direct all that concerned the administration of the college. He had under him twelve doctors, who taught the Divine and humane sciences gratis. The Emperors had a great respect for this Magister Ecumenicus and the other presbyters, and consulted them on all weighty matters. The college was nobly furnished with vessels of gold and silver, glorious momenets for the church, and, above all, was enriched with a library not to be qualled, consisting of 600,000 very curious volumes. Among the curiosities were the Iad and Odyssey of Homer written in olden characters. Leo Isauricus being agry with the ecumenic master and the actors of the college, who defended the worship of images, caused them to be put up in the palace, and commanded that they should be set on fire in the night. They were all burned, together with the whole pile of buildings and the library.

Magnificat.—The song of the Blessed Virgin Mary, so called from the openingords in the Vulgate, "Magnificat anima mea Dominum." Its use in the public services of the Church is of long standing; it is prescribed in the rules of Cesslius, about 506 A.D.

Magnoald, Sr. or as he is sometimes called Magnus, was a follower of St. Gall [p.v.]. He founded a monastery in Suaibia, a place called Fissen.

Mahan, Milo, D.D., an American divine 1819, d. 1870]. He took orders in the Episcopal ministry in 1845, and was at first Professor of Ecclesiastical History and then Rector of St. Paul's, in the city of New York. He published some works on early Church history. A memoir of him has been written by the Rev. J. H. Hopkins.

Mahomet, Mahometanism.—Neither Greek nor Roman Paganism obtained more sway over the minds of the desert tribes than the military power of those nations acquired over their bodies, and it was among these that the greatest of all opponents of Christianity arose. The Arabians preserved a tolerably accurate tradition of their existence as a free nation from the day of Abraham and Ishmael; and their religion appears to have been derived from a period as remote, for it was a compound of the ancient Sabean religion and of the patriarchal religion, of which we seem to have a new founder in Abraham himself. The Sabean religion consisted at first in the worship of the "host of heaven," the sun, moon, and stars, without the use of idols; but afterwards images were made to represent them, and we find Terah mentioned as an idolator [Joshua xxiv. 2—14]. Laaban also used idols while Jacob was in his family; and idols were in use among the descendants of Ishmael until the time of Mahomet. Their religion, so far as it was true, would necessarily be that of Abraham, not of Moses, and so far as it was false it would be of that Sabean character which has just been mentioned. A mixture of this kind, in which Abrahamic traditions and a very corrupt form of Sabeanism were the principal elements, appears to have been the actual religion of Arabia, unaffected in the mass by Christianity, at the time when Mahomet arose. The new religion, therefore, sprang up in a soil which had already given birth to an Eclecticism in which there were probably more ancient primeval or patriarchal ingredients than in any of the known Pagan systems.

Mahomet [A.D. 570—632] was born of parents who belonged to an Arabian tribe which claimed a descent from Joktan, the son of Eber [Gen. x. 25—29], and not from Ishmael. This tribe went by the name of the Koreish, and they were considered "Araba el Araba," as St. Paul declared himself a "Hebrew of the Hebrews," on account of the purity of their blood. Some years before the time of Mahomet's public life there had been signs of dissatisfaction among some members of this tribe with the religion then current, and they craved after one more in accordance with the religion of Abraham. Four are especially remembered by name—Waraca, Othman, Obayd Allah, and Zayd—who were thus seeking for some higher faith than the superstition in which they had been brought up. The two first of these shortly became Christians; the third, after he had been for a time of an impostor than he had been in a more limited sphere, while his asceticism and religious character broke down under the intoxication of his enormous success.

There was an interval of some years between the marriage of the young Mahomet with the mature Kadijah and his assumption of the office of prophet. For thirteen years, in fact, we have little or no clue to his mode of life, and he is thirty-eight years of age before we see the beginning of that career which subsequently opened out for him. From that age until forty he was known to retire frequently to a cave near Mecca called the Cave of Hir, where it is said that he practised great mortifications as a preparation for his office; and at the end of that time he declared himself to be the Prophet of God. Three years more passed, and the circle of his adherents was widened by his open proclamation of himself as a prophet entrusted with a great mission to all the family of Hashem, and his forty-fourth year [A.D. 613] Mahomet declared publicly to the people of Mecca that he had been sent by God to reform their religion, and to put down the idolatry of the city. At first he was met by ridicule and insults; but a religious reformer who shows himself to be in earnest will not long want adherents, and in a few months those of Mahomet began to increase that the supporters of the old religion were alarmed, and became fierce opponents of him and his pretensions, endeavoring to put him to death. In consequence this opposition he sought refuge in a town named Tayef, not very far distant from Mecc where he continued to make proclamations preaching his new religion—for it was now developing into this—to his neighbours, and the caravans which travelled to Mecca. He afterwards returned to Mecca, until compelled by an insurrection which his preaching had aroused to fly for his life to Yalreb, or Medina. This flight began on July 16th, 622, and the day had been the era from which all Mussulman chronology is reckoned since the days of Mahomet, so that an event which is by a computation Anno Domini, 1886, is by the Mahometans [after July] reckoned in 1304th year of the Hegira or Flight.

There are only 354 days in the Mahomet year, which accounts for the discrepancy in the number of years between the Christian and the Mahometan reckoning of the interval between A.D. 622 and the present time; 1 Christian being equal to about 103 Mahomet years.

The city to which Mahomet fled had been in no small degree prepared for his receipt. The Pilgrims had come thence to Mecca, a city, as has been heard of the fame of Mahomet. The city of Medina had been originally occupied by two tribes, one of idolatrous Arab and one of Jews. A fierce war arose between the rival races; it terminated in defeat of the Jews, who were reduced to slavery. Amid their sufferings they were frequently heard to exclaim, “Oh! if the appointed time of the Messiah had arrived, we would seek Him, and He would deliver us from this tyranny.” When the Medine pilgrims heard the account of the new prophet at Mecca, they said to one another, “Can his be the Messiah of whom the Jews are constantly speaking? Let us find him out, and gain him over to our interests.” Mahomet at once saw what an advantage he had gained by such a prepossession; he declared he was the person whom the Jews expected, but that his mission was not confined to a single people, for all who believed in God and His prophet should share its advantages. [Taylor’s History of Mahomedanism, p. 105.]

It was probably from this time that Mahomet began to be an intentional impostor, claiming to be far more than a reformer of religion; and it is a curious fact that the chronology of the great anti-Christian imposture which he founded should be reckoned, not from the time when he showed himself in the character of a reforming servant of God, but from a period thirteen years later, when his assumptions were of a much less excusable kind.

It was about this period of Mahomet’s career that the Koran began to be produced as an authority. He had declared in the first instance that he had received a message from God by Gabriel; and that pretended message was succeeded, he alleged, by many others. These were taken down from the lips of Mahomet, and written on bones or on palm-leaves, and when collected formed the Koran, a book which holds the same place in the estimation of the Mahometans that the Holy Bible does among Christians. It is said to be very beautiful reading in the original Arabic in which it is written, but in English a great part of it is nonsense, while some of it is grossly immoral and profane. This book was written down by the companions of Mahomet at various periods during the course of his public life; and portions of it show that he had an imperfect acquaintance with Old Testament history and with the facts of the Gospel, but all is grossly distorted, and ludicrous fables are added on to some of the most solemn histories of Holy Writ. The great burden of the book is that Mahomet is the prophet of God. Christ is named, as is also the Virgin Mary; but the miraculous conception and birth of Jesus are denied, and He is declared to be the son of Joseph as well as Mary. To win the support of ignorant Christians, Mahomet allowed that Jesus was a prophet, but only in a very inferior degree to himself; the latter and not the former being set forth as the great centre, next to God Himself, of the religious system nucleated in the book. [Koran.]

The flight to Yalreb was the turning-point of Mahomet’s career. The religion which he had already begun to found now took shape as a form of doctrine, worship, and morals; and mosques began to be erected in which it might have a local habitation. The citizens of Yalreb were prodigiously in favour of Mahomet, and showed as much eagerness to receive him as those of Mecca had shown to get rid of him. They welcomed him to their city in procession as their sovereign and religious head, and changed its name from Yalreb to Medinet-al-Nabi, the City of the Prophet, by which latter name, contracted to Medina among ourselves, it has ever since been known. Then began the military character of the new religion, a character which essentially belonged to it for a very long period. Christianity mastered the world before a single sword was drawn even in its defence; but Mahometanism was propagated by violence from the beginning. At first the new “prophet” had but a small band of about three hundred military followers, but with these he made a successful raid on a caravan of the rich produce of Arabia, which was proceeding from Mecca to Syria under the escort of a thousand soldiers, headed by Abu Sophian, the successor of Abu Taleb in what was practically the sovereignty of Mecca. The small force of Mahomet was on the point of being defeated, when he pretended to have had an interview with the angel Gabriel, and as he threw a handful of sand towards the Meccans with the exclamation, “May their faces be confounded!” his followers concluded that a miracle was being wrought in their favour, and with the fierceness which such a persuasion has always given men in battle, they made a fresh onslaught, which ended in the total rout of those who had opposed them, and the capture of an immense booty. This success led Mahomet to assume a much more haughty position, and he now pretended to be guided by special revelations from heaven in all his undertakings. A second encounter between Abu Sophian and Mahomet in the following year ended in the defeat of the latter; but as the advantage was not followed up, each party remained in strong force, and for a time the whole of Arabia was the arena of most horrible petty warfare, in which plunder and murder were the objects of both sides. Then came the siege of Medina by the Meccans, which ended in a truce between Mahomet and his opponents for the long period of ten years.

The prophet then began to plunder and slay the rich Jews who thronged the towns within his reach; and by this means obtained great treasure for his further proceedings. Some he caused to be privately assassinated by small bands of his followers who presented themselves as guests, and became the murderers of their entertainers. By this means Mahomet gradually advanced towards Mecca, increasing his numbers and his wealth, without actually breaking the treaty which had been made between him and the army of Mecca. Then he found a pretext for invading the city itself, declaring that the truce had been broken by his opponents; but as he was now at the head of an army which numbered ten thousand men, the city surrendered to him on condition of his not entering it for a year, and of his followers meanwhile performing their pilgrimages to the Kaaba, the ancient temple of the Arabsians, unarmed with any weapon but their swords. During the interval, the false prophet employed himself in extending his conquests over neighbouring tribes, and especially in subduing and plundering the Jews; and he also sent ambassadors to Persia, Constantinople, and Ethiopia, inviting monarchs and people to adopt the new religion. The King of Ethiopia was ready to become a convert; the Emperor of Constantinople, Heraclius, returned a politic but indifferent answer; and only the Persian sovereign showed indignation at the effrontery of the adventurer. He tore in pieces the letter, and denounced the message as insolent: “Thus may Allah tear his kingdom,” was the reply of Mahomet.

When the time came for Mahomet to visit Mecca, he entered the city in the twofold character of conqueror and religious reformer. His first act was to go to the Kaaba, and cause all the three hundred and sixty idols to be destroyed, laying his hand on each, and saying, “Truth has come, let falsehood disappear.” His opposition to idolatry was always consistent and energetic. No doubt this opposition to idolatry became one great means of gaining over most of the Iconoelasts, who had done so much harm to Christianity in the East. These religious men were powerfully impressed with the evil of using images of saints and of our Lord, and, finding the new imposture agree with their own principles in this particular, they looked on such a basis of agreement as one which they could adopt, without considering the important points of fundamental difference. Certain it is that many such Christians were gained over by the impostor.

The personal supremacy of Mahomet over the whole of Arabia was now established, and he began to carry his arms against Palestine, which was then under the dominion of Heraclius, the Emperor of Constantinople; but the expedition ending without any engagement between the Christians and the Moslems, Mahomet returned to Medina. His mode of life at this time was of the most sensual description. One of his rules in the Koran for all his followers was that they were to practise polygamy only to the extent of having four wives each. To justify himself in possessing a much larger number, he pretended a fresh revelation, by which he was to be allowed any number that he pleased; and there can be no doubt that sensual excess shortened his days.

The death of Mahomet took place on Jun 8th, 632, when he was at the age of sixty-three. Poisoned food had been given him some years before by a Jewish slave, but before he had partaken of it in sufficient quantity to cause immediate fatal effect the woman’s act was discovered. The poison remained, however, in his system, and acting upon a frame exhausted by dissipation carried him off at the time named, after sixteen years of raving fanaticism. He left no son, and only one daughter, Fatima, behind him. His body was buried in a grave dug under the bed on which he had died, and mosque erected over the spot has become the scene of as much virtual idolatry in Medina as ever was practised in the Kaaba at Mecca.

Mahomet left to his followers a new religion and the germ of an empire. He was succeeded in his rule over the latter by Ab Beke [A.D. 571-634], the father of his favourite wife Ayesha, and the first of the four Caliphs by whom the Moslem empire was founded. Within thirty years from his death, his followers had conquered the whole of Syria, Egypt, and Mesopotamia, and had overthrown the empire of the Persians. The second of his four great successors, the Caliph Omar [582-644], took Jerusalem in the year 637, and built on the site of the Temple the mosque which has since been called by his name. It was he also who destroyed the great library of Alexandria three years after wards, declaring that no books were need besides the Koran; by that ignorant and savage act he deprived the world of some of its greatest literary treasures, including probably many Christian writings, and many primitive manuscripts of the Holy Scriptures. Oma was also the first of the Mahometan rulers who assumed the title of “Commander of the Faithful”; and he, in fact, consolidated the which Mahomet himself had founded, and in a great extent completed his work. “During the reign of Omar,” says the Mahometan historian, “the Saracens conquered thirty-six thousand cities, towns, and castles, destroy four thousand Christian, Magian, and Pagan temples, and erected fourteen hundred mosques.” As to the latter item, it is certain that many mosques yet exist—as that of S Sophia at Constantinople—which were originally Christian churches. The early course of this false religion was, indeed, that of most sanguinary propagandism, cruelties acts of tyranny being perpetrated, under the plea of devotion to God and his prophet Mahomet, such as no civilised conqueror had ever been guilty of.

The third caliph, Othman [A.D. 574-656] who had been secretary to Mahomet, extended the conquests of Omar, and with them the new religion. Persia was entirely subdued, the north of Africa, and some of the lands in the Mediterranean. He was murdered by his own people in the mosque at Medina, and succeeded by Ali [A.D. 598–661], first cousin of Mahomet, almost his first convert, and the husband of his daughter Fatima. He, too, after some years of civil war, was stabbed in a mosque (that of Cufa), being the last of the immediate successors of Mahomet. The seat of the empire was then moved to Damascus.

It is not necessary to go into much detail respecting the subsequent history of Mahometan conquest, and it will be sufficient just to sketch out in a few words the progress which it made between the time of these great founders and the period at which modern history begins. Let it be said, then, that almost the whole of Asia (Asia Minor excepted) was subdued during the time of the first Caliphs, and that in the reign of the first Caliph of Damascus [A.D. 675] the empire penetrated as far as Tangier and the Atlantic. A few years later the entire north of Africa was part of the empire, as far as the Straits of Gibraltar. In 711 Spain, on the north of those straits, was successfully invaded by the Arab conquerors, who retained possession of that part of Europe until 1492. Under Soliman the greater part of Asia Minor was conquered—that is, in A.D. 717 (though Constantiople was not conquered until 1453), and about the same time the northern parts of India were subdued. The emires had even penetrated into the south of rance, and it was not until the defeat of bDurrahman by Charles Martel in 732 that there seemed any hope of preventing that which Mahomet had directed his followers to accomplish—the subjugation of the whole world to is rule and religion. It brings home the fact of Mahomet's conquest very vividly to our minds to remember, that Spain was a Mahometan country for eight hundred years before the Reformation and down to the sign of our Henry VII., and also that for some centuries the empire founded on the axis of this religion covered as large a portion of the globe as the Roman empire and done in the most prosperous days of the Caesars. When it is remembered that wherever the arms of the invaders penetrated, there religion of the false prophet in whose name they fought and ruled was propagated and enforced, it will be conceived how mighty an enemy Christianity had to contend with in these middle ages of its history. Even now, ninety-six millions of Mahometans occupy some of the fairest portions of the eastern hemisphere. This religion has almost entire possession of the northern half of Africa, Turkey in Europe, of Arabia, Persia, the Holy Land, Asia Minor, and some parts of India; and very few of its devotees have ever become converts to Christianity.

Principles of Mahometanism.—Let us now endeavour to sum up the principles of Mahometanism, as it has been exhibited to the world for twelve centuries and a quarter.

First of all, it must be noted that Mahometanism professes an unbounded veneration for the doctrine of the unity of God. "Islamism," says the Mahometan doctor, "rests on five foundations; of which the first is the confession of God, that there is no other God beside Him, and that Mahomet is His prophet; the second is the offering up of prayer at stated intervals; the third, the giving of alms; the fourth, fasting during the month Ramadan; and the fifth is the pilgrimage to Mecca, which every person must perform who is able." In as far as this confession of one God stands by itself, it may be taken as the truth, just as it was the truth for the Jews to confess, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord." But the Koran entirely repudiates the doctrine of the Trinity, and says distinctly, "Jesus was a mere mortal, and not the Son of God." His birth by a supernatural conception is denied; His resurrection and ascension are taken no account of. Our Lord is allowed to have been a holy man, a messenger from God, but His place as the object of man's worship, love, and hope, is denied Him. Hence some hold it to be an error to call Mahometanism a heresy: Dante views it as such in the Inferno [xxvii. 35] where he speaks of Mahomet and his followers who

"While they lived did sow, Scandal and schism, and, therefore, thus are rent." Other writers have also taken this idea, and in a lecture on the subject Dean Stanley has said that "Mahometanism must be regarded as an eccentric heretical form of Eastern Christianity" [Lect. on Eccl. Hist. p. 308]. But the essence of Mahometanism, others maintain, is rather to repudiate Christianity—i.e. the system of religion in which Christ is the centre—and to substitute a system in which He holds a very inferior place, and which would not be one iota changed if its partial acknowledgment of Christ were left out altogether. So in the creed which was lately quoted, the complement of the truth that there is one God is the assertion that Mahomet is His prophet, and the whole foundation of the system at large is that all personal messengers from God culminated in the person of Mahomet, and all revelations in the Koran. It is contended, therefore, to be a mistake to suppose that there is any ground of agreement between Christianity and Mahometanism, for when once they are brought face to face, they must be as much opposed to each other as Christianity and Paganism.

Mai, Angelo [b. 1782, d. 1854], Cardinal of the Roman Church [1888].—A very learned and acute philologist, who made it a specialty to study manuscripts and palimpsests, and published editions of the famous Vatican manuscripts and of the Old Testament, as well as of some of the Fathers.

Maimbourg, Louis [b. 1619, d. 1686], was born at Nancy, and in 1626 became a Jesuit. Some of his writings drew on him the indulgence of the Court of Rome, where—upon the Jesuits turned him out of their body, and he retired to the abbey of St. Victor in Paris, where Louis XIV. settled a considerable pension on him, and where he died very suddenly, when he was composing the History of the Schism of England. He wrote two volumes of sermons, a History of Arianism, History of the Iconoclasts, History of the Crusades, History of the Schism of the Greeks, History of Lutheranism and Calvinism, The Decay of the Empire, the Pontificate of St. Leo, etc. His books are not now read; Protestant writers charge him with passion and insincerity, and with romancing in his accounts of ancient history.

Maimonides, or, more properly, Moses ben Maimon, one of the most celebrated Jewish rabbis, was born at Cordova about 1135. He was educated by his father, a learned man, who had written some works on Hebrew and Arabic. Maimonides also studied Greek philosophy, medicine, and theology under the ablest Arabic masters of the day. In 1148 the Almohades took Cordova, and forced all Jews and Christians to become Mohammedans or fly. Maimonides and his family fled to Fez, where they remained till 1165, and then went through Acco and Jerusalem to Fostat (ancient Cairo), where his father died. The son is said to have at first gained his living by the trade of a jeweller, but he afterwards became physician to the Sultan, and chief of all the Jews in Egypt. He died, Dec. 13th, 1204.

The learning and ability of Maimonides have been universally acknowledged, and there was a saying; "from Moses to Moses no one has arisen like Moses." He it was who first put the numerous Jewish traditions, and the discussions they had given rise to, in order, so that he has been called "the second law-giver." He also was the first Jewish Biblical commentator.

His first work, written in 1158, was a treatise on the Jewish calendar, and two years later he wrote a Letter on Glorifying God by suffering Persecution, which was an apology for himself for having in Fez professed Mohammedanism, while in secret he still practised Judaism, a proceeding which called forth many reproaches in later years. But his first really great work was the Commentary on the Mishna [1158–68], originally written in Arabic, but translated into Hebrew by many rabbis. This is an historical introduction to the Oral Law, which is now considered so essential a part of the Talmud that the two are generally printed together. In this work is to be found the first defined Jewish creed which forms part of the ritual, and is repeated each morning by the orthodox Jews. Maimonides' second great work was the Mishni-Thora also called The Mighty Hand, a complete encyclopedia of Jewish literature and law and written in beautiful Hebrew. To this generally appended his Book of the Precepts written in Arabic, which contains 613 precepts chiefly directed against the authors of the Asharoth, or Warnings. His third and no important work was the Arabic Delalath Hairim, translated into Hebrew by his disciple Samuel ben Tybbon, with the title of Mor Nebuchim, or Guide to the Perplexed. This a philosophical commentary on the Bible, as consists of three parts. The first treats of the allusions in the Bible to God's sensuousness the second of the Jewish religion, and the third of Ezekiel's vision. This book caused such discords among the Jews—orthodox versus science—that at the beginning of the thirteenth century they brought their disputes to be settled by Christians, who burn the books; and then followed a raid upon Hebrew books, and finally upon Jews themselves. Meanwhile David Kimichi was in 1234, chosen to settle the dispute, an Maimonides became the glory of his nation and received the names of "Great Eagle the "Light of Two Worlds," etc. The fate of the book soon spread into other countries. The original Arabic was printed for the first time in Paris in 1856. In 1827 Towne printed an English translation under the title of The Reasons of the Laws of Moses for the Mordeh Nebuchim of Maimonides. Another work is Maimonides' Thirteen Articles Faith, printed at Worms in 1529.

Maistre, Le. [Sacy, Dr.]

Maitland, Samuel Roffy, D.I, essayist and controversialist, was born London in 1792. His family was Presbyter, and he was baptised in the Kirk Scotland, and thus when he went up Trinity College, Cambridge, he was unable to graduate. He studied for the law, and was called to the bar in 1816, but becoming a member of the English Church, was ordained in 1821. In 1823 he became Perpetual Curate of Christ Church, Gloucester, and in 1837 was appointed Librarian to Arch bishop Howley, and Keeper of the Manuscri at Lambeth. He held this post till the Arch bishop's death in 1848, when he retired Gloucester, and died there in 1866. Maitland's works may be ranged in the classes. The first consists of essays on Church history. The works of this class are The Dark Ages, in which he contends that darkness has been much exaggerated; Pa and Documents Illustrative of the History of Rites of the Ancient Albignes and Waldens and Essays on Subjects connected with Reformation in England. The two last works rave rise to much controversy, to which Dr. Maitland responded in "letters," "notes," and "reviews," in some of which he criticises works by Fox, Faber, Townsend, and Milner. Many new views of events which are now generally accepted were first started by Maitland. His second class of works contains explanations of the Apocalypse and the prophetic millennium, such as The Prophetic Period of Daniel and St. John, etc., and the third and most miscellaneous treats of current opinions as to theology and morals. The most important are: Erwin, or the Nature, History, and Destiny of Man; eight Essays on Various Subjects, an Sacred Art, Messuerism, Super¬tition and Science, etc. Dr. Maitland also, while at Lambeth, prepared an Index of such English Books printed before the year 1600 as are now in the Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth, etc.

Major Orders.—The superior ranks of the Christian ministry, bishops, priests, deacons, and (in the Roman Church) subdeacons.

Major, George [b. 1502, d. 1574], a Protestant minister of Germany, born at Nurem¬berg, a personal friend of Luther. He taught at Magdeburg and Wittenberg, and became minister at Eisleben. He died at Wittenberg in great poverty. His religious opinions were attacked by Nicholas Amsdorf, and he wrote an answer to him and the Rigid Confessionists, declaring that good works are so far necessary to salvation that even children cannot be justified without them. His disciples were called Majorists. His works were published in three volumes, containing his sermons, commentaries on some books of the Bible, etc.

Majorinus. [Dualists.]

Malachy, St. [b. 1095, d. 1148], was born of a good family at Armagh. He was ordained priest in 1120, and did much to improve discipline in the diocese of Armagh, where he was the Assistant of Archbishop Celsus. He pressed Roman practices on the Irish Church, and was the means of its being placed under the authority of the Pope. [IRELAND, CHURCH OF.] He was made Abbot of Bangor, and in 1134 succeeded to the Archbishopsric of Armagh. He died at Clairvaux, in the arms of his bosom friend St. Bernard, who wrote a funeral panegyric on him. He was the first Irish saint canonised by the Pope. He is said to be the author of the Prophecies concerning the Popes, from Celestine II., 1143, down to Innocent XI., 1692; but this is more than improbable, as they were never heard of till Arnold de Wyon published them in 1595 in his Lignum Vite, dedicated to Philip II. of Spain, and they were probably his own invention. St. Bernard, who wrote St. Malachy's Life, and mentions his slenderest predictions, takes no notice of these prophecies.

Malakanes.—A Russian sect, so named from the Russian malako, "milk," from their use of milk on fast days. They call themselves "Istineeye Christiane," or true Christians. They were discovered in the Government of Tambob in the middle of the last century, but nothing is known of their origin. They reject the sacraments, saying that they understand by baptism not the earthly water but the spiritual, and as regards "the Lord's Supper, it was a commemoration of Christ, but the words of the Gospel are the spiritual bread of life." In 1833 Terentius Belineoff, an enthusiast, proclaimed that the millennium would begin in thirty months, and ordered them to leave off work. He also told them he was Elias, and announced the day when he would ascend into heaven, but on making the attempt fell to the ground, and his dis¬appointed followers delivered him up to prison. The sect is principally to be found in the Crimea, but many emigrated to Asia, Georgia, etc.

Maldonatus, Joannes, a Roman Catho¬lic commentator of great value, born at Las Casas, in Estremadura, 1533; died at Rome, 1583. He studied at Salamanca under a Dominican and under Tolet, a Jesuit, through whose influence Maldonatus entered the Society of Jesuits in 1562, giving up for that purpose a professorship of theology which he had held at Salamanca. He was sent by his superiors to Rome, and then to Paris, where he remained till 1576, teaching the¬ology in the college of Clermont. He lectured and preached with such success that he drew together numbers of people, Protestants as well as others, and Charles IX. was accustomed to attend his lectures. His success aroused the jealousy of his rivals, and he was accused of holding heretical opinions on the Immaculate Conception and Purgatory. Maldonatus justified himself by referring to the Council of Trent, and the Pope took his part. He was, nevertheless, removed to the Jesuit college at Bourges, and two years later was appointed to visit the Jesuit colleges in France, and took great interest in the welfare of the university at Pont-a-Mousson, which had been recently founded. Pope Gregory invited him to Rome to assist in the publication of the Septuagint in Greek, and to teach in the Colle¬gium Romanum. His principal work was his Commentary on the Four Gospels, and he also wrote commentaries on the Prophets and Psalms, and on some of the Epistles, besides many theological works which were never printed.

Malebranche, Nicholas, a French philosopher, son of Nicholas Malebranche, President of the Chamber of Accounts, was born in Paris, Aug. 6th, 1638. He was deformed and sickly, and from childhood fond of solitude. He studied theology, and in 1660 entered the Congregation of the Oratory. He was at first undecided whether to study Bible history and the Fathers of the Church or philosophy; at last, a book by Cartesius falling into his hands, he applied himself to study physics, and became the most prominent of Cartesius' disciples. In 1673 and the following year appeared his famous work, De la Recherche de la Vérité, which investigated the causes of the errors to which the human mind is liable, the nature of truth, and the way of reaching it. He maintained that we see all things in God, and that all beings and thoughts exist in Him. This book shows great depth and originality of thought, and is written with eloquence and clearness. His next work was De la Nature et la Grace, and contains a new system of mystical idealism. This was opposed by Bossuet, Arnauld, and others. Arnauld wrote a book on true and false ideas against Malebranche, and a bitter controversy began. Some suspected Malebranche of leaning towards Spinoza's doctrine of substance, while others accused him of a tendency towards the Archbishop of Cambrai's system of Pure Love. Francis Lami, a Benedictine, attacked Malebranche, accusing him of inconsistency, which was replied to by a tract on the Love of God. Being desired to write something to assist the conversion of the Chinese, he drew up a conference between a Christian and a Chinese philosopher. He also wrote Christian and Metaphysical Meditations. He was chosen an honorary member of the Academy of Science, and his probity and piety are said to have been no less remarkable than his learning, genius, and judgment.

Malmesbury, William of [b. in Somersetshire about 1096, of a Norman father and Saxon mother]. He was educated at Malmesbury, and became in course of time Librarian and Precentor of the monastery, but declined the position of abbot. He lived at Malmesbury all his life, which he spent in writing the histories which have made his name famous. Of these the most important are, De Gestis Regum, comprising the history of England from the Anglo-Saxon conquest till the end of Henry I.'s reign; Historia Novella, a continuation of the first, lasting till 1142; De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum, an account of the English Church from the introduction of Christianity by St. Augustine till 1123, and which he continued by Lives of Aldhelm and St. Dunstan. The date of his death is uncertain, but it is evident from his works that it was later than 1142, and it is supposed by one of his translators that he lived some years after that date.

Mamertus, Sr. [brother to Claudian Mamertus, the writer], Bishop of Vienne, in Dauphiny. The first authentic mention of him is in the year 463, when he had a dispute with Leontius, Bishop of Arles, about the consecration of the Bishop of Die, which both Metropolitanians claimed to lie within their jurisdictions. The point was submitted to Pope Hilary, who ordered a Council to be called which was probably held at Arles, and which decided in favour of Leontius. Mamertus is specially famous as the founder of the Rogation Days. The land had been shaken by earthquakes, ravaged by wild beasts, and threatened by invaders, and the Bishop ordered that the Litanies which had been in use long before, but which had been laid aside, should be read often, and said with fasting, and in Procession. He fixed upon the three day before Ascension Day, and the practice soon became observed throughout Christian countries. In 474 Sidonius Apollinaris, Bishop of Clermont, wrote a letter to Mamertus, congratulating him on the success of these processions and saying that he was looking to them as his chief hope in the threatened invasions of the Goths. In 511 the Rogation Days were recognised at the Council of Orleans, and their continuance was directed. Nothing is known of Mamertus after 474, but he is commemorated on May 11th.

Man.—We shall consider man in this article under two heads: 1, his place in creation, and 2, his moral and spiritual nature.

1. Of late years the theory has been put forth that man is merely the highest development, so far as this world is concerned, of creative energy, and traces its origin through the ape and other less complete organisms to some remote germ of being only conceivable by the imagination. This has already been considered under the head of Evolution. It remains, therefore, for us to notice the opposing doctrine that man is the result of distinct and separate act of Creation, and that so far from being in his present condition the crown and summit of a gradually ascending scale of intelligence and organisation, he is in his moral nature, at least, a creature fallen from the pure and upright condition in which he at first existed.

In the Bible we are taught that after certain successive phases of creation, man was made as the supreme act of the Creator, and we need not say that the upholders of both the views above named find no contradiction between them in Revelation. Our only source of knowledge is the physical nature of man compare with that of all other creatures, and the records to be found in the earth on which he has lived. Can we find any sign of the existence of a connecting link between man and the brute? The nearest approach to such a connecting link is, of course, the ape, and the gorilla we see the closest approximations to humanity that the animal world affords while in the aborigines of Australia is found the lowest form of human existence. Between these two lies the strait which research sought to bridge. For thousands of years these two types of being, the ape and the man, have existed together, but always at a safe distance from each other, and not, as the supporters of the evolutionary theory would lead us to expect, in gradually approaching lines. For, take the earliest known remains of man and compare them with those of the ape: if the two had a common origin, we should find a greater resemblance between the two than the earliest known specimens than in those of other species. In comparing, however, the two, we find that precisely the same differences existed in the far past as exist now, at the man and the ape of the Tertiary period were as distinct from each other as they are now. The brain of the gorilla still averages in size 30·51 cubic inches, while the brain of the Australian savage averages 99·35 cubic inches. Between the two there is a difference of 68·84 inches. But between the rain of the lowest savage and that of the most highly cultured European, the product of centuries of civilization and select breeding, the difference is only 12·64 inches. If, then, the difference between the lowest and the highest man be so small, how great is the difference between the lowest man and the highest brute? and this difference has never been less, so far as we have any means of knowing.

With regard to the antiquity of man, there exist most widely differing hypotheses, some basing an existence of 230,000 years, while others limit it to 6,000. Historical evidence carries us back, in its farthest limits, about 400,000 years. Beyond that we have little to go by, except the remains of human ingenuity and handiwork found in the gravel deposits of old river valleys, such as that of the Thames in England and the Somme in France. Between the dawn of history and the age of stone implements, lies a great gulf of unknown width. Underneath the layer of soil formed by the agency of causes now acting, and termed by geologists Recent, are what are termed the Quaternary strata, in the late series of which appear deposits of gravel in patches here and there upon the slopes of wider valleys, somewhat above the level of the streams now owing along their bottoms. Had these gravel been deposited by slowly subsiding heets of water, they would have been distributed evenly over the whole surface, but, vening as they do in patches, they must have been carried on by sudden floods, which flowed the current channels covered with the sediment brought down from higher levels. In course of time this dried and formed loam above them. In these gravel beds are found animal remains, such as bones, teeth, etc., and stones, highly flints, shaped into implements and weapons such as hammers, knives and arrow heads, all significant of the presence of man, and of his dependence for subsistence upon the chase of wild animals. A strange and hitherto unaccounted-for fact is the absence of all human bones in these deposits; but, in spite of this, the presence of articles of human ingenuity and manufacture sufficiently proves the presence of humanity. The question, then, to be decided is, How long ago were these deposits made? Were there no other causes at work then than we see now, or were their rate of action the slow and almost imperceptible progress now going on around us, then indeed the antiquity of man would be a matter for the imagination to conceive and not for sober calculation. But it is impossible to say at what rate of progress these changes of surface have gone on, or whether that progress has been uniform or irregular. There have probably been sudden local catastrophes, and in some parts changes have developed much faster than in others, as in our own land what five hundred years ago were seaports, crowded with busy shipping, are now inland villages out of sight of the sea; and what were formerly oak forests are now the beds of deep seas. Yet this has been the work of a few hundreds of years, and not the slow achievement of ages. It does not follow, therefore, that, because traces of human handiwork have been found in the Quaternary strata, the antiquity of man is so great as many have supposed. Indeed 8,000 years might be quite long enough to account for all the changes that have taken place since the deposits of gravel occurred in which these traces of humanity are found. In fact geologists are by no means agreed as yet upon the duration of later geological periods. There is, consequently, nothing in the much debated question of the Stone Age to positively contradict the general deductions of the Biblical chronology.

Contemporary with the men of the Stone Age was the mammoth, whose teeth and bones lie scattered both on the uplands and in the valleys of the Quaternary period, and whose form has been found faithfully carved on bone and ivory amongst the other relics of prehistoric man. Now, though the mammoth most certainly existed in very late geological periods, we do not find it referred to in either myth or fable. It is probable, therefore, that since the time when men and mammoths lived together a long epoch interpolated, since which the mammoth has been extinct, but man, driven from his former haunts, has reappeared. Even in those prehistoric days man was not merely a being of reason and design, able to work in stone, the material that lay next his hand, but was an artist also, depicting in rude but graphic lines the forms of the creatures around him.

There is nothing in the history of man to demonstrate the gradual development of a moral being out of a purely animal creature. Acquaintance with natural forces, and consequent employment of them in ministering to human desires and necessities, have of course increased with the lapse of time; but history strongly proves the tendency of races to degenerate, so that the savage of to-day may with just as much likelihood be the modern representative of a long-perished civilisation as the cultured man of to-day may be the outcome of a gradually ascending series of mental developments.

To sum up: Science fails to show us any traces of a connecting link between man and the brute, nor does it tell us with any approach to exactness the age of man upon the earth; but, so far as present appearances go, there is no necessity to imagine more than about 8,000 years to account for all the phenomena that exist, and they are utterly at variance with the vast and indefinite ages that some would assign.

2. We have now to consider shortly Man himself, in his individual and aggregate existence. He has a body, a soul, and a spirit. The union of body and soul constitutes his life. The possession of a spirit makes him an intellectual, moral, religious being. It is an instinct within him to preserve life, and it is part of his moral obligation to avoid whatever practices tend to injure it—intemperance, debauchery, excessive labour, reckless squandering of means. As an intellectual being he is bound to cultivate his mental faculties, to acquire knowledge, to regulate his opinions by the exercise of a sound judgment. As a moral being, he must not only obey conscience, but must seek by such means as open themselves to him to train that conscience to give a right judgment, to quicken and strengthen it continually. His duty to his fellow-men is to be truthful, even when no other person can be injured by falsehood. "Speak every man truth to his neighbour, for we are members one of another." Covetousness, ambition, love of display, pride, apathy, are all sins against the moral and religious life, because they imply injury to others in thought if not in deed. Humility, not only towards others but within his own soul, is a necessity to one who would see God and learn his own place with respect to Him. The constant acknowledgment of dependence upon Him, and attendance upon His worship, is the true attitude of one who realises that he is not a waif and stray of the universe, but a child of the living God, who calls him to His favour now, and to the hope of perfect consummation and bliss hereafter.

Man, Bishopric of. [Sodor and Man.]

Manchester, Bishopric of.—The great manufacturing county of Lancashire was separated, with the exception of Liverpool and a large district around, from the diocese of Chester in the year 1848, when it was formed into an independent diocese, with Manchester for its cathedral city.

The Bishops of Manchester up to the present time have been

The cathedral of Manchester is the ancient parochial and collegiate church of the city. Having been the parish church from time immemorial, it was, in the year 1422, constituted into a collegiate church with a wardenship, eight fellows, four clerks or minor canons and six choirmen. The college was disestablished in 1547, but refounded by a charter of Queen Elizabeth in 1578, and continued in existence until the foundation of the see in 1584, when it became the nucleus of the cathedral chapter. The present cathedral dates originally from the establishment of the college, but it was enlarged by the addition of man, guild and chantry chapels in the latter part of the fifteenth century. It is a magnificent specimen of Perpendicular work, and has been carefully restored. The original tower having become unsafe, the present one was built in its place. The collegiate church was originally dedicated in the names of the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. George, and St. Denys: but the college was called Christ’s College in the charter of Queen Elizabeth.

Manes. [Manichæus.]

Manes.—Divinities among the ancient Romans which some think have been souls separated from the bodies, and other the gods, of the dead. They are said to have been so called from the old Latin word manum, or "good." The heathens considered souls to be of a light, airy substance, resembling shadows, but having the same organs and capable of the same functions as when in the body. This idea was adopted by some of the primitive Christians and applied to God, and they received the name of Anthropomorphites. An annual festival, called Feralia, was dedicated specially to the Manes, and held on Feb. 19th.

Manicheus or Manes was a Persian heretic who flourished in the third century. The story is that he was originally a slave but was purchased, and afterwards adopted, by a rich widow, who gave him a good education and at her death left him her property. He was finally slain alive by the Persian King for failing in his attempt to heal the monarch’s son.

Manes gave himself out to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, and the promised Comforter. He considerably increased the number of his followers by concealing himself for a year and stating on his reappearance that he had been on a visit to heaven, whence he brought a revelation. This revelation was contained in a book, full of strange symbols, which he exhibited to his disciples.

The essential point of the Manichean system was its recognition of two eternal and dependent principles. According to Mani-ans, there existed from all eternity two opposing powers, one good and the other evil, each having his own dominion in space. The god god dwelt in the light, and from him proceeded two other persons, of the same essence, at inferior in rank, viz., the Son, who dwell in the sun and moon, and the Holy host, who inhabits the air. The Evil One dwelt in darkness, and his kingdom contained the elements of matter. His subjects are continually rebelling and engaging in battles, and, in one of these, some of them, forced by their enemies, crossed the boundary the realms of light and took possession of portion of the celestial kingdon. The first man sent against them by God was ken prisoner, but the "living spirit" rescued him, and confined the devs in the air, where they produce thunder, lightning, and tempests. The next work of the "living spirit" was to parate the heavenly essence from the atter with which the powers of darkness had contaminated it. Hence came the universe. The sun and moon are composed of the celestial substance, but the earth is only imperfectly freed from the dross of matter. Man was the work of the evil devils. They formed material bodies in which to imprison that portion of the heavenly essence which they had retained, and thus human beings came into existence. Their bodies, as they are formed, entraps the powers which pervade all creation, and so the earth is populated.

To free these souls from their corporal prisons, and complete the work of separation, it was necessary to send prophets to all nations to prepare the way, sent His Son into the world, taught mankind their true origin, and showed by His example how they must live to gain their lost condition. Since flesh is an evil organ, our Saviour did not take a body, but His body was a phantasm, and is birth, sufferings, and crucifixion an appearance only.

All souls must eventually become perfect. Those which do not become so during their man life will have another opportunity in the bodies of other animals, and those which are not purified by the end of the world will be condemned, as a punishment, to act as colors to the imprisoned demons. Finally, when all souls are freed, and the separation of good and evil elements completed, the earth will be committed to the flames, and its mists will return to the realms of darkness.

Man was the author of several works in Arabic and Persian, of which some parts are still extant. He rejected the Old Testament, as it contained him, together with several sorcerphal books which supported the doctrine of the immaterial body of Christ.

Manicheism reached Rome about A.D. 277, read widely, and continued down to comparatively modern times. The sect consisted of two classes—auditors and elect. Their hierarchy, chosen exclusively from the elect, consisted of a leader and twelve "masters," under whom were seventy-two bishops, in imitation of Christ, His twelve apostles, and seventy-two disciples.

Maniple.—One of the vestments used in the Roman Church. It is three feet four inches long and three inches wide, of the same colour and make as the stole, and fringed at the ends, and is attached by a loop to a button on the left sleeve of the alb. This vestment was formerly a handkerchief held in the hand, and was probably used when handing the eucharistic vessels.

Manse [Lat. mansus, "abiding place"] denotes in ancient law-books a house or habitation, with or without land, and later was applied to ecclesiastical residences, both parochial and collegiate. In Scotland it designates the residences of the Presbyterian ministers, and it has been adopted of late years in England as the name of the houses of Congregational ministers.

Mansel, Henry Longueville, D.D.,Dean of St. Paul's, was born on Oct. 6th, 1820. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School, and thence went to St. John's College, Oxford, where he took a double first class. He became Reader in Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy at Magdalen College in 1855, Bampton Lecturer in 1858, Waynflete Professor of Logic in 1859, and Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford in 1866. Two years after he succeeded Dr. Milman as Dean of St. Paul's, and died on July 31st, 1871. The publication of Dr. Mansel's Bampton Lectures, entitled Limits of Religious Thought, marks an epoch in the history of English theology. It was an eager reiteration of the views of Sir William Hamilton, whose works Mansel had already edited, and maintained that man's intellect, being finite, cannot know absolute truth, but must depend upon a revelation which comes from without, and which is regulative and practical. This view was immediately assailed by Professor Maurice in a series of letters, which he published under the title of What is Revelation? Mansel replied with much acrimony, and a very bitter controversy began and spread among other writers. Maurice contended that Mansel, by divorcing Reason from Faith, destroyed the life of both; that God does not reveal, not regulative truths, but His very self to man. Certainly the doctrine known in modern days as Agnosticism is professedly an acceptance of Mansel's challenge. He said, "You cannot know God. All you can do is to believe what is told you on miraculous evidence." The retort was, "That evidence is not such as convinces us, and we therefore reject it, and all belief with it." But the belief that God does speak directly to the conscience, and that by appeals to that conscience Christ brought conviction, was a living faith ages before Sir W. Hamilton was born, and will outlive all such theories.

Mansel was a brilliant logician, and was also known at Oxford as a clever satirist and wit. A satire of his in the manner of Aristophanes against the Pantheism of the Neologian writers had a wonderful success, and quotations from it were on every one's tongue. His history of the Gnostic heresies was edited by Bishop Lightfoot, and there is a Life of him by Lord Carnarvon.

Mant, Richard [b. 1776, d. 1848], Bishop of Down and Connor in 1828, to which Dromore was added in 1832, was the son of a Hampshire clergyman, and grandson of Bingham, author of Christian Antiquities. Mant's commentary on the Bible, which work he accomplished with the aid of Dr. George D'Ovly [q.v.], was for many years a very popular work. He also edited the Book of Common Prayer, with notes, and the Book of Psalms in an English metrical version, and published two volumes of sermons.

Mantileta.—A vestment worn in the Roman Church by cardinals, bishops, and abbots. When worn by cardinals it is red, violet and rose-coloured; when by bishops, all of one colour. It is a garment made of silk or wool, reaching almost to the knees, with openings for the arms, and a low collar. It is worn over the rochet.

Manton, Thomas [b. 1620, d. 1677], was a Nonconformist, one of Cromwell's chaplains, and preached frequently before the Parliament. He looked favourably upon the Restoration, became one of Charles's chaplains, and took part in the Savoy Conference, but was deprived by the Act of Uniformity. He was one of the ablest of the Puritans, and his works are still read. The best known are: CXL. Sermons on Psalm cix.; and expositions of James, Jude, the Lord's Prayer, and Isaiah liii.

Manual [Lat. manus, "hand"] was the name given to small portable books, and became restricted to a small treatise or a book of devotion. The term was specially applied to a small book for the use of the clergy containing the occasional offices, as baptism, churching, marriage, etc., and also services for Candlemas, Ash Wednesday, Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday. The name is peculiar to England and Scotland; abroad the book was called agenda, pastorale, rituale, etc.

Manuscripts of the Scriptures.—The Hebrew MSS. of the Old Testament are those used in the synagogues, and private copies. The former are on skins, without the vowel points, and there are a great many regulations respecting these copies. The other MSS. are in form like other books; all except the most modern are on vellum. There are no very ancient Hebrew MSS., owing to the fact that the Jews, when copies of their Scriptures became worn out, buried them, lest the material should be employed for an secular purpose. The oldest MSS. know do not go back further than the eighth century.

The oldest Greek MSS., which are all on vellum, are known as Uncial MSS., i.e., they are written throughout in capital letters. Those in which small letters are used are called Cursives. The Uncial MSS. are without word-divisions or punctuations. The age of a MS. can be pretty accurately determined by the form of the letters, the method of arrangement, the nature of the ink and of the vellum.

Both in Uncials and Cursives names of frequent occurrence are contracted. Thus Θεός (God), ΚΖ for ΚΥΠΡΙΟΣ (Lord), ΠΝΑ for ΠΝΕΥΜΑ (Spirit), &c. In one passage a very important controversy turns upon this point. In 1 Tim. iii. 16 a version has "God was manifest." The text from which this translation was made had ΘΕΟΣ. But many copies have ΘΕΩ, the relative pronoun "which." The collation of the manuscripts of the New Testament has been undertaken by many scholars, but the greatest and most important achievements in this direction have been wrought in our own century. Tischendorf, Lachmann, and Tregelles have earned the gratitude of all student of the Holy Scriptures. There still is among us Dr. Scrivener, who has worked with labor and diligence in the collation of the cursiv copies, and Drs. Westcott and Hort have recently published a most painstaking recension of the sacred text.

Very few MSS. contain all the books of the New Testament. Some are copies of particular books, some have had leaves torn away. [Bible, Canon, Codex.]

Mapes, Walter [or Map], [b. probably Herefordshire between 1140 and 1150; d. in the beginning of the thirteenth century], studied at the University of Paris, and on his return to England became a favourite at the Court of King Henry II. on account of his learning and courtliness of manner. He sent him to the Court of Louis VII. of France, and later on to a Council held by Pope Alexander III., where Mapes was employed to carry on a discussion with th Waldenses. On his return to England the King showered ecclesiastical preferments upon him; he became Incumbent of Westbury, Gloucestershire, and of other livings; Can of St. Paul's and of Salisbury; Precentor of Lincoln; and Archdeacon of Oxford. His appointment to the last-named post too see in 1196, and this is the last mention of his name is to be found of him. He was a constant companion of the King, and accompanied him in most of his journeys. Mapes celebrated for his many literary works, and on his history of King Arthur and the knights of the Round Table most of the stories have been derived. His De Nigis ratio is a series of historical sketches, written in Latin, of life in Courts and monasteries, showing with great power the corruptions of the English Court and of that Rome. He owes much of his fame to satirical Latin poems and drinking songs.

Marbecke. [Music.]

Marburg Confession.—This name is given to the fifteen Articles drawn up at the conference held at Marburg in 1529, by the sh of Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, in the peace of settling the dispute which had arisen between the divines of Germany and Switzerland concerning the manner of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. The principal champions in the debates were Luther, who took (Ecclampsidius; and Melanchthon, who disputed with Zwingli; other eminent men were also present. The conference began Oct. 1st, and lasted four days. Melanchthon and Zwingli were able to come to agreement as regarded the doctrine of the unity in Unity and the Godhead of Christ, of the Divine Word, and Original sin, about which they had had some slight difference; but on the main question they had to discuss (the manner of Christ's presence in the Eucharist) neither of the contending parties could be made to abandon, or even to modify, their opinion. The Germans maintained the doctrine of Consubstantiation; the Swiss that the elements were simply memorial substances, the body and blood of Christ.

An outbreak of the sweating sickness broke the conference very hurriedly, and in the sawing up of the Articles the only unity of sentiment they arrived at as regarded the eucharist was, that "the sacrament of the altar is a sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, and that the 'spiritual part' of that body is the primary condition required;" but they could not determine whether the true body and blood of Christ are present bodily in the bread and wine." Other shortly afterwards drew up for the Protestant Alliance a confession of faith on the basis of the Marburg Articles, but with ditions in accordance with his own views.

Marca, Petrus de, Bishop of Conserrans, 43; Archbishop of Paris, 1661 [q. d. at Gant, 1594; d. at Paris, 1662]. He was educated as a lawyer, and in 1639 was summoned to Paris, where he was made Councillor of State. In 1641 he wrote a book on the heresies of the Gallican Church (De concordia oppositorum et imperii seu de libertatibus Ecclesie Gallicane), which gave such offence to the Pope that when Marca was appointed to the bishopric of Conserrans, the Pope refused for eight years to allow him to be consecrated, when Marca retracted. Besides his book on the Gallican liberties, Marca wrote De Eucharistia, De Constantopolitana Patriarche, Dissertatioi Posthuma, Opuscula, and a History of Bearn.

Marcella.—One of the illustrious women who lived under the tuition of St. Jerome. She became a widow seven months after her marriage, and thenceforward lived a retired life. She strongly opposed the Origenists, who appeared in Rome at that time, and was consulted as a theologian. In one of his works St. Jerome says "It is easy to collect the virtue and quality of the mistress by that of the scholars who were educated by her." She died in 409.

Marcellians.—The followers of Marcellus, who was bishop of Ancyra in the fourth century. Marcellus was strongly opposed to the Arians, but in refusing to offer the name of Christ to Asterius, founder of the Semi-Arian school, he fell into the Sabellian heresy, and in maintaining the unity of the Son with the Father he lost sight of the true distinction between them. Eusebius, of Csesarea, wrote two works against him, and in 336 a Council was held at Constantinople, at which Marcellus was deposed. At the Council of Sardica he was acquitted of heresy and reinstated, but his views were developed by his pupil Photinus, who founded the sect of the Photinians [q. v.].

Marcian, Emperor of the East.—On the death of Theodosius in 450, his sister, Pulcheria, became Empress in her own right, and gave her hand in marriage to Marcian, then a senator. Marcian strongly supported the orthodox faith. He recalled the bishops who had been banished by the pseudo-Council of Ephesus (the Latrocinium), but left the question of reinstating them in their sees to be determined in a general Council. This Council was held at Chalcedon in a.d. 451. Marcian gave his consent and support to its enactments, and enforced them by several edicts. He died at Constantinople a.d. 457.

Marcion, the founder of the Marcionite heresy, was the son of the Bishop of Sinope in Pontus, and flourished in the latter half of the second century. Being excommunicated by his father, he has been said for immorality, but more probably for heretical views, he went to Rome; but the Church there refused to receive him, and he attached himself to the heretic Cerdo. Tertullian states that he afterwards repented of his errors, and obtained a promise of readmission to the Church, on condition that he reclaimed all whom he had led astray; but that death overtook him while endeavouring to fulfil this condition. But in this story Tertullian probably confounds Marcion with his master Cerdo.

There is some difficulty in arriving at Marcion's real opinions, but they appear to have been substantially as follows:—He taught that there were two eternal principles, the Father of Jesus Christ, and the Creator, or Demiurge. The latter was by nature evil, and created the world, and was the author of the Law, and the God of the Jews; the former was the author of the Gospel, and sent His son, Jesus Christ, to deliver mankind from the dominion of the Demiurge. Holding that the body, the creation of the Demiurge, was necessarily evil, he denied the truth of our Lord's incarnation, maintaining that Christ's body was a phantasm only, like the bodies assumed by angels when they appeared to men. This opinion he supported by reference to such texts as: "He took on him the form of a servant," i.e., he taught the appearance, as against the reality. Hence also he denied the resurrection of the body, though he seems to have allowed a judgment to come.

For the same reason, that it came from the evil principle, he rejected the Old Testament entirely, and published a book of "Anti-theses," in which he contrasted the precepts of the Law and the Gospel.

The New Testament, in principle, he received, but it was altered and mutilated to suit his particular views, and reduced to two divisions: (1) The Gospel, which was a compilation founded mainly on St. Luke's, and (2) the Epistles, ten in number. He defended these emendations on the ground that the original text had become corrupt, a statement which appeared the more plausible from the number of spurious Gospels, etc., then in circulation.

The Marcionites became very numerous, as is evident from the number of works written against them, as well as from the direct testimony of Justin. Constantine, in 326, issued an edict against these and other heretics, and Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus, tells us that he converted ten thousand of them. Their doctrine of the evil nature of the body led them to practise fasting and self-denial, and even to go so far as to exclude married persons from the sacraments, denying salvation to all but the unmarried. Some of them appear to have undergone martyrdom for their religion.

Marcosians.—A sect of Gnostics founded by Marcus, a pupil of Valentinus. Marcus is called by Irenæus, Marcus the Magician, and seems to have associated magical arts with the rites of Christianity. The Marcosians had many apocryphal books which they held for canonical, and from which they selected fabulous stories of the childhood of Christ, still said to be in use among the Greek monks. Marcus used two kinds of baptism—a physical baptism for the pardon of sin and the hope of eternal life in the kingdom of the Demiurge, and a pneumatic baptism, by which the spiritual nature attain to self-consciousness and to perfection, uniting into fellowship with the Pleroma. The Marcosians are said to have been the first to practise the ceremony of extreme unction. They do not seem ever to have been a large sect, and were probably absorbed into the Valentinians [q.v.].

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Verus, Roman Emperor, succeeded father-in-law, Antoninus Pius, in 161. He was brought up in the Stoic philosophy, and wrote some Reflections which breathe a deep piety. He was the best of all the Roman Emperors though in his reign the Christians suffer a bitter persecution, Justin Martyr being one of its victims. This persecution was not a result of cruelty but of conviction; the Emperors, as conservators of the State, must have done those who, from whatever motives, went against the Christian principle, or at all appearance working for the subversion of it. Professor F. D. Maurice gives us the estimate of Marcus Aurelius's character [Eclectic History, page 350]: "I cannot do that it was the piety of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius—his genuine unaffected piety, as his desire of upholding the State which had been committed to his care—that led him to feel more strongly, and act more severely, against the Christians than any of his predecessors. No one felt more keenly and bitterly than he did the decay of moral strength among his people; few saw more clearly that moral strength must be grounded upon faith in the invisible. . . . If subjects had lost so much of their faith in the gods already, so much of their sense of right and wrong, what a crime it must be to make them more irreligious still! To take from them the sanctions upon which their conduct depended! Were not the Christians doing this?

Were they not teaching citizens and slaves to despise the gods? What a duty must it be for him to do all that in him lay to stop such an infection, to preserve strength in the internal life of the Empire, the only means of preserving its exter-machinery! So, I believe, he reasoned, and such reasoning led him to be a persecutor. He was not a superstitious man; he laboured hard to deliver himself from superstition, and to preserve at once an awe and affection, for the Divine Power. He thought as most statesmen and philosophers do, that the common people must be superstitious order to be moral; that fear of the future must be the chief means of keeping them right.

Whenever any national calamity befell the country, it was attributed to the anger of the gods, who were indignant at the toleration of a new religion, and an earthquake, famine, pestilence could only be removed by the shedding of Christian blood. Thus, when,
Lucius Verus, the colleague of Marcus, returned from his Parthian campaign, his soldiers brought back a pestilential disorder of great malignity which raged several years, and in 169 there was an inundation of the tiber: both were visited on the Christians.

The legend of the THUNDERING Legion [q.v.] makes him to be changed in his views, but probably his animosity to Christianity lasted till his death. [PERSECUTIONS.]

Marcus Eugenieus.—One of the stoutest-upholders of the Greek Church against Papal laims. He was born at the end of the fourteenth century, taught rhetoric for some time, was elected Archbishop of Ephesus, and chosen one of the representatives of the Council of Ferrara, 1438, at which an attempt was made to reconcile the Greek and Latin churches. The chief points of difference between them were concerning the use of unavened bread, the doctrines of PURGATORY, the Procession of the Holy Ghost, and the PRIVACY of the Pope. A formula of union was drawn up and subscribed July, 1439, Marcus being almost the only one to refuse. On his return to the East he continued to write against the Council and the Latins till his death, in 1447. Among his works are a tract on the consecration of the Eucharist, epistles against the Latin claims, two circular letters addressed to all Christendom against the Council, a confession of Faith, a tract concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, etc.

Margolouth, Moses [b. 1829, d. 1881], was born of Jewish parents, but was converted to Christianity, and became Vicar of Little Linford, Bucks. He wrote The Poetry of the Pentateuch, The Lord's Prayer no Adapting of Existing Jewish Petitions, etc.

Mariolatry.—Of the worship of the mother of our Lord there is no trace either in the Scriptures or in the first three or four centuries. In the earliest Church hymns there is no hint of it. Daniel's Thesaurus, collection of Greek hymns dating from the third century to the twelfth, only has so, and these are confessedly of late date. At the festival of the Greek Church commemorating the Epiphany of Christ as God and His Baptism there is, of course, no connection with the history of the Virgin; it was enough that of the Nativity that error first began to creep in. When the Council of Ephesus had truly decided that Christ is not united, and therefore that the Virgin should be called Theotokos, opportunity was given for a base of the truth, and one title after another began to be lavished upon her: "Surpassingly holy," "All holy," "Lady," "Queen." It was, in fact, overlooked that the glory of the incarnation lay in its wonderful condescension, and that the glory of all connected with Christ was solely and exclusively in what He is. The Evangelist had declared as much when he pointedly traced the genealogy of the Divine Redeemer through Rahab, and through "her who had been the wife of Uriah."

Another source of the worship of Mary is to be found in the growth of monasticism: the adoration of the Mother of God became absorbed in that of the "Ever Virgin." Christendom came to regard its pattern life, not as found in the home of Nazareth, in holy wedded love and parental care, but in the solitary life of the wilderness. Thus the early Latin hymns which sang her praise dwelt on her virginity, that was "the birth which became God." Still, it must be remembered that not one of the Ambrosian hymns is addressed to her. Scripture failing to furnish material for adoration, fancy supplied its place, and invented the stories of her Immaculate Conception and of her Assumption, and out of these was created a new worship—the worship of a great goddess, unknown to Scripture or to history. Figures were made of her, decked in vulgar gold and tawdry finery, and before them were poured out prayers as to one comprising in herself all that was beneficent in man, all that was tender and pure in woman, all that is gracious in God. As a consequence it followed that God was robbed of His true glory. The compassion and infinite tenderness which the Gospels reveal in Christ were taken from Him, and He was only thought of as a stern and avenging Judge. The love of the Father was forgotten in that of the mother; the consolations of the Comforter, in those of "our Lady of Pity," "our Lady of Good Help," "our Lady of Sorrows." The Persons of the Holy Trinity were placed in some distant heaven where they took little concern of the affairs of earth, where they were worshipped indeed with formal worship; but the heartfelt worship of friend speaking to friend was kept for the mighty mother, whose intercession was all powerful, whose help was always ready. Thus the rise and development of Mariolatry were simultaneous with an obscuration of the true love of God in Christ, and especially of that truly human nature in the Saviour which the human heart craves for, and which is the true preservative against errors of this kind.

Mark, Bishop of Arethusa.—One of the principal supporters of the Arians in the fourth century. He was present at the Council of Sirmium in 352, and was charged with drawing up the confession of faith made there, and afterwards on several occasions he engaged himself in the defence of Arianism. It is said that he saved Julian's life in the beginning of the reign of Constantius, notwithstanding which service he was put to death when Julian came to the throne for having pulled down a heathen temple. He was dragged about the streets, tossed in the air, and caught by the soldiers on the points of their swords, and finally, after being covered all over with honey, was tied to a post and left to be devoured by the flies. On account of the support he had given to the enemies of the Church he has never been canonised, nor reckoned as one of the martyrs.

Mark of Ephesus. [Marcus Eugenicius.]

Mark's Day, St.—A festival celebrated on April 25th, in honour of the Evangelist. St. Mark was a Jew of the tribe of Levi, and was probably converted by St. Peter, whom he accompanied on his travels as interpreter and amanuensis. St. Mark, being sent into Egypt by the Apostle, founded a Christian Church at Alexandria, of which he became the first bishop. It is said that he suffered martyrdom about Easter time in the year 68.

Marlorat, Augustin, was born at Bar-le-Duc, in Lorraine, in 1506. He was educated in an Augustinian convent, became a Friar in 1521, and nine years after was made Prior of a monastery at Bourges, where he became well known as a very learned man and a great preacher; but in 1535 he joined the Reformed Church and fled to Geneva. He became a preacher near Lausanne, and afterwards removed to the village of Vevey in Switzerland. Afterwards, being recalled to France, he became minister at Paris and at Rouen. In the latter town a great part of the inhabitants were Protestants, and after the massacre of Vassy in March, 1562, they took possession of the city, and established their own religion. In October the town was recaptured by the Roman Catholics, and Marlorat was condemned to death, and burnt in front of his own church by order of Montmorency and the Duke of Guise. Marlorat wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, Isaiah, and the New Testament, parts of which have been translated into English.

Maronites.—A community of Syrian Christians whose head-quarters is in Mount Lebanon. They say that they derive their name from a monk named Maro, who collected a number of followers in the fifth century, and placed them in a monastery on the Orontes, which he named after himself. In the seventh century this sect was obliged, in consequence of opposition by the Greek Church, to take refuge in Lebanon, and so this name was taken by the whole population of the mountains. In many respects their ritual resembled that of the Greek Church, and all through the Middle Ages they preserved their individuality and independence. But during the Crusades they established some sort of relations with the Latin Church, and in the time of Gregory XIII. they formally joined the Roman Communion, and consented to be under the government of the Pope. But even so they obtained certain rights of their own, such as communion in both kinds, the marriage of their clergy, and the Mass in their own vernacular. Pope Gregory founded a monastery on the Quirinal Mount at Rome, and attached to it a college for the sole use of the Maronites. Youth are educated there by the Jesuits, and then sent to their own country. They have their patriarch, archbishop, bishops, and about 15 curates; but the population is so oppressed by the Turks that all the clergy are obliged to work for their living. They now say Mass in Latin, with the exception of the Gospel, which is read in Arabic, the common language of the people. Their population is now about 200,000. Every man is armed, and their army is in great perfection at one time. In 1860, however, they were attacked by the Druzes [q.v.], a tribe living near them, and although far superior in point of numbers to their invaders, their capital was destroyed and the inhabitants massacred. They are a fine-looking people and very hospitable, especially towards Europeans.

Marot, Clément, religious poet, was born at Cahors in 1495. He lived at the Court of Francis I., and was a favourite with Margaret, Queen of Navarre; but fell into disgrace, and, turning Calvinist, went to Geneva. He soon returned to Lyons, abjured Calvinism, and served under Francis I. in the Italian campaign of 1535. He afterwards began to translate psalms into French which became very popular at the Court, and he was called "the prince of poets and the poet of princes." He has left his name to style of poetry called Marotique. The first edition of his poems was published in 1544 and dedicated to the King and the lady of France. A second edition, with a prefac by Calvin, appeared in 1543; but was condemned by the Sorbonne, and Marot retired to Turin, where he died in poverty in 1544.

Marriage.—When Christ came on earth marriage had come to be regarded among Jews and Gentiles as merely a civil contract and in consequence divorce was easily procured. Christ taught the sacredness of the marriage bond; and forbade divorce, except on the ground of adultery. Henceforth marriages were considered, like that of our forefathers, Adam and Eve, as sanctioned by God Himself. St. Paul compares the marriage bond to the union between Christ and His Church; and in all ages of the Church matrimony has been regarded as a sacred rite performed in the sight of God. Thus St. Ignatius writes, "It becomes those who marry and those that are given in marriage, to take this yoke upon them with the consent or the direction of the Church, that their marriage may be according to the will of God, and not their own lusts." Tertullian says, "He shall sufficiently set forth the happiness of the marriage which the Church brings about by her procurement, which the Eucharist confirms, which angels report when do-and the Father ratifies." In such passages we have recorded the commencement of that ecclesiastical control in domestic affairs which the Church early began to exercise. But in the reign of Constantine, when religious fervour began to cool and discipline to grow lax, some Christians were married by the civil power, without any religious ceremony: and as this practice in after ages showed a tendency to increase, laws were passed both in the East A.D. 900] and West [A.D. 800], ordaining that marriages be contracted as religious ceremonies with the blessing of the Church, and that a reception of the Holy Eucharist was to follow the marriage rite. This law, although frequently ignored, as far as the Eucharist was concerned, continued in force in England until the Commonwealth, when marriage was declared by the State to be merely a civil contract. At the Restoration, his religious character of the marriage rite was again recognised by the civil law; and he present Rubric, advising a celebration of the Holy Communion, was added to the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer. A change in the English law of marriage was made by the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV. c. 85, whereby marriages might be performed in three ways, viz.: either in the parish church; or in some registered place of worship; or in the registrar's office, without any religious ceremony. The Church of England, while recognising the validity of the last-mentioned, yet by her teaching strongly disapproves of them. Moreover, in 1868, a Royal Commission reported that "It is both the wisdom and the duty of the State to associate its legislation with religious habits and sentiments of the people, and to obtain, as far as possible, the sanction of a religious ceremony for the marriage contract." The percentage of civil marriages is very small; in 1878 it was 11.6, whereas that of marriages performed in places of worship was 88.4.

Marriage Laws.—In all civilised countries laws have been passed regulating marriage. These laws have differed in different countries at different times, but their object has been identical—viz.: to prevent incest, and to guard against injury either to the community at large or to individuals. The Jewish code is contained in Leviticus xviii. It is on this chapter that "The table of inbred and affinity, wherein whosoever are related are forbidden in Scripture and our laws to marry together," in the Book of Common Prayer, is founded. Of late years a great controversy has arisen as to the prohibition to marry a deceased wife's sister. The argument from Scripture has been contested with great heat upon both sides, and many good men have been found upon each side of it: the moral and social arguments also limits of being very strongly stated upon both sides, and at the last division upon the subject even such a body as the House of Lords was very nearly equally divided. Such marriages are at the present time legal in all the British colonies, in most Protestant Continental nations, and in the United States. In England the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act in 1835 has led to considerable misconception: it has been held by some that that Act first rendered marriages with a deceased wife's sister unlawful, they being previously lawful; but such is not the case. Previous to that Act, such marriages could not be declared invalid until the Ecclesiastical Court had pronounced sentence upon them; Lord Lyndhurst's Act simply did away with the necessity of the sentence of an Ecclesiastical Court, and declared all such unions to be void, and their offspring illegitimate.

The Roman code, as regards marriage, was nearly identical with the Levitical law: an innovation was made legalising marriage with a brother's daughter, but this was done to enable Claudius to marry his niece, Agrippina, and was never received with favour by the people. Marriages with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife were admissible. When the Emperors became Christians the Roman law of marriage was brought into accordance with ecclesiastical feeling. Constantius, in 339, forbade, under a penalty of death, marriage with a niece; and, in 354, forbade marriages with a deceased wife's sister and with a deceased brother's wife. This continued to be the civil law of the Empire, though the Emperor Honorius infringed it by marrying successively two sisters. Marriages between first cousins were forbidden by the earliest Roman law; were subsequently considered lawful, but were condemned by Theodosius in 384; but by the beginning of the fifth century they were sanctioned both in the East and the West.

By a law passed in the time of the Emperor Justinian, about A.D. 527, marriage was forbidden between a sponsor and a godchild, on the ground of spiritual relationship. The Church in various Councils adopted the principle of this law, and extended its application: by the Council of Trent marriages were forbidden between sponsors and the godchild, or its parents; between the baptiser and the baptised, or parents of the baptised; between the presenter for confirmation and the candidate, or parents of the candidate.

Second marriages were regarded as invalid by the Novatianist and Montanist heresies: but the Church in the 8th canon of the Council of Nicæa condemned the Novatian opinion. Marriages between Christians and unbelievers were forbidden by the early Church, which refused to solemnise such marriages, though it did not dispute their validity; resort had, in such cases, to be made to the civil power. There have been several notable instances of such unions being the means of great good; e.g. Monica, Queens Bertha and Ethelburga, and Clothilda, who were all married to unbelievers.

From very early times down to the Middle Ages marriages were not solemnised on Sundays, or on fasts and vigils. The rule laid down by the Council of Trent was that marriages are not to take place from Advent to Epiphany, or from Ash Wednesday to the Octave of Easter. In England the law of the country allows marriages on any day in the year. The morning was originally the time for marriage, because the parties were to receive the Holy Communion fasting. The hours for marriage in this country have, by an Act passed in 1886, been extended from 8 a.m. to 3 p.m. On the laws of Celibacy and Divorce see under those heads. The principal marriage ceremonies have been derived from the heathen customs; they were: the arrhe, or espousal gifts, an earnest or pledge that marriage should be completed; the ring, betokening fidelity; the dowry, the sum of money agreed to be paid over to the bride. All these took place at the betrothal. In the Church at the time of the marriage ceremony an obligation, or offering, was made by the contracting parties; the benediction is given by the priest: the bride is veiled, as a sign that she confines herself to her husband; the veil was in some Eastern countries a part of the ordinary dress of married women. In the Greek Church the whole ceremony is called "the veiling"; while in the West it was known as "the crowning," from the custom of placing crowns on the heads of the newly-married. Other ceremonies were the joining of hands and the giving of a kiss.

Marriott, Charles, B.D. [b. 1810, d. 1857], an Oxford divine of the Tractarian School. He was Fellow of Oriel, and succeeded Newman as Vicar of St. Mary's; was joint editor of the Library of the Fathers, and author of several theological treatises. Dr. Newman makes a very touching allusion to him in the account of his joining the Church of Rome.

Marriott, Wharton Booth [b. 1825, d. 1871], Assistant Master of Eton College, author of Vestiarum Anglicanum, a work upon Church vestments; and also articles in Smith's Dictionaries of Christian Biography and Antiquities.

Marrow Controversy. [Scotland, Church of.]

Marsden, Samuel [b. 1764, d. 1838], was brought up as a Wesleyan, but joined the Church of England, and in 1794 went out to Australia as Chaplain to the penal colony. He applied to the Church Missionary Society for help, but did not obtain it. He was joined by two laymen, William Hill and John King, and the three together founded a mission in New Zealand.

Marsh, Herbert [b. 1757, d. 1839], was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow and Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, was made Bishop of Llandaff in 1816, and of Peterborough in 1818. Bishop Marsh revived the ruridecanal office of his diocese, and rendered it very useful by conferences in which both laymen and clergy take part, and of which the bishop is the president. This may be said to be the origin of Diocesan Conferences, which at the present time are exerting so considerable an influence. Bishop Marsh's writings, though largely superseded by later works, are very valuable for two reasons: they are learned and calm judgment; and secondly, they direct the way towards a better criticism than had hitherto prevailed. They are: The Authenticity of the Five Books of Moses; Lectures on the Criticism and Interpretation of the Bible; Introduction to the New Testament; and a translation of Michaelis's Introduction to the New Testament. One act of the Bishop exposed him to severe criticism. He was a determined opponent of Calvinism, and he drew up a series of test questions to be put to a candidate for the ministry, for which Sydney Smith attack him vehemently in the Edinburgh Review.

Marshall, Stephen, one of the Sme tymnuans [CALAMY, EDMUND], and one of the most influential members of the Westminster Assembly. He also assisted greatly in drawing up a catalogue of fundamental doctrines as a basis of toleration, and was made a Tryer. He died in 1655, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, but his remains were removed at the Restoration. His sermons are very eloquent. The chief are Reformation and Desolate Sacred Panegyrics, Of the Baptizing of Infan Rights Understanding of the Times. He also wrote A Defence of Infant Baptism.

Marshall, Rev. T. W. M., English clergyman, and Roman Catholic convert 1815, d. 1877]. He was educated at Trini College, Cambridge, and became rector Swallowcliffe, Wilt, but joined the Rom Church in 1848. Before doing so he wrote a learned work, Notes on the Catholic Epistle. Afterwards he became an Inspector Schools. His History of Christian Missions much valued by his co-religionists.

Marshman, Joshua [b. 1768, d. 1833 a great missionary, was a Baptist. Until twenty-sixth year he was a weaver, then came a schoolmaster, and in 1799 sailed India with Mr. Ward, his wife, and two others and joined William Carey [Carey, William at Scramble. Here he laboured for nearly forty years. In 1800 he and Mrs. Marshman opened two boarding schools, the proceeds which amounted to £1,000 per annum, afterwards to £2,000. He devoted this, however, to the support of the mission, keeping only £200 himself. With the help of Ca
d Ward, he opened a college for the instruction of the natives. He edited native and English papers, and published a Chinese version of the Bible, and a key to the Chinese language. [See further under Missions.]

Martianay, John, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at Sever up, in the diocese of Aire, in Gascony, a.d. 47, and died in Paris in 1717. He was made Benedictine at Toulouse in August, 68. He applied himself to the study of Greek, Hebrew, and Scriptural criticism, and finished a new edition of St. Jerome's works five volumes, about which he had disputed with Richard Simon and other writers. In five books against Father Fezron he defended the authenticity and chronology of the Hebrew Text of the Old Testament, published the old Latin version of St. Matthew's Gospel, with French notes; historical tracts to prove the inspiration of the canonical books; a treatise of the books of the Old Testament; and three or four of this Father translated into French the New Testament; an analytical harmony of a great many obscure passages in the Old Testament; Essay on Translation; and the New Testament with notes taken wholly from the Scripture, in two volumes.

Martin Marprelate Controversy, casioned by the publication, in 1588 and 1589, of a series of seven tracts, purporting to have been written by Martin Marprelate, Gentleman, who is supposed to have been Henry Barrowe. The author attacked the English prelacy with much wit and humour, and the tracts had a wide circulation, giving rise to a storm of controversy.

Martin, Popes. [Popes.]

Martin, Sr., Bishop of Braga, in Portugal, lived in the sixteenth century. He was raised in the pannonia, took leave of his country ten years, and travelled into Palestine, and hence made a voyage into Galicia, where he converted Theodemirus, an Arian prince, having been some time Abbot of Dumes, near Braga, he was promoted to the Episcopal see. He probably died in 580, and is celebrated in the Roman Church on March 17. Among his works are Formula vite mortae; De Moribus, a tract consisting of a series of maxims gathered from various sources, which may contain some of Seneca's works; a collection of twenty-five canons used in the Eastern Church, etc.

Martin, Sr., Bishop of Tours, was born in Sabaria, in Hungary, about 316. While a child his parents removed to Pavia, where he was educated. He from infancy wished to vote himself to the Church, though his rents were idolaters, and at ten years of age became a catechumen. In 331 an order was issued that all soldiers' sons should bear arms. Martin's father was a military tribune, and the saint was forced to give up his hopes of entering the Church, and became a soldier. He was baptised and preserved his innocence in spite of the many temptations to which he was exposed. After several years' service he quitted the camp, and went to St. Hilary of Poictiers, who wished to ordain him deacon, but, not being able to conquer his humility, made him exorcist. He retired into a monastery in Milan, and in 360 founded the first in France at Locciaignum, now Licugé. Here he is said to have wrought many miracles. In 371 he was made Bishop of Tours. He resided at first near the church, but afterwards retired to a monastery two miles off, the famous Abbey of Marmoutier, which belongs to the Congregation of St. Maur. He showed great zeal for the Church by overthrowing the ancient pagan temples in his diocese, and erecting churches in their place. He died Nov. 11th, 397, and his fame must have spread with marvellous rapidity, for the church of Sun Martino in Monte, in Rome, existed within a hundred years after his death, and the church of St. Martin's, Canterbury, was dedicated about the middle of the fifth century.

The best known of the legends about St. Martin is, that when a soldier he divided his cloak with a naked beggar. This cloak was for long one of the most valued of French relics, and was carried as a banner in war. It is said that the word "chaplet," French chapelle, is derived from "cape," French cape, meaning the tent in which St. Martin's cloak was preserved, and that "chaplain" or chapellain is the person entrusted with the care of it.

Martyn, Henry, a great missionary, was born at Truro, 1781, the son of a miner who had risen to be head clerk in a merchant's office. Henry was educated at the Truro Grammar-school, and was sent at the age of fourteen as candidate for a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, which he just failed to obtain. Two years later he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1801 was Senior Wrangler. The death of his father, in 1799, had turned his thoughts to religion; he realised that the distinction he had gained was inadequate to bring him happiness, and in 1802 he made up his mind to become a missionary, following the example of David Brainerd, the story of whose life had much impressed him. While preparing for ordination he employed his time as Tutor at Cambridge, where he had been elected Fellow of St. John's College. He was ordained in 1803, and became Curate at Lollworth till 1805, when he started for India as a chaplain of the East India Company. He arrived at Calcutta in April, 1806, but did not go to his appointed station at Dinapore till September, in consequence of a fever which attacked him immediately upon his arrival, and in which he was tended by other English missionaries. He was on the most cordial terms with Carey, who writes delightfully about him. His work during his missionary life was carried on at Dinapore and Cawnpore, where he laboured among the English soldiers and residents, preached to the natives, and made for them a translation of the New Testament, which was so highly esteemed that he set about a translation of the same into Persian. Not satisfied with the results he prepared to take a journey into Persia in order to perfect himself in the language, and in January, 1811, he embarked in a vessel bound for the Persian Gulf. He went to Shiraz, where he completed his translation, and also translated the Psalms. Martyn was welcomed by the Mahometans of Shiraz, and invited to enter into a discussion with their chief, which lasted for a long time and produced no very satisfactory results. He afterwards proceeded to Tebriz, the residence of the English Ambassador, Sir Gore Ouseley, who treated him with hospitality, and undertook the publication of the New Testament translation, which was completed in February, 1812. Here, again, Martyn was engaged in discussions with Mahometan priests, and this time it might have gone hard with him but for the protection of the Ambassador. On his recovery from a severe fever, by which he was again attacked at Tebriz, Martyn decided on going to Constantinople on his way to England, as his health did not permit of his resuming his work without a period of rest. He also hoped to induce a lady, Miss Lydia Grenfell, to whom he had long been attached, to accompany him back to India on his return. He travelled as far as Tocat with rapidly decreasing strength, and here he died, in October, 1812, with none but strangers to attend him. He was buried at Tocat in the Armenian cemetery.

Martyr.—This word is Greek for a “widow,” and is applied by St. Paul and St. John to our Lord, “Jesus Christ the faithful witness” [Gr. martyr]. In common Christian usage the word is confined to one who suffers death by reason of his witness or testimony to the truth of the Gospel. According to this use of the word, the first Christian martyr was St. Stephen, and we learn by St. Paul’s confession of the part which he took in persecuting the Christians at Jerusalem [Acts xxvi. 10] that there were others who suffered martyrdom in the persecution which followed St. Stephen’s death. Each outburst of persecution—and they were many—added many noble names to the list of witnesses, and each Church zealously preserved the memory of those, its sons and daughters, who counted not their lives dear unto themselves. That subsequent generations might be fortified to bear the same noble witness, if called upon to do so, by the recollection of their fortitude, steps were taken to record in minute detail the circumstances connected with their trials, the questions put to them, the answers they made, and whatever passed during their examination, imprisonment, and execution. These “gesta martyrum” were read during the time of Divine Service on the day on which their death was commemorated—a day which was beautifully called their birthday, as the day on which they were born to endless life. These commemorations frequently took place at the tombs of the martyrs. On these days it was customary for a sermon to be preached which the constancy and faithfulness of the martyr was held up for the imitation of the congregation. It would appear that short after the Whitsun Festival, and, therefore, probably on the Sunday now called Trinity Sunday, a festival was kept in commemoration of all the martyrs. With regard to the honor thus paid to the memory of the martyrs, Augustine explains that they were “to be honored for their imitable and worth examples, not to be worshipped for religious reasons.

Martyr, Peter, one of the Continen Reformers of the time of Edward VI., was born at Florence in the year 1500. He became an Augustinian monk, and acquired a great reputation for learning and eloquence. He was favourably impressed by the works of Zwinglius and Bucer, and was at length induced to embrace the Reformed opinions. The arguments of Valdes, a Spanish lawyer, were decisive in his decision to leave Italy and go to Switzerland, thence to Strassburg, where he settled for some time, and married a nun who had been a Protestant. In 1549 he was invited, with friends Bucer, to England by Edward VI., and made Professor of Divinity at Oxford. His influence largely contributed to the revival of the first Prayer Book, and the issue of the second. He died and was buried at Oxford, and his bones were exhumed and burnt under Mary’s reign.

Martyrology.—A list of martyrs: other saints, with the Services connected with them. The martyrologists drew their matter from the calendars of particular Churches. The original martyrologies are lost in antiquity. Those reckoned to Eusebius Jerome are spurious. Bede, in the beginning of the eighth century, compiled two martyrlogies, one in prose and another in verse, but that which goes under his name is full of later additions. Florus, the deacon of Lyon living in the ninth century, enlarged Bede’s martyrology, and put it almost in the condition it is at present. Valdebertus, a monk of the diocese of Treves, living in the middle of the ninth century, wrote a martyrlogy in verse extracted from Bede and Florus, and it is inserted in the fifth volume of Dacheri Spicilegium. About the same time Raba Manrus, Archbishop of Mentz, drew up a martyrology, published by Canisius in the tome of his Antiquae Lectiones; after these rchbishop of Vienna, compiled a new martyrology while he was travelling in Italy; for, being from Rometo Ravenna, A.D. 857, he saw a manuscript of an ancient martyrology which had been brought thither from Aquileia. Usuardus, a monk of St. Germain-des-Prés, drew up a larger and more correct martyrology than those above-mentioned; and dedicated to Charles the Bald, A.D. 870. This performance was well received, and began to make use of in the offices of the Western church; and it is probable that the See of Rome accepted it. At the end of this century, or the beginning of the next, a monastery, called the Stammerer, a monk of the abbey of St. Gall, in Switzerland, drew up another martyrology upon Ado’s materials. His martyrology, published by Canisius, had not the same success with that of Usuardus, his churches and monasteries which used it last made a great many alterations or additions in it, and this occasioned a vast number of different martyrologies during the following six hundred years. The moderns, arosus to reform the defects of the old martyrologies, compiled new ones. Augustinus Elimus, of Padua, began this reform in the tenth century. After him, Francis Marull, called Maurolycus, Abbot of Messina, in Sicily, drew up a martyrology, in which he entirely amended Usuardus’s text. John Van der Celen, known by the name of Molanus, a monk of Louvain, restored it through two editions, with alterations and very learned notes. At the same time Gaelasinus, Apostolicotonant, drew up a martyrology and dedicated it to Gregory XIII.; but this was not approved at Rome. Baronius’s martyrology, written some time after, with notes, as better received, had the approbation of Pope Sixtus Quintus, and has since passed for the modern martyrology of the Roman church. It has been several times corrected. But Châtelain, Canon of Notre Dame Paris, translated the text of the Roman martyrology into French, with notes upon it, which was published A.D. 1709.

As to the different narratives in some martyrologies, and the want of proofs with exact to facts, we may say generally:—In some of the early ages of the church there were some memoirs either vrious or interpolated by the heretics. Of a kind are the greatest part of the lives of the Apostles. 2. Notwithstanding the primitive Christians had been careful in lecting the genuine acts of the martyrs the persecutions, and in the calamities which happened when the Goths, Vandals, and the Western Empire, yet the greatest part of these narratives perished in the ignorance and barbarity of following centuries; 3. which was another misfortune, new revisions were drawn up from counterfeit records. Sometimes heretics made deletions and insertions in these remains. 4. In the eighth and succeeding centuries several writers, both of the Greek and Latin Churches, compiled acts of the martyrs and saints’ lives as their fancy directed them, which afterwards crept into the offices of the Church. Simon Metaphrastes, a Greek author of the ninth century, was somewhat noted for this. 5. Other writers, who had no gift for discrimination, threw all sorts of legendary romances into the lives of saints and martyrs, without examining whether they had even an air of probability about them. 6. Those in latter centuries who wrote lives of martyrs and saints, though they were not without capacity, yet, through want of courage to contradict received opinions, made use of this fabulous stuff, and passed counterfeit coin for sterling. Bollandus, and those that came after him, exercised a little more judgment, but undoubtedly have inserted many spurious pieces in their collection.

The martyrology is read in monastic houses at Rome, and is followed by the versicle, “Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints.”

Maruthas. — A Mesopotamian Bishop who was present at the Council of Antioch, which was called against the Messalians, A.D. 390. He assisted at the assembly of the bishops who met at Chalcedon against St. Chrysostom; but, having discovered the insincerity and passion of this Bishop’s enemies, he went over to his party. It appears by one of St. Chrysostom’s epistles that they hold a correspondence, that Maruthas was imprisoned, and that St. Chrysostom solicited his discharge. Maruthas was sent Ambassador by the Emperor Arcadius to Isdegerdes, King of Persia, who gave him an honourable reception, and permitted him to build as many churches in his dominions as he had occasion for. This prelate was very successful in propagating Christianity in Persia. Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian, reports that nothing but death prevented Isdegerdes from declaring himself a Christian. The date of Maruthas’s death is unknown; but he is commemorated Dec. 4th. He was author of The Acts of the Martyrs who suffered in Sapor’s Persecution; Odes in their Honour; A History of the Council of Nice; A Syrian Liturgy; and Commentaries on the Gospels.

Mazorites or Masorettes. — The name given to the Rabbis who made it their special work to correct the faults which had crept into the text of the Old Testament during the Babylonish captivity, and to prevent, for the future, its being corrupted by any alteration. The name is derived from Masora, i.e. “tradition,” or from Massorah, “to bind.” They first separated the apocryphal from the canonical books; and divided the latter into twenty-two books, being the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet; they then divided each book into sections and verses. They counted all the words and letters of each section; and because there were words which were to be read otherwise than they were written, and which contained more or less letters than those that were to be pronounced, they made marginal notes, called Cetib, the manner of writing, and Keri, the manner of reading. They observed likewise the anomaly or irregularity of several words, as to the vowels or accents. It is said that they were the inventors of these points which serve instead of vowels. There is a great difference of opinion as to what time the Masorah was written, but it was probably not all accomplished in one century; but was finished in the tenth or eleventh century. There were several editions, varying considerably, but the received and authoritative text is that of Jacob ben-Chajim ibn Adonijah, who carefully sifted and arranged the previous works on the subject. It was published in 1524. A very interesting account of the Masoretic writings has been published by Dr. Ginsburg.

Mass.—A word derived from the phrase, Ite missa est, used in the Latin Church to signify that the service was over, and the congregation might leave. From this use the word came to denote any Church service; e.g., missa catechumenorum, the service at which the catechumens were allowed to be present; missa fideiolum, the Holy Eucharist, at which the faithful only attended; vespertinalis missa, evening prayer. Subsequently it was applied only to the Communion Service, which was then known by the name of The Mass. [For The Mass of the Presanctified, see Good Friday.]

Mass Priests are priests specially appointed to say masses for the souls of the dead in chantries or at particular altars. They were formerly Secular priests, as distinguished from Regulars.

Massillon, Jean Baptiste, one of the most famous of French preachers, was born at Hyères, in Provence, 1663. He early entered the Congregation of the Oratory; but his father, wishing that his son should succeed him as a notary, withdrew him before he had completed his studies. Massillon, however, gained permission to return to the college in 1681, and began to study theology, and then to teach it in the diocese of Meaux. His first attempt in the pulpit was at Vienne, where he preached a funeral oration over M. Villars, the Archbishop, which was so successful that he was called to Paris, and gave a course of ecclesiastical conferences in the Seminary of St. Magloire, which established his reputation. Here he had the opportunity of hearing Bourdaloue, whom he did not take for his model, but who had great influence over him. Massillon did not use any of the declamatory or theatrical action which was then so popular in France, but supplied its place by great earnestness and impressiveness of look and manner. He preached Advent course of sermons at Versailles before Louis XIV., who, it is said, remarked "that when he heard other great preachers he felt satisfied with them, but when he heard Massillon he felt dissatisfied with himself." He again preached at Versailles to Lent, 1704, and the King expressed his approval, but for some unknown reason never invited him again. In 1709 he preached a funeral oration over the Prince de Condé which was considered at the time one of the greatest triumphs of oratory, but which, on publication, was severely criticised. After the death of Louis XIV., Massillon was, in 1717, chosen Bishop of Clermont, and in the same year was appointed Lent preacher before Louis XV., on which occasion he composed the celebrated set of ten sermons entitled Le Petit Carême. In 1719 he was consecrated to his bishopric, and was elected a member of the Academy. In 1723 he preached a funeral oration of the Duchess of Orleans, last public discourse in Paris; and from that time gave himself up to the affairs of his diocese, where he was beloved for his charity and gentleness. He put a stop to the extravagant processions which took place then and to other superstitious customs. He published of apocrypha in 1742, at the age of 79 years. His works, consisting chiefly of sermons and conferences, were collected and published in 1745 and 1746.

Massingberd, Francis Charles, Anglican Church writer [b. 1800, d. 1871], educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1822, became rector of South Ormsby, Lincolnshire, in 1823, and remained there till his death. He was appointed Prebendary of Lincoln in 1847, Chancellor of the Cathedral in 1862, aimed at restoring the power of Convocation and made untiring efforts in the cause. Most important of his literary works was History of the English Reformation, published in 1857. He also wrote lectures on Prayer Book, and a number of religious phillets.

Master of the Sacred Palace dignity conferred by the Roman Curia, believed to have been first held by St. Dominus. Originally the holder of this office was required to take charge of the servants of the Pope's palace and the attendants of the papal court and to instruct them in religious matters. Duties have now been extended, and in the right of appointing ecclesiastics to posts before the Pope on important occasions, conferring degrees in philosophy and theology, and of controlling the public books in Rome.

Master of the Sentences.—A dignity given to Peter Lombard [Lombard, Pi in his work of the Sentences—that is, a collection of sentences or passages taken from works of the Fathers, bearing on the fundamental doctrines of the Church.

Materialism.—As the word implies, Materialism deals merely with matter, with that which we can appreciate with our senses. According to it, nothing at all exists but matter—there is no such thing as a separate spiritual existence. There is no God and no spirit in man which can hold communion with Him; none is required, since God is nonexistent. Materialism is the basis, in one or other, for nearly all forms of unbelief. As Atheism denies that there is a God, so the mystery of our own being and of the world around us has to be explained by materialism. Pantheism regards God as a kind of animating principle or impersonal spirit, and matter becomes exchangeable ideas; matter is merged into it, and a kind of materialism has to explain the Nature begat matter and life. Deism, Naturalism, Rationalism admit that God created the world, but that, having once done so, He takes no further part in its government, but leaves it to be regulated by fixed laws. The difficulty of the origin of life and matter is thus got over, but a phase of Materialism has to be called in to explain how the old keeps on without a Divine Ruler. So the Positivist makes a clean sweep even of the idea of God, ascribing it merely to self-contradiction, and he, too, has only matter to deal with. [Atheism, Pantheism, Deism, Positivism.] Materialism merges in matter, and its creed is, "There is nothing but matter."

The History of Materialism is a long one. It pervades the whole history of mankind. And, gloomy outlook by which it leads is before us in the words of the "Preacher," "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." It seems to have flourished in the Chinese Empire early in the 4th century before Christ, and earlier still in Greece. Democritus, b.c. 460, first propounded the "atomic theory," still held, with slight changes, by Materialists at the present day.

He taught that matter is eternal, that it consists of minute atoms incapable of division, with spaces between them. He derived the soul from the finest fire atoms. Epicurus, c. 342, maintained that much of the unkindness and degradation of mankind arose from the slavish dread which they entertained of the power and wrath of the gods in this life and after death. To remove these fears he taught that the gods dwelt in sublime comfort, and were indifferent to the world and its inhabitants, and he sought to show that the material universe was not created by the gods, but that all the objects in it were formed by the union of elementary atoms, which had existed from all eternity, and were governed by simple laws. Lucretius, a Latin poet, about three hundred years later, tried to popularise and make these views attractive in a long poem, De Rerum Natura, in which, whilst he apostrophised the gods, he yet sought to free his countrymen from the tyranny of their religious beliefs. He begins with the axiom that nothing can be produced from nothing, and that nothing can be reduced to nothing, and then goes on to define the ultimate atoms, infinite in number, which, together with vacant space, infinite in extent, constitute the universe. Generally speaking, these principles are maintained by modern Materialistic writers. Sir W. Thomson, however, holds that the primary substance is a perfect fluid which fills all space, atoms being only the rotating portions of this fluid. These atoms are, however, only objects of faith to the Materialist, for they have never been seen. Lucretius endowed atoms with the power of motion and of free will, and thus he endeavoured to show how they came together to make a beginning of organised nature; whilst Materialists of the present day deny the power of motion to atoms and, of course, of free will. Man, they say, is a Necessitarian, he has no free will, since all his passions and thoughts are mere functions of organised substance.

During the long conflict between Christianity and Paganism, Materialism, as a philosophy, passed out of sight, but again came into power at the time of the French Revolution, when "There is no God in heaven, no soul in man, no future life" was the creed of many of the rulers of the French people. Modern English Materialism made a fresh start with H. G. Atkinson and Harriet Martineau, and at the present time, the writings of Professors Tyndall and Huxley state the Materialistic argument in a powerful as well as attractive manner, although it is only just to say that these gentlemen do not call themselves Materialists, and indeed deny some of the apparently logical materialistic conclusions.

Origin of the Universe according to Materialists.—Allowing the existence of atoms, Materialists now rely on the law of gravitation to explain the movements of atoms whereby they came together and formed the various kinds of matter, organised and unorganised, with which we are acquainted. This law is "that every body attracts every other body with a force proportional to their masses conjointly, and to the square of their distances apart inversely." Hence, they say, the atoms would come together of themselves; but in order that they may do this, it has further to be assumed, either that the atoms are of different sizes, or that they are at unequal distances apart, since, if they were all equal in size and all equidistant, there could be no motion, their mutual attractions exactly balancing each other. But this assumption is fatal to the theory, since—matter being a single substance, and hence uniformly divided—it would have to be allowed that some other power had collected matter into unequal atoms, or had set these at varying distances apart. This position is in no way altered by using the terms energy and force. Energy is defined by physicists to be the power of doing work; force, the rate at which that work is done. The energy which moves atoms must—so there is nothing but matter divided into atoms—be resident in them, but this will not help to explain how they first moved together, since physical science declares that energy is locked up in matter, and only becomes active in consequence of some previous energy exerted, i.e., of some work done (for example, the stone cannot fall to the ground until it has been, by work, lifted up; the spring cannot recoil until it has been first bent). Hence, to unloose the pent-up energy of the atoms, to convert what is called potential into actual energy, there would be wanted the exercise of some previous energy altogether outside matter, and therefore unknown to Materialists. Materialism, then, fails to explain how the universe was first formed, and we are compelled to go back for an explanation of this to some great First Cause—in short, to God. Supposing, however, the difficulty of starting the universe to be surmounted, Materialists then make great strides with the help of the doctrine of Evolution, since, to a large extent, they are treading on firm and sure ground; but again they break down when they try to explain, by its means, man’s spirit and intellect, and moral sense. [Evolution.]

There remains to be discussed the origin of life. How does Materialism explain this? Living things, whether plants or animals, from the lowest to the highest, feed, grow, and reproduce themselves: these are the signs of life. Besides living things, there are the various lifeless substances making up the soil, and the air and water. Where is the point of contact between living and non-living things? It has been discovered that plants have the power of taking up the various constituents of soil, water, and air, and converting them into living matter—in short, of feeding upon them; whilst animals can only feed upon living matter, or that which has once lived—on plants or other animals. Hence we have non-living matter converted into living matter, but only by a living agent. Is there any evidence to prove that any form of life can be developed out of matter without life? Professors Tyndall and Huxley admit that they cannot point to any proof that life can be developed, except from previous life. Life can only be produced from some living germ. Here again the Materialist theory breaks down; it fails altogether to explain the origin of life.

Materialism necessarily dispenses with Religion; it denies the existence of God, of the soul, of a future life; hence prayer and worship have no meaning. It likewise undermines the basis of Morals. Man, being only a complicated aggregation of atoms of matter governed by physical laws, is altogether irresponsible for his actions. A Materialist, who is intelligent enough can have conscience, no sense of sin, no ideas of right or wrong. Harriet Martineau said, "We have finally dismissed all notions of retribution. The whole basis of sin and responsibility is the calm, calculated deliberation of choosing good or evil."

Another Materialist, Vogt, has pressed himself with great plainness: "If will does not exist, neither does any agency of responsibility, such as morals, justice, and Heaven knows what else, which impose upon us. At no moment are we to be expected, any more than we can dictate to the secretion of our kidneys. The organ cannot govern itself; it is governed by the overwhelming law of its material combination. It is impossible to demonstrate the imminence of punishment." Such is Materialism carrying its logical conclusions. Many Materialists vastly better than this creed. But it would be a mistake to attribute their character to their Materialism. It is due rather to an untrained mind, and to the silent influence of centuries of habit and feelings, the society amongst which they live, and are unknowing witnesses to the life and power of Christianity, which compels them to accept its high moral standard.

Mather Family.—This family, so named in the history of religion in America, begins with Richard Mather, born in Lincolnshire in 1566. He was ordained in English Church, but, being suspended for Puritanism, went to New England in 1636 and founded a congregation at Dorchestertown, which he kept till his death in 1669. He left six sons, four of whom followed his profession, the youngest of whom, Increase, became President of Harvard College and the most religious writer of his time. He wrote Maria Cotton, the daughter of his stepson, and became the father of Cotton Mathew (1667, d. 1729), the most renowned of the Mather line family. He was a great preacher, a zealous pastor, and philanthropist. He printed 382 works, one a folio, and left many in manuscript. His has, however, come down to us more through his fiery than through his good deeds, were conspicuous. He wrote, in 1685, a book against witchcraft, in which he declared that witches were possessed with dead and devils, that they had left them the devil, and served the highest powers. He was thereby the cause of innocent blood being shed, and acknowledged later that he had gone too far." It be remembered that other good men were above a like superstition; among them Matthew Hale. Franklin speaks very his attempts to do good. His son, Samuel, was ordained the pastor of a congregation at Avrard, but it was not a large one, and died in him.

Matthew, Theobald, the apostle of mercy in Ireland, was born at Thompson, in Tipperary, 1790. His father died when his children were young, and Theobald was sent by the Countess of Llandaff to study at the Academy of Kilkenny, and thence to Maynooth. He became a priest of the Roman Catholic Church in 1814, and went to Cork head of the Capuchin Monastery, where he made a great influence over rich and poor alike. He established a society for visiting the poor, on the model of those of St. Vincent Paul. One of his fellow-workers was William, a Quaker, who was greatly interested in the total abstinence question, and so firmly imbued Father Matthew with his notions, that he, on April 10th, 1838, joined his association, and from that time gave himself wholly up to the work. His success was great in that in nine months 200,000 persons, mostly inhabitants of Cork, had taken the pledge. Not content with this, he travelled over Ireland, Scotland, and England, and kept two years in America, travelling as far as St. Louis. He was almost penniless, as a source of his income had been a distillery kept by his brother, which was now shut up; he became deeply in debt, but Her Majesty, recognition of his services, gave him an annuity of £300, and more was raised by private subscription. He died at Queenstown on Dec. 8th, 1856, having been for some time disabled from work by his failing health. His statue has been put up to him in Cork.

Mathilde, Countess of Tuscany [b. 1046, 1115], daughter of Boniface, Marquis of Tuscany. Her father had been an adherent of a German Emperor in his struggle with a Pope, but changed sides towards the close of his life, and was followed in this by his daughter, who succeeded to his possessions in north and Central Italy at a very early age. She was the most strenuous of the supporters of Gregory VII. against Henry IV., carried the war after Gregory's death, and gained a high reputation for courage and skill in military affairs. Mathilde was married twice, first to Godfrey of Lorraine, and afterwards to Duke Welf of Bavaria, from whom she was divorced.

Matins.— The name given to the first of the seven daily hours of prayer which were kept in England before the Reformation. It took place at daybreak. The name is the English Prayer Book synonymous with VENERABLE PRAYER.

Matthew Paris [b. early in the thirteenth century], supposed by some to have been born or to have studied in Paris, though the fact of his surname is the only foundation for such a belief. In 1217 he entered the Cluniac monastery at St. Albans. His learning gained him the esteem of Henry III., who granted, at his request, certain privileges to the University of Oxford. He died in 1259. His chief work was the Historia Anglica Major, extending from 1066 to 1259, the first part of which was copied from the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover. It was continued after his death by another monk till 1573.

Matthew of Westminster, so called because he was a Benedictine in the monastery of that city. He is surnamed Florilegus, because he entitled his history Flores Historiarum. He lived in the fourteenth century; little is known of his personal history. His history is divided into three books. The first treats of the chief events from the time of the Creation till our Saviour's birth; the second carries down the history to William the Conqueror; and the third reaches from the Norman Conquest till the death of Edward I., in whose time he lived. He also wrote a chronicle of his own monastery.

Maundy Thursday. [HOLY WEEK.]

Maur, Sr., a Congregation of the Order of Benedictines in France. In the Middle Ages this order had sunk very low, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century attempts were made to revive it. Didier de la Cour established in Lorraine the austere branch of St. Vanne, and it was proposed to unite it to all the Benedictine monasteries of France. But, instead, a monk of St. Vanne, named Dom Bénard, was charged by Louis XIII., in 1618, to establish a new order, and this was confirmed by Pope Gregory XV. in 1621. It was placed under the patronage of St. Maur. The Order was divided into sixteen provinces, each of which had about twenty religious houses. In Paris the most celebrated monastery was that of St. Germain-des-Prés, but there were also those of St. Denis and of the Blancs Manteaux. There was also the monastery of St. Remigius, at Rheims, Maumontier, etc. The monks, besides following the rule of St. Benedict, had particular statutes and constitutions; they had a Superior-General, who was elected for life, and assistants and visitors, and they held a general chapter every three years. They made, in addition to their religious vows, a particular profession of learning, and had seminaries in each province for the education of the young. What the Congregation of St. Maur has done for history cannot be overestimated. To them we owe all the Benedictine editions of the Fathers. It is impossible to enumerate all the works they have produced, but among the more important are the Gallica Christiana, the Histoire Litteraire de la France, the Art de Véifier les Dates, the Annales of the Benedictine...
Order, and Lives of Benedictine Saints. These two last were written by Mabillon; other celebrated writers are Martene, Tassin, Montfaucon, etc. The Congregation was suppressed in 1792.

Maurice, Elector of Saxony [b. 1521, d. 1553]. Under the teaching of his father he had embraced the Reformation and signed the Articles of Smalcald; but being ambitious, and desirous of gaining favour with Charles V. at the Diet of Ratisbon, in 1546, he made a secret treaty with the Emperor against his uncle, the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse, the two principal Protestant princes, and invaded his uncle's dominions whilst he was away fighting against the Emperor in the cause of religion and liberty. The Elector hearing this, directed his march homeward; but was pursued by the Emperor, and the two armies met at Mühlberg, on the Rhine, on April 24th, 1547, and the Elector was completely defeated, and taken prisoner. The Emperor then made Maurice Elector, in the room of his uncle, John Frederic. Philip, Landgrave of Hesse, whose daughter, Agnes, Maurice had married, was persuaded by his son-in-law Maurice to submit to the Emperor, and by him was treacherously kept in prison. This revolution seemed to complete the ruin of the Protestant cause, and at the Diet of Augsburg in 1548 the Emperor required of the Protestants that they would leave the decision of these religious contests to the wisdom of the Council that was to meet at Trent. To these proposals, Maurice, amongst others, consented; but as by his treaty with the Emperor he was to be left unfettered in religious matters, he refused to accept the Interim which had been drawn up at Augsburg, and held a conference at Leipzig, headed by Melanchthon, to modify that rule; but even that was not acceptable to his subjects. Maurice gave his consent to the re-establishing of the Council of Trent only on certain conditions: 1. That the points of doctrine which had been already decided there should be re-examined and discussed anew. 2. That this examination should be made in presence of the Protestant divines or their deputies. 3. That the Saxon Protestants should have the liberty of voting as well as deliberating in the Council. 4. That the Pope should not pretend to preside in that assembly either in person or by his legates. Maurice had no intention of submitting to the Emperor's views; he only yielded in appearance that he might carry his point, and thus in reality take the command. All the princes of Europe had for a long time addressed their united entreaties to the Emperor for the deliverance of the Landgrave of Hesse and the Elector of Saxony from their imprisonment, but these solicitations had no effect, and Maurice, who ardently desired the liberation of his father-in-law Philip, determined to break with the Emperor, and with the utmost secrecy entered into an alliance with the King of France and several of the German princes. He then marched at the head of a formidable army against the Emperor in 1552, and surprised Charles at Innsbruck where he was protected by a mere handful of troops. Thus alarmed, the Emperor was willing to make peace on almost any conditions, and consequently he shortly afterward concluded at Passau the famous treaty of pacification with the Protestants. [PASSA TREATY OF.] He also promised within six months to assemble a Diet, in which all the tumults and dissensions in religious matter should be removed. Thus did the same Prince who had been foremost in opposing the Protestants now procure for them a bulwark of peace and liberty. Maurice, however, did not live to see the happy issue of all this strife; for he lost his life in the following year from a wound received at the battle of Silverhausen while he was fighting against Albert of Brandenburg.

Maurice, Frederick Denison [b. 1800, d. 1872], was born at Normanstone near Lowtoft. His father was a Unitarian minister who took pupils. They removed in 1812 to Clifton, and then to Frenchay, near Bristol. The religious difficulties of home were grea to him; dissatisfied with the father's teaching for a while they all became Calvinists, and his mother became a Baptist, and his sister being first strongly influenced by Wesleyanism, went into different forms of belief, or some of them finally joined the Churc Anxious to escape the difficulties of his position, Frederick Maurice chose the bar profession, Frederick Maurice chose the bar profession, and in October, 1823, entered Trinity College, Cambridge. Here he made acquaintance with Sterling and Julius Har; who had a marked influence on him. I passed his LL.B. examination, taking a fairly class; but left college without a degree, he was unable on conscientious grounds this time to subscribe the Thirty-nine Article of the Church of England. On leaving Cam bridge he began working in London either the bar or as a conveyancer, and wrote for the Westminster Review. In 1828 became editor of the Athenaeum. In this year he felt a growing inclination to join Church of England and take holy orders, and set about the course of 1829, he entered himself at Exeter College, Oxford, with scrupulously anxious to remove the tempta tion from himself of subscribing the formularies his former university, and determined begin afresh. On March 29th, 1831, he be baptised as a member of the Church of Eland, and in Jan., 1833, he was ordained the curacy of Bubbenhall, in Warwickshi Here he remained till the end of 1833, and undertook the most important work of life, a History of Moral and Metaphysic Philosophy. From the moment of his enter the Church, the growth of his spirit in Catholicity is steadily apparent. In 1836 he seemed to be in accord with the Oxford tract writers, and had written a pamphlet, Subscription no Bondage, against the liberalism of Hampden and Whately. Mr. Newman, who saw it in proof, wished to make it one of the Tracts for the Times. But Maurice's instincts taught him that there were more divergencies than had yet appeared between him and the great Oriel tutor, and the pamphlet was not included in the series. Then came the breach; it arose out of Pusey's tract on baptism (No. 67, Tracts for the Times). In answer to it, Maurice wrote his Letters to a Quaker on Baptism, which, with the letters that followed it, made up afterwards his well-known work, The Kingdom of Christ. In these letters Maurice attacked the leading religious newspaper of the day, the Record; the paper retorted, and from that day forward the war between them lasted for many years.

Maurice was elected Chaplain of Guy's Hospital in 1836, and Professor of English Literature and Theology at King's College, London, in 1840 and 1846 respectively. In the latter year he also became Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn, and made here a great name as a preacher. In 1844 the Record made a fierce attack upon him for his defence of Mr. Ward when the latter was expelled from Oxford. In 1847 his convictions regarding the higher education of women who were called on to teach, led to the ousting of Queen's College, Harley Street, which has proved the pioneer to many like institutions. In 1849, in co-operation with Charles Kingsley, he founded the party known as the "Christian Socialists." The name of "socialism," however, caused his teaching to be looked on with suspicion, the Quarterly Review had a bitter article against him, and Dr. Jelf, the Principal of King's, took fright, and called on Maurice to vindicate himself. A committee was appointed by the Council to examine into his writings, which agreed that they contained nothing inconsistent with his title as Professor of Divinity in the College. In 1853 he was again in hot religious controversy; in his Theological Essays, published that year, and chiefly addressed to Unitarians, he expressed views which the Record declared to be Universalism, and to involve the denial of eternal punishment. The Council of King's College, afraid of the force of public opinion likely to be brought against them, decided that the Essays were of dangerous tendency, and he was dismissed from his professorship. Public sympathy was greatly with him, and it is now generally agreed that Maurice was misunderstood and misrepresented; but for some years he was under cloud; the High Churchmen feared to take him up when the other party had triumphantly cast him down, and he regarded himself as a pariah. In 1853 began, perhaps, the most important institution that he set on foot—the Working Men's College, and here he gathered around him as teachers Messrs. Ruskin, T. Hughes, Lowes Dickinson, Rossetti, etc. Thus his time was as fully occupied as ever, and yet he found time for his Sermons on Sacrifice, his Commentary on the writings of St. John, and the elaborated edition of his History of Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy. In 1858 came his pamphlet controversy with Mansel about his Bampton Lectures; Maurice believed that he detected in them an atheistical tendency, and loudly raised his voice against them. In 1860 he was appointed Incumbent of St. Peter's, Vere Street, and once more the Record uttered a loud protest, the result of which was that some of the clergy memorialised Bishop Tait not to collate him. This was in vain, and the protest, which contained no names of eminence, was met by a counter address from many of the most renowned theologians in England. His incumbency there was a very happy one until Colenso's book on the Pentateuch appeared. Maurice was inexpressibly shocked; he had a chivalrous regard for Colenso, who he thought had shown him great kindness, but he could not endure the thought of being supposed to share his views, and he believed that the resignation of his living would be taken as a protest against them. But his friends earnestly dissuaded him from this step, and Bishop Tait refused to accept his resignation. In 1866 he was elected to the Professorship of Casuistry or Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, a post in every way congenial to him. Three years later, finding his health unequal to the twofold duties, he resigned St. Peter's, Vere Street, and gave his whole time to Cambridge. In 1870 he accepted the charge of the small parish of St. Edward, Cambridge, and in 1871 was appointed Whitehall Preacher. He died in London on Easter Monday, 1872.

Maurice was a profound thinker and an acute critic, but his influence was mainly due to the wonderful beauty of his personal character. He seemed to those who knew him most intimately to be absolutely free from any taint of selfishness, pure and saintly in life and conversation, humble, gentle, lovable. No one who ever came in contact with him forgot the impression of his depth and earnestness and devotion of character. To his pupils, when lecturing, he seemed as one inspired; the expression of his face had that wonderful blending of humility and authority which constrained all who heard him to listen with a reverence they felt for no one else. Few persons had so wide an influence on their generation during their lifetime, and Maurice will always be remembered as one of the greatest leaders of thought in this century. His two most important works are his History of Philosophy and Kingdom of Christ. Of his many volumes of expositions The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament are probably the best.
Maury, Jean Sifferin, Cardinal, was born June 26th, 1746, at Vaureas, in Venaisin. He was educated at the Seminary of St. Garde, at Avignon, and in 1764 went on to Paris, where he took orders. In 1772 he preached an oration on Fénélon, which was highly approved of, and was appointed Vicar-General of the Bishop of Lomberg. However, he soon returned to Paris, and delivered two orations on St. Louis and St. Augustine, which secured his popularity as a preacher, and he was then advanced to the abbacy of Frendre, and became also preacher to King Louis XVI. In 1785 he gained the benefice of the priory of Lioris, and was elected deputy of the States-General in 1789. Here he became a noted orator of the aristocratic party, and was strongly opposed to Mirabeau. In 1790 the decree was passing requiring all ecclesiastics to swear to uphold the new constitutions. Maury among many others refused, on the ground that it was hostile to the interests of the Church, and fled to Rome, where he was warmly received by Pope Pius VI., and was, in 1794, made Bishop in partibus of Nicea, a Cardinal, and afterwards Bishop of Montefiascone and Corneto. In 1799 he became for a time Ambassador to the exiled Louis XVIII., who was residing at Mrizzau; but when the Roman Church was reconciled to Napoleon, Maury wrote him a letter on August 22nd, 1804, which resulted in the Cardinal's reconciliation with the French Government, and in May, 1806, he returned to Paris. He became a great favourite with Napoleon, who, in 1810, made him Archbishop of Paris; but a disagreement having arisen between Napoleon and the Pope, the latter was very angry when the Cardinal accepted the appointment. He was deprived, in 1814, on the return of the Bourbons, and went to Rome, but was imprisoned in the Castle of San Angelo, and not released till he had resigned his See of Montefiascone, retiring on a pension. He died on May 11th, 1817. His principal works are Essais sur l'Éloquence de la Chaire, and Lettres sur l'État actuel de la Religion et du Clergé de France.

Maximus, St., was born at Constantinople, in 580, of a noble family, and soon rose to esteem by his piety and learning. He was engaged by the Emperor Heraclius to write a history of the emperors; but when his patron joined the Monothelites, Maximus retired to the Monastery of Chrysopolis, where he soon became Abbot. Observing that heresy gained ground in the East, he travelled to Rome, Africa, and other provinces, raising his voice against it. In 645 he held a celebrated discussion with Pyrrhus, who had been his predecessor at Chrysopolis, and was now Patriarch of Constantinople, but had adopted Monothelitism and been driven from his episcopal throne. At the conclusion of the debate, Pyrrhus abjured his errors and was received back into the Church. This victory, which was the heaviest blow the Monothelite heresy had yet received, raised the reputation of Maximus, and many crowded to consult him. In 649 he was the main cause of the assembling of the Lateran Synod by Pope Martin I. against the heresy. In 655, Constantine II., who favoured the Monothelites, had Maximus seized, with the two Anastasii and banished into Thrace, where Theodorus, Bishop of Bisias, visited them, and tried to pervert their faith, but did not succeed. Maximus and his disciples were then taken to Constantinople, where their tongues and right hands were cut off, and they were imprisoned in the castle of Shrerni, where Maximus died, Aug. 13th, 662.

Maximus was one of the most voluminous writers of his age. He wrote upon the Scriptures; an ascetic discourse; theological, devotional, and polemical tracts; five dialogues upon the Trinity; a discourse upon the ceremonies of the Church; and a commentary upon the works bearing the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. His method of interpretation was that of the Alexandrian divines, full of discoveries of allegory in the Old Testament narratives. The Schoolemae afterwards drew largely from his works.

May.—This month is held by the Roman Catholics to be specially the month of the blessed Virgin. Her altars are decked, a special hymn sung in her honour. By Brief of Pope Pius VII., in 1815, a three hundred days' indulgence was granted to any who should mark the season by confession, communion, and prayer, for the intention of the Pope, at this season.

Maynooth College, County Kildare, Ireland.—A Roman Catholic College founded in 1795, by an Act of the Irish Parliament, to supply the place of the French Colleges, when the Irish clergy had formerly been educated and which had been destroyed during the French Revolution. The original endowments were settled by an annual vote of £8,928, which was continued, in spite of great opposition after the Union. In 1846 Sir Robert Peel succeeded, with difficulty, in carrying a Bill for a permanent endowment of £26,000 year, and a grant of £30,000 for building purposes. By the Irish Church Act of 1866 the grant ceased after 1871, and as a compensation £372,331 was appropriated for the College support. The College receives 50 students, all destined for the priesthood. To course lasts over eight years, of which two are devoted to classics, two to philosophy, four to Hebrew and Irish, Scripture, Divinit Canon Law, and Church history. The Divinity students, 250 in number, receive £20 annually. The College is possessed of son estates in county Meath, left by Lord Durbayn, Roman Catholic Bishop of Cor which yield £460 per annum, devoted £20 scholarships, assigned to the most distinguished students, and held for three years.

Mazarin, Jules, Cardinal of Metz and Chief Minister of France, was born of a Genoese family, at Pescina, in the Abruzzi, July 14th, 1602. He gave early proofs of his spirit, made great advances in learning in Italy, and then studied law at Alcalá, in Spain. On his return to Italy he entered the Pope's military service, and was engaged with Cardinal Barberini in trying to bring about peace between the Princes at war about Cassal and Montserrat. The peace of Quesas, in 1631, is attributed to Mazarin. Cardinal Richelieu esteemed him highly, as did also Cardinal Antonio, who procured his advancement in the Court of Rome, and persuaded the Pope to send him Vice-Legate to Avignon, and Nuncio-Extraordinary to France, where he earned the affairs of the Court, and gained the favour of Louis XIII., who procured him a Cardinal's hat from Pope Urban VIII., in 1641. After Richelieu's death, Mazarin became Privy Councillor, and was named as one of the executors in the King's will, so that he had the charge of affairs during the minority of Louis XIV., under the regency of Queen Anne of Austria, to whom he soon made himself indispensable. He was, however, very unpopular among the oppressed and poor, as well as the great, who were jealous of him, and their dislike gave rise to the civil war which raged from 1649 to 1652. He retired for a time into the Netherlands, where he remained till the beginning of 1653. On his return to court he was at first received with significant silence, but soon became popular, and retained his former power. Under him the influence of France was much increased among the nations, and in the internal government of the country those principles of despotism were established on which Louis XIV. afterwards acted. As a financier, Mazarin was far inferior to Richelieu. He died at Vincennes, March 9th, 1661.

Mazarine Bible, The, so called because discovered in the Mazarine Library in Paris, 1769, was printed by Gutenberg, in Mentz, between 1450 and 1455, the first complete copy ever printed in movable type. There are known to exist six copies of the Mazarine bible printed on vellum, which are now reckoned to be worth £4,000 each, one of which is in the British Museum; and twenty-one copies on paper, reckoned at £3,000 each.

McAll Mission.—This is a mission founded at Paris in 1872 by the Rev. R. W. McAll, formerly Congregational minister at adleigh, in Lancashire. The first station as opened at Belleville, the artisan district, and now there are twenty-five missions in Paris, nine in its environs, and sixty in other arts of France, in Corsica, and in Algiers. has the total number of mission stations is ninety-four, containing 15,135 sittings. There were in 1881, 10,441 meetings for adults, attended by 729,756 persons. There are, besides services, "Sociétés Fraternelles," which consist of a Sunday school, Bible class, and a catechism exercise for grown-up people. There is also a juvenile mission, which in 1884 held 4,150 meetings, attended by 171,398 children. The income is derived from the Foreign Evangelisation Society, the Evangelical Continental Society, and from auxiliary societies in London and other parts of England, in Scotland, the United States, Australia, France, and Switzerland. It amounted in 1884 to £14,473 12s. 1d., and the expenditure to £13,981 15s. 11d. The object of the mission is to evangelise the poorer classes of France, and this work has been wonderfully blessed. Tracts, parts of the Bible, etc., are distributed in the streets, and simple services with short sermons and many hymns are regularly held in the mission rooms. In April, 1884, a new station was opened on the Boulevards to attract the artisans, etc., who spend their evenings there. At St. Etienne there is a medical mission connected with the other work. Much good was done in Marseilles during the cholera, both in instructing the people on the laws of health and in attending the sick.

McCaul, Alexander [b. 1798, d. 1863], a learned Hebraist, began his ministerial work as a missionary for the Society for the Conversion of the Jews. He was Professor of Hebrew, and afterwards of Ecclesiastical History in King's College, London, and Prebendary of St. Paul's. He wrote many books on Hebrew subjects, as:—A Comparison of Modern Judaism with the Religion of Moses and the Prophets, Lectures on the Prophecies, and the Messiahship of Jesus.

McCoyne, Robert Murray [b. 1813, d. 1843], Scottish Pastor and Missionary, began his ministerial life at Larbert, Stirlingshire, 1835, and next year was called to St. Peter's, Dundee, which he held till his death. In 1838, his health giving way, he went to Palestine, employing his time by enquiring into the present condition of the Jews. The published results were very valuable for the information they gave concerning the Holy Land. In fact, subsequent works, such as Dr. Robinson's, Dean Stanley's, and Canon Tristram's, are the carrying on of what McCoyne began. Returning to his parish and finding it flourishing under his locum tenens, William Burns, he again started on Evangelistic enquiries, and twice visited Ireland. He died before he had reached thirty, but the publication of his Memoirs and Remains by Bonar was a revelation of a most beautiful and pious life, and it has become a religious classic, having gone through more than 100 editions.

McCrie, Thomas, D.D., a Scottish divine [b. 1772, d. 1835]. He was educated at Dunse, his native town, and at the University of Edinburgh. He was ordained in 1796, and for ten years had an Anti-Burgher church in Edinburgh; but then, disagreeing with his fellow-religionists on some civil subject, he separated from them, with a few other ministers, and they set themselves forth as "The Constitutional Presbytery." He wrote a series of papers on the early history of the Church of Scotland, but his great work was the Life of John Knox, a work which did much to change public opinion on the character of the great Scottish reformer, and procured for its author the degree of D.D. from his university. Besides this he wrote the Life of Andrew Melville, History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy, and History of the Reformation in Spain. A memoir of him was written by his son Thomas, who is also the author of several works on Scottish Church History.

McIlvaine, Charles Pettit, D.D., Bishop of Ohio, U.S. [6. 1799, d. 1873]. He was descended from an Ayrshire family who crossed the Atlantic in 1700. He was ordained in 1820, became Bishop in 1832, and by the end of his life had come to be acknowledged the leader of the Evangelical party in the American Church, being a man not only of strong opinions, but of high ability and of pure and holy character. He was a very able administrator, coming to his diocese when it was ready to die, with only four parishes and nineteen clergy. When he died there were 123 parishes and 108 clergy. But he was also highly esteemed among his countrymen for his wisdom, and when the affair of the Trent in 1871 threatened a war between England and the United States, President Lincoln sent Bishop McIlvaine to England on a successful mission of peace. He crossed the Atlantic many times, and was always cordially welcomed in England by those who had come to know him. His preaching was very popular with those who found in him a terse and vigorous exponent of their views, the more so as his voice was singularly powerful as well as melodious. His works comprise Evidences of Christianity [1831], Oxford Divinity Compared with that of the Romish and Anglican Churches [1841], The True Temple, or Holy Catholic Church [1860], and many sermons and charges.

Means of Grace.—The sacraments and other ordinances of the Church through which grace is conveyed to faithful souls. Mainly they are threefold—the Sacraments, the Word preached and read, and Prayer. In the formularies of the Anglican Church their efficacy is declared to depend on the faith of the recipient, which seems directed against the doctrine of the Roman Church that they are valid because of the Opus Operatum [q.v.].

Mechitarists.—A congregation of Armenian Christians of the Roman Catholic faith who reside in a convent on the island of San Lazzaro, close to Venice, and whose chief work is the printing of Armenian classical literature, with the object of instructing the scattered members of their nation. They take their name from Mechitar, an Armenian, born at Siwas, or Sebaste, in 1676. He was ordained priest in 1699, and in 1701 formed at Constantinople a society for the purpose of improving the moral and religious education of his countrymen, and of effecting a union between the Armenian and Roman Catholic Churches. Meeting with much opposition, he removed to Modon in the Morea, and here he carried on his work for fourteen years; but when, in 1715, that part of Greece fell under Turkish rule, he removed to Venice, where the island of San Lazzaro was assigned to him, and where he built his convent. He died there in 1749. Branches of this Society are now found in Vienna and Trieste, and also in France. Mechitar published a complete translation of the Bible into the Armenian tongue; and his pupils have followed his good example by rendering good European works into Armenian, while they have also familiarised the Western world with Armenian and other Oriental literature.

Medardus, Sr., Bishop of Noyon, was born at Salency, in Picardy, in the middle of the fifth century. His first See was Verman that being laid in ruins by the barbarians, he removed it to Noyon. On the death of Felix, Bishop of Tournay, Medardus was chosen by the people to succeed him. He hesitated, saying it was unlawful for a man to hold two bishoprics; but the King, the Metropolitan, and all the suffragan bishops applying to the Pope, laid before him the necessity of placing St. Medardus in a bishopric in order that he might root out idolatry which still remained in parts of diocese. The Pope complied with the request, and the bishoprics remained united until 1161. Little more is known of the Bishop, except that when Queen Radegund fled from her husband, he made her a deaconess at her request. Many miracles are alleged of him, and it is also related that when Bishop was dying, King Clotaire came to beg his blessing and absolution, and one of the bearers at his burial at Croy, in Soissons, and began a church and monastery to his memory, which were completed by his son Sigibert. Medardus is commemorated June 9th.

Mede, Joseph, was born in Berden, Essex, in 1586. He was admitted to Christ's College, Cambridge, 1602, where he made great proficiency in learning. He was at some time inclined towards Pyrrhonism, but got over his difficulties, and gained the reputation of an exact logician and philosopher, a good mathematician, an excellent anatomist, a considerable linguist and philologist, and proficient in history and chronology. His first work was a Latin tract, De Sanctitate Relatiae, which so pleased Bishop Andrewes that he invited the author into his family. The offer, however, was refused. Mede then studied Chaldean and the Egyptian hieroglyphics, hoping they might resemble the language of the prophets. He died at Cambridge in 1638. His best known work is the Clavis Apocalyptica, which was translated by Richard More. It was very highly esteemed; Mede held the "contusitive" view of apocryphal prophecies—that is, that they are predictive of progressive history.

Mediator.—One who intervenes to reconcile two parties who are at variance. The idea of mediation as a necessity to salvation formed a great part of the religion of Paganism, and the name of "mediator" was given by the Persians to their god, and by the Jews to the Messiah. It is a part of human consciousness that sin makes a separation between God and the soul. Christ is the appointed Mediator to bring about the reconciliation; through Him alone can man be brought into a state of salvation, and into a state of greater friendship with God than was possible before the Fall. In order to accomplish this work of reconciliation it was necessary that the Mediator should be God and Man in one person. He must be Man in order that He might be related to those in whose cause He was to mediate; that reconciliation should be made for sin in the same nature which sinned; that the Mediator should be capable of obeying the law broken by the sin of man, which God could not do; that He might be capable of suffering death, since "without shedding of blood there is no remission;" that He might sustain man by sympathy, having experience of his trials and temptations; and that, being holy and sinless, He might offer Himself without spot to God, thereby taking away the sins of men. On the other hand He must be God in order that He might enter into a covenant with God, as no mere man could do; that His obedience and sufferings might be infinite in their effect; and that we might have such confidence in His mediation as would be impossible were He only Man. Were Christ God and not Man, he could not approach Him with confidence; were He Man and not God we should be guilty of idolatry to worship Him at all. His attributes as Mediator are:—1. He is the only Mediator. 2. He is the Mediator of men only, not of spirits. 3. He is the Mediator for all men, without exception, and for all who died before his Incarnation as well as for all who have existed since. 4. He is a constant, just, and loving Mediator, and His mediation is successful.

Meditation.—A term used in an ecclesiastical sense to denote the union of memory, understanding, and will in private prayer. It is distinguished from mental prayer, in which the reason does not come so prominently into use, being replaced by greater devotion. Meditation has been systematized by Loyola and others to rules by which devotion may be stimulated, and good resolutions and desires formed; and the practice of mental prayer and meditation is prescribed in the directions for the use of religious communities. It is recommended by many of the Fathers, though St. Benedict affirms that it is not necessary to salvation.

Meeting-house.—The name given by many Dissenters to their place of worship. The chief difference between a meeting-house and a church is that the former is not consecrated. Meeting-houses first arose after the passing of the Act of Uniformity of 1662, when the ejected ministers met together. They were prohibited for some time by the Conventicle Act; but when all opposition was withdrawn the number of meeting-houses increased greatly.

Megilloth.—In the Jewish synagogue worship, a roll containing the books of Esther, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Lamentations.

Melanchthon, Philip [b. 1497, d. 1560], one of the principal instruments employed by God in the work of the Reformation, was born at Bretten, a village in the Palatinate of the Rhine. His father's name was Schwarzerd. black earth, but he changed it to its Greek equivalent, melanchthon. He went to the High School at Pforzheim on the death of his father, when he was only ten years of age, and whilst here he came under the notice of his great uncle, Reuchlin, the celebrated Hebraist, who stimulated him to a resolute pursuit of the highest kind of learning. In 1509, when only twelve years of age, he became a student in the University of Heidelberg, and took his B.A. in 1511; but when he applied for the M.A. he was refused on the score of his extreme youth, and he therefore removed to Tübingen, where he studied civil law, attended lectures in medicine, read the Greek physician Galen, and made so considerable a proficiency in the liberal arts and sciences, the languages, and philosophy, that in 1513 he was admitted to a Master's degree. Tübingen is only ten miles from Stuttgart, the home of Reuchlin, and at his house Melanchthon first met with some of the leaders of the great war of intellectual liberty then going on, and in a quiet way met part in the fray. When only seventeen he gave lectures in this university on Virgil and Terence. Erasmus thus spoke of the rising scholar: "What promise there is in this young man—this boy! His attainments in both literatures are equally valuable. What ingenuity and acumen, what purity of language, what beauty of expression, what a memory for the most unfamiliar things, what a wide extent of reading!" In 1518, through the influence of Reuchlin, Duke Frederic of Saxony made him Professor of Greek in the University of Wittenberg. His opening lecture was one of the notable events in the spiritual and intellectual history of Europe; he sketched the history of the decline of literature and learning, and indicated the causes of their fall; he pointed out that the classics of Rome and Greece must be studied with devotion at once sensible and clear; that sacred learning must be reformed; the literal sense of the Bible must be had at all costs, and Christ must be made the centre and soul of theology. Luther was present at this oration; he had just begun his opposition to the Church of Rome in that place; Melanchthon, in this important juncture, was therefore seasonably brought to his assistance, for which he became eminently qualified, as much by the meekness of his wisdom as the greatness of his talents. He soon entered into all the views of the great Reformer, was animated by the same ardent zeal for the truth, and willingly shared with him in all the dangers and sorrows to which the revival of pure religion unavoidably exposed them. After the death of Luther, indeed, nearly the whole burden of the Reformation rested on him.

In 1520 Melanchthon gave a course of lectures on the Epistle to the Romans, and these were published by Luther without his friend's knowledge. His writings were manifold; indeed, whenever the truth needed to be defended, his pen was always in request; the University of Paris having condemned Luther's doctrines, Melanchthon wrote in defence of them Adversus furiousum Parisiensium Logastrorum Decretum in 1521. Of his early works none was more deservedly regarded than his first attempt to form a system of divinity from the pure fountain of Divine truth. He judged it a matter of great importance to mankind to be furnished with a clear, concise, and comprehensive view of the doctrines contained in the Bible. The Church of Rome had deserted the Scriptures, and their divinity consisted of detached sentences from St. Augustine and others; these, together with some of the subtle and barren distinctions of the Schoolmen, formed their whole system of theology. Melanchthon, by uniting perspicuity with simplicity, endeavoured to place Scriptural doctrine in a clear and strong light, and published his Theological Commonplaces—a work which became very popular, and was translated into several languages. He took a very considerable part in the Confession of Augsburg. In 1540, when on a journey, he was seized with dangerous illness at Weimar; the Elector of Saxony at once sent for Luther, whose distress was intense, and also poured out his whole soul to God in such earnestness of supplication that his energy seemed to revive the apparently dying man, and from that hour he grew better. He had a conference of three days with Eck at Worms in 1541, but it was broken up by the Emperor's command, and adjourned to Ratisbon. In 1546 Luther died, and Melanchthon preached the funeral sermon. In November of that year the University of Wittenberg was dissolved, and Melanchthon retired to Zerbst for a time. In 1548, at Leipzig, he helped to draw up the Interim [q.v.]. He spent his remaining years in establishing schools throughout the Protestant nations, and in trying to heal the disputes of his party. These disputes turned mainly upon two points: the method of justification and the doctrine of the Sacraments. He viewed the strains of Christians on these points with acute sorrow, and, true to the principles of his whole life, sought without cessation to find a mode of reconciling the Calvinistic and Lutheran theologies. He was certainly one of the most learned men of his age; spoke Latin with the freedom of his native tongue, wrote both in that language and in Greek, and was thoroughly acquainted with the original text of the Old Testament. He died in peace and hope, April 18th, 1550, and was buried by the side of Luther at Wittenberg.

Melchites [Heb. melcha, "a king," "followers of the King."—Those of the Eastern Church, whether Syrians or Egyptians, who follow the doctrines laid down by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The name was first given because the Council was declared by some to have been directed entirely by the Emperor Marcian. The name of Melchites was afterwards given to those who remained loyal to the Eastern Emperors after the Mahometan Caliphs had usurped the throne of Egypt. They follow the faith of the Greek Church, and are, like the Greeks, strong opposers of the supremacy of the Pope. The Melchites have translated into Arabic the Bible, Acts of Councils, and Exegesis, with many of the Greek books of divinity.

Meletius, Bishop of Antioch, was born at Melitene, in Lesser Armenia. Originally Bishop of Sebaste, he was elected to the See of Antioch on the translation of Eudoxius to Constantinople, A.D. 361. He was then supposed to hold Arian views, but soon after his installation he preached a sermon in support of the Nicene doctrine, and, through Arian influence, was deposed and banished within a month of his election. Two Bishops were chosen to fill his place—Euzoibus by the Arians, and Paulinus by the Luciferians, so that there were now three Bishops of Antioch each with his own following, that of Meletius being strengthened by the orthodox party which had existed in the Church since the deprivation of Eustathius, about A.D. 328. In 363 Meletius was restored to his See, and at once held a Synod of Bishops, at which the Nicene Creed was signed. He was again banished by Valens, but finally reinstated by the Emperor Theodosius. He acted as president during a part of the session of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, but died before its close.

Melitius, Bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, founder of a schism. This schism arose out of a persecution, either local, about A.D. 301, or the great Diocletian persecution, about A.D. 305. Two contradictory accounts are given of the cause of his secession, one attributing it to his disapproval of the Alexandrian Bishop's lenity in dealing with penitent apostates, and the other stating that it was brought about by his deposition for having himself sacrificed during the persecution. Probably a jealousy of the growing authority of the Bishop of Alexandria had much to do with it. His following became considerable, including at one time as many as twenty-eight bishops. As the Melitians were orthodox in doctrine, the Council of Nicaea endeavoured to bring them back to the Church by conciliation. The plan was successful for a time, but Melitius afterwards separated again, and at his death provided for the continuation of the schism by ordaining as his successor one John, said to have been his servant. But after the death of their leader, the Melitians fell into Arianism, and lost their individuality as a sect.

Melito, Bishop of Sardis, was a Christian apologist of the second century. Besides his Apology, addressed to Marcus Aurelius, he was the author of several other works, none of which, however, have come down to us. Very little is known of him, but he was greatly revered and respected by his contemporaries.

Mellitus, first Bishop of London, was one of the companions of St. Augustine, being sent to him by Pope Gregory I. in 601. Upon his arrival he was very successful with the East Saxons, who were brought over to Christianity, with their King Sebert. Thereupon Augustine consecrated Mellitus Bishop in 604, in which year King Ethelbert built and endowed St. Paul's Cathedral. As far as it appears, Mellitus was consecrated by Augustine without the assistance of any other Bishops, which practice, notwithstanding it was disapproved by the Apostolical Constitutions, etc., yet in case of necessity is allowed. A great many instances of such consecrations are to be met with. In 610, Mellitus took a journey to Rome, consulted Pope Boniface about the regulating of the English Church, and was present at a Synod about the regulation of monastic discipline. Mellitus gave his vote for the canons made upon this occasion, and brought them into England with him, with the letters which Boniface wrote to Archbishop Laurence and King Ethelbert. In 616, King Ethelbert and Sebert died, and their sons, who succeeded in their dominions, renounced Christianity, relapsed into heathenism, and expelled Mellitus from his diocese. Upon this he retired into Kent, and, consulting with the Bishops Laurence and Justus, he travelled with the latter into France. Laurence being ready to follow them, his voyage was happily made unnecessary by King Eadbald's return to Christianity. Upon this occasion, Mellitus and Justus being recalled about a year after their departure, Justus was restored to his See at Rochester; but the Londoners being strongly addicted to heathenism, refused to receive Mellitus, neither was Eadbald in a condition to force them. So that Mellitus, being obliged to settle in Kent, succeeded to the See of Canterbury upon the death of Laurence, A.D. 619. According to Bede, he died in 624, after he had been Archbishop five years. After his expulsion from his diocese of London, the Eastern Saxons had neither bishops nor any religious administrations in the Christian form for thirty-eight years.

Melville, Andrew, an eminent Scotch Reformer, was born at Baldorff on the banks of the South Esk in 1546. He lost both parents when only two years old, and his care devolved on his eldest brother. Andrew was educated at Montrose Grammar School, and in 1569 went to St. Mary's College in the University of St. Andrews, where he remained for five years. He studied in Paris for two years, and then proceeded to Poictiers, where he was at one time made Regent of St. Macren College. Driven away by political disturbances, he went to Geneva, where he, through his friend Beza, was appointed to the Chair of Humanity in the Academy. Here it was that he gained the love for religious liberty for which he was afterwards so zealous. He returned to Scotland in 1574, and was offered the post of private tutor in the family of the Regent Morton, but refused, and became Principal of Glasgow College. He made many improvements, and gained a great influence, not only over the students, but throughout the whole of Scotland. The overthrow of Episcopacy and establishment of Presbyterianism were greatly owing to him, and he received the nickname of "Episcopomastix" or "the scourge of bishops." He was possessed of great intrepidity, and it is related of him that on one occasion, when Morton had exclaimed that there would be no peace in the country till he was hanged or banished, he replied, "Tush, man! threaten your courtiers so. It is the same to me whether I rot in the air or in the ground; and I have lived out of your country as well as in it. Let God be praised, you can neither hang nor exile His truth." At the end of 1580 he was made Principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, where he worked with much zeal and ability; the number of students increased, and those of other colleges also attended. In 1592 the Privy Council revived Episcopacy, and filled up the See of Glasgow. The Scotch Church excommunicated the new Bishop, upon which the Privy Council declared the excommunication to be void, imprisoned those who refused to pay the episcopal rents, and laid Glasgow College under an interdict. Melville preached against these proceedings so fiercely that he was summoned before the Privy Council. He claimed to be tried in a Church Court, and on a refusal made his escape and fled to London, where he remained for twenty months. On his return to St. Andrews he continued his work with as great zeal as before, and was made Moderator of the General Assembly and Rector of the University. In 1605 James I. wished to make another attempt to reestablish Episcopacy, and in order to get rid of some of his opponents, invited Melville and others to come to London and take part in the Hampton Court Conference. They went and had interviews with the King, but found that they were really prisoners, and not allowed to return home. Melville wrote a Latin epigram, in which he ridiculed a service which had taken place in the Chapel Royal on St. Michael's Day. For this he was confined for nearly a year in the houses, first of the Dean of St. Paul's, and afterwards of the Bishop of Winchester; then in the Tower, where he remained till February, 1611; and then was not allowed to return home, but was only liberated on condition that he should become Professor of Sodan University, where he remained till his death in 1622.

Melville, Henry [b. in Cornwall, 1800, d. in London, 1871].—One of the most celebrated preachers of the Church of England in the present century. He was educated at Cambridge. He held many successive appointments, and in 1853 was appointed one of the Queen's Chaplains, and Canon of St. Paul's in 1856, with which, after 1863, he held the living of Barnes. He became famous as a preacher through the Golden Lectureship, which is delivered every Tuesday in the Church of St. Margaret, Lothbury, in the City. This lectureship he held for ten years. His sermons were regularly taken down and published for a penny, much against his will, and had an enormous circulation. Many of these were afterwards collected and published in revised and corrected form by himself. They are rhetorical and full of illustration, but not always original. He borrowed much from Chalmers. One peculiarity of his sermons is his continual reiteration of his text, always with some new light. Any one who analyses one of Melville's sermons will find nearly every paragraph ending with some phrase or other out of the text. When he was preaching the listeners waited for this culminating sentence in breathless silence. Then came a pause, during which they would move into easier positions and settle themselves once more, and so he began again, once more to end his paragraph with a fresh repetition in new setting. He belonged to the old-fashioned Evangelical school.

Member of the Church.—One who has been received into the Church by the administration of Baptism. Some religious societies do not consider those who have been baptised in infancy as members till they have become communicants.

Menæa.—The Greek Breviary, containing the offices for fixed festivals. The book consists of hymns, readings, extracts from the Monologium, etc. It is in 12 vols., each containing the menaem for one month.

Menander, a disciple of Simon Magus was a Samaritan. His heresy was substantially the same as that of his master, but a few additions were made by him. Agreeing with Simon Magus that the world was made by evil angels, he promised his followers the power of overcoming these by magic. He also promised immortality to all who received his baptism. Two of Menander's disciples, Basilides and Saturninus, afterwards became leaders of sects. [BASILIDIANS, SATURNIANS.]

Mendeans, otherwise known as Sabians and as Christians of St. John, a small sect of great antiquity, dwelling in the land of Lebanon, in the eastern part of the Euphrates. They were interesting as a survival of ancient Gnosticism —in other words, of a religion compound of Christianity corrupted by admixture of Judaism and heathenism. They only became known in Europe in the middle of the seventeenth century, when two Jesuit missionaries who had gone to the East came back with an account of them, which they published at Rome in 1652. Several travellers have visited them since, among these Sir John Chardin and Niebuhr. The most accurate knowledge of them is derived from their sacred books, which are written in Aramaic and consist of fragments of very various value and interest. There are Mendea manuscripts in the British Museum and elsewhere.

The most important of their books, Sidr babba, or the Great Books, consists of two parts, one written for the living, the other for the dead, containing prayers to be read at funerals, etc. They also have the Sidra d'Yahya, or Book of John; the Qolata or S德拉 di Nisnatta (Book of Souls), containing hymns on the subject of baptism, and prayers to be used at their ceremonies; and the Drisvan, a book of moral and spiritual tracts.

The Mendeans are sometimes called Herobaptists, from their frequent washing. The following account of their rites was given by Conti, a Maronite of Mount Lebanon:—"He who presides in sacred things wears vest and tiara, both of camel's skin.
also take honey and locusts sacramentally, which are distributed as consecrated elements to the worshippers present, and are sent to the absent, equally, as a religious rite: both these kinds of food being taken with the greatest reverence. So also once a month they have an exhortation in their place of worship, and to this they flock with eagerness. The chief topic of this discourse is the 'Light of the World,' always introduced with sentences like those of the Evangelist: 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' This they apply to John and deny to Jesus the Messiah, whom they do not allow to be Son of God, but a prophet and a follower of John. Their places of worship are void of all ornament. 'They contain neither pictures nor statues.'

Baptism, the rite of initiation, is performed in the open air in a large vessel, at the earliest dawn of day: the middle part of the day is proper to honey and locusts, and, at the close, at the time of divine worship, they light lamps and candles, and solemnly repeat these words: "John, whom we here worship as our father (institutor), we beseech thee to be propitious to us; to protect us from every hostile power, and to enlighten our minds with the light of the true religion, as thou hast commanded us to light these luminaries." After discharging this duty, whoever can, proceeds to partake of the sacrament already described, twice a week—i.e. on Sunday and Thursday. This is never omitted.

They dedicate four festival days to St. John—his birthday, the day on which he instituted baptism, the day of his death, and the day on which he is supposed to have slain a dragon.

Mendicant Friars.—The several orders of these came into existence in the thirteenth century. They were probably instituted in imitation of the Waldenses, who had made themselves conspicuous by leading a life of poverty, practising self-denial, and spending their time in prayer, preaching, and reading the Scriptures. These had made it their object to oppose the corrupt doctrines and innovations of the Papacy, and the Mendicant Orders were instituted by Pope Innocent III. to counteract their influence. The principal orders were the DominicanS, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Carmelites [q.v.]. In a short time the Mendicants acquired more power and influence than any of the ancient monastic establishments, and the Friars gave offence to the secular clergy by taking upon themselves the administration of the sacrament, by virtue of a dispensation from Pope Gregory IX., though it was contrary to a Canon passed by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, which ordained that each person should receive the sacraments at the hands of his own curate or pastor. The dispute continued till 1254, when Innocent IV. decided in favour of the secular clergy; at his death it broke out afresh, but his decision was confirmed in 1263 by the Synod of Clermont, and again in 1274 by the Council of Salzburg. The discussion was not, for a long time, satisfactorily settled; but Pope Boniface VIII. did his best to conciliate both parties by ordaining that the Mendicants might receive confessions upon application to the parish priest.

Mennonites.—A name given to the Dutch Baptists in memory of their reformer, Menno Symonis, who lived in the sixteenth century [b. 1505, d. 1564]. There are four sects which come under this head—Flemings, Germans, Frieslanders, and Waterlanders, and they were originally called Anabaptists, but changed the name in consequence of the ridicule which had attached to it. They were also known as "Doopsgezindent" or "Dippers." Menno, a priest of Friesland, who was born in 1492, and who was led at the dawn of the Reformation to cast off Papal doctrine, came to the conclusion that Infant Baptism was not sanctioned in Scripture, but rejected the enthusiasms and revelations of the first Anabaptists and their doctrines concerning the new Kingdom of Christ, and formulated tenets which are still held by his followers. He died in 1539. His treatise entitled A True Christian Belief, was in 1580 developed by two Mennonite preachers into the Confession of Waterland, which is supposed to contain the whole of the Mennonite doctrine. It declares that Christ's Body was not of the substance of His mother, but of a direct creation by the power of the Holy Spirit from the essence of the Father; that there is no Original Sin, and therefore no necessity for Infant Baptism; that it is not lawful for Christians to exercise any office of magistry, nor to wage war upon any terms; that the ministers of the Gospel ought to receive no salary; and that it is possible for a Christian to attain to the height of perfection in this life. A supplementary Confession was written in 1632 introducing the Arian belief respecting the Incarnation; but the generality of the communities at the present day appear to be orthodox, as in most points appears to have been Menno himself. There are several congregations of Mennonites in Elsass and Bavaria, several in Poland also, and a few in France. There are also about 200,000 of them in America. [Tunkers.]

Menologium.—A Greek book corresponding to the Roman Martyrologies, containing the biographies of the different saints and martyrs throughout the year, with the day on which they are commemorated. The first compiler of such a book seems to have been St. Eusebius of Caesarea, and another was arranged by Palladius, Bishop of Hierapolis. There were several alterations of these as time went on, and others were compiled by Simon Metaphrastes, etc. In later times selections from the Menologium were inserted in the Menaia or Greek breviary, under the name of "Synaxaria."

Mental Reservation.—A doctrine of the Jesuits, to the effect that falsehood in certain circumstances may be reconciled to the conscience if at the same time a saving clause be added secretly. They say that even when giving evidence on oath mental reservation may be made, so that the evidence may be understood falsely, by the witness giving his words some qualification in his own mind.

Mercersburg Theology arose in 1836 at the Theological Seminary of the German Reformed Church, in Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. Dr. Rauch, President of the College, who had come from Germany, and was well read in German metaphysics, desired to establish a regular and orderly system of philosophy, which should embody the ripe teaching of the great thinkers. His method was intensely subjective; all ideas and opinions were, with him, parts of a vast unity held together by an internal law, the centre of which is the living Intelligence. His method of reasoning was cut short by his death in 1841, before he had fully developed it, and his successor, Dr. Nevin, continued it. At the same time Dr. Philip Schaff was appointed as Professor of Church History at Mercersburg, and the two together developed the principles of the Theology in different ways, Nevin regarding it from a theological, and Schaff from a historical point of view. Their aim was the revival and defence of the pure Reformed doctrine; yet, in consequence of their appeals to ancient history and the early Fathers, they were accused of Romanist tendencies, and tried for heresy, of which they were unanimously acquitted. The doctrine on which the Mercersburg Theology is based is that of the twofold nature of Christ, from which it is believed that all other doctrines are to be developed. The Church is regarded as a spiritual organism, with life like that of an individual, developing by successive stages from childhood to manhood, whence it is inferred that views and modes of expression which held good at one period of her existence need not necessarily do so at a later period. In common with others of the German Reformers, the Mercersburg Theologians reject the doctrine of Apostolical Succession. They believe in the life-giving power of the Sacraments, in opposition to the usually received opinion in America that they are merely emblems or symbols. They have also drawn up a Liturgy for the use of their disciples, being strongly opposed to the practice of extemporaneous public prayer, and in favour of the revival of the old pre-Reformation Liturgy.

Mercy, Spiritual and Corporal Works of.—The seven chief works of mercy to the bodies and souls of men were first enumerated in the Middle Ages, and are still to be found in the catechisms of the Roman Catholic Church under the term "Spiritual and Corporal Works of Mercy." The latter are to visit the sick and prisoners, to give drink to the thirsty, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, give shelter to strangers, and bury the dead. The former are to give counsel to the doubtful, convert sinners, teach the ignorant, console the distressed, bear wrongs patiently, forgive injuries, and to pray for the living and the dead.

Merit. [Condignity.]

Merle d'Aubigné. [D'Aubigné.]

Messaliens. [Euchites.]

Messiah signifies "anointed," the title given by way of eminence to our Saviour meaning the same in Hebrew as Christ in Greek, and expressing the authority which he had to assume the characters of Prophet, Priest, and King. The notions of the ancient Jews regarding the Messiah were corrupted by their looking forward to a temporal monarch, and thus despiring Jesus Christ of account of His poverty. Many of the modern Rabbins believe that Messiah is come, but that he conceals himself on account of the sins of the Jews. Others believe he is yet to come, and have fixed times for his appearance, and then, when these have passed without realising their prediction, have cursed those who should in future profess to calculate the time of his coming. Others again have had recourse to a twofold Messiah, one in the state of poverty and one in a state of splendour; the first, they say, is to proceed from the tribe of Ephraim, and to be slain; the second is to be of the tribe of Judah and line of David, who is to bring the first Messiah to life again, to assemble all Israel, and rule over the whole world.

The fact that Jesus Christ is the true Messiah is grounded on the following fulfilment of prophecy:—The sacrifices and ceremonial of the Mosaic law were to be superseded by the sacrifice of Jesus. Ps. xi. 6-8; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Dan. ix. 27; Jer. xxxii. 31-34. Now they have ceased. The first prophecy of His coming is found in Gen. iii. 15, and repeated Gen. xxii. 18. The exact time of His coming was foretold, Hag. ii. 6-9; Dan. ix. 24. The place of His birth and where He should principally impart His doctrine was determined, Mic. v. 2; Isa. ix. 1, 2. His genealogy is traced out by S. Matthew and St. Luke. The kind of miracles He should work is specified in Isaiah xxxv. 5-6. His coming as a King, and yet in lowly estate, Zech. ix. 9. His suffering an death by the hands of wicked men, Isa. xliv. 28 and liii. 9; Dan. xii. 26. His resurrection, Ps. lxxxviii. 18, xvi. 10. The rejection of Him by the Jewish nation and His preaching to the Gentiles, Isaiah liii. 1 met regularly once a week at least in some private house for spiritual exercises, and were constant in their attendance at the services of the parish church; for Wesley’s aim was to rekindle a spirit of piety within the Church of England, and not to set up a sect in opposition to her. Hence the meetings of his Society were not held during the hours of Divine Service, his object being to supplement the work of the clergy and not to provide a substitute for such work. His teaching on this point is most emphatic. He says “We hold communion with the Church for conscience sake, by constantly attending both the Word preached and the Sacraments administered therein.” Again, he bade his lay preachers whom he had appointed to minister to his followers in different parts of the country, “in every place to exhort those who are brought up in the Church constantly to attend its services.” And he wrote even in 1790, the year before his death, “I fear that when the Methodists leave the Church, God will leave them.” Circumstances were, however, too strong for him. The spiritual deadness which had of itself stimulated his movement, was unable to endure it, and in 1740 this intolerance was displayed by the clergy repelling Methodists from the Lord’s Supper at Bristol—an example widely followed elsewhere. The brothers were thus driven into administering the Sacrament to their own people at their own meetings, but it was not till 1788 that Wesley ordained preachers to assist in administering the Sacraments in England, and not till his death in 1791 was the last link severed which bound the Church to Methodism, the gradual severance having been against his own will at every stage of the process. The Methodists were equally excluded from many of the Dissenting meeting-houses, and by this want of sympathy on the part of others, was largely developed that wonderful system of open-air preaching which did so much to bring the neglected populace of England within the reach of the gospel.

Methodism, then, was not intended so much to be a Church or sect, as a “method” of cultivating the Divine life; and this method remains essentially the same still, in all the bodies into which the original Wesleyan Methodists have now divided. Its success as such has been simply wonderful. It has produced great works of Christian benevolence, and has exerted an influence on the religious life of England so great, that a thoughtful philosopher, F. D. Maurice, has expressed his conviction that it was Methodism which saved England from being carried into the terrible vortex of the French Revolution. In seeking to account for such success, in the first place let it be noted that Methodism was at its very heart a religious movement. It did not take its rise in any doctrinal disputes or questions of Church government. Its declared object was “to reform the nation, more particularly the Church, and to spread Scriptural holiness over the land." To the Methodist all ideas were subordinated to this need of personal holiness, in order that the soul might hold fast to God. John Wesley, says Mr. Matthew Arnold, "had a genius for godliness." Secondly, we have to take into account Wesley's marvellous powers of organisation, a power which was still predominated by the main idea we have stated, and which was subjected to the influence of the methodical habits already alluded to. Thus it was, that so simple a custom as the weekly meeting of the few at Oxford, developed into the class-meeting, and so on. In every village his Society was at work, and preaching houses were erected throughout the kingdom. In order to retain hold on those who had been moved by his preaching, Wesley formed every dozen or twenty converts into a "class," under a class leader, or sometimes under a lay preacher; these bands and classes met weekly for prayer and confession of sins. Several of these "classes" were grouped together to form a "circuit," and about eighteen "circuits" formed a "district." A "circuit" generally comprised a market town, and the neighbouring villages within a distance of ten or twelve miles. It was under the guidance of three or four ministers and some lay preachers. The management of each "district" was entrusted to the ministers, who met on certain stated occasions for discussion and transaction of necessary business. And once a year each "district" sent up representatives to attend a conference held in London or some large town.

The same features still distinguish Methodism, and the only condition exacted of those desiring to enter the Society is "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." The members are arranged into classes of about a dozen, more or less, under a "class leader," who meet weekly after Wesley's old Oxford custom, to relate and compare their spiritual "experience," and receive exhortation or counsel from the leader, or from one another under his superintendence. The leader also receives at these meetings the weekly contributions towards the expenses of the ministry, the customary minimum being one penny a week. These contributions are then handed to the "stewards," and in this way—in which Methodism stands alone—the humblest member is grasped by the system, and brought into direct pecuniary as well as spiritual relation with the body. A convenient number of classes is united into a society or congregational Church, and a sufficient number of these into circuits, each circuit having one or more itinerant or recognised preachers authorised by the Conference, under whom are lay or "local" preachers ministering in their own localities. It is an essential part of the modern Methodist system that every one who gives apparent evidence of the possession of true ministerial gift, or of "preaching power," should be led to exercise it under the responsible ministry; so that the system not only recognises, but is a vast agency for the express development, of lay preaching. Without this vast body of lay preachers the work could not possibly be carried on, and the results accomplished are an eloquent testimony to the value of lay preaching under proper safeguards. Owing to their permanent residence and local knowledge, some local preachers of character and ability have even superior influence to the circuit preacher. These are appointed for three years only, and no circuit or itinerant preacher can be appointed again to the same circuit until he has been three years absent at some other. Furnished residences are provided for these Conference preachers, and to keep up the furniture and utensils complete is part of the duty of the stewards. Candidates for the regular paid ministry have to pass four years as probationers, after which they are admitted to the theological colleges; and this system ensures that every minister shall (in the opinion of his brethren at least) be possessed of some amount of preaching power. Each society has a monthly "leaders' meeting," composed of stewards and leaders; this deals with most cases of discipline, etc., and is the general Church court of reference; but each circuit also has its quarterly "circuit" meeting, composed of leaders, preachers, and stewards. The super-cur of all is the Conference. The foundation of this in Wesleyan Methodism is the "local hundred," whose numbers are kept up by election to vacancies, and who really possess the legal power of the Conference, according to a deed executed by John Wesley, and enrolled in Chancery. But as a matter of fact representatives elected by assemblages of circuits, called "districts," deliberate together with the legal hundred, which confirms the decisions, and finally sanctions all ministerial appointments. The standard of Methodist doctrine (except amongst the Calvinistic branch) is found in the volumes of Wesley's Sermons and Notes on the New Testament, which are so named in trust-deeds. Methodists believe that no man can possess any assurance of final salvation, but only of present acceptance with God, and that it is fearfully possible to fall entirely away even from a real state of grace. They also maintain the possibility of an entire deliverance from sin even this life.

It will be gathered from the above sketch of Methodist doctrine and practice, that the system presents several very peculiar and distinctive features. [1] As regards its doctrine no other Christian Church or system known to the earth so nakedly and avowedly adopts the religious opinions of one man as the measure of its own; in this respect it is absolutely unique. [2] Its system of doctrine places very great if not exaggerated, stress upon the religious feeling or experience of the present moment. Of this, therefore, an exalted degree is apt to be sought. One practical result (besides many others) is in the pious ejaculatory utterances of the congregations during their meetings, which in many parts of England and Wales will strike a stranger with astonishment. [3] The itinerancy, or periodical moving of the whole body of the regular ministry, differs radically from the notions of other organised Churches, the lay element representing the really permanent portion of the preaching and pastorale. [4] But the key-stone of the whole system was, and still remains, the class-meeting, by which personal intercourse is kept up weekly with the humblest member, and some contribution (however small) periodically secured from him to the general body. The relation of individual “experience” at these meetings by every member, at regular intervals, as every thoughtful man will see at once, must give a very peculiar tone to Methodist piety, and in fact does so. There can be no doubt that while greatly helpful to some natures, it must coarsen and harden the spiritual feelings of others, and lead sometimes to very undesirable results. Of late years some, to the knowledge of the writer, have left the Society because they would not undergo what was to them mental and spiritual torture; and there has been some discussion in the body itself as to the wisdom of maintaining either John Wesley’s cut-and-dried body of doctrine as the standard of belief, the itinerancy of the ministry, or the class-meeting discipline, in their old vigour. It is the class-meeting, however, with its assertion of, and grasp upon, the individual soul, which has made Methodism what it is; and what it would be without its distinguishing features is difficult to imagine. That untold good has been accomplished, in spite of serious objections obvious to everyone, he must be worse than foolish and thoughtless who would attempt to deny.

Besides the usual sacraments and observances of a Christian Church, Wesley borrowed from the Moravians the “love-feast,” in which one or more societies meet together in fellowship, and partake together, with some solemnity, of cakes and water. Another practice almost general amongst them is the holding of a “watch-night” service on the eve of the New Year, when the services are protracted till past midnight, and when the New Year has commenced the whole congregation stands up and renewes the solemn vow to serve the Lord.

It is not surprising that, in an age of the greatest lukewarmness and indifference on the part of the Church, a Society displaying so much zeal and activity should win many converts, especially when we consider the avowedly unsectarian nature of the organisation, which was joined by many members both of the Church of England and Dissenting bodies. In 1741 the first secession took place, upon theological grounds. Hitherto the Wesleys and Whitfield had worked together, but Whitfield’s strong views concerning predestination were now found incompatible with further union, and he left the Society along with many followers. Wesley’s views on these subjects were mainly in accordance with Arminian theology, but otherwise may be described as what is popularly called “Evangelical.” Among a large portion of the Wesleyan Methodists the whole or part of the Church Service is still used at morning worship, testifying to the desire always felt by Wesley that his movement should be considered part and parcel of the Anglican body.

The rupture, however, became inevitable, and was practically effected by his own act in 1784, though the last hope of union was not finally destroyed until his death in 1791. So far back as 1746 Wesley had become convinced by Lord King’s Account of the Primitive Church that bishops and presbyters have the same meaning in the New Testament. Thirty-eight years later, when pressing representations were made to him of the need for ministers to be ordained in America to administer the sacraments, he ordained Dr. Coke as superintending “bishop” for America, who subsequently ordained Francis Asbury. Soon after, Wesley exercised the same responsibility in regard to Scotland, and in 1788 he ordained ministers for England also. His brother Charles strongly disapproved of this step; but there is no doubt that it was sincerely taken, and Southey’s offensive insinuations on the subject have very little ground. Not content with imputing to Wesley more or less conscious dishonesty, Southey argues that if presbyter and bishop were synonymous the consecration was useless, as Dr. Coke was ordained already, and therefore “as good a bishop as Mr. Wesley himself.” Wesley would not have questioned that for a moment; and his solemn ordination of Dr. Coke was not to the more office of presbyter, but as a delegate of his own authority to be exercised in America. It was a step taken with hesitation, as were all Wesley’s steps in the direction of separation; but it appeared to be forced on him, and when taken was practically final and irrevocable. Perhaps few thoughtful students of what Methodism has since done, will question the reality of the Divine providence which so modified Wesley’s personal wishes into an entirely different direction.

At the death of John Wesley great dispensations arose within the Methodist body, now increased to over 60,000 members. The laity claimed a share in the government of their body; they protested against the Conference being solely composed of ministers; they also claimed their “right to hold public religious worship at such hours as were most convenient, without being restricted to the mere intervals of the hours appointed for service in the Established Church;" and also the right to receive the Sacraments at the hands of their lay preachers—a thing which Wesley had refused to permit. At last, in order to allay the discontent and dissensions, which had increased to an alarming extent, the Conference in 1795 drew up a Plan of Pacification. The claims of the laity to a share in the government of the Society were steadily rejected. The claims of the trustees of the various chapels to a voice in the appointment of their ministers were also denied. The whole business of electing and appointing ministers and local preachers was reserved to the Conference. But, on the other hand, in order to meet the claims of the laity to a certain extent, a new court was formed to administer discipline in each district. The Court consisted of the preachers of each district, and all trustees, stewards, and leaders of the circuit. The Court received accusations against a preacher, and had power to suspend him till the next Conference, to whom the matter must then be submitted. This arrangement still continues in force.

Owing to the dissatisfaction that many of the laity felt at the decisions of the Conference of 1795, a second secession occurred in 1797, the seceding members forming the "Methodist New Connexion;" they are sometimes called Kilhamites, after their leader, Alexander Kilham. A few years later, in 1812, the "Primitive Methodists" formed a distinct sect, after being expelled from the main body. In 1815 a further secession occurred, the Bryanites or Bible Christians forming a separate communion. The "Methodist Free Churches" consist of those who were expelled from Methodism in 1828, 1835, and 1849; they amalgamated in 1857, and are known as the "United Free Churches."

Wesleyan Methodists.—In spite, however, of these numerous secessions, amounting in a few years to the loss of 100,000 members, the Society still flourishes, and remains the leading division of the great body. At the present time they have in the United Kingdom 2,183 ministers, 469,857 class members, and 7,071 chapels. According to the official returns published at the close of 1885, Methodists of all kinds throughout the world number 32,701 ministers and 5,174,037 class members.

Calvinistic Methodists.—This sect followed Whitfield in 1741, but it was not till 1748 that a secession formally occurred, in consequence of Whitfield preaching strong Calvinistic doctrine. Some of their earliest chapels were erected in Moorfields and in Tottenham Court Road about the year 1756; but the greatest number were in Wales. On the death of Whitfield, in 1769, the various congregations supported themselves on the Independent principle. At the present time they number 970 ministers, 276,051 members, and 1,372 chapels. A section of this body is known as "Lady Huntingdon's Connexion [Huntingdon, Countess of."

Methodist New Connexion.—Founded in 1797, owing to the expulsion of Alexander Kilham from the Methodist ministry; 5,000 sympathisers formed the first members of the new sect. Alexander Kilham was the first claim the right of the Methodist people to meet together for worship in Church hour and to receive the Sacraments from their own ministers. In theology, the New Connexion does not differ from the old; the chief difference between the two bodies is that the New Connexion admits the laity to a share in the government of the society. Ministers and lay delegate attend the Conference in equal numbers, and the laity have a voice in the election and expulsion of their ministers. This body has missions abroad, especially in China, and the present time has in the United Kingdom 211 ministers, 33,964 members, and 469 chapels. The society is also strong in Canada.

Primitive Methodists.—This sect arose from the expulsion of William Clowes at Boar Lane in 1811. These two men had preached and conducted prayer meetings among the men engaged in the Potteries in Staffordshire; great numbers of people attended their meeting. In 1807 they introduced the American custom of holding camp meetings, at which various speakers addressed the congregation assembled in the open air. These meetings were prolonged sometimes throughout the whole day. The Methodist Conference disapproving this, expelled the promoters, William Clow and Hugh Bourne. In 1812 they took the name of "Primitive Methodists," signifying by this that they wished to walk as close as they could in the steps of John Wesley. They were named also "Bryanites," from the custom of singing aloud in the open street. In their theology they do not differ materially from the original Methodist Society; their prominent doctrine being "full, free, and present salvation." They differ from the older Methodists in the admission of laity to their Conference, in a majority of two to one. Other characteristics of this body are their preference for open-air preaching, and the allowing women to press the distribution of bread and water at the love-feasts, the great excitement which prevails at their meetings. They flourish chiefly in the northern counties of England first. Their present statistics for the Unit Kingdom are as follows:—1,042 ministers, 192,389 members, and 4,217 chapels.

Bible Christians or Bryanites.—This sect arose in 1815, with the secession of William O'Bryan, a Methodist local preacher in Cornwall. It succeeded well in Devonshire and Cornwall, but in 1829 O'Bryan left the sect. Their Conference consists of eq numbers of ministers and people; and they allow females to act as itinerant preachers. They possess in the United Kingdom at the present time 245 ministers, 28,760 class members, and 578 chapels; and they have a mission also in Australia.

METHODIST UNITED FREE CHURCHES consist of members expelled from the Methodist society, especially for agitating in favour of the admission of the laity to a voice in the management of their society. They were amalgamated in 1857, and differ only from the older society in giving increased powers to the laity. They have foreign missions in Africa and Australia; and number at the present time, in the United Kingdom, 419 ministers, 84,653 class members, and 1,232 chapels.

Two other very small sections of Methodism are the Wesleyan Reform Union, founded in 1849, and the Independent Methodists. Their adherents together must 13,915 members.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN AMERICA. Methodism is the leading denomination, in point of numbers, in the United States. It was introduced in 1766 by some Irish emigrants. Among these were Barbara Heck and Philip Embury, who began to hold sermons in a rigging loft in New York. Their numbers increased so quickly that in two years' time they built a meeting-house. Several preachers were sent out from England to assist the new society. Their first Conference was held at Philadelphia in 1773. During the War of Independence all the English preachers, except Mr. Asbury, returned home. At the close of the war, in 1784, John Wesley determined on consecrating Dr. Coke as bishop, with directions to consecrate Mr. Asbury as second Bishop of the American Methodists. They thus became organised to an Episcopalian Church. Three orders of ministers are recognised by them—bishops, elders, and deacons. There are three branches or divisions of this Episcopal Church, viz., the Methodist Episcopal Church, north; Methodist Episcopal Church, South; and Methodist Episcopal Church, Coloured, embracing the coloured races. The church in the North has 12,811 ministers and 1,799,610 class members; the Church in the South has 4,945 ministers and 883,168 members; while the Coloured Church has 953 ministers and 125,683 members. In theology and organisation these churches follow the pattern of the Wesleyan Methodists in England. The directory for their worship and doctrine consists of an abridgment of the Book of Common Prayer and of the Thirty-nine Articles, arranged by John Wesley. A schism in this society occurred in 1830, owing to the dissatisfaction felt by some members at the government of the Church; and the Methodist Protestant Church" came into being in that year.

METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH. The first general Convention of this sect was held at Baltimore, in 1830. Eighty-three ministers attended, and lay representatives of about 5,000 members. The only difference between this and the Episcopalian Methodist Church lies in the mode of government. The former admits laymen in equal numbers with ministers to their Conferences, and places all ministers on a level in authority; while the latter rejects lay representation, and adopts unlimited episcopacy. The Protestant Church has 1,500 ministers and 131,010 members.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.—An important sect, numbering 1,882 ministers and 400,804 members. It was founded in Philadelphia in 1816. It arose through the harsh treatment accorded by the Whites to their Coloured fellow-Methodists, who accordingly decided to form a communion of their own. They do not differ from the Methodist Church either in theology or in practice.

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL ZION CHURCH.—This sect was founded in 1796, owing to the harsh treatment received by the coloured people from their white fellow-Christians. Bishop Asbury gave his sanction to the new community. At first they held their services only during the intervals between the services of their white brethren; but in 1799 they decided to form a distinct communion, and they accordingly erected a place of worship in New York, called Zion Church. They, however, continued subject to the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church till 1820, in which year they became entirely independent of the older body. Their characteristics are: the making marriage a sacrament on a par with Baptism and Holy Communion; abstaining from all spirits except in case of necessity. They have 2,000 ministers and 302,750 class members.

Other sects of Methodists in America are:

Evangelical Association, having 953 ministers and 120,357 members.

Primitive Methodist Church, with 27 ministers and 3,878 members.

American Wesleyan Church, with 267 ministers and 29,805 members.

Free Methodist Church, with 263 ministers and 13,045 members.

Union American Methodist Episcopal Church and Congregational Methodists, both small bodies.

Methodius, missionary to the Slavs, the son of Leon, of Thessalonica, was sent, A.D. 863, with his brother Cyril, by the Greek Emperor Michael, to Moravia, on the invitation of its Governor, Rostislav, who was anxious to have the Scriptures translated into the Slavonic tongue. They first composed a Slavonic alphabet by the use of Greek letters, to which they added Armenian, Hebrew, and some original characters, amounting in all to forty letters. They then translated the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, and afterwards the Psalter and other books. By this means many converts were made and churches built. After labouring for four and a half years, they were, on the information of the German clergy, who were jealous at their success, summoned by Pope Nicholas to Rome; they were admitted to an audience, and, having satisfactorily explained their creed, Methodius was appointed Metropolitan of Moravia and Pannonia. He returned, therefore, to his missionary work (Cyril seems to have died in Rome) until political troubles obliged him for a time to give it up. He visited Rome a second time, and obtained from Pope John VIII. an approval of his Slavonic Liturgy, as the Pontiff confessed that he concluded from the words of the Psalmist, “Praise the Lord, all ye nations,” that it could not be meant that the Scriptures should only be used in Greek, Latin, and Hebrew, which would confine them to the use of the clergy. One condition, however, was insisted on—that Mass must be celebrated in Greek or Latin. Methodius once more returned to Moravia, and there laboured till his death in 885.

Metrical Psalms and Hymns.—The first translation of the Psalms into English metre was made in Henry VIII.'s reign by Sir Thomas Wyatt; but this version is lost. The first edition which has come down to us, and which is called the “Old Version,” was begun by Sternhold, who translated fifty psalms. The work was completed by Hopkins and others, and published, together with about forty tunes, in 1562. The “New Version” was brought out by Tate and Brady in 1596.

The metrical psalms were never an essential part of Divine Service, but were used at certain intervals without disturbing the rest of the service. This use was based on the injunction of Queen Elizabeth, that “in the beginning or in the end of Common Prayer, either at morning or evening, there may be sung an hymn or such-like song to the praise of Almighty God in the best sort of melody and music that may be conveniently devised, having respect that the sense of the hymn may be understood and perceived.”

The use of metrical hymns began in the Eastern Church, and was introduced into the West by Ambrose. The first attempt at translating hymns from the Breviary was made by Cranmer in 1544, and in the following year seven English hymns, one for each service, appeared in the Primer; but they were all discarded from the Reformed Prayer Book, except one—“Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire.” Some hymns were translated in Queen Elizabeth’s reign, and the Puritans wished to introduce them; but they were refused by the Revisers of the Prayer Book in 1661. [See Hymns.]

Metropolitan.—A metropolitan town, the capital, or mother city, from which colonists went. It has been said that metropolitan see is the ecclesiastical sense are of apostolical institution, or that at least the Apostles prepared the way for them, inasmuch as when travelling about they chose the civil metropolis as the best place to fix their head-quarters and to found the Church. The term was not used till the fourth century; but the Council of N. speaks of the existence of metropolitans as a new thing, and, in fact, treats the still more extensive authority of the Bishops of Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome as established by ancient custom. The Council of Antioch in explicit decree as to the precedence of the bishop of the metropolis, and as to the necessity of his presence when questions of a gene- nature are discussed, but with a strong reservation as to the powers of each bishop in matters affecting merely his own diocese.

The breaking up of the Roman Empire the disturbances made it difficult for distant bishops to attend the Councils, which led to independent action on the part of the metropolitans. In Africa the right of a metropolitan was dependent upon the civil metropolis, but on the priority of the episcopal character; thus the eldest bishop in a province was metropolitan.

The privileges of a metropolitan in a province were [1] to have precedence of all other bishops; [2] to consecrate the bishop of the province; [3] to call a provincial con- ciliar for preserving orthodoxy and discipline.

In England there are two metropolitans, the Archbishop of Canterbury and York. [Arch- bishop.] And the system has been duly introduced into the Colonial Churches. Thus, the Bishop of Capetown is Metropolitan of South Africa, and Sydney, of Australia.

Meyer, HEINRICH AUGUST WILHE [b. in Gotha in 1800, d. in Hanover, 187 He studied theology at Jena, and became Pastor in 1822. His ministerial life was faithful, earnest, devout, and he was admis as a preacher, but is known to the world large by his commentaries on the New Tes- ment, which are placed within the reach of English students of Scripture through translations in Clark's Theological Library.

Michael, Sr.—The Feast of St. Mich- and All Angels is kept by the Anglican Church on Sept. 29th. St. Michael is mentioned in Scripture in the Book of Daniel, in the Epistles of Jude, and in the Book of Revelation. T. Roman Catholics celebrate three apparitions of St. Michael—one at Chonos, former Colosse in Phrygia; one on Mount Gargato (now St. Angelo), in Italy; and one on Tom on the sea coast between Normandy and Brittany. At each of these places a church was built on the site of the apparition. It is said that a church was erected in his honour by Constantine, called Michaelion, about 676, and a half miles from Constantinople, and v frequently by numbers, who declared that the Archangel frequently appeared there and cured distempers. In process of time no less than fifteen churches in Constantinople bore his name. It is noticed that all ancient churches in England dedicated to him stand on elevated ground.

St. Michael is the patron saint of France, and it is he who is said to have appeared to Joan of Arc.

Michael Cerularius was Patriarch of Constantinople from 1043 to 1059, and in his time the breach between the Eastern and Western Churches was completed. In concert with Leo, Archbishop of Bulgaria, he addressed a letter to John, Bishop of Trani in Apulia [1053], denouncing the errors of the Latins in the following respects:—[1.] The use of unleavened bread in the Holy Communion. [2.] The practice of fasting on Saturdays in Lent. [3.] Of eating things strangled and blood. [4.] Of using the hymn “Hallelujah” only upon Easter Day. This letter was followed up by the closing of the Latin Churches, and the seizure of the Latin monasteries in Constantinople. The Pope, Leo IX., replied to these charges in a letter, and in 1054 sent Cardinals Humbert and Frederick, and the Archbishop of Amalfi, as his Legates, to try to effect a reconciliation. The envoys were well received by the Emperor Constantine Monomachus, who wished to preserve the Pope’s interest, and they succeeded in obtaining from Nicetas Pectoratus, a Studite monk who had written in support of Cerularius, an anathema against his own book. Michael himself, however, refused all communication with the Legates. At last the latter entered the Cathedral of Sophia, and laid upon the high altar a Bull which, while allowing the orthodoxy of the people of Constantinople in general, excommunicated the Patriarch and his adherents. They then left Constantinople, to return two days later at the Emperor’s invitation, and to receive an honourable dismissal. Meanwhile Michael retorted with a counter anathema, and in spite of the efforts of Peter of Antioch, who tried to act as mediator, the breach continued. Another legation was sent by Pope Stephen IX. in 1057, but without result. Michael Cerularius was at length deposed in 1059 by the Emperor Isaac Comnenus, and died shortly after. But the breach remained, and still remains, unhealed.

Michaelis, Johann David [b. at Halle, 9 February, 1717, d. August 22nd, 1791], a celebrated exegetical writer, was educated at Halle, travelled in England and Holland, became Professor of Philosophy at Göttingen in 1745, and was the chief instrument in forming a Scientific Association in the University. For nearly twenty years he edited the Göttinger Gelehrten Anzeigen, and was Librarian of the University; but during the latter years of his life he was occupied almost entirely with his professorship. He was one of the most eminent Biblical scholars of the eighteenth century, and did much valuable work as a critic and commentator; he was also learned in archaeology and history. His commentaries on the Laws of Moses were published in English translations in 1810.

Middleton, Conyers, a well-known divine and controversialist, was born in Yorkshire in 1683. In 1700 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, took his B.A. degree in 1702, and was ordained. Four years after he became a Fellow, and in 1708 joined with others of his college in a petition against Bentley, the Master; and for some years he and Bentley carried on a warfare which is painful to read of, in which bitter and angry words more than once brought the two divines into the law courts as mutual accusers. In 1726, Bentley issued specimens of a new edition of the Greek Testament, which he intended to bring out. The work was prepared very hurriedly, and contained several errors, which Middleton took advantage of, and wrote so strongly that the idea of Bentley’s Greek Testament was given up. Middleton was made Principal Librarian of the College, and published a new plan for arranging the library in 1723. In the following year he spent some time in Rome, and in 1729 published a Letter from Rome, showing that the present Romans derived their religion from that of their heathen ancestors—a book which was received with great favour by the learned. He afterwards wrote works containing statements which were considered by his contemporaries to have been written by an infidel, but which are now received; such as that the Scriptures were not of absolute inspiration; that the Apostles sometimes adapted the prophecies relating to Christ; and that the Jews borrowed some of their customs from Egypt. On these subjects he had a controversy with Dr. Waterland. In 1741 appeared his most famous work, A Life of Cicero, the proceeds of which brought him in enough money to purchase an estate at Hildersham, near Cambridge, where he spent the remainder of his life, and died in 1750. He also wrote a book on Miracles, denying the continuance of miraculous powers in the Church after the time of the Apostles, and in another treatise attacked Bishop Sherlock’s discourses on prophecy.

Middleton, Thomas Fanshaw, the first Bishop of Calcutta [b. at Kedleston, Derbyshire, 1769, d. at Calcutta, 1822]. He studied at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, became Curate of Gainsborough, then Rector of St. Pancras, London, and Archdeacon of Huntingdon. He was a good Greek scholar, and an eloquent and impressive preacher; and having been selected to deliver a charge to a Danish Missionary who was starting for India, his speech was so much admired by the Bishop of Lincoln that he recommended Middleton in 1814 to the newly-created Bishopric of Calcutta. After some hesitation Middleton accepted the post, and arrived in Calcutta in November, 1814. The duties of the diocese were very heavy, and the Bishop had innumerable difficulties to contend with, which, added to the trying climate, enfeebled his health. In 1820 he founded the Bishop's College for the training of missionaries, and ordained some natives to Holy Orders. His literary works consist of The Doctrine of the Greek Article applied to the Criticism and Illustration of the New Testament, published in 1808, and a few sermons, charges, etc., which appeared after his death.

Mildmay Conferences.—Evangelical Conferences, now held from time to time at the Conference Hall, Mildmay Park. The first of them was held at Barnet in 1856, under the guidance of the Rev. W. Penncather and his wife, and in 1860 an iron room was built there for carrying on the mission work, which was afterwards removed to St. Jude's, Mildmay Park. In 1870 the present Conference Hall was finished, which will seat 2,500 people. It was designed to be a centre of union for Christians of all Evangelical denominations, and to facilitate the carrying on of a variety of Evangelistic and Missionary agencies. The large hall is used every Sunday afternoon and evening for preaching and various meetings, and the five basement-rooms are used for Bible classes on Sunday and during the week for helping the poor both temporally and spiritually. Once a Sunday there is a special service for the deaf and dumb. Adjoining the Hall is a Deaconess House, where ladies desiring to devote their lives to mission work live and give up their whole time to work among the poor of London, by undertaking house-to-house visitation, mothers' meetings, night schools, and classes of various kinds in districts in the East of London principally. There are also in connection with the Hall a Nursing House, a Cottage Hospital, Invalids' House, an Orphanage, an Invalids' Kitchen, a Dorcas Society, a Mothers' Meeting, Mon's Night Schools, Medical Mission Hospital, Coffee and Lodging Houses at Bethnal Green, Railway Mission in Liverpool Street, and a Bible Flower Mission. A Mission to the Jews was commenced in 1876.

There is a daily prayer meeting held in the hall.

Military Orders.—The origin of these associations may be traced to the necessities of the Christian pilgrims to the Holy Land, who often reached Jerusalem utterly destitute and broken in health, and who were tended in the hospitals by the monks, who were compelled in self-defence to assume the joint character of soldier and monk. Many of these Orders have now fallen into disuse, but some of them still exist in the form of orders of knighthood. There were once from 90 to 100; we give a few particulars of the most important.

1. Knights Hospitallers.—This Order owed its foundation to some merchants of Amalfi, who obtained leave from the Caliph of Egypt to build a church at Jerusalem; they founded a monastery of the Benedictine Order to receive and entertain Christian pilgrims and a convent of nuns dedicated to Mary Magdalene, to receive the women who should visit the Holy Sepulchre. The hospital was built in 1080, and the administration of it was committed to the Abbot Gerard, who, after Godfrey of Bouillon had taken the city in 1099, founded the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and became its first Grand Master. He instituted a rule and religious habit for the knights, who, at their reception, vowed chastity, obedience, and self-abnegation, and promised always to assist the Christians. Gerard died in 1118, and was succeeded by Raymond du Puy, who established a yet more severe rule, which was confirmed by Pope Calixtus II. in 1120. Numerous hospitals, called Commanderies [q.v.], were established at sea-side towns, whence pilgrims were assisted on their way to the Holy Land. The Order had become military in 1104, and many rich men enrolled themselves, and they were styled "knights." When Jerusalem was conquered by Saladin in 1187, the knights, with their Grand Master Dups, retired to Margatt in Phoenicia, and thence to Acre which they valiantly defended in 1290. Thence they went to Cyprus, where they stayed till 1310, and in that year, under the Grand Master, Foulques de Villaret, they took Rhodes and next year defended it against the Saracens for which reason their successors have used these four letters for a device, F.E.R.T., i.e. Fortitudo ejus Rhodium tenet. In 1522 the island was attacked by Solymax the Magnificent, and the Grand Master, Villiers de l'Il d'Adam, was forced to capitulate; they then retired to Candia, thence to Sicily, where Pope Adrian VI. granted them the city of Viterbo. In 1530 the Emperor Charles V. gave them the island of Malta, which he had conquered from Tunis, on condition that they should defend his kingdom of Sicily from the Turks. In 1565 Solymax besieged Malta for four months, but it was gallantly defended by the Grand Master, John de Valette Parisis. They then remained undisturbed till 1798 when, by means of bribery to some French knights and the cowardice of the Grand Master, Ferdinand d'Hompesch, the island was surrendered to Napoleon. The Order was then suppressed in many of the European States, and the office of Grand Master has never since been filled up; a Deputy Grand Master has, however, been appointed, who live... in Spain, but the knights are now very few in number. The Order was divided into three classes—1. Knights, who must all be of noble birth; 2. Chaplains; 3. Serving brothers, who were not noble. The knights were divided into eight different languages or nations—1. That of Provence, from which the Grand Commander was always chosen; 2. Auvergne, whose chief was Marshal of the Order; 3. France, whose chief was Grand Hospitalier; 4. Italy, whose chief was High Admiral; 5. Aragon, whose chief was Grand Conservator; 6. Germany, whose chief was Grand Bailiff; 7. Castile, whose chief was Grand Chancellor; and 8. England, whose chief was General of Infantry. Every language had several Grand Priories, and every Grand Priory a certain number of Commanderies. Amongst the knights the Grand Crosses were those who had a right to be candidates for the dignity of Grand Master, who was the sovereign of the island, and to whom all knights owed obedience. There were also Dorsmes or Demi-Crosses, who were allowed to marry, and wore a golden cross of three branches. In times of peace the knights wore a black habit with a white cross of the well-known shape called the Maltese cross, having eight points. When fighting, the dress was red with a great white cross before and behind.

2. The Knights Templars began at Jerusalem about 1118. Hugh de Payens, Geoffrey of St. Omer, with seven others whose names are not known, devoted themselves to God’s service as Canons Regular, and made their religious vows to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Baldwin II. gave them a house near the site of the Temple, whence their name of Templars, or Knights of the Temple, or Poor Soldiers of the Temple of Solomon. The King and nobles gave them estates, some for a set term of years, others for ever, the object of the institution being to defend pilgrims from the cruelty of the infidels, and to keep the passes free for such as undertook the journey to the Holy Land. Until 1128 the nine knights added none to their number, but after the Council of Troyes, aspirants for knighthood joined the Order in great numbers. At that Council, Honorius II. confirmed the rules of their Order, amongst the rest that their dress should be white; in 1146, Eugenius III. added a cross to be set on their cloaks. Like other Orders they were divided into three classes—1. The Knights proper; 2. the Esquires; 3. Rich men who, without becoming actual knights, aided with gifts of money and obtained protection in case of need. As their numbers increased they were organised into Provinces, each containing so many Commanderies and Preceptories. A spirit of rivalry existed between them and the Knights Hospitallers. After the conquest of Jerusalem by the Saracens, they spread ill over Europe, and were a very wealthy society. Matthew Paris says they had 9,000 houses or convents and 20,000 knights. Their stations in the East were Jerusalem, Antioch, Tripoli and Cyprus, and almost every country in the West had one of their Provinces. In each country they had their Governor, who was called Master of the Temple, or of the Militia of the Temple. One of their Masters fell at the siege of Acre [1291], and they then retired to Cyprus. Their work of fighting against the infidels was now done, and they took up no definite enterprise. In Spain and Portugal they remained popular for a time because of the assistance they gave against the Moors; but in France, where was their chief settlement, their immense wealth excited the cupidity of the French King. All sorts of dreadful charges were brought against them, many of them absurd and incredible, and in 1307 they were seized by secret orders of Philip le Bel and thrown into prison. Confessions were extorted from some of them by torture, which they afterwards retracted. In these proceedings Philip was aided by Pope Clement V., who owed his office to the French King. Philip, impatient at the Pope’s inactivity, submitted the case to the officers of the Inquisition; but the Pope suspended these proceedings and ordered that the knights should be tried by a commission of cardinals appointed by him. Two or three years passed in disputes as to how the Templars should be dealt with, and at last, in 1310, Philip called a Council at Paris, headed by the Archbishop of Sens, and under this Council the proceedings of the Inquisition were resumed. Many knights died either of torture or long captivity, and many were burnt, amongst them the Grand Master, Jacques du Molay; this was in 1313. The year before [1312] the whole Order had been abolished at the General Council of Vienne, and their property was given to the Knights of St. John of Malta, who also received from Edward II. of England in 1323 a like grant of their English possessions. The Templars, though suppressed in other countries, were nowhere else ill-treated as in France. The seal of the Templars represented two knights riding on one horse, as an emblem of their poverty; their war-cry was “Beau siant,” and their banner bore the same name, and the motto, “Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, sed Tuo Nomin da gloriam.” Traces of the Knights Templars are still to be found in England: in the Temple Church, London, where are cross-legged figures of several of the knights; in the Round Churches at Northampton, Cambridge, and Mapledstead; and in the names of several villages, as Temple Brewer, Lincolnshire; Temple Newsom, Yorkshire; Temple Cowley, near Oxford; places in which they possessed property and had small Preceptories of their Order.

3. Teutonic Knights, of Knights of St. Mary, instituted after the siege of Acre in 1192 with the sanction of Henry of Jerusalem, Frederick of Suabia, and the Emperor Henry VI. in favour of the German nation, who had suffered greatly in that siege. The statutes of the Order were formed on the model of those of the Hospitallers and Templars. The knights were to be exclusively Teutonic or German, to be well born, to vow the defence of the Christian Church and Holy Land, and to give entertainment to the pilgrims of their own nation, and they were to be called Knights of St. Mary, or of Our Lady of Mount Sion. Pope Celestine III. ordered that they should be clad in white and wear a black cross, in the form of that of St. John of Jerusalem, on their habits, standards, and arms, and live according to St. Augustine's rule. At first the Teutonic Knights were all laymen, but soon they had priests, and in 1221 a class of half-brothers, or serving-brothers, was added. Their first station was Acre. After the fall of Jerusalem they removed to Venice, thence to Marburg in Hesse, and in 1309 to Marienburg on the Vistula. In 1252 they had been joined by the Order of Christ, or Brethren of the Sword, who possessed Livonia, and for a long time the knights carried on a cruel war against the heathen nations on the shores of the Baltic, which resulted in the conquest of Prussia and other territories, and raised the Order to the rank of a sovereign Power. [See Chaucer's Prologue, "The Knight."] Their power began to decline in the 15th century, when Sigismund of Poland snatched West Prussia from them. In 1510 the knights chose his nephew, Albert of Brandenburg, for their Grand Master; this Prince embracing Luther's doctrines, treated with Sigismund to make him absolute master of Prussia, on condition of his doing homage for it to the Crown of Poland. He then drove the knights from the country, and they retired to Mengenthin in Suabia. The Order was formally abolished by Napoleon in 1809.

In Spain there were three military Orders:—

1. The Knights of Calatrava, founded by a Cistercian monk named Velasquez, in 1158, to defend Calatrava from the Moors, were sanctioned by Pope Alexander III. in 1164. At first they were victorious; but in 1197 the Moors took Calatrava, and the knights went to Salvatierra and took that name till they were able to return to their former city in 1212. The Order soon became rich, and this caused so many dissensions as to patronage that in 1489 Pope Innocent VIII. annexed the Grand Mastership to the Crown of Spain. In this century the Order was suppressed with other monastic institutions in Spain, and the title is now only an honorary distinction.

2. Knights of St. James of Compostella.—The relics of St. James the Apostle are said to have been buried at Compostella in Gallicia, which occasioned an extraordinary concourse of pilgrims to flock thither. In 1161 thirteen Spanish nobles founded an Order of knighthood to protect these pilgrims from the Moors; the Order was confirmed in 1175 by Pope Celestine III. They outstripped in wealth and power the other Spanish Orders and gained vast territories. This wealth was with them, as with other Orders, the primary cause of their decline. In 1522 the Grand Mastership was transferred to Papal authority. The Order was not finally dissolved till 1833.

3. Knights of Alcántara.—This Order was founded about the same time as that of Compostella, for the defence of Estremadura from the Moors. It adopted the rule of St. Benedict, and was confirmed in 1197 by Pope Celestine III. It was afterwards joined to the Order of Calatrava, but in the 14th century the knights quarrelled over the election of a Grand Master, which resulted in open war and ultimate separation. In 1495 it, with Calatrava and Compostella, was placed under the authority of the Spanish Crown. This Order was abolished in this century, but revived in 1874 by the late King of Spain.

Among French military Orders we mention the Ultramarine, or Beyond-the-Sea Order, founded by St. Louis in 1269 to encourage his nobles to undertake the expedition to the Holy Land; the Knights of St. Lazarus, to whom Louis VII. gave land near Orleans, and who were united to the Knights of Malta by Pope Innocent VII. but re-established by Henry IV. in 1608 known also as the Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel; the Knights of St. Louis established by Louis XIV. in 1639—a strict military Order; the Knights of Notre Dame de Lis, instituted against the Moors by Garcia IV., King of Navarre, in 1400. Then there was the Order of the Gold-Fleece, instituted in 1429 by Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy, in defence of the Catholic faith; the military Order of St. Dominic, established against the Albigensians; the Knights of Jesus Christ, instituted about 1318 by Denys, King of Portugal, against the Moors.

In England we have the Order of the Bath spoken of by writers in the 13th century as of ancient custom; the Order of the Garter, founded by Edward III. in 1347. In Scotland the Order of the Thistle, instituted by James V. in 1534.

Milk and Honey were offered upon an altar, in primitive times, on the Saturday before Easter, but in such a way as to distinguish them from the oblations of bread with a wine for the Eucharist, and were tasted the newly-baptised.

Milk, John, D.D. [b. 1645, d. 1707], Fell of Queen's College, Oxford, Chaplain Charles II., Rector of Blechington, and Prior of St. Edmund's Hall, author of a critical edition of the Greek Testament, which was published a fortnight before his death.

Mill, John Stuart [b. 1806, d. 1873], an English philosopher. He was the son of an acute thinker, who educated him not only in ordinary subjects of study, but in politics and all the foremost controversies of the day. In this way he imbibed the philosophy founded solely upon utility and experience from his very cradle. In 1820 he went to France for a year, part of which he spent in the south, at the house of Sir Samuel Bentham, the brother of Jeremy Bentham, and the rest of the time at Paris, where he lived with Jean Baptiste Say, the French economist, and made the acquaintance of many leading politicians. On his return to England he brought back a strong interest in Liberalism and De-

Authorship. That which is macy, made a revolution in the world.

Mill, Samuel (1806-1873). An English

Liberty is more popular. His examination of Sir William Hamilton's philosophy was remarkably acute, and is considered by many as the most deductive and logical of his writings. In some of his writings, even to the last, we find absolute rejection and rejection of Christianity. But, on the other hand, there is a plaintive confession that he has not found the peace and rest for which he yearned, and a regret that his education was what it was. Deep earnestness, strong conscientiousness, intense desire to find truth, and to lead others to it, all these are to be found in his writings. He rejects Christianity, yet looks longingly upon it; and in one of his Essays on Religion goes so far as to say that to the "rational" sceptic it must ever present itself as a "possibility" that Christ may have had a unique and special commission from God. Many a firm believer in Christian doctrine reading Mill's essays, has expressed the conviction that, weakened as his intellectual conceptions were in the most important of all subjects, these essays are the work of one who was not far from the kingdom of God.

Millenarians. [Chiliasts.]

Millenary Petition.—A petition drawn past in the Pilgrim's Progress, and presented to King

James I., in April, 1603. It is so called because it was supposed to have been signed by 1,000 ministers, though in reality the number did not exceed 300. The chief reforms de-stressed by the Puritans were:—That the cross in baptism, questions addressed to infants, kneeling at the Holy Communion, confirmations, the ring in marriage, bowing at the name of Jesus, the reading of the Apocrypha in church, and the terms "priest" and "absolution" in the Liturgy, should be abolished; that women should not be allowed to baptize; that the use of the cap and sur-plice, and the keeping of holy days, should not be compulsory; that church songs and music should be moderated to better edification; that the clergy should preach at least once every Sunday; and that examination should precede the Communion. This petition resulted in the Hampton Court Conference [q.v.].

Miller, Hugh [b. 1802, d. 1856], an eminent Scotch geologist, was the first editor of the Free Church newspaper, The Witness, started at Edinburgh in 1840. In 1844 an anonymous work, entitled Festivals of the Natural History of Creation, had excited great attention in the religious world. Five years later

Mr. Miller combated the views expressed in it

by a work entitled Footprints of the Creator, in which he denied the literal meaning of the word "day" in the first chapter of Genesis,

and also the universality of the Deluge. Such boldness of speech was a novelty then, and caused much alarm; but few persons would find anything in this to frighten them now. He was also the author of Testimony of the Rocks [1857], and of a Letter to Lord Brougham on the Auchterarder Case. His death occurred through suicide, clearly traced to overwork and worry acting upon a sensitive temperament.

Milman, Henry Hart, Dean of St. Paul's and ecclesiastical historian [b. 1791, d. 1868]. He was the youngest son of Sir Francis Milman, physician to George III. Educated at Eton and Oxford, in 1817 he became Vicar of St. Mary's, Reading. In 1820, the year of the publication of his first important sacred poem, The Fall of Jerusalem, he was made one of the Select Preachers at Oxford; in the next year, Professor of Poetry; and in 1829,

Bampton Lecturer. In 1835 he was appointed

Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, and, in 1849, Dean of St. Paul's. His works, which are of great ability and learning, were fiercely attacked on their first publication.

They are among the first examples of the free publishing which has become more familiar to us through the writings of Dean Stanley. The History of the Jews, written for Murray's

"Family Library," scared old-fashioned persons accustomed to the mild Evangelicalism of writers like Simeon and Legh Richmond.

Thus Milman called Abraham a "sheikh," and dealt with the sacred history in the critical spirit with which one would regard any other history. The book made its way in spite of opposition, and was followed by the History of Christianity to the Abolition of Paganism, and this again by the History of Latin Christianity to the Pontificate of Nicholas V. This is a very grand work, full of learning and knowledge, though the style lacks the picturesqueness and sparkle which characterise Stanley. To be added to these works is a volume of Essays from the Quarterly Review on Savonarola, Erasmus, etc.; a fine edition of Gibbon; Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral; and his poems, The Fall of Jerusalem, The Martyr of Antioch, Belshazzar, etc. Two hymns by him are universally popular, "When our heads are bowed with woe" and "Bound upon the accursed tree." Under his deanship the popular services under the dome of St. Paul's were begun in 1835.

Milner, Isaac and Joseph, brothers, eminent clergymen of the Evangelical school. They were educated at the Leeds Grammar School; but their father's death leaving them without means, Joseph was sent in his eighteenth year to Cambridge, and after ordination was appointed Head Master of Hull Grammar School, and Afternoon Lecturer in the church. Isaac had been put to work in a woollen factory, but now became his brother's Assistant Master, and in 1771 went to Queen's College, Cambridge, as a Sizar. Honours flowed in upon him. In 1774 he was Senior Wrangler; he was appointed to the two Chairs of Mathematics and Philosophy, Master of Queen's College [1788], and Vice-chancellor. In 1791 he was appointed Dean of Carlisle. At Cambridge he formed a close friendship with Wilberforce, in whose house he died in 1820, aged sixty-nine. His brother Joseph had long since finished his life at Hull, where, though he was nick-named "the Methodist," his earnestness had gradually overcome all opposition, and the church at which he lectured was crowded, though he was not chosen to the incumbency of Trinity Church until a few weeks before his death in 1797. The work for which the two brothers are famed is the History of the Church of Christ, of which Joseph wrote the first three volumes, and Isaac the two last. In spite of its prejudices and onesidedness, this book filled a great gap, and was the only work of the kind until Neander. The best part of it is the history of the Reformation, and especially the description of the character and work of Luther. The other works of the two brothers are obsolete.

Milner, John, D.D., F.S.A.—A Roman Catholic Bishop [b. 1752, d. 1826]. He was born in London, and received his early education at Sedgley Park, near Wolverhampton, and thence removed to the English seminary at Douay. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and sent to begin his missionary career in London. In 1779 he went to live at Winchester, and for twenty-four years had the pastoral care of the Catholic congregation there, and in 1792 built them a chapel. He had an ardent love of history and antiquities, a love which was fostered by the many remains of Catholic edifices in Winchester; he was made a Fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries, and wrote papers for them on the Glastonbury cup, on the Limerick mitre and crosier, on an ancient copy of St. John's Gospel, on the use of the Pax, and on the emblematical figures on the font in Winchester Cathedral. He also wrote articles on antiquities for the Gentleman's Magazine, and a paper on Gothic architecture in Rees's Cyclopedia. In 1792 he published An Historical and Critical Enquiry into the Existence and Character of St. George. But the work which fixed his fame was The History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester, the first edition of which appeared in 1793, and a second in 1800. This book was praised by the reviews as a work of the highest merit. In his history Dr. Milner freely censured Bishop Hoadly, observing that, "both living and dying he undermined the Church, of which he was a prelate," and for this he was attacked by Dr. Sturges Prebendary of Winchester, in a book called Reflections on Popery. Dr. Milner answered this by a celebrated work, Letters to a Prebendary, which shows acute controversial skill and throws new light on those portions of English history subsequent to the change of religion; this work was extolled in the House of Commons, and its author was defended in the Upper House by Bishop Horsley who attacked by the Lord Chancellor. In 1809 Dr. Milner was made Bishop of the Midland District of England, and was, therefore, obliged to leave Winchester, and went to reside at Wolverhampton. In 1808 he was instrumental in establishing a seminary for Catholic youths at Oscott, near Birmingham, under the title of St. Mary's College. In later years he wrote several treatises on ecclesiastical architecture, and also some religious works, the most important of which was T. End of Religious Controversy. It produced several controversial replies, one of the best of which was by Dr. J. H. Hopkins, America Bishop of Vermont.

Milton, John, the greatest of English sacred poets, the son of John Milto scrivener, was born in London in 1608. I was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge and after taking his degree lived a while, Horton, in Buckinghamshire, and wrote I Minor Poems. He then travelled into Italy and returned to England about the beginning the Civil Wars, and threw himself eagerly into the ranks of the Independent party, and on the establishment of the Commonwealth became Latin Secretary to Cromwell. During this portion of his life his muse was all but silent; it was the period of his great pro

On the Restoration he fell into poverty. Blindness had for some time threatened him, and now the threat was fulfilled. He lived for the rest of his life in the parish of Cripplegate, whence appeared his great poems Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes. In his early life he had been a Churchman, in the second period he was a Baptist, in the latter portion he frequented no public worship, but had the Scriptures read to him at home. His latest theology was Arian or Semi-Arian. He died in 1674, and was buried in St. Giles's Cripplegate.

Minims.—An Order of monks founded by St. Francis of Paula [q.v.]. They took the name of Minims [minim, "the least"] to express their humility as even below the Franciscans, who called themselves Friars minor ["the less"]. In France they were called Bon hommes because Louis XI. and Charles VIII. so called Francis of Paula and his followers. There were also Minim nuns.

Minister.—Etymologically this word means the same as "deacon," and originally had the same use, but it came afterwards to be synonymous with "preacher." It is now used in the Anglican Church for any who have authority to preach, administer the sacraments, etc.

Among the Franciscans and Capuchins the head of the Order is called the minister-general, and each province is placed under a minister provincial. In the Society of Jesus, the generals have five assistants, called ministers.

Ministerium.—A body of ordained ministers in the Lutheran Church, to whom is committed the examination, licensing, and ordaining of candidates for Holy Orders, and also trials for clerical heresy, and on occasion also for lay heresy.

Minor Canons.—Priests in collegiate churches, next in rank to the canons and prebendaries, but not of the Chapter, who are responsible for the performance of the daily service. In cathedrals of the old foundation they are not often found; their duties being generally performed there by the priest-vicars. But at Hereford and Chichester there are both minor canons and priest-vicars; and there are twelve minor canons at St. Paul's, and seven at Windsor, where there are only lay-vicars besides. At Hereford, the minor canons are responsible for the reading of the daily prayers, the vicars-choral for the Litany and Lessons; which seems to mark this office as being more presbyterial than that of the vicars. In the cathedrals of the new foundation, there are no priest-vicars, but all the inferior clerical members are minor canons. Formerly they were more numerous than now, being commensurate to the number of the prebendaries; e.g. twelve at Canterbury, twelve at Durham, ten at Worcester.

The stipend of a minor canon is fixed by law at not less than £150 per annum, and the office may be held by a vicar, provided that his benefice is within six miles of the cathedral.

Minors, Friars. [Franciscans.]

Minster.—A shortened form of the word "monastery." The name is applied to churches to which a monastery or ecclesiastical fraternity was formerly attached, as Westminster, Sherborne Minster, etc. In a few cases the name has come into popular use for a cathedral, as at York, where the noble fane is almost always called "the Minster." But Ripon and Beverley in the same county are also called " Ministers."

Minucius Felix was a Christian apologist of the end of the second or beginning of the third century. He was a Roman orator, and his work entitled Octavius was in the form of a dialogue between a heathen and a Christian. It throws much light upon the treatment of Christians of those times, and is a powerful exposure of the absurdities and the abominations of Paganism.

Miracle Plays were dramas founded on the historical parts of Holy Scripture and the lives of the saints. Such plays date from very early times. One such is attributed, though on questionable evidence, to St. Gregory Nazianzen. The first record of an actual performance belongs to England. Matthew Paris relates that the Abbot of St. Albans exhibited one at Dunstable, about the beginning of the twelfth century; and in Fitzstephen's life of Becket there is mention made of dramatic representations of the lives of the saints in London. These plays were sometimes known as "Mysteria," and a distinction was made, but not closely adhered to, between "Mysteria," as representing Biblical subjects, and "Miracle Plays," legendary stories from the Hagiology; in fact, as Mr. A. W. Ward has remarked in his history of English dramatic literature, the name "Mystery," though common in France, was not applied to these dramas in England. The performances were a distinguishing feature of the festival of Corpus Christi, established in 1264, the office for which was composed by St. Thomas Aquinas, and which comprised a recitation of the Creed and a drama of the Incarnation. The plays were performed originally in churches, but afterwards in the streets, becoming less and less religious, and more free and coarse, as time went on, until they became discredited. But they formed a large feature of mediæval amusements, and were often performed with much elaboration of language and of costume. [See Ward's account of the Towneley and Chester Plays, i. 33-51.] Out of them were developed a third class of dramatic performances, known as “Moralities,” in which the vices and virtues were personified. The popular representation of the devil with horns, tail, and cloven hoof is owing to the fact that this was his conventional style in the Middle Age “Moralities.” Bishop Bale, the author of our first historical play, was also the author of the last miracle plays. When the Reformation came, Luther and others were in favour of continuing the performances. Milton’s original idea of Paradise Lost was that of a sacred drama. But the sudden and magnificent rise of the secular drama in the days of Elizabeth was a death-blow to the “Moralities,” by reason of its reality, truth to life, and expression of popular wants and feelings. Still, the old plays have never entirely died out. The performances of Old Father Christmas and St. George and the Dragon even yet survive in country parishes. The writer has seen both acted. On the Continent various causes led to the extinction of the sacred dramas, and in the eighteenth century they were suppressed in South Germany by law. In the village of Oberammergau the “Passion Play” still survives, and is acted every ten years. [OBERAMMERGAU.]

MIRACLES.—Miracles are mentioned in Scripture under four names: “wonders, signs, powers, and works.” As “wonders,” their immediate physical effect on the spectator is emphasised; as “signs,” their moral and spiritual purpose is implied, lurking under their phenomenal aspect; as “powers,” they hint at some hidden cause that produces them; while as “works,” their general practical character is regarded, as the acts of a distinct person, in attestation of his mission and his message.

Still the question remains, What is a miracle? It may be replied that a miracle is not a violation of the ordinary laws of Nature, but a special interference of supernatural or superhuman power for a definite moral purpose. It is the extraordinary interposition of the Great Lawgiver Himself, modifying for the time the regular action of His own ordinary laws. Even so the human will is a potent factor in the physical world, as when a man raises his hand, or throws up a ball into the air, in spite of the law of gravitation. It is God’s will making itself seen and felt in the ordinary course of Nature. A miracle, then, is a possible event, because it does not of itself deny the existence of the regular order of Nature. An exceptional phenomenon, like a miracle, simply reveals God in another way than that in which Nature reveals Him. An occasional departure does not overthrow the harmony of the cosmos, but, on the contrary, implies it. There could be no exception, unless there were also a general law.

Modern Science, which has fathomed more deeply the unbroken reign of Law in the physical order of Creation, denies the possibility of a miracle. The real question is, Is there a God, or is there not? If there is, a miracle is possible. Once admit the idea of One Almighty God, and a miracle becomes an imaginable event. And if there is thus room for one miracle, there is room for many.

But can a miracle be proved? Hume denied that it could. Our belief, according to his view, is the result of experience, and ordinary experience knows nothing of miracles. He urges further that the human testimony advanced in their support is solitary, exceptional, and may be mistaken, inasmuch as all testimony is as likely to be false as true: no testimony, therefore, is to be received which contradicts the uniform tenor of Nature. The question, however, is not the abstract credibility of all human testimony, but the specific credibility of certain special witnesses. The character and circumstances of the Evangelists and Apostles is a distinct element in this inquiry. What they were in themselves and what they suffered in support of the miraculous story they published, affords strong proof that they were at least honest men. But were they mistaken men, mistaken in their interpretation of the phenomena which they witnessed? The answer is, No: not only because the character of some of the miracles was such as to admit only of one interpretation, and that, the supernatural interpretation, such, for instance, as the Ascension—and if we admit one miracle, we must also admit others—but because of the extraordinary purity of the morality which the miracles, thus vouched for, inculcated; and also because of the lasting beneficial results that remain to this day.

It ought to be remembered that a mere wonder of itself proves nothing. The wonder must also be a sign, associated with some word or act indicative of design. This coincidence of extraordinary manner and avowed purpose, which is found in most of the Scriptural miracles, and which is wanting in medieval and so-called modern miracles, is an essential part of the evidence for the miracles themselves. What new morality, what permanent results, have followed from the fantastic miracles of the Middle Ages, or from the unauthenticated vagaries of Modern Spiritualism?

Miracles, again, are necessary as the credentials of Revelation; and since Revelation makes known what could not be otherwise discovered, what is beyond and above reason, it follows that reason is not adequate of itself to gauge the truth of a Revelation when given; some other sign, some other proof is wanted, viz., a miracle—in its purpose and in its results evidently from above. A miracle, then, is not only possible, but probable; and if it is probable, it is also credible. With the existing evidence in their favour, it is more weakly credulous to renounce the miracles of the Gospels than to accept them. To imagine that Christ founded His religion, and that His followers conquered the larger part of the civilised world in His name, without miracles as His and their original credentials, is a greater strain on our reason and faith than to suppose that the miracles were facts, and that the record given of them is true.

After all, Nature is not sufficient, apart from Revelation. There is no complete discovery of God in Nature. It reveals Wisdom and Power, but not Love. The sum of Natural Theology, as Lord Brangham said, is only to discover "a great Mechanian." God's moral character, or His connection with ourselves, is not clearly legible in the works of Creation. "Our Father which art in heaven" was never found in Nature's Book; it was Christ Himself who alone authorised such a mode of address, and all that it contains. Under such conditions, when a further Revelation was wanted, it is not incredible that it should be given; and given too in the only way by which it could be substantiated—by the occasional performance of miracles; mighty, and therefore proofs of His power; beneficial, and therefore signs of His love; lasting in consequent results, and therefore evidences of a set design; by which also He showed that there were other laws at work than the physical laws of Nature; by which, too, He lifted up men's hearts and minds at once into a higher spiritual sphere, and made known to mankind His own moral perfections and infinite love.

Nor is there an escape from such conclusions by supposing that Christ was in possession of some of the secrets of science in advance of His own day, or even of later times, and therefore wrought only what seemed to be wonders to the ignorant eyes that beheld them. For as Christ appealed to His miracles as proofs that He was God, and came from God, He must then have been only an arrant deceiver, even while inculcating the loftiest morality, which has since revolutionised the world. Such truth and such falsehood in the same Person would only exhibit a moral monster, which would be a monstrous miracle in itself.

In the present day, the internal proof of Christianity most relied on is its sublimity and its fitness for human wants. But, valuable as this may be as an auxiliary, internal roof is not sufficient without external evidence. Internal proof only appeals to reason, and reason is not the sole judge in such a matter. Our Lord Himself said: "Believe that I am in the Father . . . or else believe for the very works' sake." This was an argument for the truth of His doctrine from the character of His works. For instance, the natural facts of the Incarnation and Atonement are not proved actually to have taken place, because they are exactly suitable to man's wants; such internal evidence requires historical corroboration as an additional proof in their favour. Even so, the indirect evidence from the character of the Gospel itself demanded the direct evidence of miracles in order to substantiate its claims.

In conclusion, it may be said that miracles are possible, if the existence of one Supreme God is admitted; that they are antecedently probable from the necessary character of a Revelation from Heaven; that trustworthy evidence has been adduced in their support of a very various and complex kind; and that by them a new moral and spiritual element has been introduced into the world, of which the lasting results are a standing proof of the miracles themselves. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that the question of the general credibility of miracles, as recorded in Scripture, must not be confounded with that of the actual occurrence or not of any single event presumed to be so recorded, but which may rest on less than the normal evidence, or may present less of those signs of a true miracle above mentioned, or may involve some error in interpretation. Thus, for instance, the narrative concerning Joshua and the sun and moon standing still may be held to be a quotation from a recognised poem, rather than a sober statement, and is so held by many who sincerely believe generally in the miraculous element of revelation. It is not so much the character of the marvelous, as the moral surroundings and whole setting of the passage, that arouse suspicion in such a case. Again, the account of the angelic intervention at the Pool of Bethesda is now known to be merely a corruption of the text, being absent from the oldest MSS. But caution is needed in the exercise of such selective processes, lest they degenerate into a mere systematic attempt to explain away every miracle where any possible grounds can be found. Such a course will be of no real benefit in the end, since, as has been partly indicated above, the miraculous element is too deeply ingrained in the Biblical revelation for one to be really destroyed without the virtual destruction of the other also.

Miserere.— The name given to Psalm l., one of the penitential psalms, which begins in Latin with the words "Miserere mei, Deus," "Have mercy upon me, O God." Sometimes any short anthem or office containing these words is so called. Also the name is given to certain stalls found in ancient churches, of which the seats will turn up, and thus give more room for kneeling. These misereors are to be found in many of the cathedrals, and are mostly carved, often with very grotesque figures.

Mishna. [Talmud.]

Missal.—The book used in the Roman Church which contains the lessons and antiphons, with the canon, proper prayers, or collects and prefaces for the celebration of the Eucharist throughout the year.

The first mention of a missal is that of Egbert of York in the eighth century, but this contained neither the antiphons nor the lessons. About the eleventh or twelfth century appeared the Complete or Plenary Missal compiled for the use of the priests. There were different missals for various rites, as the Sarum, Roman, Ambrosian, and others; but in 1570 Pope Pius V. caused the Roman Missal to be revised, and then commanded it to be used throughout the Catholic Church. With the exception of a few alterations by Popes Clement VIII. and Urban VIII., this missal is still in use.

Missions.—The Church of Christ from its very nature was from the beginning a Missionary Church. "Go and make disciples of all nations" was the commission given to her by her departing Lord. Consequently the first records of the Church, as contained in the Acts of the Apostles, are almost entirely a narrative of the first Christian missions. The work was necessarily limited at first through the comparatively small size of the world as known to the Apostles. For the first four centuries the Roman Empire comprised the whole of the civilised world, and to the Roman Empire the preaching of the Gospel was confined during that time. Few records, however, remain of missionary preaching, simply because the facilities offered for travel in the wonderful organisation of the Empire brought the Church into the closest contact with the furthest confines, and so the Gospel spread without written records. This explains how it is that in so many cases we find distant lands in possession of the truth, without the slightest trace remaining of the conversion, or of the first missionary by whom they were visited. Gaul is a case in point. We have no record of its conversion, but by the end of the second century the Church seems to have been fully established, and its members ready, if necessary, to suffer a martyr's death. So the Church continued to spread through the Empire, partly through the indefatigable labours of its missionaries, and partly by the constancy shown by its members under persecution, until the middle of the fourth century. But at that time the Christians found themselves confronted by what must have appeared at first an almost hopeless task. Soon after Rome fell before Alaric, countless tribes of heathen poured into Europe and quickly overran the whole of the Roman Empire, and then the missionary powers of the Church were required as they had never been before. The heathen tribes who were now to be called into the Church comprised three classes—Celts, Teutons, and Slavs. They did not, of course, all come on the scene at once, but for years there was a constant stream of them flowing into Europe from Asia, those who came first being gradually pushed more and more westward as they were overtaken by the later arrivals.

The greater portion of the Celtic race had been incorporated into the Roman Empire and therefore shared its civilisation and religion. But Northern Britain and Ireland were exceptions to this general absorption. The history of their conversion to the faith forms a very beautiful chapter in missionary history. The first missionary to the Irish of whom any record remains, was Palladius sent by Pope Celestine about A.D. 431. He erected three wooden churches and baptised a few converts. But his work did not prosper and he retired to Scotland, intending to make his way back to Rome, but died at Fordin in Kincardineshire. Within a year he was followed by the famous St. Patrick, whose life will be found under his own name. His magnificent work was carried on with enthusiasm by his successors, Jarlah, Corma Dubtach. They founded schools and monasteries all over the country. The nunnery St. Bridget, at Kildare, was the most celebrated foundation for women. The name of St. Columba is almost as illustrious as that of St. Patrick himself. [Columba] To him was owing the conversion of the Picts, and of a great portion of Northern and Western Britain. The Welsh monastery Bangor is said by Bede to have had 2,1 monks. Not only was their work well done in their own spheres, but its indirect influence was also mighty. To the Celtic schools pupils were attracted from all parts of Europe. When fresh mission-fields were opened in succeeding years by other hands, the disciples of Patri and Columba ever and anon appeared to quicken the flame when it grew dim. To Teutons treated them with high respect, as they made their way into far-off Iceland.

The Goths, who, led by Alaric, burst in the south, humbled even imperial Rome itself, and at last laid the mighty empire in the dust, received Christianity to a limited degree from the people they had conquered, but in a limited degree only. The Arian heresy, banished by the Emperors from the Empire, found a lodgment among the fierce Teutons, Visigoths, Ostrogoths, Suevia, Vandals, Lombards—every one was converted to an Arian Christianity. Consequently Catholic historians are all but silent respecting the missionaries to them. One great name, however, comes before us, that of Ulfilas, "Apostle of the Goths." [Ulfilas] The eastern Church was supreme, and did not allow for any of these Goths, who lived along the Eastern Danube, though St. Chrysostom displayed deep anxiety for their conversion. In the middle of the fifth century missionaries went forth to those who had already accepted the Arian faith, with the purpose of convincing them to that of the Catholic Chur Valentinus; Severinus.] But the greatest low struck at Ariantism among the Goths when the heathen Clovis, or Chlodwig, succeeded to the crown of the Salian Franks—a tribe which had settled along the eastern bank of the Rhine from the Maine to its mouth. [Clovis.] But his conversion to Christianity, though it affected his own tribe, and did much to extinguish Ariantism, was of much power beyond the tribe.

There was little spiritual life or zeal observable, and the Germans on the other side of the Rhine remained heathen.

Meanwhile the conversion of our own ancient forefathers, begun by the preaching of St. Augustine, was carried on by anilinus and others, and was abundantly supplemented by Celtic missionaries in the north somewhat different lines, but with a uniformity which in the long run brought about uniformity of practice. [See Augustine; Irinus; Paulinus; Felix; Oswald; Wil-\n\n AONAI.l), regions the children, red me, noble whom, their te e, and Audomar, who, Christian Charlemagne set the uniformity was religious. The apostle St. Augustine began his operations, in the Rhine and the Danube, crossed the latter river, overcame the Slavs dwelling there, and became entirely incorporated with them. They were attacked by the Greek emperor Nicephorus in 811, but he was slain, and they held their ground. Soon afterwards a monk who had been captured by them was exchanged for a Bulgarian princess in captivity at Constantinople. On her return home, not only had she herself become a Christian, but she found that her brother, the reigning prince, had been deeply moved by his captive monk, though he refused to turn Christian. For a long time she entertained in vain, but at length, her deities having failed him in a famine, and the God of his sister proving strong to help, he was baptised by the Patriarch of Constantinople, the Emperor being his godfather. Unhappily the bitter jealousy between the Eastern and Western Churches displayed itself. The Bulgarians, partly moved by the quarrels of the missionaries who came to them, and partly by a reluctance to become too intimately connected with the Court of Constantinople, had applied for teachers to the German Emperor, and this had resulted in a mission from the Pope. After a tempestuous time of controversy they finally elected to place themselves under the Greek Patriarch, a Greek episcopate was established in the country, and the faith began to spread, though it was hindered by the equal zeal of Mahometan missionaries. Connected with this centre was the conversion of Bohemia. [Bohemia; Methodius.] The Slavonic tribe which has since assumed so vast an importance in Europe is, we need not say, Russia. In early days the country was called Scythia, and there are legends of early preachers there, among them the Apostle St. Andrew. The empire which has since become so great first appears in history in the ninth century, but its Christianity dates from the baptism of the Princess Ola [q.v.], followed by that of her grandson Vladimir [q.v.], under whose rule the Church was established in Russia. The conversion of the Wends, another Slavonian tribe, on the banks of the Oder and the Saale, belongs to the eleventh and twelfth centuries. [PRUSSIA, CONVERSION OF.] In 1292 Raymond Lully [q.v.] began the first mission to the Mahomedians.

The Reformation for a time hindered to a great degree foreign missions, being itself a home mission to Christendom. For two centuries Christian missions on a large scale ceased to be sent out by the Reformed Churches. The only missionary work for a while after the Reformation was that of the Jesuits [XAVIER], and even this zeal presently cooled and almost disappeared. Then a few missionaries of the Reformed faith appear. Thus in 1632 Peter Heyling went to Abyssinia; he translated the New Testament into Amharic for the use of the natives. The Dutch sent missionaries to the Malay Archipelago, to South India, and Ceylon. A college for missionaries was established by Waleus, of Leyden, in 1612. In 1604 Baron von Welz laboured as a missionary in Dutch Guiana, and by his writings tried to rouse a missionary spirit among the Luther-sans, but it was a long time before the claims of the heathen were considered by Reformed Christendom. The first mission of any importance was the Danish-Halle Mission, sent out at the beginning of the eighteenth century. The Danes had possessed the town and territory of Tranquebar since 1621, and in 1704 Dr. Lütken, one of the royal chaplains, persuaded King Frederick III. to give 9,000 marks (£450), with which he founded a college at Copenhagen to train missionaries to teach their Indian subjects. Soon after, two students from Halle, Bartholomew Ziegenbalg and Henry Püttschau, went out and reached Tran-quebar, July 9th, 1706, and started what is known as the "Danish-Halle Mission." The first church was opened under the name of "New Jerusalem," in May, 1707, and soon after Ziegenbalg published an account of his conference with the Brahmins, which excited great interest in Europe, and help was sent from the English Propagation Society and Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Still the work was confined to Tranquebar, and it was not till 1750, when Christian Schwartz, also a student at Halle, arrived in India, that the missions spread. He was the first to establish Christian vernacular schools, in which he was greatly helped by a converted native, Raja Serfojee. Schwartz died in 1798, having laboured in the country nearly fifty years. At the same time other missionaries had arrived. In 1758 Kiernander, a Swede, came to Calcutta, built a mission church, which still remains, and was the means of converting 200 heathens and 300 Romanist Charles Grant, a Scotchman, worked in Bengal and founded a Christian Society, which became the first centre of Evangelical missionary effort in Northern India. He also wrote a book called Observations on the State of the Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain, which did more than any other to rouse up a feeling of interest in India. The chief enemy to the work carried on was the East India Company, which, however, awoke the people by their extreme indifference. Missionaries were sent from Copenhagen to Greenland in 1721, and to Lapland about the same time. The Moravians sent missionaries to St. Thomas and to Greenland in 1732.

The latter country they established the settlement of Ny, or New, Hrnnhut. In 1734 they began a mission to the Red Indians of New York and Pennsylvania, and later Dav Zeisberger became the Moravian apostle to the Delawares. In 1742 a Church of converted Indians was formed at Shekonom. Previously to this the Moravians had, in 1736, sent a missionary from Hrnnhut to Sou America. And in 1736 they sent Geor Schmidt as a missionary to the Bushmen South Africa. The Moravians also sent missions to the blacks of Australia in 18 and to the Tibetans in 1856. The orthodox Lutherans stood aloof from all missionary efforts, and had it not been for the Pieti and Moravians, missionary work would during this period have ceased altogether. Meanwhile, in England the first real effort to evangelise the heathen was the establishment in 1649 of "the Corporation for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England." T was a Puritan undertaking, and the first Puritan missionary was John Elliot, who followed the Pilgrim Fathers to America in 1630, and for the remaining fifty-eight ye of his life laboured to convert the Peq tribe of the Iroquois Indians. At his des in 1696, there were 1,100 Indian conve carefully trained, and formed into six congredations, with a native ministry. Of missionaries who laboured in the same coun were the families of the Mayhews and Brainerds. Meanwhile, John and Cha Wesley and Whitfield had been attrac from England to the same enterprise. American War of Independence, however, a stop for a time to all missionary work, of the missionaries being obliged to return England. But in 1786 Dr. Coke was sent by Wesley to superintend the Wesle Methodist missions; he laboured till 1813. the following year, 1814, the General Wesle Methodist Missionary Society was established.

While the great body of the Refor Churches did at first next to nothing in mi-sionary work, the Church of Rome organ and sustained foreign missions on a magnifi scale. Thus Xavier in 1542 presided over the first Jesuit mission to Goa; he was a man of saintly character; his labours extended along the Coromandel Coast from Cape Comorin to Ceylon, to Southern India, the Chinese Archipelago, and Japan. At his death, in 1552, his converts in South India alone were numbered at 300,000. In 1622 Pope Gregory XV. founded at Rome the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith; its rich endowments were greatly increased by succeeding Popes; it is the wealthiest missionary institution in the world, and supports extensive missions in all parts. In 1633 and 1644 congregations of priests were formed in France for mission work abroad; their principal stations were at Siam, Anam, Tongking, and in Persia. The tactics of the Romanists, pretending to be pagans, in order to influence the natives, have recoiled on themselves; and missions which were once flourishing have in many cases ceased most to exist. The rivalry between the Jesuits and other orders of missionary priests so helped to destroy the chances of successful missionary work. Thus in Japan, where Xavier had been most successful, the native church was ruined after three generations, and reigners excluded from the country in 1637.

China, Matteo Ricci and two others began to labour in 1579. By living as a gentleman, he succeeded in making many converts. In 1630, Dominican and Franciscan missionaries arrived and exposed these tactics. In 1670 the converts to Rome numbered 138 Chinese priests and 404,530 native disciples; there were also 254 European priests labouring in the country. In Africa many missions were established along the coast. The Romanist missions were the result primarily of the expeditions sent out by the two tholeic countries of Spain and Portugal. It was not till the latter part of the eighteenth century that England began to awake its duties of evangelising the heathen. The chief credit is due to William Carey, a Baptist. Through his influence "The Parrish Baptist Society for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen" was formed in 182. In the following year Carey and omas, surgeon of an East Indian, landed Calcutta. After undergoing great privations, and translating the New Testament into Bengalee, he succeeded in making a few converts and forming a community, who resided sent out missions to West Africa. It was joined in 1799 by four more missionaries from England, and a settlement was made at Serampore, from whence missionaries were sent over Northern India and thence to Central Asia; the first Christian primary school in North India; the first college to train native ministers, and to teach educated Hindoos Christianity. Over thirty large mission stations sprang from Serampore. The Baptist Missionary Society has done much also in West Africa, where it has taken charge lately of the Congo Mission. The General Baptist Missionary Society, founded at Derby in 1816, maintains missions in Orissa and Ganjam, India.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts was founded in 1701 by royal charter, "for the religious instruction of the Queen's subjects beyond the seas, and for the propagation of the Gospel" "in the plantations, colonies, and factories of Great Britain." It is the oldest Missionary Society of the Church of England, and has given very great assistance in spreading the Gospel among the heathen. It maintains now 527 ordained missionaries, of whom 161 are in Asia, 129 in Africa, 20 in Australia and the Pacific, 216 in America and the West Indies, and one in Europe. The income of the Society is upwards of £100,000. There are also 1,404 catechists and lay teachers, mostly natives, and 300 students supported by the Society. But it must be noted here that this Society was intended for "the Queen's subjects." It must be acknowledged that the Church of England did not show the zeal which ought to have been shown on behalf of the heathen. The apostle, as already hinted, of England to the heathen was William Carey [q.v.]. When he made his proposals to the assembly at Northampton in 1786, there was not a single native of Britain engaged in the conversion of the heathen. Nor indeed was it much better in Europe generally; the only spark of missionary zeal discernible was in the Moravian settlement at Herrnhut. The grand work of Carey in India was followed by the foundation of the London Missionary Society in 1795. It was undeniably in its constitution, but is practically in the hands of the Congregationalists. Its average income exceeds £125,000, and that of the Wesleyan Missionary Society is about £160,000.

The Church Missionary Society was founded in 1799. It grew out of the Eclectic Society, which had been established for the discussion of religious questions by meetings of "Evangelical" clergymen of the Church of England and Dissenters. The income of the society has risen to over £200,000, and it is at present at the head of all the evangelistic organisations of Christendom. It sent missionaries to West Africa in 1804, to Madras in 1814, and to Calcutta in 1829. In Africa there are stations at Sierra Leone, the Niger, Victoria Nyanza, and Cairo. In Asia, stations are to be found in Palestine, Persia, India, Ceylon, Mauritius, China, and Japan; missionaries also work among the Maories of...
New Zealand, and in North-West America and the North Pacific. In all they maintain 220 European missionaries and teachers, and over 200 ordained native clergy. The name of Henry Martyn will long be remembered among missionaries of the present century.

In the Quarterly Review for July, 1886, is an article on modern missions, giving a vast amount of information. The tables there given show that the Church of England Missionary Societies have an annual income of £631,918; mixed societies of £283,850; Scotch, Irish, and Colonial, of £242,260; Nonconformist, of £253,770. Continental missionary societies are returned at £193,553, and American at £606,450. This classification, however, includes amongst “mixed” societies the London Society, which is entirely Non-conformist, while the Irish, Scotch, and Colonial societies are also Nonconformist. To these societies must be added the missions of the Church of Rome, under the care of the Propaganda. Upwards of a quarter of a million is poured into the treasury of missions by the flourishing society known as “L’Œuvre de la Propagation de la Foi,” whose head-quarters are at Lyons. The Roman Church was never more enterprising in the matter of missions than it is at present, and the organisation is very remarkable and complete. The divisions of Christendom are a terrible hindrance to missionary work; and how much remains to be done will be seen when it is stated that, calculating the population of the world at 1,440 millions, the Christians number 440 millions, leaving 1,000 millions still unconverted to Christianity.

Mitre.—The episcopal coronet or head-dress, which is always used, as distinctive, in episcopal armorial bearings. The name “mitre” was formerly given to the turban worn by Greek and Latin women, and also by Asiatic men. The cap worn by the Jewish high-priest, which is called in the Septuagint “mitra” or “ciradis,” seems to have been a sort of turban; but Josephus mentions a sort of triple crown which was worn over it. It has been thought by some that the well-known Episcopal mitre, or pointed cap with the top cloven or divided, was copied from the headdress of the Jewish high-priest; but this appears doubtful for reasons above stated. Others have traced in it, with perhaps more reason, a symbol of the “cloven tongues” which descended on the day of Pentecost. There is little doubt that the mitre was specially connected with the Roman Church and then gradually spread all over the Western Empire. Thus we hear that in 1049 Leo IX. placed the “Roman mitre” on the head of Eberhard, Archbishop of Treves; and afterward the mitre, “which is the sign of the Romans,” was granted to the Bishop of Hamburg. From that time it was widely used, and was worn by the cardinals till the cardinal’s hat was sanctioned in 1245. Mitres were worn in England at the coronations of Edward VI. and Elizabeth; but since then, with a few exceptions, they have fallen into comparative desuetude. In the Roman Church there are three sorts of mitres: the “precious mitre,” ornamented with jewels; the “mitre auraphrygiata” without precious stones, but made of gold cloth; and the “plain mitre,” white silk and linen. No mitre is used in the Greek Church.

Mixed Chalice.—Water mixed with the wine of the Holy Communion. It appears from one of St. Cyprian’s epistles, says Bingham, that the custom of the Church was to use wine mixed with water, and he pleads for both as necessary, from the command as an example of Christ; adding some other reasons why it should be so—as, that the water represented the people as the wine does the blood of Christ; and when in the cup the water is mingled with the wine, Christ and His people are united together. And so, he says, in sanctifying the cup of the Lord “water cannot be offered alone, as neither can the wine be offered alone; for if the wine offered by itself the blood of Christ begins to be without us, and if the water be alone, people begin to be without Christ.” The Third Council of Carthage so-much as to have the same opinion of the necessity of water when they determined that nothing be offered at the altar but what the Lord Himself commanded—that is, bread, and wine mingled with water. Numerous other writers and Councils refer to the same practice; yet, after all there is no express command for this in the institution, notwithstanding this general consent of the ancient Church, it is commonly determined by modern divines, as well the Roman as Protestant communion, that it is not essential to the Sacrament itself, as reader that is curious may find demonstrate in Vossius in his dissertation upon this subject [Bingham’s Orig. Eccel., book xv. chap. ii. §

Modalists.—Another name for Saliens. Those who make the distinction between the Persons of the Trinity to consist me in the mode of manifestation. [Sabelian]

Moderates. [Scotland, Church of]

Moderator.—The name given to presiding officer at the General Assembly Kirk Sessions, and other Presbyterian courts. On the introduction of episcopacy into England, perpetual moderators were proposed presbyteries.

Moffat, Robert, D.D., the great African missionary, was born on Dec. 21st, 1796, at Ormistan, East Lothian. He first went to sea, but soon gave that up and became a gardener. In 1815, after attending a missionary meeting at Warrington, he obtained his parents’ consent to take work with the London Missionary Society, and ordained at Surrey Chapel in October, 1816, with John Williams, the "Martyr of Erronanga," and others. He at once started for South Africa, and took up his abode at Afri cander's Knoll. After two years he left for Griquatown, and in 1819 married Miss Mary Smith, who greatly helped on his missionary efforts. He afterwards spent most of his time, except for occasional trips to Cape Town on account of Mrs. Moffat's health, among the Bechuanas and Kurumans, translating St. Luke's Gospel and other portions of Scripture into Bechuana. One of his daughters married David Livingstone. Though he went to Africa under the London Missionary Society, Dr. Moffat also worked on behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society, of which, in 1882, he became vice-president. He returned to England in 1870 on account of his wife's health, but she died in London in January, 1871. In the next year Dr. Moffat was made a D.D. by the University of Edin gburgh, and in 1873 received a testimonial of £5,800 as a mark of the public appreciation of his labours. Another testimonial was the foun dation of the Moffat Institution at Boshung for the training of Bechuanas as native pastors. Some years before his death he retired to Hildenborough, near Tunbridge Vells, where he devoted himself to the transla tion of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress into Bechuana. He died on August 9th, 1883, in his eighty-seventh year.

Möhler, JOHANN ADAM, one of the greatest modern polemical Roman Catholic riters, was born at Igersheim in Wurttem erg, May 6th, 1796. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was ordained priest in 1819, and for a short time acted as missionary; but in 1820 returned to his university as Classical tutor, and was finally chosen as Theological professor. Here he wrote most of his works, the first being a treatise On the Unity of the church, followed in 1827 by Athanasius the veat and the Church of his Time. His lec tures were always crowded, many Protestants figging often among his auditors. His best known work is Symbolism, or the Doctrinal Differences between Catholics and Protestants, translated into English by J. R. Robertson in 1843, in which Romanism is accused and Protestantism is caricatured; ttht Reformation is acknowledged to have begun from purely religious motives. He was answered by several Protestants, the chief work on the subject is Dr. F. Baur's Difference between Catholicism and Protestantism; to which Möhler replied Further Researches into the Doctrinal Differences of Catholics and Protestants. He died at Munich on April 21st, 1838. Möhler was also the author of a Church history, and be seriously considered as one of the most acute philosophical controversialists.

Molina, Louis.—A celebrated Spanish Jesuit [b. 1535, d. 1600], for twenty years Divinity Lecturer in the University of Evora in Portugal. Molina's principal works are A Commentary on St. Thomas, On Justice and Right, and the celebrated treatise on the Consistency of Grace and Free Will, of which some account will be found in the article on Jansenists.

Molinos, Miguel de.—A Spanish priest, born at Saragossa, 1640, of a noble family in Aragon. He was patronised by the Pope and Cardinals on account of his learning and theology, and published in 1676 a Guia Spirituale, and shortly afterwards a Breve Trattato della Costituzione Comunione. In these works he put forth a new and startling theory, namely, that men ought to practise entire abnegation of self, so as to bring themselves into close union with God, after which they should remain in quietness of mind, with no further care for their bodies. The theory took the name of Quietism, and held much the same place in Spain as Jansenism held at the same time in France, and Pietism in Germany. It gained many supporters, but was looked upon with deep suspicion by the Jesuits, who foresaw a decline of the power of the Church, when outward symbols should be set aside, and the worship of the Church regarded as secondary to private devotion. The matter was brought before the Inquisition, who at first acquitted Molinos; but Louis XV. urged the Pope to interfere, and the Inquisition was again re tained to examine into the case. This time the doctrines were condemned, in Aug., 1687. The writings of Molinos were confiscated, and himself arrested and sentenced to be burned; but the sentence was afterwards commuted to imprisonment for life, in consequence, it has been said, of his recantation. A Bull was issued against him in the same year by Pope Innocent XI., who had formerly been his patron. He died at Rome, in the dungeon of the Inquisition, Dec. 28th, 1697.

Mollah.—A Mahometan Doctor of the Law, and, as such, possessed both of spiritual and civil authority; an expounder of the Koran, and also a judge in civil and criminal cases.

Monarchians.—Heretics who deny the distinction of Persons in the Divine Nature. The term comes from the Gr. monarchia: monos, "alone," and archo, "to govern," literally, the government of a single-individual. The heresy of the Monarchians may be traced in the very earliest times of Christianity; they are mentioned by Tertullian. The op posite views to be found among them involved them in more violent disputes with each other than with the Church, but they all agreed with regard to what was conveyed by this term of Monarchianism—a zeal to preserve the unity of the consciousness of God, which made them unwilling to acknowledge any other Divine Being than the one God, the Father. Either they absolutely rejected the doctrine of the Logos, or they understood by the Logos simply a Divine energy, the Divine wisdom or reason, which illuminates the souls of the pious. There were amongst them two great classes. With the one class, the dialectical, critical faculty of the understanding was supreme; with the other, the practical element and Christian feeling predominated. While the first class saw nothing in Christ but His human nature, and kept the Divine element entirely out of sight, the others could see nothing but the Godhead, and wholly suppressed or overlooked the human element. Accounts of the various sects included under the comprehensive term of Monarchians, will be found under their respective heads, viz., ALQGI, ARTEMONTIES, PATRIPASSIANS, SABELLIANS, PAUL OF SAMOSATA, THEODOTIANS.

Monasticism. — A monastery may be defined as a house of religious retirement or seclusion. The word is an English form of the Greek word monastērion, "a secluded dwelling." The popular form of the word was "monster," as in Westminster or Newminster.

As Christian institutions, monasteries took their rise from the days of persecution. In the Decian persecution [A.D. 250–3], and again in that of Diocletian [A.D. 305–13], many Christians took refuge in the deserts, where they were obliged to lead lives of great privation. Some of them became so attached to such a kind of life, that they still continued to pursue it after the necessity for doing so had passed away. These gradually acquired distinctive names, some being called Ascetics [Gr. astēlai], "men training, or exercising, or disciplining themselves." As St. Paul says, "Heroin do I exercise myself" [Gr. en touto de askō]. Others went by the name of ΑΝΧΟΡΙΤΕΣ [Gr. anachôrētai], "men who had retired from the world;" while others again were named HERMITS [Gr. erēmitai], "men of the desert."

After persecution had ceased, large numbers of the hermits formed societies for the purpose of living in common, calling themselves by the name of Cenobites [from two Greek words, κοινός, "common," and bios, "life"], and thus were formed the first actual monasteries among Christians. They were of a simple and voluntary character at first, but when St. Basil [b. 329, d. 379] put them into a more definite form, he probably introduced the practice of vows, which in early times were binding upon the monks as long as they resided in the monastery, but permitted them to leave and give up the monastic life when they pleased.

It was by St. Athanasius, the friend of St. Antony, that the system was introduced into Europe [about A.D. 340]; and after his day it made great progress under Augustine, Gregory of Tours, and others of a similar character, and by them monasticism was consolidated into a much better and more practical form than that of which it had assumed in the East.

Formerly the monks were all laymen. Not only were monks prohibited the priesthood, but, as appears from the letters of St. Gregory, priests were expressly prohibited from becoming monks. Pope Siricius was the first who called them to the clericate, on occasion of some great scarcity of priests that the Church was then supposed to labour under, and since that time the priesthood was usually united with the monastic profession.

Towards the close of the fifth century, lay monks, who had formerly lived only for themselves in solitary retreats, found themselves in a condition to claim an eminence in the Christian community. The fame of the sanctity was so great that bishops and priests were often chosen out of their order, and the learning made them useful to the bishops in combating heresies, chiefly in the great Nestorian controversy; but many abusing their authority, it was ordered at the Council of Chalcedon that monks should be wholly unlearned, and should build no monastery without their leave, and should be removed from ecclesiastical employments, except called thereto by their bishops. From this jurisdiction they were exempted by the Pope of the seventh century, and in return they voted themselves wholly to advance interest and maintain the dignity of Bishop of Rome. This immunity in authority was a fruitful source of licentiousness and disorder, and occasioned greater part of the vices with which they were afterwards charged. In the eighth century the monastic discipline was greatly relaxed both in the East and West; all efforts to restore it were inefficient. Nevertheless, this kind of institution was the highest esteem, and nothing could equal the veneration paid in the ninth century, those who thus retired from the world; it was called to Court and employed in affairs of the greatest moment. At the Lateran Council in 1215, however, a decree was passed by the advice of Innocent III preventing any new monastic institutions.

The monastic system in its integrity is best represented by the BENEDICTINE MONKS [q.v.]. A monastery of this chara... own, giving up all for the use of the society in general. There cannot be a doubt that whatever evils grew up in the monastic system, to it our country was indebted while it lasted for great benefits, spiritual and temporal. Churches and parishes were founded by the monks, and supplied by them with clergy when they could not be supplied in any other way. They were the schoolmasters, and the only ones, of their neighbourhood, for both rich and poor, a school being as commonly a part of a monastery as it is in our lay of a parish. They copied out the Bible, the devotional books of their times, the classics, and other works with great care and skill. They wrote many books, religious and secular, of great value. They were, in fact, during the Middle Ages, the barrier by which ignorance and barbarism were kept out of our country, when no other class of people would have had the inclination or the power to exclude them. Nor must it be forgotten that our greatest engineering and architectural works were undertaken by them, and most frequently at their own expense; for they were the great bridge-builders and the great architects of their age; and so diligent and skilful were they in drainage, that it became common complaint, after their dissolution, that the Fen countries were relapsing into a state of ruin, such as they had not been in since the monks had first taken possession of Peterborough, Thorney, Ramsey, Ely, and her such districts, and brought them under cultivation.

Monastery of the Clergy.—The direction of St. Paul to Timothy that bishops and deacons should be "husbands of one wife" admitted of and received two interpretations, and gave rise to a different usage in different Churches. Some regarded it as excluding from ordination those who had married twice; others modified this view by confining the prohibition to the case of those who had married twice after their baptism; while others, again, thought that those only were excluded who practised polygamy. The same variety of interpretations obtained with regard to the condition that the widows recognised on the Church roll should have been the wives of one man.

Monogram.—A symbol representing any name; in an ecclesiastical sense, the abbreviation of the name Jesus Christ. Such are X (the Greek ε), to which is sometimes added P (R) thus, and sometimes the final letter T, which is also regarded as a symbol of His death. Another monogram is Ω, i.e. "Alpha and Omega," which finds its explanation in Rev. 1. [See I. H. S.]

Monophysites [from monos, "alone," and physis, "nature".]—A general name given to all those sects which acknowledge only one nature in Christ. Such were the EUTYCHIANS [q.v.], condemned at the Council of Chalcedon in 451. The decrees of that Council, however, were fiercely opposed by the followers of Cyril, Patriarch of Alexandria, who declared that the Council had reinstated the Nestorian heresy. Theodosius, a fanatical monk, spread the seeds of discord in Palestine, and procured the banishment of Juvenalis, Bishop of Jerusalem, and his own election for a time to that dignity. In Alexandria Proterius was nominated Patriarch in the room of the deposed Dioscurus, and a great schism arose, which was only quelled by military force. The Monophysite party was headed by the Presbyter Timotheus Ailurus, and on the death of the Emperor Marcian, he was appointed Patriarch. The Emperor Leo appealed to Pope Leo the Great as to the legitimacy of the election of Ailurus, and in 460 he was banished to Cherson; but Timotheus Salpachiolus, a neutral person, was appointed in his place. In Antioch Petrus Fullensis was supported by Zenus, son-in-law and successor to the Emperor, and when in 476 Basiliscus expelled Zeno, and secured the imperial throne to himself, the Monophysites became the ruling party in the East. In 477 Zeno once more made himself master of the Empire, and to settle the manifold dissensions which were disturbing Church and State, he, in 482, offered to the disputants the formula of concord called the Henoticon [q.v.]. For a moment it seemed successful. Petrus Mongus, the Patriarch of Alexandria, accepted it, and the Monophysites who had looked on him as their leader, separated themselves from him, and having no principal leader they were designated the headless sect, Acephali. On the other hand the conviction grew upon the Roman Pope that the Henoticon was really in favour of the Monophysites, and then the schism grew worse than ever. Instead of two parties, there were now four—the zealots on both sides, and the moderates of the two parties who accepted the compromise. The Roman Church stigmatised the ruling party of the Oriental Church as heretical; and a schism between the Eastern and Western Churches was the consequence. In 491 Zeno died, and was succeeded by Anastasius, whose partiality for the Monophysites caused riots and bloodshed at Constantinople. Then two men of vigorous activity took the lead of the Monophysites. One of these was Xenayas, a Persian, whose name was changed into the Greek form Philoxenas, and who is best known as the promoter of the Philoxenian Syriac translation of the New Testament. The other was Severus, a learned monk of Palestine, who had been made Patriarch of Antioch, and was deposed about 520. Severus held peculiar views regarding the united wills in the united natures, and thus prepared the way for the opinions of the Monothelites [q.v.]. One of his deacons, Themistius, invented the tenet of the Agnôtēs, that the human soul in Christ was like ours in everything, even in ignorânce. Anastasius had been succeeded by Justin in 518, who was a tool in the hands of his nephew Justinian, and was persuaded by his chief ministers to depose all the Monophysite clergy. Severus fled to Egypt, where his party was strong, and here he headed that portion called the Pâtharôlatrōn or Corrupticole, who maintained that Christ's human nature was corruptible, all qualities of human nature being retained in our Lord after His Incarnation, though so incorporated with the Divine nature as to have no longer any identity of their own.

Justinian, who became emperor in 527, meant to be orthodox, but his wife Theodora, who was attached to Monophysitism, successfully plotted for the advantage of that party, moved by hatred of Roman ascendency. Her agent in these schemes was Anthimus, who had once been a bishop in Pontus, and who had resigned under pretext of living a more Christian life as a monk; he came to Constantinople, drew around him all the most important men of the Monophysite party, amongst them Severus, and was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 535. Justinian had no idea that his bishop was unorthodox till later, when the Pope Agapetus visited Constantinople, and a complaint was brought against Anthimus by the dissatisfied clergy, which ended in his deposition and the election of Mennas to the patriarchate. Agapetus died the following year, and Theodora with Antonina, wife of the General Belisarius, persuaded that a deacon named Vigilius, who had accompanied him to Constantinople, should be his successor on condition of joining to the Monophysite party. Vigilius, however, was afraid of committing himself. While open professing to submit to Chalcedon, he secret wrote letters of sympathy to Anthimus, that Theodora could not effect much. She then endeavoured to gain her point by citing quarrels amongst the opponents in Monophysitism; she represented to Justini that the chief objection of the Monophys to the Council of Chaldex was that it had approved of the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas of Edessa, who favoured Nestorianism; and that if the writings were condemned, an important obstacle would be removed to the recognition of the Council of Chalcedon, and that object he was striving for would be secured, the reuniting of the Monophysites the dominant Church. The result was that Justinian in 544 issued an edict condemning the writings of the three obnoxious writers above-named, which were known under title of "The Three Chapters." Now it must be confessed that these writings had been at peace with the divines of Chalcedon, the condemnation of their writings was regarded as a part condemnation of that Council, and the Church long refused acquiescence, and so or eight years were spent in unfruitful strivings. Mennas, the Patriarch of Constantinople, and others, agreed in condemning the three articles, but Justinian could not as he wished with the Bishops of Illyria North Africa. Vigilius thus encouraged, fused to subscribe, and in 551 was obliged to abscond. Then it was determined the General Council for the determination of dispute should be assembled at Constantin in 553, under the Patriarch Eutychius, who succeeded Mennas; Vigilius was invited to take part in this Council, but declined, and Council therefore decided according to the imperial edict. Several bishops of Illyria North Africa were deposed and banished. Still the object sought of reconciling Monophysites to the dominant party was not attained, and the unstable character of the Roman Bishop caused a schism in the Western Church, the Churches of Istria and others renouncing fellowship with the Roman Church.
A party among the Monophysites, who followed the doctrines of Xenayas and of Julian, Bishop of Halicarnassus, derived, as a consequence from the union of the Deity and humanity in one nature in Christ, the proposition that the body of Christ, even during His earthly life, was not subjected, by any necessity of nature, to wants such as hunger, thirst, and pain; but that by a free determination of His own will, He subjected Himself to all these things for the salvation of man: which view went under the name of APHTHARTODOCETISM [q.v.]. To this branch Justinian allied himself towards the close of his reign, and was preparing to make it a law when he died, in 565. The Alexandrian section of the Aphthartodociæ were called GIANTÆ from their leader Gaianus, whom they made Patriarch in opposition to Theodosius, who had been appointed by the Emperor.

In Egypt the Monophysite party continued to exercise an important influence. The sect was revived in the sixth century by Jacob baradecus, a monk of Nisibis, who became Bishop of Edessa, and at his death he left in a most flourishing state in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and other countries. The Syrian Monophysites were called from him Jacobites [q.v.]. They still exist in Egypt under the name of Copts, and also in Armenia. From the eleventh century downwards, all the patriarchs of the Monophysites have taken the name Ignatius, to show that they are the lineal successors of Ignatius, who was Bishop of Antioch in the first century, and consequently the lawful Patriarch of Antioch. In the fourteenth century a small body of Asiatic Monophysites joined the Church of Rome; but the Africans have resisted all attempts to bring them under the Papal yoke.

Monothelism.—The word implies the belief in, and worship of, one God, as distinguished from the worship of many gods, or polytheism. Canon Rawlinson has shown that in very early times monothestic beliefs prevailed; but they seem to have been more vague—the sense of some mighty power dwelling in nature, perhaps analogous to the real Spirit of the Indians of North America; however this may be, the religion of heathen people in ancient (and modern) times appears to be polytheistic, or to have become so at the beginning of history. There are now three great monothestic religions: Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. All agree that God has spoken to man "at sundry times and in divers manners"; that He has thus communicated a special knowledge of His and will to the Patriarchs, to Moses and the Prophets. At this point Judaism ends. Christians add that God perfected this revelation of Himself in the Divine Person of Jesus Christ. Mohammedans regard Christ as a teacher sent from God, but revere the Prophet of Mecca as the bearer to mankind of the last and most precious disclosures of the Divine Will. It will thus be seen that these monothestic religions depend on special revelations from God—that to the Jews, of the unity of the Godhead, being the starting point of all; for Mohammedanism doubtless borrowed its strict belief in one God from the Jews.

Monothelites.—This heretical sect arose in the Eastern Church in the seventh century, through a desire to bring the doctrines of the Monophysites [q.v.] into harmony with the orthodox doctrines of the Church. The Emperor Heraclius was assured by one Paul, a man of great influence among the Armenian Monophysites, that the peace of the Church might be restored by the reaffirmation of the decrees of Chalcedon with the addition of the proposition that after the union of the two natures, there was in Jesus but one will and one operation, which was partly Human and partly Divine. Cyrus, whom Heraclius had raised from the Bishopric of Phasis to the Patriarchate of Alexandria, assembled a Synod at Alexandria in 633, whereat this doctrine was affirmed, and, in consequence, vast numbers of the Eutychians became reconciled to the Church. The Patriarch of Jerusalem opposed, and appealed to the Bishop of Rome, Honorius, who declared in favour of the Monothelite doctrine. In 639 Heraclius issued his Ecphesis, or "exposition of the faith." It was accepted by the Eastern Church, but condemned by Pope John IV., successor of Honorius. This was followed by the "Type," issued by the Emperor Constans II., forbidding all controversy concerning the Will of Christ. But both parties were too embittered now to keep silence, and a Council called by Pope Martin in 649 condemned the heresy, heretics, and both edicts together—an act which caused the Emperor to condemn Pope Martin to death, though the sentence was commuted to banishment to Cherson. The Monothelite doctrine was finally condemned at the Sixth Lateran Council at Constantinople [680–1], and it was decided that Christ has "two natural wills and two natural operations, without division, without conversion or change, with nothing like antagonism or confusion," but that the Human will is subject to the Divine. Anathemas were also pronounced on the leaders of the heresy, and repeated for three centuries by the successors of Pope Honorius.

Monsell, Harriet, sister-in-law of John S. B. Monsell, died Easter Day, 1883. She was the daughter of Sir Edward O’Brien, of Dromoland, in Ireland, and married the Rev. Charles Monsell. On her widowhood in 1850 she resolved to give herself up to the work of the Church; she accordingly resided at Clewer, and gave her active help in the House of Mercy which the Rev. T. T. Carter had originated in 1849. She lived with an invalid.

sister in Windsor, and when she went to and fro to the old house which had been purchased for the House of Mercy, there was not even the nucleus of a sisterhood; but no more happy association of characters can be imagined for the creation of a work like the sisterhood of St. John the Baptist at Clewer than Harriet Monsell's and Mr. Carter's. She was neither literary, scholarlike, imaginative, nor critical; but hers was the brightest and gayest of natures, with a quick, clear knowledge of men and manners, and the sharpest common sense. Her sympathy was a vast power. A community larger than most colleges, having within the walls of the mother house almost an equal number of female penitents, with about twenty other centres of work in hospitals, schools, orphanages, penitentiaries, and missions, besides a large number of associates of both sexes,—the bare enumeration of these represents a sphere adequate to the capacity of the widest sympathy. But quite outside all these demands on the Mother Superior of a "religious house," Harriet Monsell was the adviser and comforter of numerous friends; no one could be said to be more accessible than "the Mother of Clewer." She was one of the most hopeful women in the world. With a consciousness that she was dead against the stream of public opinion during twenty-five years of a notorious work, having to overtake and overpass prejudice at every stroke, committed to a venture of great audacity, insisting on the creation and extension of a work absolutely new in the English Church, with no optimistic and sentimental ignoring of hard and ugly facts,—she lived by hope, and the cheerfulness of her life was the beautiful product of this hopefulness of her soul. Seventy sisters followed their foundress to her grave.

Monsell, John S. B. [b. 1811, d. 1875], sacred poet, born in Ireland and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, was examining chaplain to Bishop Mant, and became Vicar of Egham, Surrey, in 1853, and Rector of St. Nicholas, Guildford, in 1870. His poems are very sweet and devout, and some of his hymns are very popular.

Monstrance or Expository. — The vessel in the Roman Church in which the Sacrament is exposed to the gaze of the faithful on solemn occasions. The vessel is usually of gold or silver, with a tall stand, on which is a circle of crystal through which the host is visible, and this is surrounded by rays to represent the sun.

Montalembert, Charles Forges, Count de [b. 1810, d. 1870].—A devout lay writer of great influence of the Roman Church. He was born in England, but came of an ancient family of Poitou; his father was for some time French minister in the Court of Sweden; his mother was Scotch. He was chiefly educated in the University of Paris but spent a good deal of his youth in Sweden. While quite a young man he formed an intimate acquaintance with the Abbé Lamennais, then the ardent advocate of an alliance between Catholicism and Democracy and they started as their organ a journal called the Avenir. They entered on a fierce contest with the University of Paris, denounced its monopoly of education, and, to prove the superiority of their system, Montalembert, in conjunction with Lacordaire opened a "free school" without the licence of the authorities, for which he was prosecuted. In 1835 he was censured by Pope Gregory XVI. for advocating the union of Catholicism and Democracy, and two years later was again in collision with the Government of the day on the question of religious liberty, and made his three famous speeches in the Chamber of Peers—on the Liberty of the Church, the Liberty of Instruction, and the Liberty of the Monastic Orders. On this occasion he declared himself the defender of the Society of Jesus. In 1845 he founded the Committee of Religious Associates, and in 1848 after the Revolution was accomplished, he became a member of Louis Napoleon's Legislature, and received the Legion of Honour. At this period he was constantly in collision with Victor Hugo. His adhesion to the Bonapartists did not long endure, for, indignant at the decree of 1851 confiscating the property of the Orleans Princes, he detached himself from the Government, and from the time till his death was a bitter opponent of the Imperialists. In 1851 he was elected a member of the French Academy. In 1853 his parliamentary career came to a close and the following year he was sentenced to a fine and imprisonment for an article published in the Correspondant (a monthly periodical, the organ of the Liberal Catholic party) referring to the Indian debate in the English Parliament, and satirising the institutions of France. The Emperor remitted the penalties, much to the indignation of the accused, who professed to consider himself dishonoured by this course, and he soon brought on himself a new prosecution for an article in the same periodical on the Imperial policy towards the Pope.

Montalembert was a great orator; beside the speeches mentioned above, he made two specially famous, on the murder of the Pope's minister Rossi and on the veto proprius of the Pope. He spoke and wrote English perfectly, and had an accurate acquaintance with English literature. A keen to his political views may be found in admiration of Edmund Burke; he had great sympathies with Ireland and Poland. He was best known in England as a brilliant writer. His first important work was a Life of St. Elizabeth of Hungary, published in 1834, and his latest, and most important, T.
Montes of the West. One of his minor productions, The Political Future of England 1856], excited much interest and some controversy on this side of the Channel. He was also the author of Vie IX. et Lord Palmerston [1856]; a pamphlet on Poland, Une Nation en Deuil [1861]; a biographical sketch of Lacroix; the pamphlet L'Eglise libre dans l'Etat libre; le Pape et la Pologne, besides divers articles in the Encyclopédie Catholique and the Correspondant. He died March 5th, 1870, at his residence in Paris.

Montanists. [MONTANUS.]

Montanus, the founder of the sect of the montanists, was born at Ardana, a town of Fysia, on the borders of Phrygia, whence the sect was frequently called the Phrygian or atrophycian. He is said to have been originally a priest of Cybele. He began to teach about A.D. 170 that he was the inspired instrument through whom the Paraclete or Comforter was to supplement the teaching of the Apostles, and communicate a further revelation. Two wealthy Phrygian women, Maximilla and Priscilla, also professed to be inspired in like manner, and the words let fall by them in their fits of frenzy were reverently received by their followers.

Councils of Asiatic bishops were held to consider these pretensions, at which the montanists were condemned and excommunicated, and their leader characterised as possessed with a devil. Many of the Western churches also wrote condemning them; but, nevertheless, the heresy spread over many parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe. The "revelations" of Montanus did not set the main articles of the Christian Faith in question; they were chiefly concerned with points of discipline. He taught that it was unlawful to admit to absolution those who were guilty of serious crimes after baptism, even though they should repent; that flight during persecution was unlawful; that second marriages were adulterous; that it was unlawful for rationalists to be present at the games of the circus or amphitheatre, or to bear arms in the cause of their country. He enforced rigid rules, and increased the number of fasts, as well as making the manner of observance more severe. He held the doctrine of the millennium, and pointed out the ruined city of Phrygia as the site of the New Jerusalem. The idea underlying his teaching, the speedy advent of Christ and the consummation of all things, He held the doctrine of the millennium, and pointed out the ruined city of Phrygia as the site of the New Jerusalem. The idea underlying his teaching, the speedy advent of Christ and the consummation of all things, was the speedy advent of Christ and the consummation of all things.

Monte Carlo. —A celebrated monastery built on a mountain of the same name, which overhangs the town of San-Germaino, between fifty and sixty miles north-west of Naples. This monastery was founded by St. Benedict in 529. Towards the end of the sixth century it was destroyed by the Lombards, and the monks took refuge in Rome, where Pope Gregory gave them St. Andrew's Church. In 729 the monastery was restored, but in the ninth century it was plundered by the Saracens, and then finally it was re-established towards the close of the tenth century. It was one of the very richest of the Benedictine establishments, having four bishoprics and many livings attached to it, besides a great deal of landed property, which brought in enormous revenues. Its library contained many treasures, and from its printing press some important works have issued, its monks being noted for their learning. The medical school, founded by Abbot Bertharius in the ninth century, had a great reputation. The buildings suffered much from an earthquake in 1349. The monastery was secularised in 1866.

Montenegrin Church. —A sect of the Greek Church in the south of Albania. It is under the Most Holy See of Rome, but differs from the Oriental Church in rejecting images, crucifixes, and pictures.

Montaufon, Bernard de. —A Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur and a great antiquarian [b. in Languedoc, Jan. 17th, 1655, d. at St. Germain-des-Prés, Paris, 1741]. He entered the military profession, but on the death of his parents left the service, and in 1675 entered the Congregation of St. Maur. In 1688 he, together with the Fathers Anthony Pouget and James Lopin, published a collection of Greek remains, Analecta Graecae; also a tract upon the history of Judith [1690] and a new edition of the works of St. Athanasius in Latin and Greek [1697]. In 1698 he started for Italy, where he collected many antiquities and consulted the manuscripts in the Italian libraries, and, on his return three years after, published an account of his experiences in the Diarium Italicum. Among his other works are two volumes of the Greek Fathers never before printed, with a Latin translation and notes [1706]; the Palaeographia Graecae, a tract concerning the original form and progress of the Greek alphabet [1708]; a new edition of the works of Origen and St. Chrysostom, and a French translation of Philo's Contemplative Life, with notes to prove that the Therapeutae were Christians.

Montgomery, James [b. 1771, d. 1854]. —Religious poet. He was the son of Irish parents, but born at Irvine in Ayrshire. His father was a Moravian preacher, and, at seven years of age, James was sent to the Moravian school at Fulneck, near Leeds, with the object of his ultimate training.
for the ministry. But he was unable to fix his mind to the severer studies, and a poetic instinct developed in him; he read by stealth Milton and Cowper, and gave much of his time to composing hymns. His teachers declared him dull and incompetent to carry out the studies of the place; he was therefore taken from school and apprenticed to a baker at Mirfield, near Fulneck, but ran away when sixteen years old. In 1789 he was employed by Mr. Gales of Sheffield, and eventually he became editor and proprietor of the Sheffield Iris. He was twice imprisoned on account of publishing some political articles. In 1806 he published his poem The Wanderer of Switzerland, and, taking a great interest in the emancipation of the slaves, he wrote in 1809 a poem on this subject called The West Indies. The World before the Flood was published in 1812. After this time his life became a distinctly religious one; he wrote many hymns and minor poems, which were collected and published in 1851, and another volume called Original Hymns, etc., in 1853.

Montgomery, Robert, was born at Bath in 1807. Nothing is known of his boyhood, but he appeared before the world as an author at an early age. In 1828 he published The Omnipresence of the Deity, a poem which was so popular that it passed through eight editions in as many months. In 1830 he entered at Lincoln College, Oxford, and was ordained five years afterwards. From that time till 1842 he produced no literary work. He became curate of Whittington in Shropshire for a few months, and then went to Percy Street Chapel, London. In 1838 he removed to St. Jude's Episcopal Chapel in Glasgow; but his preaching raised so much controversy that, after four years, he returned to London. He died in 1855. His works were severely censured by Macaulay, but commended by Southey. Among them the most famous, after The Omnipresence of the Deity, are Satan, The Messiah, A Vision of Heaven, A Vision of Hell, Lyra Christiana, The Angel of Life, etc.

Monumental Brasses. [Brasses.]

Monuments of the Dead.—A monument, from the Latin moneo, "I remind," is a structure intended to keep some remarkable person in memory. Thus among the religious monuments may be reckoned memorial churches, windows, altars, schools, etc.; but those which are usually understood by the name are the tablets put up on the walls of churches or raised in the cemeteries.

The earliest monuments now extant in England seem to date from the Norman Conquest. The form is often that of a stone sarcophagus, prism-shaped, to preserve them from the weather, as they were in the open air and without inscription. They were first ornamented about the year 1160. Carvings appeared on them, armorial bearings, the insignia of those to whose memory they were raised, etc., and as the sculpture improved, the sloping roofs disappeared, so that in the thirteenth century the monuments were flat. Soon the human figures were added with their insignia and in full dress, so that antiquaries often ascertain the costume of the times from the monuments. In the fifteenth century skeletons in shrrouds were first used and these were succeeded by corpses with the head bound up and the feet tied. Also religious allegories were more and more used such as pictures of the soul of the dying carried to heaven by angels, etc. The tombs gradually rose in height, and arches were raised over them and canopies to protect them from the weather, till it became the custom to place them inside churches. It was found however, that they took up too much room so in the fifteenth century the custom began of annexing chapels to churches to contain the monuments. The custom of fixing memorial tablets against the wall in order to gain more room, did not come into use till after the Reformation.

With regard to the inscriptions, as has been said, the first monuments have none. Up to the twelfth century the churchyard epitaphs were written in Latin. Then French was used written in Lombardic characters, till the middle of the fourteenth century; from that time English and Latin have been used.

Moralities.—A form of religious drama in which allegorical representations of vice and virtues took the place of biblical characters. They were invented in France at the beginning of the fifteenth century, and found much favour in England, but seldom occurred in Germany.

Moral Law is distinguished from [1] Natural and [2] Judicial Law. By the form we mean the Laws of Nature, which we are compelled by necessity to obey, seeing that they are out of our control. Judicial Law made by a State, the infraction of which involves penalties ordained by that State, to which a man may be said to be bound; the fear of those penalties only, seeing that he may, in his conscience, doubt whether the law is, in the abstract, right. Thus a man who pays his tithe or poor rate, or refrains from his business on Sundays, may consider, in all these cases, that the law ought to be altered; but, so long as it is not, he has no choice but to obey. But Moral Law begins with the human will; does not say to it, "Y, must recognise the necessity of obedience, whether you agree with the commands not," but says instead, "Obey because obedience is right in itself." The moment external compulsion comes in, Moral Law ceases to be of effect. The basis of Moral Law then, is religion, the sense in the soul of Deity towards its Creator, and the purpose of which He created it. And the enemy of moral Law is selfishness. Mere self-seeking may assume many forms, without making a man absolutely repulsive as a hardened ruffian, or apparently contemptible as one living only for enjoyment and idleness; but its essence is the same, and it is opposed to the idea of duty.

On the other hand, the man who recognises that he is under Moral Law, recognises that he is a member of a great community; that he is sinful, but can be holy; is weak, but can find strength; can assert the Divine element in himself by taking voluntary service under him who made him, by crying to the Creator of the whole universe, "I am Thine, O save me, for I do not forget Thy commandments." he recognition that all created things, from the lowest organism upwards, fulfil their part, an incentive to him to fulfil his, and therefore Moral Law comes to him with an authority which the mere law of the land could not have, bidding him be pure and gentle, truthful and high-minded, brave and able, courteous and generous, dutiful and useful, through Jesus Christ, whose very appearance this world was in order that He "might fulfil all righteousness."

Moral Philosophy. — Philosophy is etymologically the love of wisdom ["philein, to love"]; sophia, "wisdom"). When men search after knowledge among the things which are seen, we call it physics ["physius, nature"]; when they recognise that this inquiry must be extended beyond these things, in search of a basis which is greater than this visible world, such inquiry becomes metaphysical ["meta, beyond"].

And when this inquiry leads to the confession that a truth is laid upon us by what we learn, and at wisdom involves obedience to what is right, we come to Moral Philosophy. One of oldest books in the world propounds this perfectly exact language in the question: Where shall wisdom be found, and where is a place of understanding?" [Job xxviii. 12.] it pronounces such a quest of more importance than the search for silver and gold. The book of Proverbs declares that it is written to promote that search: thus we have a brew philosophy in the Old Testament. Sultaneously the like inquiry was going on over the heathen world, and Chinese, Hindu, and Persian philosophies have come down to us as well as Jewish and European. Greek philosophy is historically divided into three periods—that before and that after Socrates. To the first period belong Thales, Pythagoras, Zeno, of all of whom but imperfect records remain; to the second belong the great names of Plato and Aristotle. The Greek conception of Deity was eminently that of the "counsellor." The man was that of the "ruler," and Roman holosophy was more mundane than the Greek, less transcendental. One of the great excellencies of the philosophic poet Lucretius is his deep earnestness of purpose; but the thoughts as well as the style of Roman literature largely imitated the Greek.

In the first two centuries of Christianity lived two noble heathen moralists, Seneca and M. Aurelius. The seat of the first Christian School of Philosophy was Alexandria, and it has a splendid roll of names to show, of which Clement of Alexandria is the greatest. Clement; Neo Platonists. In the fourth century we have Athanasius, and a little later Augustine; in the fifth, Boethius; in the sixth, Pope Gregory the Great; he may be said to close the first period of Christian philosophy. The second begins with the time of Charlemagne. In the first ages the great controversies had been on the Nature of God. Then began those on the subject, first, of Predestination and Freewill; then on the Sacraments, and chiefly on Transubstantiation. The Dark Ages, as the ninth and tenth centuries have been truly called, were barren as to learning, full of political intrigues and ignoble struggles, while the Papacy was a centre of harlotry. During this period philosophy found its most congenial home with the Mahometans, among whom Mathematics and Natural Science made great progress. Then came the age of the Schoolmen [q.v.], Lanfranc, Anselm, Abelard, Peter, Albert, Aquinas, Lombard, and the rest. The rise of the Mendicant Orders in the beginning of the thirteenth century marked the beginning of a new age. They acquired dominion in the universities, beginning at Paris, and the benefit they wrought was to substitute common sense and practical usefulness for the word-splitting and trifling to which the School Philosophy had sunk. Their theology was more human and real; not profitless dialectic. The fifteenth century saw the dawn of the Reformation; the foremost name is that of Savonarola. The revival of learning is followed by the preaching of Luther in the first half of the sixteenth century, and in the second half comes the great battle between the principles of Loyola and of Calvin. This may be regarded as the last great battle fought on the old ground, the division being between the principles of absolute obedience to the Church, and freedom of the conscience. New ideas have sprung up since then, which have modified the opinions of the partisans of both sides. The main elements of those new ideas have been the vast discoveries in science and in historical criticism, and also the new political doctrines which changed conditions have brought into being. Questions concerning right and wrong, the absolute good, the final destinies of men, are still debated as keenly as ever, but in very different methods from those used by the controversialists of the sixteenth century.

In the above sketch we have not attempted to distinguish between varying opinions of abstract doctrine. We return to the fact that moral philosophy means questions concerning human action and moral excellence. The two words Ethics and Morals, the one of Greek and the other of Latin derivation, are commonly regarded as synonymous, yet there is a difference between them illustrative of the difference of the Greek and Roman character. An ethos is a habit of the mind, an inward disposition; the mores are the outer result of such habit, "customs" or "manners." The will, then, being set in some given direction, moral philosophy inquires concerning that direction, and asks, "What is good?" Or, in other words, what should man set before him as his supreme aim? Is seeking after happiness the same as seeking after goodness? The answer of the conscience and of Christianity declares that there is a supreme good, and that the duty of man is to conform himself to the acknowledged standard of good. Hence there is a right and a wrong per se, which, though defined by human enactments, do not rest upon them, but are determined by the Divine Will, and have their foundation in the character of God. The faculty by which we recognise such distinction, and judge actions according to it, we call the "Conscience." "There is a principle of reflection in men," says the greatest English moral philosopher, Bishop Butler, "by which they distinguish between, and approve or disapprove, their own actions. We are plainly constituted such sort of creatures as to reflect upon our own nature. The mind can take a view of what passes within itself, its propensions, aversions, passions, affections, and of the several actions consequent upon them. In this survey it approves of one, disapproves of another, and towards a third is affected in neither of these ways, but is quite indifferent. This principle in man is conscience." Conscience implies responsibility, and hence comes the anticipation of judgment, the sense of guilt or of merit.

But this general principle has modifications. An act may be in itself good or bad, but the agent's part will be affected by circumstances out of his own control. Virtue implies deliberate choice of good for its own sake when there is free will, and resolution to hold that choice. And good for its own sake is love, first towards God and then towards all which is like Him, or is capable of being made like Him. But society is so complicated that one man may be hindered from pursuing methods which to another are easy. We cannot therefore judge one another; only Omniscience can determine the responsibility of individuals. We are bound to judge overt acts by the Divine law, and in a thousand cases to visit offences by penalties; but to dissect motives, to reckon all the thousand influences within and without each individual, his education, his circumstances, his constitution, this is beyond our power. Moral philosophy declares to man his duties and obligations. Those duties concern himself, his own being and happiness, and also his fellow creatures. Thus the "Duty to God and my neighbour" in the Catechism of the Church of England may be called the Church compendium of Moral Philosophy. The final result of all such duty is happiness—i.e. the rest of man on finding all that he has been seeking after. But religion having taught us that this peace cannot be found so long as our aim is selfish, and is only to be obtained by seeking the supreme good—that is, God—we realise the truth of the Divine paradox of Christ, "He that will save his life shall lose it, but he that will lose his life for my sake the same shall find it." Not Utilitarianism, nor yet selfish ease or enjoyment, but obedience to duty, because that is obedience to the Supreme Good, this is the perfect happiness, and towards this the voice of God is evermore calling His children.

Moravians or United Brethren.—After the expulsion of the Protostants from Bohemia, as described at page 162, many of them met secretly for devotion, and from time to time fled into the Protestant States of Germany. In 1729 they were permitted by Count Zinzendorf to settle in his territory, and he ultimately became the head of their Church. It was in contemplation to affiliate themselves to the Lutheran Church, but on casting lot it was decided to remain a separate body under the name of "Unitas Fratrum." They a once began to send out missionaries to preach the Gospel in distant lands, Count Zinzendorf who had been banished from Germany, him self taking the leadership of the "Congregation of Pilgrims," as he termed his fellow labourers. Their first field of work was in the West Indies, then in Greenland, and since that in South Africa, Australia, and among the North American Indians. Their first establishment in England was in 1742; yet they now have about thirty-four chapels.

The Moravian doctrines are in accordance with the Confession of Augsburg. The following Declaration was adopted in 1775 at General Synod held at Barby near Rugby:—"The chief doctrine to which the Church of the Brethren adhere, and which we must preserve as an invaluable treasure committed unto us, is this—that by the sacrifice for victory by Jesus Christ, and by that alone, grace and deliverance from sin are to be obtained for mankind. We will therefore, without lessening the importance of any other article of the Christian faith, steadfastly maintain the following five points:—

1. The doctrine of the universal depravity of man: that there is no health in man, that, since the Fall, he has no power whatever left to help himself.

2. The doctrine of the Divinity of Christ, that God, the Creator of all things, was manifest in the flesh, and reconciled us to Him..."
that He is before all things, and that by Him things consist.

"3. The doctrine of the atonement and satisfaction made for us by Jesus Christ: at He was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification, and that, by His merits alone we receive freely the forgiveness of sin and sanctification in soul and body.

"4. The doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the operations of His grace: that it is He who worketh in us conviction of sin, faith in Jesus, and purity in heart.

"5. The doctrine of the fruits of faith: at faith must evidenee itself by willing obedience to the commandments of God, from love and gratitude."

The Moravian Church is in form episcopal, a bishops claiming direct descent from some of the old CHURCH OF BOHEMIA [q.v.]. They have also presbyters and deacons. The Church is governed by a board of Elders, who are chosen by the general synods held at periods varying from seven to twelve years. One of these nichs has the general supervision of the holy society is held at Herrnhut, the cradle of the Moravian Church, for which reason the Moravians are sometimes called Herrnhutians. There are female elders, but they have no vote at the conference. The Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper are administered much in the same way as in other reestablished Churches. In some settlements the latter ordinance is celebrated on every fourth Saturday evening, in others on every fourth and Sunday. The deacons distribute the consecrated bread to all the communicants standing, who kneel down and eat it altogether; they stand and receive the cup in turn. Former feet-washing was observed before partaking of the Communion, but now this ceremony is confined to Maundy Thursday. They use a great deal of music, both vocal and instrumental, and at their morning service they have a litany and extemporary prayers. Occasionally they hold love-feasts, in imitation of the agape of the early Church. The cohabitation of a marriage is often decided by lot, and previous to marriage the sexes in many places occupy separate establishments, called the "Single Brethren's Houses" and the "Single Sisters' Houses." Several Elders usually attend the death-bed of a Brother and prepare him for the end by prayer, singing, and laying-on of hands. They have a custom a Easter Day of the whole congregation meeting at sunrise in the burial-ground, where they hold a solemn service, commemorating the name of all those who have died during the previous year.

In Europe and America the number of actual members of the Moravian Church does not exceed 18,000; but it is supposed that early 100,000 more are under the spiritual care of their ministers. In England they have schools at Fulneck in Yorkshire, Fairfield in Lancashire, and Ockbrook in Derbyshire; in Ireland, at Gracehill, Antrim. On the Continent Herrnhut is still their centre, and they have separate communities in Silisia, Königsfeld in Baden, Neuwied on the Rhine, Christianfeld in Holstein, Zeyst near Utrecht, and Sarepta on the borders of Asiatic Russia, besides organised societies at Berlin, Potsdam, Copenhagen, Stockholm, St. Petersburg, Moscow, etc. In the United States they have separate communities at Bethlehem (which ranks in size next to Herrnhut), Nazareth, and Lititz in Pennsylvania, and at Salem in North Carolina. Besides these there are congregations at Newport in Rhode Island, Philadelphia, New York, etc., and several country congregations scattered through Pennsylvania, the members of which generally dwell on their plantations, but have a common place of worship. In their separate communities they do not allow the permanent residence of any persons as householders who are not members in full communion, and who have not signed the written instrument of brotherly agreement upon which their constitution and discipline rests; but they freely admit of the temporary residence among them of such other persons as are willing to conform to their external regulations. Each community has to provide for the erection and maintenance of a church, the support of its ministers and schools; but the individuals are as entirely independent in their private property as other persons, and do not have, as has often been stated, a community of goods. Their schools have sustained a very considerable reputation in Europe and America; there is, especially, one at Niesky, in Upper Lusatia, where they maintain a higher classical institution, where those receive a preparatory education who intend to embrace the liberal professions, or be prepared for the ministry.

The Moravians have been particularly active in missionary work; among their principal missions are those among the negro slaves in the three Danish West Indian islands; in Jamaica, St. Kitts, Antigua, Barbadoes, Tobago, and Surinam; in Greenland; in Labrador among the Esquimaux; at the Cape of Good Hope among the Caffres and Hottentots; and in North America amongst the Indians and Cherokees.

It is a general principle of the society that their social organisation is in no way to interfere with their duties as citizens, or as subjects of Governments under which they live, and wherever they are settled.

More, Hannah, was born at Stapleton, near Bristol, in 1745, the daughter of a village schoolmaster, who soon after her birth removed to Bristol. At the age of sixteen she wrote a pastoral drama, The Search after Happiness, and in the following year a tragedy, based on the story of Regulus and called The Inflexible Captive. She was introduced to Garrick, through whom she became known to Dr. Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and others, and became a great favourite in society. But after living in London for about five years she became convinced that the life she led was not befitting to a Christian, and determined to give up the drama and retire into the country. During her transition state she wrote her Sacred Dramas. In 1786 she fixed her residence at Wrington, about ten miles from Bristol, where, four years later, she was joined by her sisters. In 1802 they all removed to Barleywood, where her sisters died, and she remained there till 1828, when she went to Clifton, and died there in 1833.

The works which Hannah More wrote during the second part of her life are too numerous to mention, but the chief were:—

Thoughts on the Manners of the Great, Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education, Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World, Catechism in Search of a Wife, Practical Piety, Christian Morals. She was the writer of one of the first of the Cheep Repository tracts, which she called The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain.

She was one of the great reformers of the manners of English society. She is said to have gained thirty thousand pounds by her books, a third of which she bequeathed to the poor.

More, Henry, Christian Platonic philosopher [b. 1614, d. 1687], was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and was dissatisfied with all systems till he found rest in the writings of Plato. He became a Fellow of Christ's College, and lived there as a private tutor, refusing the mastership of his college, a bishopric, and other preferments, the only one he would accept being a prebendal stall at Gloucester.

More was of opinion that the Hebrews had transmitted their wisdom to Pythagoras, and he to Plato, and that therefore Platonism contains the principle of Divine philosophy. His writings, though tinctured with mysticism, show great piety and a liberal spirit. The chief works are Philosophical Poems, which were published in 1647, and contain the germ of most of his speculations; Conjectura Cabalistica, The Mystery of Iniquity, A Key to the Revelation, Enchiridion Ethieum, Enchiridium Metaphysicum, An Apology for Descartes, The Immortality of the Soul, etc.

Morestshiki or Self-immolators. —A fanatical sect of the Eastern Church residing chiefly in Siberia. They have received their name from their custom of meeting on a certain day in each year, and digging a deep pit, which they fill with wood, straw, etc., and, having set fire to the pile, several leap in and perish, while the others sing triumphant hymns. Their doctrines are unknown, as they have never been committed to writing, but they are believed to hold the Sabellian heresy, and also to deny the Death and Resurrection of Christ.

Morganatic Marriages are those which take place between a man of high rank and a woman of inferior standing, in which it is agreed that neither the woman nor her children shall enjoy the rank of her husband.

Morin, John, Father of the Oratory, illustrious for his virtue and learning, born at Blois in 1591, of Protestant parents, studied at Leyden, and, returning to Paris disguised at the controversies between the Calvinists and Arminians, turned Roman Catholic, and entered into the Congregation of the Fathers of the Oratory. He devoted himself especially to the conversion of the Jews, and wrote in defence of the Septuagint's translation, which he caused to be printed at Paris in 1628 and which he defended in a work printed in 1629, and entitled Exercitaciones Bibliica. His learning and judgment were so great that Pope Urban VIII. desired to see him, and he went to Rome, where he endeavoured to advance the union of the Greek Church with the Roman. But Cardinal Richelieu obliged his superiors to call him home. He edited and translated the Hebrew Samaritan Pentateuch (which had not been mentioned since St. Jerome's time), causing it to be printed in the Paris Polyglot Bible. He died in 1659.

Morley, George, D.D., Bishop of Winchester [b. in Chapside, 1597, d. at Chelsea 1684]. He was educated at Westminster and Christ Church, Oxford. Charles I. made him a canon in 1640. He was a faithful follower of the King during the Civil War, and gave the profits of his canonry to some years to the Royalist cause; he also refused to sit in the Westminster Assembly though nominated thereto by both Houses. In 1648 Morley was imprisoned by the Parliament, but went abroad in the following year. He remained at the Hague for nearly ten years, and only returned, at the request of the Royalists, to convert the Presbyterian to Episcopacy, and to restrain the impatience of the Royalists from leading them into rash actions. At the Restoration he was rewarded for his services by a presentation to the Deanery of Christ Church, and then to the Bishopric of Worcester, whence he was transferred to Winchester in 1662. Though an enthusiastic Royalist, Morley was a strong Calvinist in his theology. He was a munificent benefactor to his See.

Mormons or Latter-Day Saints. —Mormonism is one of the most remarkable religious movements of modern times. The word derived from the Gaelic mor, "great," and the Egyptian mor, "good," thus meaning "great good." The founder of the sect was Joseph Smith, born in 1805, of humble parentage a Vermont, in the United States. In 1815 he removed, with his parents, to Palmyra, New York. His father was a man of a peculiar temperament, a visionary, who spent much time in searching for hidden treasure, and his son seems to have inherited his eccentricities in an intensified form. When about fourteen years of age, Joseph Smith says that he was pondering on the importance of preparing for a future state; he was perplexed by the variety of opinions held by different denominations of Christians and betook himself to prayer that he might see his way out of the difficulty. He thus describes what happened: "I retired to a secret place in a grove and began to call upon the Lord. While fervently engaged in supplication, my mind was taken away from the objects with which I was surrounded, and I was enrap[t] in a heavenly vision, and saw two glorious personages, who exactly resembled each other in features and likeness, surrounded with a brilliant light, which eclipsed the sun at noonday. They told me that all the religious denominations were believing in incorrect doctrines, and that none of them was acknowledged of God as His Church and kingdom. And I was expressly commanded to 'go not after them,' at the same time receiving a promise that the fulness of the Gospel should at some future time be made known to me. On the evening of the 21st of September, 1823, while I was praying unto God and endeavouring to exercise faith in the precious promises of Scripture, on a sudden, a light like that of day, only of a far purer and more glorious appearance and brightness, burst into the room; indeed, the first sight was as though the house was filled with consuming fire. The appearance produced a shock that affected the whole body. In a moment a personage stood before me, surrounded with a glory yet greater than that with which I was already surrounded. This messenger proclaimed himself to be an angel of God, sent to bring the joyful tidings that the covenant which God made with ancient Israel was at hand to be fulfilled; that the preparatory work for the second coming of the Messiah was speedily to commence; that the time was at hand for the Gospel in all its fulness to be preached in power unto all nations, that a people might be prepared for the millennial reign.

"I was informed that I was chosen to be an instrument in the hands of God to bring about some of His purposes in this glorious dispensation.

"I was informed also concerning the aboriginal inhabitants of this country, and shown who they were and from whence they came; a brief sketch of their origin, progress, civilisation, laws, governments, of their righteousness and iniquity, and the blessings of God being finally withdrawn from them as a people, was made known unto me. I was also told where there were deposited some plates, on which was engraven an abridgment of the records of the ancient prophets that had existed on this continent. The angel appeared to me three times the same night and unfolded the same things. After having received many visits from the angels of God, unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days, on the morning of the 22nd of September, 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into my hands. These records were engraved on plates which had the appearance of gold; each plate was six inches wide and eight inches long, and not quite so thick as common tin. They were filled with engravings in Egyptian characters, and bound together in a volume, as the leaves of a book, with three rings running through the whole. The volume was something near six inches in thickness, a part of which was sealed. The characters on the unsealed part were small and beautifully engraved. The whole book exhibited many marks of antiquity in its construction and much skill in the art of engraving. With the records was found a curious instrument which the ancients called 'Urim and Thummim,' which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim on a bow fastened to a breastplate.

"Through the medium of the Urim and Thummim I translated the record by the gift and power of God."

This translation, it is said, constitutes the Book of Mormon, which is considered by its disciples as revealed Scripture.

The news of his alleged discovery attracted much attention, and Smith was so persecuted that he had to take refuge in Pennsylvania, carrying away his precious book in a barrel of beans. Mormon was said to be a prophet in the fourth or fifth century, who had engraved on plates the history of the troubles of the American Israelites, and his son Moroni concealed them in a hill called Cumorah, about A.D. 420. They are said to contain many prophecies concerning the colonising of America by a direct tribe of Jews, for which reason the Mormons claim direct Jewish descent. The Mormons urge in favour of the authenticity of the Book of Mormon, that it was an impossibility for it to have been written and invented by an uneducated man like Smith; and to account for the non-production of the engraved plates, they say that Smith was forbidden by distinct revelation to show them to any of his disciples. It is alleged, on the other hand, that about 1809-12 Solomon Spaulding, who had once been a clergyman, wrote a tale on the supposition that the American Indians were the lost ten tribes of Israel, in which the names Mormon and Moroni frequently occur; and that the MS. found its way into the hands of Sidney Rigdon, one of Smith's earliest followers.

The Book of Mormon was followed by a Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which contained the further revelations which it was supposed were made to Smith as the Church needed them.

The "Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints" was organised on April 6th, 1830, at Manchester, in the State of New York. There were about thirty members. Churches were formed in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri, notably in the last-named State, in Jackson County. Here they made large purchases of land; but popular hostility was so great that, in 1833, they were driven from their settlement, and they removed to Clay County. But they were not to be left unmolested. In 1838, Joseph Smith and his brother Hiram were imprisoned, and the Mormons sought a new resting-place at Commerce, in the State of Illinois. This place they at once enlarged, and called Nauvoo, or "Beautiful." Their prophet was made "Mayor" of the city, and "General" of a body of militia. In 1841 they were commanded by a "revelation" to build a superb temple, towards which each member should give a tithe of his property. In a few years they numbered 20,000 inhabitants. But suspicion and hatred followed the Mormons; every crime committed in the neighbourhood was charged on them; their doctrine of polygamy made them a public scandal; and at length the editors of a newspaper which had been suppressed for publishing some scandal about Smith, in revenge got a warrant against him and his brother Hiram, and they were thrown into prison at Carthage, where they were shot by the mob, June 27th, 1844. This act of lynching made a martyr of one who otherwise would have been detected as an impostor or fanatic, for his own followers had become suspicious of him, and the folly of the revelations was becoming more and more apparent. But now all was changed.

Sidney Rigdon and Brigham Young were competitors for the supremacy; the latter was chosen to be the "Lord's Prophet and Seer to the Saints," under the title of First President. He lived till 1877. The Mormons now determined to seek a home far from the haunts of men, and in February, 1846, a pioneering party went beyond the Rocky Mountains to the basin of the Great Salt Lake; the rest followed in detachments, and through great hardships; and at length, in 1848, they founded a State under the name of Deseré, a word from the Mormon book, signifying the "Land of the Honeybee." Here they have made great progress, and founded several cities. Utah State has an area of 84,170 square miles, and a population of about 150,000, of which not above 20,000 are non-Mormons.

The following is the printed "Creed" given to the Mormons by their founder, Joseph Smith:

"We believe in God the Eternal Father, and His Son Jesus Christ, and in the Holy Ghost. "We believe that men will be punished for their own sins, and not for Adam's transgressions. "We believe that through the atonement of Christ all men may be saved, by perfect obedience to the laws and ordinances of the Gospel. "We believe that these ordinances are:—1st, Expiation in the Lord Jesus Christ; 2nd, Repentance; 3rd, Baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; 4th, Laying-on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost. "We believe that a man must be called of God by prophecy and laying-on of hands, by those who are in authority, to preach the Gospel and administer in the ordinances thereof. "We believe in the same organisation that existed in the primitive Church, viz., apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc. "We believe in the gift of tongues, prophecy, revelation, visions, healing, interpretation of tongues, etc. "We believe the Bible to be the Word of God, as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the Word of God. "We believe all that God has revealed, all that He does now reveal, and we believe that He will yet reveal many more things, and important things pertaining to the Kingdom of God. "We believe in the literal gathering of Israel, and in the restoration of the Ten Tribes, that Zion will be established in this continent; that Christ will reign personally upon the earth; and that the earth will be renewed and receive its paradisacl glory. "We claim the privilege of worshipping Almighty God according to the dictates of our own conscience and our own idea; for we believe that God has commanded men to worship the Lord how, where, or what they may. "We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates; in obeying, honouring, and sustaining the laws of the land. "We believe in being honest, true, chaste, benevolent, virtuous, and in doing good to all men; indeed, we may say that we follow the admonition of Paul—"We believe all things, we hope all things, we have endured many things, and hope to be able to endure all things. If there is anything virtuous, lovely, or of good report, or praiseworthy, we seek after." This is not, however, the whole of their creed. Instead of believing in a Trinity, they hold a duality of Persons in the Godhead, the Holy Ghost being merely a spiritual soul. They also believe that God has parts resembling the body of man, and not materially differing from him in size. They hold a two-fold priesthood, the Melchisedek and the Aaronic; they believe in a "baptism for the dead," i.e. that a living person may save a dead friend by being immersed for him, unless he has committed the unpardonable sin. Polygamy is not so much tolerated as enjoined as a positive duty, a man's rank in heaven being alleged to be largely dependent upon the number of his children. Children are baptised at the age of eight, never before.

Mr. Gunnison gives the following account of their Church government:—"The hierarchy of the Mormon Church has many grades of offices and gifts. The first is the presidency of three persons, which, we were led to understand, answered to the Trinity in heaven, but more particularly to Peter James, and John, the first presidents of the Gospel Church. "Next in order is the travelling High Apostolic College of twelve apostles, after that all sin is deadly in its nature, and would ruin the soul but for the intercession of Christ. Even infirmities and frailties, inasmuch as they injure the soul, are deadly; but our "Advocate with the Father" pleads for us. But when a man does not strive against his infirmities, he is contemning the Divine intercession. But to those who have faith in Christ sin is not imputed.

The Roman Catholics hold that justification is a renewal of man's nature by the grace of Christ, and those who really love God are incapable of committing sins which condemn their souls to death. Therefore as no human being is perfect, and even the saints committed sin, there must be two classes of sin—which they call venial and mortal. Mortal sins are those committed against God wilfully and deliberately, and are irreparable, utterly destroying the soul, but are remitted by the absolution of the priest in the Sacrament of Penance, and must be expiated either by satisfactions and good works in the present life or in Purgatory hereafter. The Roman Church has not defined what is and is not mortal sin, but declares that there are cases in which only God can judge. Thus, perjury and impurity are, if deliberate, mortal; but theft is put down as venial, if the injury done is small.

Mortmain [French, "a dead hand"].—The law of mortmain in England was designed to prevent land being withdrawn from general use, and to restrict acquisition by ecclesiastics. The law was probably borrowed from the Roman legislation, and was in use among the early Christians; and about the fifth century it was ordained by Justinian that certain restrictions should be laid upon money or lands bequeathed to the service of God, so as to prevent their becoming common property. Early in the second century all corporate bodies, or collegia, were forbidden to receive legacies, unless by a special privilege, and by this means the Christians were deprived of all money which was left them for the use of the Church. The law of mortmain which first really deserved the name was one passed by Valentine the Elder, which forbade the clergy to inherit the property of wards or widows, or to accept donations from the wife of any man who was a member of their body. In Charlemagne's Capitulare the only restriction was that property should not pass into the hands of ecclesiastics without due deliberation on the part of the owner. The English law of mortmain is contained in a statute of George II., by which it is enacted that no property may come into the possession of the Church unless the bequest was formally drawn up and signed by the testator and two witnesses at least twelve months before the death of the donor. This statute does not apply to the Universities or to certain public schools; and it only holds good with regard to money.
or actual property, and not with regard to lands whence interest arises, which may be devoted to charitable uses.

Morton, John, Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Bere, in Dorsetshire. At Oxford he became so eminent in Civil and Canon Law that Archbishop Bourchier recommended him to King Henry VI. for a seat at the council board. And here he displayed such honesty and ability, that King Edward IV. kept him in the same post at his coming to the throne; but Richard III., on his accession, finding it impracticable to corrupt the integrity of Morton, who was now Bishop of Ely, had him imprisoned with several other lords. This prelate made his escape to the Continent, where he made the acquaintance of Henry VII., who, on his accession, nominated him to the Archdiocese of Canterbury, made him Lord Chancellor, and procured him a cardinal's hat from Pope Alexander VI. in 1493. It was Morton who projected the marriage between Henry VII. and Elizabeth, daughter and heir to King Edward IV., by this means uniting the two Houses of York and Lancaster. He died in October, 1500, and left the character of a learned prelate and a great statesman behind him. The gateway at the entrance of Lambeth Palace is his work.

Mortuary in ecclesiastical law seems to have been originally an oblation made at a person's death. In Saxon times a funeral duty called pecunia sepulchralis, or the soul-scot, was ordered by the Council of Ænam, held in the reign of King Ethelred, to be paid to the Church. Mortuaries and corpse presents are generally considered to be the same, but Dr. Stilligfleet distinguishes them by saying that the former was a right settled on the Church, while the latter was a voluntary oblation. The mortuary, which was often a horse, ox, or cow, followed the corpse to burial, which is probably the origin of the custom of a warrior's horse attending its master's funeral. In the reign of Henry VIII. it was enacted that the mortuaries should be paid in money, and should be limited to 10a. The Welsh bishoprics and the diocese of Chester were excepted from the operation of this statute, and therefore subsequent Acts were passed with respect to them.

Mosarabes or Mixarabes.—Spanish Christians who lived among the Moors in Spain, and were under their jurisdiction. The name is derived from musa, which in Arabic signifies a "Christian." Their Liturgy, known as the Mosarabic Office, was used in Spain till the reign of Alphonsus VI., when it was discontinued by the order of Pope Gregory VII. It is still used in the Cathedral at Toledo, and at Salamanca, upon fixed days.

Mosheim, Johann Lorenz von, a distinguished Church historian of Germany, was born at Lübeck, 1694. He was educated at Lübeck and at Kiel University, where in 1716, he succeeded Albert zum Felde as Professor of Philosophy. In 1723 he was invited to Helmstadt, and received the post of Professor of Theology. He became the chief support of the University, and received many honours; but in 1747 yielded to the pressing invitations that came from Göttingen, and became Professor of Theology and Chancellor of the University. He died there on Sept. 9th, 1755.

Mosheim was a great preacher, and has been compared to Fenelon for the grace of his style. His learning was immense, and he was possessed of great talents. He is considered one of the founders of modern German literature.

The most important of his voluminous writings relate to ecclesiastical history. The chief was written in Latin, under the title Institutiones Historiae Ecclesiasticae, which first appeared in 1726. It was translated into English by Dr. Maclaine, an assistant minister at the Hague, in 1764. The history extend from the birth of Christ to the beginning of the eighteenth century, each century being treated of separately under the two heads of external and internal history. Under the first head he put "prosperous events or thral events which led to the extension of the Church, and calamitous events or persecution and infidel attacks;" under the second, biographies of the Fathers, histories of the Council and their canons, heresies, etc. This work gave the impetus to the numerous German Church historians who followed him, e.g., Neander, Schröck, Baumgarten, Paff, Henke Semler, etc. Mosheim also wrote a long work on the first three Christian centuries entitled De Rubis Christianorum ante Constantinum Commentarii, and a history of the first century, called Institutiones Historiae Christianae Majores: Dissertationes ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam Pertinentes; and Versue einer unparteiischen Ketzergeschichte, which is an account of the heresies.

Among his other works are a book on Biblical morality, called Sittenlehre der Heiligen Schrift a Latin translation of Cudworth's Intellectual System, with notes, and six volumes of sermons.

Mosques.—A Mohammedan place of worship. The word is derived, through the Italian moschea, from the Arabic mesjid, "place of prayer." The form of the older mosques in Jerusalem and Cairo is evidently derived from that of the Christian basilica, the narthex being the origin of the court with its arcade, and the eastern apses representing the principal buildings of the mosque facing Mecca. The original forms became, however, obliterated. They vary considerably in style in different countries, but in many places are always the same. They are that and of their names. The church in mecca lies, a niche towards which all the faithful turn when they pray. Opposite the pulpit is a platform, from which parts of the Koran are read to the congregation. The whole congregation say the five daily prayers in the mosques on Fridays, the Moslem Sundays. Women are not allowed to enter, but stay in the porch. On entering the mosque the Moslem takes off his shoes and carries them in his hand. Most of the mosques have hospitals attached to them, where travellers of all religions are entertained for three days.

Motett.—A term derived from the Italian motetto, "a little word or sentence," and applied to certain pieces of Church music of a moderate length, adapted to Latin words, and sung at High Mass, after or instead of the Plain Chant Offertorium. It is usually a portion of Holy Scripture, and answers very nearly to our anthem.

Mourners.—In the ancient Church penitents had to pass through three stages before they could be received into the Church. The first was that of the mourners. They had to stand outside the doors of the church, in the porch, where they could take no part in what was going on inside. The duration of time which elapsed before they reached the next stage, that of "hearers," is different, according to different codes. St. Gregory of Nyssa places the murderer for nine years in this station, while Basil limits the time to four years, out of twenty. For manslaughter, two of the eleven years of exclusion are to be among the mourners; for adultery, four out of fifteen; for uncleanness, two out of seven. One canon sentences an apostate to remain a mourner for the rest of his life.

Moveable Feasts are those which do not occur on a fixed day, as Easter and the feasts calculated from Easter. Tables for the calculation of moveable feasts are found in the Book of Common Prayer.

Mozley, James Bowling [b. 1813, d. 1878]. —A distinguished theologian of this century, son of a publisher at Gainsborough; graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, and became Fellow of Magdalen in 1836, Rector of Old Shoreham in 1837, Bampton Lecturer in 1863, Canon of Worcester in 1869, and Regius Professor of Divinity in 1871. His first important writing was a treatise on Predestination, which was followed by another on Baptismal Regeneration. His Bampton Lectures, for which he chose Miracles as his subject, was considered the greatest work on the subject since Pikeley. Another work of his, Ruling Ideas in Early Ages and their Relation to the Old Testament Faith, was also a work of much thought and value, and consisted of lectures delivered at Oxford. A volume of his letters published in 1855 is full of interesting notices of the men and doings of his time.

Mozzetta.—A vestment worn by the higher officials in the Roman Church. It is short, and open in front, covering the shoulders, and with a hood behind. It is the state dress of bishops when not performing sacred functions. The Cardinals wear it only in their own churches. The Pope has five mozzeti: of red satin for the summer, except on fast days, when it is of red serge; of red velvet for the other half of the year, except in Lent and Advent, when it is of red woolen cloth; and of white damask for the octave of Easter. A Cardinal has four mozzetti: of red silk, violet silk, rose-coloured silk, and violet serge.

Muggletonians.—A sect which arose about the middle of the seventeenth century, originated by Ludovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, of London, and a man named Reeves. Muggleton declared that he and his associate were the two witnesses foretold in Rev. xi. 3-6, and that they represented Moses and Aaron; that they had received power from Heaven to prophesy, and to destroy all who did not believe in their mission. Among other heresies, they affirmed that God the Father, leaving the government of heaven to Elijah, came down to earth in human form and suffered on the Cross; and that Satan became incarnate in Eve. They denied the doctrine of the Trinity, the creation of earth and water, the immortality of the soul, the authority of government, and some denied the lawfulness of magistracy. After the death of Reeves, Muggleton gave out that a double portion of the Spirit rested upon him. Muggleton died in Moorfields in 1697. His sect survived in places till within the last few years.

Mühlenberg, Heinrich Melchior, D.D. [b. in Hanover in 1711, d. in Pennsylvania in 1787], was one of the founders of the Lutheran Church in Pennsylvania; having been sent there in 1742 at the desire of some of the German settlers. He met with some opposition from Count Zinzendorf, who had established some Moravian congregations, but succeeded in founding many Lutheran Churches, both there and in the neighbouring States, and Pennsylvania was looked on as the mother Church of Lutheranism in the United States. The first Lutheran Synod was held under his organisation in 1748, and at his death the Synod numbered twenty-four congregations.
Muhlenberg, William Augustus, D.D. [b. in Philadelphia in 1796, d. in New York in 1877], an eminent American Episcopalian, great grandson of the above. He was ordained priest in 1820, and did much for Christian education by establishing schools. He was much interested in the improvement of Church hymns, and wrote many himself, which, with others, were adopted for use by a General Convention. He founded St. Luke's Hospital in New York in 1854, and the Church Village of St. Johnland on Long Island in the same state in 1870. He was born a rich man, but spent his whole substance in benefiting others, and died very poor in the hospital he had founded.

Munster. [Anabaptists.]

Münzer, Thomas, a leader of the Anabaptists, born at Stolberg in the Harz Mountains, studied at Wittenberg, and became Master of Arts, and travelled subsequently in various parts of Germany, preaching the doctrines of the Reformation. His zeal grew into fanaticism, and during the Peasants' War he stirred up the people to plunder the houses of the rich, and, after their defeat in 1525, he was taken prisoner and beheaded with other ringleaders.

Muratorian Canon.—A fragment of a canon discovered by Muratori in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and published in 1740. It is very mutilated, but of great importance. It claims to have been written by a contemporary of Pius, and therefore cannot be placed later than 170 A.D. The fragment mentions as canonical the first four Gospels, the Acts as written by St. Luke, thirteen Epistles of St. Paul, nine of them addressed to individuals, and four to individuals, Jude, the first and second Epistles of St. John, and the Apocalypse of St. John, the latter not for public reading. Thus, it will be seen, he omits Hebrews, James, 1st and 2nd Peter, and 3rd John.

Music.—That music has been in use in the Church from its very foundation is perfectly clear from the notices we have in the New Testament [Matt. xxvi. 30; Acts, xvi. 25; Col. iii. 16; James v. 13], as well as in the writings of the early Fathers. But we know very little of the character of it. The first great name in the history of Church music is that of Ambrose, after whom the Ambrosian Chant [q.v.] is named; the next is that of St. Gregory the Great, after whom Gregorian music is named. The traditional belief is that four of the chants known as Gregorian, viz., the first, third, fifth, and eighth tones, date from St. Ambrose, and that the rest are due to St. Gregory. The scales out of which these tones are formed differ from the modern scales in the varying positions of the semitones. They consist, of course, of eight natural notes; and one octave, known as the Hypo-Lydiian, is that which we know as the natural scale with the semitones between the third and fourth and seventh and eighth notes. A favourite scale, adopted by some of the earliest of English anthem writers, was the Dorian, starting from D as the key-note, and therefore like a minor scale in the place of its first semitone, but not in that of the second. Tallis and Batten both composed services and anthems in this mode.

The music of the Middle Ages all rested on the Gregorian mode as a basis. Instrumental accompaniments date back from the days of St. Ambrose, and some also credit him with the introduction of antiphonal singing, while others give it to St. Hilary of Poitiers, who borrowed it from the practice of the Eastern Church. The instruments were "viols," and later "organs," but originally these were in unison only with the voices. Of course the tendency was more and more to richer and smoother melody, but an outcry was raised from time to time that the ancient methods were being departed from, and the simplicity of the music destroyed by too much elaboration, as well as by the introduction of "lusty" and secular melodies. The great reformer of Church music was Giovanni Palestrina [d. 1594], the Master of the Pope's Choir first at the Lateran Church, then at St. Maria Maggiore, then at the Vatican. He found not only the singers demoralised, but the sacred service, even the most solemn parts of it, set to music which only seemed to have for its object the display of the artifices of the composers, and the pleasing of the ear by utterly secular and frivolous melodies. The Masses and other compositions of Palestrina marked the beginning of a new epoch in sacred music. Pope Gregory XIII. commissioned him to revise and reform the whole system, and, although he died before this commission was fully completed, there was sufficient done to enable the reform to be carried on. He was a splendid melodist, but he never used his art for the purpose of display, subjugated it all to the sense of the words, and aimed at purity and beauty. His works, which are astonishing in quantity, are still admired as keenly as ever they were.

The rise of the English School of Music synchronises with the dawning of the Reformation. The first anthem in Boyce's Cathedral Music is by King Henry VIII., who was originally intended by his father for Holy Orders with a view to his appointment to the Primacy. Consequently, all the greatest English sacred compositions were written with a view to their performance in the service of the Anglican Church. The first great ecclesiastical writer of the first period was John Marbecke, organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor [d. 1558], whose Te Deum, adapted from the Ambrosian, is very popular in our own day. His Book of Common Prayer Noted, an adaptation of the old plainsong of the Church to the English
Liturgy, is the basis of the English Choral service, and was republished by Mr. Dyce in 1844, and there have been many editions since. Marbeke having written a theological treatise would have been burned as a heretic for Calvinism had he not hidden himself. He was followed by Redford, the author of the beautiful anthem "Rejoice in the Lord," Christopher Tye, Thomas Tallis [d. 1585], William Byrd [d. 1623], and Richard Farrant 1580]. The choral responses and liturgy of fallis have never been superseded. His anthem "If ye love Me," and Byrd's sublime "Bow down your ear," are among our first-class anthems. Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake" is a also deservedly popular, and his service in G Minor, though heavier than suited to modern taste, has some passages beautifully pathetic and sweet. The service in F, by Orlando Gibbons, is reckoned by many musicians the finest ever written for the English ritual, and its eight-part setting of the 47th Psalm as an anthem is almost unrivalled for its majestic swing. He died in 1623, and is buried in Canterbury Cathedral. The great rebellion for a while put a complete stop to the progress of English Cathedral music. Organs were burned and music books torn up. At the Restoration, so great had been the destruction, that there was difficulty in reviving the choral services of the Church, and the taste of the King and his Court was towards more florid melodies than those of the old masters. But a new school slowly arose, not unworthy of its predecessors. Among its members were Child, Michael Wis, Blow, Lawes, and Henry Purcell, the last being the greatest composer which this country has produced. Under this school Verse anthems began, i.e. anthems with passages for solo voices, ending, and generally beginning, with a chorus, and with interludes or the organ only. One of the most curious Verses anthems is Purcell's "They that go down to the sea in ships," which opens with a pass solo beginning on upper D, and running own two octaves. It was written for a singer of exceptional voice compass. Such performances are hardly consistent with the solemn dignity which should characterise the service of the Church, and it is due to Purcell to say that such forgetfulness is not a mark of his writing in general.

Among the great composers who followed, we must name Jeremiah Clarke, Nares, Charles King, Drs. Greene and Boyce, Goldfin, Weldon. Quite worthy of being named with them are the amateurs Creighton and Aldrich, both cathedral dignitaries. The graceful service in G by the latter never fails to delight when well sung. The arrival of Handel in England in 1711 must not pass unmentioned, but the history of the oratorio rarely falls within our province. It created much opposition when it was first started in England. Cowper and Newton both wrote fiercely against it. But the opposition was not unreasonable, considering that the performances in church were, as far as it could be done, divested of all religious character; payment at the doors and fashionable lounging stood in the way of all idea of worship. The anthem music of later times in England is, some of it, very beautiful. Such names as Attwood, Walmisley, S. S. Wesley, Goss, Sterndale Bennett, Turle, to say nothing of living masters, are an honour to any national school of composers.

We have said nothing of the use of hymn singing in public worship. It had been the intention of Cranmer to translate some of the grand medieval hymns for the use of the Church, but he only carried it out with respect to the Veni Creator, which is inserted in the Ordination Service. Consequently, the metrical singing of the Church was long confined to the translation of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins, known as the Old Version. This was largely supplanted by the New Version of Tate and Brady in the days of Charles II. Nearly all the metres were either 8. 8. 8. 8. ("Long Metre"); 8. 6. 8. 6. ("Common Metre"); or 6. 6. 6. 6. ("Short Metre").

But the Evangelical movement of the eighteenth century made large use of hymn singing, and this was greatly objected to by the old-fashioned church folk, e.g. Bishop Mant preached against it, and fifty years ago it was a distinguishing mark of "Low Church men" to find hymns sung in churches. Now, however, this is all changed. When there is a good choir in a parish church one anthem is generally sung in the day, but the hymns form one of the most popular portions of the service. There has been also a remarkable revival of the ancient Gregorian chanting, partly from a dislike of the florid styles into which chant music had fallen at the beginning of the century, partly from the revived love of mediaevalism which has been the outgrowth of the Oxford movement. [See ANTHEM; CHANT; CHOIR.] The use of Choral Services again, which formerly was confined to cathedrals and college chapels, is now common in places where a choir can be gathered together. This is largely owing to the extended knowledge of music among the people. The objection which was formerly made to the chanting of the Psalms, that the unlettered could not follow it, is obviated now that everybody can read.

Mynchery.—A Saxon name for a nunnery.

Mystery [from mucein to stoma, "to shut the mouth"]).—The word is used to denote something secret, which is not revealed to mankind, or only partly revealed. The word is applied both to doctrines and facts. Thus the Incarnation of Christ, and the Resurrection from the Dead, are often spoken of as mysteries.
In the ancient Church the Sacraments were so called, more especially the Holy Communion, and the Fathers frequently speak of the "sacred" and "tremendous mysteries" of this Sacrament. It is used in this sense in the Exhortation at the beginning of the Communion Office, where Christ is said to have "instituted and ordained holy mysteries as pledges of His love," etc.

Mystical Interpretation of Scripture.—The belief of universal Christendom that certain facts and persons of the Old Testament are types of Christ is sanctioned by many passages in the Bible itself. The Epistle to the Hebrews is in great measure founded upon this belief, and St. Paul, writing to the Galatians, calls the history of Abraham and his two sons an allegory. In ancient times this method of interpretation was so widely extended that almost every event was turned into a type, and invested with a secondary and spiritual meaning; thus the scarlet thread of Rahab was regarded as a symbol of the blood of Christ, and even the relation of Bathsheba to David was interpreted as the Church forsaking the Devil and joining herself to Christ. The critical study of the Bible, consequent upon the revival of learning in Europe, caused these fancies to recede into the background, and the historical narratives to be more closely studied. Milman and Stanley and Dr. Farrar, in our own country, have aimed at showing us the characteristics of the sacred Volume as men saw them in the flesh, and to bring before us their very times and the circumstances which surrounded them. There was an outcry made when Milman called Abraham a powerful Bedouin sheykh, as if he had said something irreverent, instead of striving to make the Bible characters living men and women who become more truly examples to us when we realise them as of like passions with ourselves. Yet the old mystical interpretation is by no means cast away. It does not follow that because we have learned to realise that Isaiah and Jeremiah were politicians with opponents and partisans, and throw themselves into the burning strifes of the day, that there is no place left for the doctrine of types and secondary senses. No doubt, as in the grotesque exegesis above referred to in the case of Bathsheba, there has been much which repels us, and so there is still. Some is fanciful, some to us repulsive. Thus in Bishop Wentworth's Commentary, which is very full of mystical meanings, the bulrushes of Moses's ark are likened to the manuscripts and books which have carried his writings down the stream of the World. Such a fancy, however far-fetched, is not so grotesque as that which sees in the outrage of Reuben on his father's concubine a type of the Pope debauching Christendom. [Wordsworth on Gen. xxxv. 22.] Bishop Horne was much given to spiritualising, so are Mr. Spurgeon [e.g. in his Sermons on the Canticles], and Dr. Littledale in his Commentary on the Psalms. No doubt this method of exegesis was derived from the Jews. It was carried on by Origen and Clement of Alexandria, and, though more cautiously, by Augustine and Jerome. Nor is the mention of these great Fathers of the Church the only sanction which such a method of interpretation receives; the very fact that our Lord interpreted the Old Testament Scriptures concerning Himself, the brazen serpent and the deliverance of Jonah—all these things are sufficient to justify the principles of mystical interpretation. But the examples above quoted are a warning to us not to let fancy run riot with unreasonableness. Thus many fanciful views are founded, as has been thoroughly proved, upon false etymologies and, therefore, as one able commentator of our time has well said, "the grammar and the lexicon must be supreme."

The father of mystical interpretation as a system in the Christian Church was Origen. He drew out four senses from the sacred narrative. There was, first, the literal; secondly, the allegorical; thirdly, the tropological, in which the allegory was transferred from the Church at large to each individual soul; and fourthly, the anagogical, in which the whole was transferred again from the earthly to the heavenly. Thus literally Jerusalem became allegorically the Church militant; tropologically, the Christian soul; anagogically, the heavenly city. Manna became first the Eucharist, then the continual inner life of the soul, and lastly, the marriage supper of the Lamb. This is surely reasonable enough; but one feels on doubtful ground when we are taught by Gregory the Great to see in Job an allegory of Christ, because Job means "grief," and Christ was a Man of sorrows, and he dwelt in the land of U. ("counsel"), and Christ rules in the heart by wise counsels; and then he goes on to interpret the seven sons and three daughters, and the 7,000 sheep and the 3,000 camels. One may safely assert that the sacred narrator had no idea of such meanings in his own mind. The growth of critical and reasonable interpretation will probably form a correction of mere extravagances, as the interpreters recognised the need, first of all, of mastering the text and next of resting interpretations, not upon fanciful resemblances, but upon essential analogies, such as that of Isaac and Ishmael, the sons of freedom and bondage, with the liberty of Christianity and the bondage of the Law. Such principles commend them selves at once to the reason and the conscience and such interpretations become, as so many have already become, part of the heritage of Christendom.

Mystics.—A class of theologians who profess to be able to see mysteries hidden from the uninitiated. They are to be found i very religion, and in every age. There are aid to be three kinds: those who resign them-eves to an imagined Divine manifestation, hose who form a theory of God based on their own inspiration, and those who claim converse with spirits. The first Christian mystics seem to have arisen towards the close of the third century. They held that they must remain in a state of inaction while the Divine Spirit guided them, that if they turned their eyes
from the world the soul would return to God,
and they would enjoy not only communion with Him but would see truth undisguised and pure. Mysticism was thus a reaction against stiff formalism, a cry of the spirit for freedom. In the sixth century mysticism received a strong impetus from the publication of some writings alleged to be by Dionysius
the Areopagite, as Mystical Theology, The Heavenly Hierarchy, The Ecclesiastical Hie-archy. They certainly are not his, but probably date from the time when they first appeared. The writer endeavoured to apply to Christianity the theosophy of the Neo-Platonist school, and to show that by means of an intermediate and mediatorial hierarchy man may hold communion with the higher powers, even rising higher till he can contemplate God Himself. These works were translated by John Scotus Eriigena; afterwards a commentary was made on them by Maximus of Constantinople [q.v.], who, in addition to his works against the Monothelites, wrote a great number of mystical tracts on the Scriptures,
the Trinity, and the ceremonies of the Church,
all thoroughly saturated with the allegorising principles of the Alexandrian School.

The encouragement given to mysticism by Louis the Moek in the ninth century caused it to spread over Europe, especially in France.
St. Bernard of Clairvaux was deeply impressed with it; and St. Hugo and Richard of St.
Victoire in the twelfth century did much in opposing the materialism of the Schoolmen.
The mysticism, however, of the West did not rush into heresy as that of the East seemed fated to do. Gnosticism, Montanism, Manich-æism, all had their origin in the cry for spirit as against letter. In the West in course of time errors had their origin in the same root. Thus Bonaventure in the thirteenth, and Gerson in the fifteenth, laboured to reconcile the two elements. In the Netherlands and Germany, mystical Pantheism developed in the sect of the Brethren of the Free Spirit [q.v.]. In the fourteenth century, Henry Eckhart revived the Pan-theism of Scotus, and united it with the severest asceticism. Ruysbroeck caused a complete revolution in mysticism, which he based on Theism. He states that "man, having proceeded from God, is destined to return and become one with Him again. This oneness, however, is not to be understood as meaning that we become wholly identified with Him, and lose our own being as creatures, for that is an impossibility. What it is to be understood as meaning is, that we are conscious of being wholly in God, and at the same time also wholly in ourselves; that we are united with God, and yet at the same time remain different from Him." Mysticism was further developed by Gerhard in the Netherlands, and by John Tauler in Germany. Tauler, a Dominican, of Strassburg, and a great preacher, who was called Doctor Illuminatus, was very practical in his mysticism, and held the school of thought which was afterwards developed in the Reformation. His great friend, Henry Suso, of Ulm, a pupil of Eckhart, thus expressed his views:—"A meek man must be deformed from the creature, conformed to Christ, and transformed to Deity." Thomas a Kempis's works are pervaded by the longing for annihilation of self, and oneness with God, common to all the medieval mystics. In the fourteenth century appeared a little book, named German Theology, to which no name is appended, but which is attributed to the Custos of the Herrn Haus, at Frankfort, one of the "Friends of God" [q.v.]. This book remained comparatively unnoticed till brought forward by Luther, who ranks it third among his favourite books, next to the Bible and St.
Augustine. In 1621 it was prohibited in the Roman Church, but the edition published by Luther in 1518 met with great favour.

The Reformation, which had thus been sided by mysticism, almost caused its downfall when Luther proved the fallibility of oral tradition and individual intuition, and proclaimed the Scriptures the standard of Christian faith. But it soon broke out in more extravagant modes, especially among the Anabaptists [q.v.], though under a different form. The first Reformers who proessed mysticism were Parcelaus of Hohenheim [d. 1541] and Weigel of Meissen, in Saxony [d. 1588]; but the leader of the movement was Jacob Böhme, whose views show a mixture of Gnostic theosophy and naturalism.
[Böhme, Jacob.] Arndt [d. 1621], a Lutheran of Anhalt, who gave up his post when his province adopted Calvinism, was also a mystic,
but his mysticism took the form of a spiritual religion. He wrote True Christianity and The Paradise of Christian Virtues, which are still read in Germany. Gerhard's Sacred Meditations and School of Piety are of the same tone as Arndt's works. Towards the close of the seventeenth century, Michael de Molinos, of Saragossa, published The Guide to a Spiritual Life, the substance of which is that, in pursuance of good, the mind must be withdrawn from all worldly objects, and be wholly merged in God; therefore his followers are called Quietists [q.v.]. This book was condemned by Innocent XI., and Molinos was imprisoned. Among the most famed of the Quietists in the seventeenth century were Madame Guyon, Madame Bornignon, Peter Poiret, and Madame de Krüdener. In modern times the chief mystics have been Emanuel Swedenborg and William Law [q.v.]. In the same category we must place the Hutchinsonians, the Jansenists, and those who substitute the subjective revelation of consciousness for the objective revelation of the written Word.

Mythology.—Mythology is the science of myths or legends relating to the worship of primitive nations. All races of men have confused and hazy traditions as to the origin of the world and of their own existence which have been handed down to them in the form of stories. At first these stories are taken literally; but with the progress of civilisation they are interpreted allegorically, and their absurdities and impossibilities are explained away as being the poetical way of stating familiar facts. Almost all national mythologies contain much that is "silly, savage, and senseless," and it has been the object of philosophers like Max Müller and Herbert Spencer to account for and explain the contradictions between the honour paid to mythological deities and heroes and the abhorrent deeds they are said to have committed. A certain resemblance runs through nearly all heathen mythologies, as they chiefly relate to the same matters—such as how all things came into being, the conflict between good and evil, the phenomena of summer and winter, day and night, storm and sunshine, etc. They may be briefly classified as follows:—The Mythology of Savage and Semi-Savage Tribes. In it the powers of nature are looked upon as beings very like themselves, allied to and interchangeable with animals, and endowed with magical powers. There is recognised a dual principle, one of good and another of evil. Thus amongst the Aborigines of Australia the creative power is symbolised by the eagle-hawk, and the destructive by the crow. Amongst the Bushmen of South Africa an insect takes the place of a bird; and with the Indians of the prairies the coyote, or prairie-dog, is the subject of their myths of the origin of matter. But most savage tribes start their mythology with taking for granted the existence of the earth or sea. They do not trouble themselves with questions as to the beginning of creation. With the Maoris of New Zealand the heaven and the earth were at one time indissolubly united in a close embrace, and of them were born the gods, who cut them asunder. But these gods were engaged in incessant conflict, as is the case in every system of mythology.

We know very little of the myths of the far East, nor is it easy in a short space to give much idea of the different beliefs of India as contained in the Vedas. The philosophic tendency of the Oriental mind does not find much expression in myth or legend, which have found their most perfect development in the poetry of Greece. But the leading ideas of a creative power opposed by a destroyer are to be found in the myths of the East as everywhere else, but here we meet with the idea of sexual relationships between the gods, which is developed to such an extreme in classical mythology.

In Egypt Osiris was worshipped as the king and giver of life. He was the son of Seb, answering to the Greek Chronus, or Time, and was represented in human form. His great enemy was Typhon, the spirit of evil, who succeeded in killing him, and scattering his remains over the country. One of the chief objects of adoration was the sun-god Ra, and each divinity was symbolised by certain animals, such as the bull, the calf, the cat; and plants, as the tamarisk.

When we come to Greece the field is so large as to preclude any attempt to summarise it. Suffice it to say that almost every natural phenomenon was associated with the name of a god, the legends concerning which were in many instances grossly obscene. It is very difficult to say what the original sources of the stories that have come down to us were. No doubt they have been greatly disguised and amplified by the imagination of their narrators.

In Scandinavian mythology we meet with Loki, the evil spirit; and Odin, the all-powerful husband of Frigga, and father of Balder. "On the whole, the Scandinavian gods are a society, on an early human model of beings indifferently human, animal, and divine, some of them derived from elemental forces personified, holding sway over the elements, and skilled in sorcery."

The question now arises, How are we to account for the origin of all these myths? Men in a savage state accept them as true and undoubted facts; nor to them do I appear at all strange that a man should become a kangaroo, a bear, a snake, or a prairie-dog. Such they imagine they were before they became men, and such they are likely to be after they are dead. There is no inconsistency or contradiction in the ridiculous stories they hear about the world around them, for, beyond the outward resemblance, they recognise no difference between themselves and the wild animal they fear or which fear them. But it is very different with races that have any pretence to civilisation. Their prophets and teachers have been obliged to account for the absurdity of much of their legendary mythology, which indeed, had its natural effect in disgusting the more refined and reflective minds of Greece and Rome, and making them sceptical as to all religious teaching.

A very natural explanation was that of Euemerus the Messenian, B.C. 316, who maintained that the gods, equally with the heroes, were originally men, and all the tales about the only human facts, as they had been distorted and exaggerated by the imagination of their pious worshippers. In later times mythology has been spoken of as a disease of language. Professor Max Müller maintains that in the earliest stages of society men could only speak of what they saw under personal designations. Thus the sun would be to them the Shining One, the dawn of day the Burning One, and as the shining of the sun follows the dissipation of the cold and darkness of night they would describe the process as the Shining One following the Burning One, which gradually gave rise to the legend of Apollo, the God of Light, pursuing Daphne, who forthwith became a tree called Daphne, from its property of being easy to burn. In course of time the original meaning of the words used would fade away from the recollection of those using them, and remain only as proper names, so that what was originally understood as a plain statement of fact, such as the sunshine following the dawn of day, would become a romantic story of an amorous god pursuing a coy and fugitive maiden, who voided his embrace when overtaken by being changed into a laurel-tree. With great research and detail Max Müller endeavours to establish his theory, pointing out the close elationship existing between the names which a every branch of the great Aryan family of languages denote the different subjects of mythological lore. But it is hardly necessary to seek such an origin for mythology. To the mind of childhood the idea of personality comes naturally. The child does not inquire intently into the cause and origin of what assers around it. The storm, the sunshine, the thunder, the rain are to its imaginative ature sufficiently explained as being the acts of a personal being, and savage tribes are but children of a larger growth. And what at rst is to them a plain way of stating facts remains in later stages of mental growth a poetical representation of them. You say to child, as it trembles at the sound of the thunder, "That is the voice of God," and the child believes it to be so in a plain and literal sense. But when it grows up it uses the same language, to which, however, it attaches poetical or figurative meaning. Neither children nor uncivilised races can understand the phenomena unassociated with personal action. If anything happens, some one must have caused it. If the sun rides through the sky, Phaeton is driving his burning chariot: if the lightnings flash overhead, Jupiter is hurling his thunderbolts. Thus the earliest myths are those relating to physical events. After them come myths relating to ethics. They abound amongst all races, and are exemplified by such legends as Perseus and Andromeda, Jack the Giant Killer, and many others familiar to us as nursery tales. Then come storical myths, which have an inevitable tendency to gather fresh details as they pass from mouth to mouth. The stories of Hercules amongst the classics, and of Arthur in our own literature, are illustrations of these. Around a nucleus of actual fact gathers an accretion of fable.

But myth should not be confounded with allegory. They belong to different stages of social life, and are the results of different processes of mental working. Myth is only possible in the infancy of a race, allegory demands considerable mental development for its conception. Myth is the outcome of the unconscious action of the general mind of a whole people, allegory the result of a conscious and careful adaptation of means to an end on the part of an individual. It must have an object, myth has none. Allegory is meant to accomplish something yet to be done, myth to explain something already in being.

The chief subjects of myth, then, amongst all nations are: the origin of the world, the origin of man, sun and moon myths, death, and heroes; but all these have to be sought for amongst many books, for at present there exists no one trustworthy work on the very interesting subject of comparative mythology.

N

N or M.—The letters used to represent the child's answer to the first question in the Church Catechism, "What is your name?" Many explanations are given of the meaning of these letters; some say that they stand for typical Christian names, "Nicholas or Mary," others that they are a corruption of "N. or NN.," from the Latin Nomen or Nomina. But against this is the fact that before the sixteenth century no one received two names at baptism, and therefore Nomina would be out of place. It has been suggested that "N. or M." is a misprint for Nom. In the marriage service N. is the only letter used to represent the names of both parties.

Nag's Head Consecration. [Parker.]

Name.—It has been the custom from very early times to give the Christian name at baptism, probably in accordance with the practice of the Jews, who named their children at the ceremony of circumcision. It was usual also among the heathens to give their children names on the day when they were cleansed by lustration from natural pollution, and which was called "Dies Nominalis." There is no evidence in the works of early Christian writers to show that the Christians had adopted the practice, nor does the New Testament give any authority for it, but many instances are known of cases where new names were given at baptism, though many persons retained names which they had received before. It was usual in early times that Christian names should be taken from the Bible, or have reference to the Christian religion.

Names of Reproach. — From the earliest times the Christians have received nicknames, or names of reproach, from their enemies. The chief of these were [1] Nazarenes, a name given them by the Jews, which was adopted afterwards by a sect who kept up the Mosaical ceremonies with the Christian rites. [2] Valileans, a term always used by the Emperor Julian when speaking of the Christians. [3] Atheists, because they derided the worship of the heathen gods, and worshipped none that could be represented by art. [4] Greeks and Impostors. St. Jerome tells us that Christians in the streets were greeted by this epithet. Some say that they were called Greeks because of the proverbial falseness of that nation, and some because the Christian philosophers wore the Greek habit. [5] Magicians. The miracles of Christ and of his followers were frequently ascribed to sorcery, and Celsus and others said that he had studied magic in Egypt. Also the endurance shown by the martyrs was attributed to the same cause. [6] Sibyllists, so called by Celsus from the use by the Christians of the Sibylline books. [7] Biothamati, or self-murderers. [Parabolani and Desperati.] These names were given to them from their readiness to suffer martyrdom rather than deny their faith. [8] Samentarii and Semarii, from the faggots [sermenta] with which they were burnt and stakes [semanci] to which they were tied. [9] Cruvide, or cross-worshippers, and Asinarii, or ass worshippers, probably from the lowliness of the Redeemer's earthly state. Scrawled on the walls of Pompeii was found a crucified figure with an ass's head, underneath which was written, "This is the Christian's God." [10] Plantinian. They were so called by Celsus as a ridicule upon the poverty and simplicity of most of the early Christians, in which they were supposed to resemble Plautus, who was said, in a time of famine, to work for a baker.

The orthodox Christians often also received names of ridicule from the heretics. Thus the Novatians called them Cornelians, because they sided with Cornelius, Bishop of Rome, against Novatians; and also Apostatics, Capitolinus, and Synodarians, because they agreed to receive back penitent Apostates and those who had sacrificed in the Capitol into their communion. The Montanists called them Psychics, "earmang," as opposed to themselves, who were spiritual; the Millenarians, Allegorists, for looking upon the prophecy of a thousand years as allegorical; the Actians, Chroniles, because their religion was said to be temporary; the Manichaeans, Simplicies, or idiots; the Apollinarians, Anthropolatra, or man-worshippers; and the Origenists Philovarea, "lovers of the flesh."

Nantes, Edict of, issued by Henry IV., of France in 1598, secured to the Huguenots religious toleration so far as freedom of conscience went, but they were allowed their own worship only under certain conditions, and were obliged to observe the festivals and fasts of the Roman Catholic Church, Louis XIV., at the instigation of the Jesuits, revoked the Edict of Nantes in 1685, on the ground that there were no Protestants left in France; notwithstanding which, about a hundred thousand were driven from the country by the fierce persecutions which they underwent. Their ministers were expelled, their schools closed, and dragoons were quartered among them to get rid of them by any means short of murder. [Huguenots.]

Narthex.—The antechapel of an ancient Church in which the catechumens and "the hearers," or the second order of penitents, were placed. In some churches an outside corridor or cloister was called the exterior narthex, and was occupied by the "mourners" or those penitents who were in the first stage of their penance.

Natalis, Alexander. [Noel, Alexander.]

Natatoria or Natatorium.—The ancient name for a baptismal font or baptistry.

Nativity of the Blessed Virgin —One of the black letter days of the Church Calendar, Sept. 8th. The first record of its observance is in 687, when Pope Sergius I placed the Nativity among the festivals kept in memory of the Blessed Virgin. It was afterwards put into the martyrologies, and into Gregory the Great's Sacramentary. The Greeks and Eastern Christians did not begin to keep it until the twelfth century, but now do so with great solemnity.

Natural Laws, or laws of Nature, are simply statements of the orderly condition of things in nature. They state what is found in nature by a sufficient number of competent observers. Thus it has been found that specimens of air in different parts of the world have possessed about the same weight; hence it is inferred that the air everywhere has weight, and this is called a law of nature. Again, Newton observed that bodies fell to the ground at a certain rate, and from this and many like observations flowed the great law of gravitation, another law of nature and from this again three others, the three laws of motion. Sometimes the term Law of Nature is applied to the condition which is observed when several simple laws of nature act together; thus Darwin noticed that those species of plants and animals which could live and thrive on the plainest food, which could get their food most easily, and which could withstand the accidents of weather, and the attacks of their neighbours, with the least the ball in our hands, and, against the same law, we can throw it up into the air again. No law has been "violated;" intelligent will has merely brought other forces into play, which have temporarily suspended the most conspicuous effect of the law of gravity. Much of our life, as animals, is consumed in struggling against and modifying laws of nature, which would, left to themselves, work our death. Thus, we clothe our bodies to prevent that continual radiation of heat which, in winter at least, would be fatal to life. Now, in our case the interference is exactly known; but if God should see fit to suspend or counteract laws of nature, though He might employ means or other laws in a similar way, the means being unknown to us, what we call miracles would be produced. Such considerations may prevent us from falling into the mistake of looking upon miracles as violent interruptions to the course of nature. But whether God actually has thus modified and controlled the laws of nature is, of course, a different inquiry, and in the present day the question of the reality of miracles practically centres in the greatest of them, the Resurrection of Christ. Accepting this, as the Church does, all the others naturally follow.

Similar remarks will apply in the case of Prayer, since answers to many prayers must be of a miraculous nature—special providences, as they are called. If we can so much control and modify the action of natural laws, why is it not possible to God? But the question is, Will God thus interfere at our request? Some reply, No. God has foreordained everything; and to suppose that He would make any change because we asked Him, would be to admit that His arrangements were faulty and needed amendment; prayer, therefore, can only be useful to the one who prays by making him dwell on the goodness of God, arousing his faith, etc. It may, however, be replied that although God foresees all things, He has yet given us free-will, and has made us responsible for the use of our wills, so that, in a manner never explained to us, we have the ordering of our lives and conduct largely in our own hands, and that hence there must be room for prayer in the providential arrangements of God. Besides this, the promises that prayer shall be heard and answered are so emphatic and so varied [Matt. vii. 7, 8; Jas. i. 5; 1 John v. 14, 15], that we cannot doubt that God desires us to pray in the full belief that, under the conditions He lays down, we shall obtain our requests. [Prayer.] One condition of rightful prayer is that we should not put any hindrance in the way of its fulfilment; indeed, we ourselves are to further it as far as we can. It follows from this that we cannot expect an answer to our prayer if we are wilfully doing that which would make our desire impossible by a law of nature; for instance, natural laws tell us that a few grains of arsenic arm, would, in the long run, overpower and exterminate less hardy species, and this, the survival of the fittest," is sometimes called law of nature. As an illustration:—it has been found that the common English fly, because it is more thrifty and less dependent on surrounding circumstances, will, in time, exterminate the great blue-bottle of New Zealand. The laws of nature, collectively, re, briefly, then, the fewest and simplest assumptions, which being granted, the whole existing order of nature would result.

The further that scientific research is carried the more exactly is this "reign of law" found to prevail, so that we never look for any evasions from laws of nature; given certain conditions, we know that they will be allowed by certain other conditions; the former we call cause, the latter, effect.

To these laws of nature there are, in Christian doctrine, apparently two great classes of exceptions—miracles and the results of prayer. Thus we are brought face to face with the questions—Can we believe in miracles, which seem to contradict these laws? Can we believe that prayer will reduce any effect, when everything is regulated by law? The Deist, who believes that God created the universe and arranged it for all, but does not now interfere in its concerns, would say that the Laws of nature, as we call them, are the expression of God's mind and will, and that hence any interference with them, such as a miracle opposes, is impossible. The world, like a vast and perfect clock, has been wound up for all, and not the slightest deviation from its working is to be looked for. But it stands the case with those who believe in the beneficent rule of a Personal God, who tender mercies are over all His works? The general question of the credibility of miracles will be found discussed in the articles Miracles and Realization of prayer. In considering the relation of miracles to the laws of nature, it should be remembered that sin is always represented as having brought misery and disorder into the fair order of nature, whilst the effect of nearly all the miracles recorded in the Bible was to relieve misery to restore some degree of order. Again, many miracles were but extensions or intensifications of natural occurrences, e.g. some of the "plagues" of Egypt—the flies, the frogs, the locusts—and even our Lord's miracles of healing. We cannot, then, regard them as contrary to nature. Perhaps the simplest way of looking at miracles in regard to natural laws, is to compare them with our own ordinary power of modifying the effects of those laws. We cannot violate these, if we can control, or alter the direction of the action of many of them at pleasure; a ball, thrown into the air would, by the law of gravitation, fall to the earth, but we can arrest the action of the law by catching will destroy life: it would then be clearly useless to pray for deliverance from death if we deliberately took what we knew to be a fatal dose of the poison. Again, it would be improper, and probably useless, to pray for protection when amongst the sufferers in an epidemic of cholera, if, knowing and understanding the precautions to be used (i.e. the natural laws of the disease), we yet neglected them all when we might have observed them. God expects us to show our faith by using the reason He has given us, and conforming, as far as we know them, to the laws of nature, which are the general expression of His will, and therefore to be obeyed.

A very interesting question arises with regard to Natural Law: Have we any reason for supposing that laws of nature rule in the spiritual as well as in the natural world, or do they cease to have effect at the boundary line of Matter and Spirit? From time to time analogies have been traced between natural laws and spiritual laws, but Professor Drummond, in a remarkable book, Natural Law in the Spiritual World, takes up the position that spiritual laws are the same laws as natural laws; that the spiritual world is arranged on a like principle to the natural world, and that it is under a like governmental scheme. One example of Professor Drummond’s method must suffice. Numerous and exact experiments have conclusively proved that life can only originate from pre-existing life; that under no conditions can particles of dead matter, whether organised or not, acquire life by themselves. This fact of life only from life is known as the Law of Biogenesis in the natural world. Professor Drummond maintains that the same law holds good in the spiritual world. Except a man be born again. . . . Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit [John iii. 3, 5, 6].

As in the natural, so in the spiritual world, there is life only from life. The general argument is very interesting, and the analogies suggested are in many points striking, and in some cases seem of real value; but as a whole the contention not only does not seem to be made out, but very weighty reasons have been advanced, both from science and theology, against Professor Drummond’s cardinal conclusion.

Natural Theology.—The belief concerning the existence and the character of God which we derive from our observation of the phenomena of Nature. Thus Paley, in his work bearing this title, argues for the belief [1] in design, i.e. in an intelligent Creator; and [2] in the goodness of the Creator, judging from the arrangements observable in the Creation for promoting the happiness of the creatures. [God.]

Nave.—In modern churches, the central division of the body of the church, as distinguished from the aisles on either side. In ancient churches, the central portion as distinguished from the narthex or ante-chapel at the end, and the bema or chancel at the other. It was occupied by those worshippers who were in full communion with the Church, and also by the penitents of the third and fourth grades. In it stood the ambo, or reading desk.

Naylor, James, was born in Yorkshire. After serving as quartermaster for some time in Colonel Lambert’s regiment, he quitted the army and embraced the principles of the Quakers, but became "exalted with strange imaginations." Thus he rode into Bristol in 1656, a man and a woman holding his horse by the reins, and some others following after and singing the Tersanctus. The magistrates of Bristol seized and sent him to the Parliament, who tried and condemned him, as a blasphemer and seducer of the people, to have his tongue bored with a hot iron, to be marked in the forehead with the letter B to signify a blasphemer, then to be carried back to Bristol, where he should make his entry on horseback with his face to the tail, and then to be cast into prison for the remainder of his days. The Quakers disowned him, and condemned his extravagances; but afterwards, on his making a public recantation, he was received again into their society, and having gained his freedom, he publicly preached among them in London and other parts of England until his death in 1660. Neal, Daniel, a Dissenting minister and author, was born in London, Dec. 14th, 1678. He was educated at Merchant Taylors’ School, and in 1700 went to Holland, where he studied at Utrecht and Leyden. On his return to England he became assistant to Dr. Singleton, pastor of an Independent congregation in Aldersgate Street, whom he succeeded in 1706. He died at Bath in 1743. Neal’s first work was a History of New England, which was very favourably received in America; but the book for which he is known is a History of the Puritans, published in 4 vols. 1732-8.

Neale, John Mason, D.D., a learned ecclesiastical historian, and one of the best of English hymn writers [b. 1818, d. 1866]. He was educated at Cambridge, and ordained in 1841; a few years later he was appointed Warden of Sackville College, East Grinstead, and received no further preferment. He belonged to the Ritualist Party in the Church, and this brought him not only under popular dislike, but under the displeasure of the Bishop of Chichester, who for fourteen years would not allow him to officiate in the parish churches of his diocese. But he was a Neander, JOHANN AUGUST WILHELM, a cat ecclesiastical historian, was born at Cittingen in 1789. He was the son of a Jewish pedlar, and bore the name of David ended. His mother was a relative of the brated philosopher Mendelssohn. David’s cyouth was spent at Hamburg, to which mother, having been separated from her island, had removed. He entered the lege, where he soon attracted notice by his dustry and talent, and the influence of friends that he made there inclined him towards Christianity. This inclination was greatly strengthened by the perusal of Schleiermacher’s Discourses of Religion, first published in 1806, and in that year he was baptised

by the name of Neander [Gr. “a new man”].

Just before his baptism he wrote an essay

on religion, which, though rough and containing some errors, is characteristic of him,

and declares his intention of consecrating himself to God. He removed to Halle, where he studied under Schleiermacher, to whom he afterwards acknowledged himself to be indebted, though they differed in some points,

Neander being more positive and realistic in his views, and laying more stress upon the doctrine of sin as a free act and on the personality of God. After the French victory at Jena the University of Halle was shut up, and Neander arrived at Göttingen, where he studied under Planck and Heeren. It was here that he determined to become a Church historian. After a short stay in Hamburg he went to Heidelberg, where, in 1811, he took up his residence as a Privat Dozent, and wrote a Curriculum Vitae and De Fidei Gnososopia Idea secondum Clem. Alex. On account of his monograph, The Emperor Julian and his

Times, he was called to the newly-eslished University of Berlin as Professor of Church History, and worked there in conjunction with Schleiermacher, De Wette,

Marheineke, and other famous men. He continued at Berlin lecturing and writing,

and produced here his most famous works.

Between 1818 and 1826 appeared works of his on the Gnostics, A Life of St. Chrysostom, Memoriales of Christian Life in the Early and Middle Ages, Tertullian and his Writings, etc.

But these were only preparatory works to his great history, which appeared in five volumes between 1825 and 1845, Universal History of the Christian Religion and Church. His Life of Jesus in its Historical Relations was written to refute the celebrated work of Strauss.

As a theological teacher Neander was faithful and efficient, and he was complete master of his subject. His theology cannot be called entirely orthodox, especially on the subjects of inspiration, the sanctification of the Lord’s

Day, and the Holy Trinity; but he was deeply pious and reverent. His merit as a Church historian is that he struck out in an entirely different line to his predecessors. They had belonged to the pragmatic school, who looked on Christianity as a system of doctrine; while he, in his very first work, instead of merely discussing facts, brought out the hidden life of Christianity, realising throughout the presence of its Master and Leader. His idea of Church history is ably put forth in the introduction. “We look upon Christianity not as a system born in the hidden depths of man’s nature, but as a power which has come down from heaven, in that heaven which has opened itself to a hostile world—a world which in its unruffled and very earnest man, and la-

oured humbly and indefatigably at his desk, as well as in his hospital. The East Grinead Sisterhood, which took the lead in fur-ishing nurses to the sick, was founded by

m. His greatest work is his History of the eastern Church, a book of wonderful learning and interest, though it is incomplete. The completed portion comprises a very elaborate account of the Liturgies and Ritual of the east, and the History of the Patriarchates of Alexandria and Antioch. Another specialty

Dr. Neale’s authorship is his numerous books for children; Triumphs of the Cross,

ides of Christian Heroism, etc. etc., a collection for the most part of legends of early Christian martyrology, all marked by wonderful charm of style, though the tories, it must be confessed, are to be referred more as legends than as sound history.

The hymns are known far and wide. Probably the best known are those translated on the rhythm of St. Bernard of Morlaix,

Jerusalem the Golden,” “Brief life is here for creation,” etc. Scarcely less popular are those on Eastern sources, “Art thou weary?” “The ey is past and over.” In conjunction with the Rev. T. Holmavve, Dr. Neale published The ynnal Noted, a systematic translation of the hymns in use in the Roman Church, to which

r. Holmavve supplied the music from ancient sources. The book has been to a great extent superseded by Hymns Ancient and modern and other works which used the best

Dr. Neale’s hymns. The writer of this paper has an autograph letter from him, in which he gives a general leave to use any prayerful hymns of his on behalf of the church. A glance at the Table of Hymns of Authors in any collection of the present day will show how greatly we are indebted to

in. Other works of his are The Moral Con-dance of St. Antony of Padua (a collection texts arranged for sermons, mostly involv-ge a large amount of mystical interpretation),

istory of the Jansenist Church of Holland,

eral volumes of sermons, all more or less ystical, and a Commentary on the Psalms of e same character. Whatever judgment

ay be formed of his peculiar opinions, it will always be acknowledged by those who

new him that he was not only a man of markeable learning, but also one of humility,

unsellishness, and of saintliness.
essence, as well as in its origin, is exalted high above all that man can create with his own powers, and which was designed to impart to him new life, and transform him in his innermost nature."

He was also very apt in bringing out the individualities of those of whom he was writing and allowing them to speak for themselves, without mentioning his own feelings or opinions. This, however, sometimes led him into the error of dwelling too much on individual Christians instead of the whole Christian Church, of regarding Christianity as a succession of famous men. Another fault is in his style, which was too diffuse and monotonous, and his ignorance on political and aesthetic matters lessens the value of his discussions on Church government and sacred art. In his anxiety not to be too severe on heretics, he sometimes does injustice to the zealous opponents of sects. But in spite of these defects his work may be fairly called what he said Church history ought to be—"A living witness for the Divine power of Christianity, a school of Christian experience, a voice of edification, instruction, and warning, sounding through all ages, for all who are disposed to hear."

Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian Man.—A book which was published under the sanction of the King and Convocation in 1543. To distinguish it from its predecessor, the Institution of a Christian Man, which was commonly called "The Bishop's Book," it received the name of "The King's Book." Henry VIII. took a considerable part in the work of The Necessary Doctrine, which is full of traces of Gardiner's influence over him at the time of writing. For instance, the preface, which is probably the King's work, forbade any under the rank of the nobility and gentry to read the English Bible under penalty of a month's imprisonment for each offence.

Necessitarians or Necessarists [also termed Fatalists].—Those who believe that all things happen of necessity, or according to fixed laws. This doctrine of necessity is connected with that most profound mystery, the origin of evil, and hence deep thinkers in all ages have occupied their minds with this question. Necessitarians may be divided into:—[1] Those, like the Materialists and Positivists, who believe that in nature things could not possibly be otherwise than they are, and therefore that even the will of God is not free to alter or control them. [2] Those who hold that man's will is not free to control his actions, but that he chooses according to fixed laws of his Creator. The leading writer among modern Necessitarians was Hobbes, who argued that every act of man's choice is the result of a series of causes, God being the First Cause; and that if we could see the connection of these causes, we should, as God does, see and know that man, in everything, acts of necessity. Another writer of this school was Leibnitz, who grounded his optimist doctrine of Necessity on his theory of the perfection of the universe. Anthony Collins argued in favour of Necessity, on the ground that all our actions are controlled by some force external to ourselves. Locke also held similar opinions. But the two most widely read writers on Necessity were Dr. Priestley [b. 1733, d. 1804] and Jonathan Edwards [b. 1703, d. 1758], President of Princeton College, U.S. The former, who was a Materialist, adopted the views of Spinoza, and concluded from them that motives act upon the mind as weights in the scale, and that under certain conditions man will always act in the same way, his mind being as incapable of overcoming the motive or inducements brought to bear upon it, as the scale has of resisting the effects of the weight cast into it. President Edwards wrote two treatises on this subject, entitled An Enquiry into the Freedom of the Will, and The Doctrine of Original Sin. He argues that man may resist a certain amount of opposition to his will, but that his power of resistance limited, and that under certain conditions his will is powerless to resist. This he calls moral necessity. He argued, too, that God's foreknowledge is inconsistent with an absence of necessity in man's choice. The Unitarians and Rationalists are credited with extensive holding strong views in favour of Necessity.

Necrology [Gr. necros, "dead," and logos "a discourse"].—A collection of accounts of the lives and deeds of deceased persons, published soon after their death. Also a list of the deceased members or benefactors of any religious community.

Necromancy [Gr. nkeiros, "dead," and manteia, "divination"].—The art of revealing future events by conversing with the dead. It originated in the East, and amongst the Greeks it was said to have been the invention of Orpheus. Thessaly was the chief place where it was practised, and it was connect there with many horrible rites. A distinct class of people called Psychagogoi, "evokers of spirits," made it their profession. Its practice is condemned in the Old Testament, where there have a singular instance of it in the story the witch of Endor. With the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, necromancy was strictly forbidden. It is still practised by some of the negro tribes in West Africa. Traces of it are to be found in Scandinavian and Teutonic poems. In own days, some persons in the United States calling themselves spiritualists, pretend table-turning and spirit-rapping to hold converse with the spirit-world.

Nectarius.—Successor of Gregory Nazianzen as Patriarch of Constantinople in 3
Neophytes [Gr. "newly planted"] was a term used in the primitive Church for converts who had been recently baptised. Neophytes could not hold any offices in the Church; but when any enter the Roman Church they sometimes do so under special privileges from the Pope. The name was also given to those who had been newly received amongst the clergy or into any religious order.

Neo-Platonism.—A system of philosophy which became prominent in Alexandria about the end of the second century. Ammonius Saccas [i.e. the sack-bearer], so-called from his having been in former years a carriol, was at that time the chief teacher of this school. But long before this, Philo Judaeus, a contemporary of Christ, had prepared the way, and, by some, is regarded as the first of the Neo-Platonists. The chief aim of this school was to popularise and revive the doctrines of Plato, by showing that all that was true in current systems of philosophy was in harmony with Platonism. At Alexandria every system of philosophy and every religious sect had its representatives; Ammonius Saccas taught that all these were derived from one original and perfect standard of philosophy, which had been delivered to the Egyptians by Hermes, and had been preserved in its purity by Plato. The amalgamation of the mysticism of Egypt with the speculations of Plato formed the basis of Neo-Platonism; and with it were blended many of the doctrines of Aristotle and of the existing philosophies. Ammonius, who had been brought up as a Christian, held that Christ was a great and wise teacher; but that His followers were misled, and had corrupted His teaching by spurious additions, such as the Divinity of Christ and other doctrines.

Christ, he said, would be favourable to Neo-Platonism, for He came to check error, but not to abolish the true standard of philosophy. Hence Neo-Platonism as taught by Ammonius was hostile to, and became the powerful rival of, Christianity. Other prominent teachers in this school were Numenius, a Jew, Longinus, and Plotinus, and a powerful patron was found in Julian the Apostate. Plotinus consolidated Neo-Platonism, and reduced it to a definite system. The Supreme Being, according to this school, was a mystical Trinity, consisting of unity, or Primitive Light, the source of all things; intelligence; and soul, from which emanated all the souls of men and animals. The souls of men were considered to be kept in their bodies as in a prison, and hence self-denial and asceticism were enjoined as a means towards the release of the soul, and its rise above earthly things. The most distinguished pupil of Plotinus was Porphyry; in his time Neo-Platonism became strongly hostile to Christianity. Their last great teacher was Proclus, a man of great learning, who lived about 450. In 519 the id predecessor of St. Chrysostom. He warned the Church with great piety and moderation. Since the Novatian heresies were had a special penitential priest to receive the confessions of those who had lived deeply after baptism, but several cases had stopped in, and Nectarius abolished them.

Nectarius, Patriarch of Jerusalem from 360–72, wrote a preface to Mogila's Con- ission in 1662, a declaration against Rome, and a Greek treatise against the theses on apal Supremacy, published in Palestine to avert the Greeks to the Romish Church.

Neff, Felix [b. 1798, d. 1829], was a tive of Geneva, who was trained as a soldier who was converted during the religious vial of his native city, and having been dained in London, in 1823, went to the autes-Alpes, where he preached to the adenes, who had greatly degenerated in the and morals. His life was a very noble self-sacrificing one, and his labours were much blessed.

Nelson, Robert.—One of the large and edly list of English laymen who have done the service to the Church by their example and writings. He was born in London, 1656, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and 1680 was elected a Fellow of the Royal cety. He was intimate with Harley, with whom he travelled in France and Italy. He spent his life chiefly in writing. He refused to take the oaths of allegiance to King illiam, and remained a Nonjuror till 1709; died at Kensington, Jan. 16th, 1715, leaving much money for the poor. His chief works are—Life of Bishop Bull; Practice of the Devotion; Companion for the Festivals and acts of the Church of England, which is still the best book on the subject; The Life and writings of William Kettellwell; Letters to Clarke on the Trinity; and The Whole story of a Christian.

Neology. [Rationalism.]

Neonomians [Gr. neos, "new," and nom, "law"].—The name applied to the views some teachers at the end of the seventeenth story, who asserted that the old Law was irely abolished, and that Christianity was a new Law which had taken its place. It is one of the many controversies in which the forces of Antinomianism were brought on side and Legalism on the other. The nomians, while expressing their belief in action, added that "the very elect are not naturally justified until they receive Christ, remain condemned; that there is a full of pardon and glory upon the terms of Gospel to all who hear it, and that God relly requires them to comply with the terms." The principal teacher to whom name Neonomian was applied was Daniel Llywas [q. v.].
Emperor Justinian arbitrarily closed their school at Alexandria, and dispersed their followers, and by about the middle of the century they had disappeared altogether. But their system has greatly influenced Christianity in all ages. Origen was a pupil of Ammonius Saccas. Clement of Alexandria, and other divines, may be styled Christian Neo-Platonists, in that they, like Ammonius, sought to find out what was true in Platonism, and in every philosophy; and then to show that it was in harmony with the Christian faith. Truth, it was recognised, was not confined to any one sect or system. Thus Clement, in his Strom, i. 7, writes: "By philosophy, I mean not Stoic, Platonic, Epi-curean, or Peripatetic theories, but all sound teaching of the collective schools, all precepts of virtue that have connection with religious knowledge." At the Reformation, Neo-Platonism flourished for a time, especially in Florence.

Neot, St., was an Anglo-Saxon saint of great holiness and learning, who resided first at Glastonbury, and afterwards in Cornwall, on the spot where the present St. Neot's was afterwards erected. It is said that he had a great influence over King Alfred, to whom he was a kinsman. He died on July 31st, about 822.

Nepotism [Lat. nepos, "a nephew"].—The practice among ecclesiastics of conferring honours, titles, or privileges upon members of their family.

Neri, St. Philip, founder of the Oratorians, descended from two of the noblest families in Tuscany, was born at Florence in 1515. When he was eighteen he went to his uncle, who was a merchant, living at St. Germans, near Mount Cassino. It was intended that Philip should become his heir, but the youth feared being led away to a love of dissipation, and went to Rome, where he became tutor in the family of Galeotto Gaccia. Here he continued his studies, and his fame for learning and for purity of life became very great. He ate only once a day, and his food was generally bread and water. He was the disciple and intimate friend of St. Charles Borromeo [Βορρόμεω], and under him did many works of charity. In 1548, with the assistance of his confessor Persiano Rosa, he founded the famous Confraternity of the Blessed Trinity in the Church of Our Saviour del Campo for the relief of the poor. In 1551 he was ordained priest, and joined the community of St. Jerome, which had received the name of "The Charity." In 1564 he formed those who had joined him in the care of the hospitals, and who numbered about twenty, into the Congregation of the Oratorians, so called because they assembled for prayers in the oratory or chapel every morning and evening. The society obtained the approbation of Pope Gregory XIII., who gave to them the church of "Our Lady of Vallicella," of which they took possession in 1583. The Oratorians soon spread all over Italy, and were introduced into France in 1631. St. Philip died Mar. 26th, 1595. He was canonised by Pope Gregory X. in 1622.

The Oratorians were established in France in 1611, to the great disgust of the Jesuits. The Order increased, however, until the Revolution, when it went down rapidly; but has been revived of late years. The first congregation in England was established at Birmingham in 1847 by Dr. J. H. (since Cardinal) Newman, and in 1849 F. W. Faber set up another at Brompton. The church which they have since built on that site is one of the most magnificent in London.

Nero, Persecution of, took place A.D. 64, in the tenth year of the Emperor's reign. In July of that year a fire broke out in Rome, on the south side of the Palatine Hill and raged for some days, so that two-thirds of the city was burnt to ashes. Many believed that Nero himself was the cause of the fire, and, though there is no evidence to prove it, it is possible, from the fact his cruelty of disposition and his desire increased magnificence in the buildings Rome. He endeavoured to allay suspicion kindness to all who suffered from the fire, a laid the blame on the Christians, whom caused to be persecuted with great violence. Some were torn asunder by wild beasts others were crucified, and some were covered with pitch or other inflammable material set up on poles to light the gardens of Emperor's palace. [Persecutions.]

Nestorians.—Followers of Nestorius, who was Bishop of Constantinople from to 431. Formerly a monk of Antioch, he had gained some reputation as a scholar and orator, he was nominated to the See of Constantinople by the Emperor Theodosius and readily elected by the clergy and people to put an end to the distractions caused the claims of two rival Constantinopolitan candidates—Porcius and Philip of Side. began his episcopal career by showing himself extremely zealous for the extirpation heresy. After denouncing heretics in moderate terms in a sermon preached on day of his installation, he proceeded to accuse the Arians and other sects, prevailed on the Emperor to publish a edict against them. But it was not before Nestorius himself was accused heretical views concerning the nature of Lord. Many eminent divines, especially ti of the school of Alexandria, in their against Arianism, had been led to insist strongly upon the Divine nature of the Saviour as almost to exclude the idea of his human nature; and to assert of him as God which could strictly only be said of man. For example, God was said to be en born, to have suffered, and died. This advice was strongly condemned in a sermon read at Constantinople by Anastasius, a rebbe to whom Nestorius had brought with him from Antioch. Anastasius particularly urged the use of the term Theotokos (Hearer, Mother of God), which had been applied to the Virgin Mary by Athanasius and others, and was then in general use. Nestorius supported these views of Anastasius in numerous remains, in which, amongst other things, he maintained that it was not allowable to affirm at God was born, or that man may be wor-dipped; and proposed to replace the word Theotokos (which, however, he admitted in a rare sense) by Christotokos, i.e. Mother of Christ, urging that since both natures were sited in Christ, this term would express all the meaning that the older term was meant to mean. These sermons caused a great comotion in Constantinople. Proclus and others hamently opposed Nestorius, some even sing so far as to threaten to throw him into the sea; the Bishop, for his part, retaliated by depositing, banishing, or whipping such of his opponents as were under his authority.
The controversy spread, and soon reached crypt, where a number of monks adopted overseas views. Cyril of Alexandria, becoming aware of the dispute, entered the lists against the two Bishops, inflamed by a standing rivalry of their See, assumed momentum which the complexion of a personal arre. Cyril enlisted the aid of Celestine, shop of Rome, and addressed several letters Nestorius, the most important of which attained two anathemas, to which the shop of Constantinople was called upon to subscribe. Nestorius answered by sending twelve counter-anathemas.
At length a General Council was called at Ephesus by the Emperor Theodosius to settle the vexed questions, A.D. 431. John of Antioch and other Eastern bishops were able to reach Ephesus at the time appointed,
ring to the bad state of the roads.
Neve-eless, the Anti-Nestorians determined to en the Council, and a session was held under representative of Cyril. Nestorius was three times cited to appear, but, with his suffragans, was refused to obey in the absence of the dentals. After the third citation the question was discussed in his absence, and Nesrius condemned and deposed “in the name
our Lord Jesus Christ whom he hath asphamed.” The Emperor at first refused to ratify this sentence, but extensive bribery bought his Court over to the side of Cyril,
and he was at last prevailed upon to confirm the deposition, and consent to the consecration of Maximian, a monk, to the bishopric of Constantinople. Nestorius was banished to a monastery at Antioch, where he remained 1434. Maximian dying in that year, the Nestorian party urged the restoration of their leader, and the disturbance thus caused was so serious, that he was sentenced to be banished for life to the Great Oasis. Here he was taken captive by a wild people called the Blennyma, who devastated the Oasis.
On being released by these captors, he gave himself up to an officer of the Emperor in Egypt, under whose treatment he died [about A.D. 440].

The followers of Nestorius, being driven from the empire, wandered eastward, and settled in Persia, Ceylon, and on the Malabar and other parts of the coast of India. In the sixth century Nestorianism became the established religion of Persia, and all other forms of Christianity were forbidden. The absence of continuous written history prevents us from knowing accurately the course of the Nestorian Church. That they existed in China in the 8th century is proved by the fact that the Jesuits in the 17th century found there a monument set up by them in 781. In 1258 twenty-five Metropolitans acknowledged the authority of the Nestorian Patriarch of Bagdad. In the primacy of Archbishop Tait, repeated applications having been made by the Nestorian Christians for instruction and help, under isolation and oppression, Dr. Cutts was sent out to report on their condition. They have had, at least, the courage of their faith, however ignorant they may have been. Education has been more than once offered them by other Churches which had a purpose behind—namely, to proselytise them to their own views—a somewhat ungenerous method, and one which they greatly resent.
The wisest suggestion which appears to have been made with respect to them is, that means should be afforded of procuring their union with the Eastern Church, as represented by the orthodox Patriarchs. If Eastern Christians could be brought to understand one another better, and to see that their separation is largely owing to misrepresentations and misunderstandings, a great benefit would cure to Christianity. It would present an unbroken front to the reviving fanaticism of Islam, which threatens even yet to disturb very seriously the course of civilisation. And it would be a blessing to the English Church to be privileged thus to be the peacemaker.
A mission to them, set on foot by Archbishop Benson, has sent back a most interesting report, which will be found in the Guardian newspaper for Sept. 14th and 28th, 1886.
The object of this mission was to exhibit the doctrine and ritual of the Church of England, and its harmony with the Catholic antiquity which they claim, combined with learning in the Scriptures. The mission, as the report shows, was received with the most hearty welcome.

Newcastle, Bishopric of.—This diocese was founded in May, 1882, its first bishop being the Right Rev. Ernest Roland Wilberforce. It was taken out of the Sees of Durham and Carlisle, and comprises the entire county of Northumberland, the town and county of Berwick-on-Tweed, and part of Cumberland. It has 171 benefices. The officials of the diocese are two archdeacons, the vicar of St. Nicholas Church, Newcastle, and seventeen minor canons. The income of the See is £3,500 a year.

The church of St. Nicholas, which supplies the place of a cathedral, was consecrated by Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, in 1091. It was burned down in 1216, and there are traces of its first rebuilding; the present structure of the nave, however, dates from 1359, and portions of it were not built till 1474. The style is Decorated and Early Perpendicular. It contains nine side-chapels or chantries. It was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott between 1873 and 1877.

Newcome, William. Archbishop of Armagh, was born in 1729. He was educated at Abingdon Grammar School, and thence went to Oxford in 1753. In 1765 he became a D.D. and Chaplain to the Earl of Hertford, who was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. In the following year he was made Bishop of Dromore, whence he was successively preferred to Ossory in 1775, Waterford in 1779, and to Armagh in 1795. He died in 1800.

Archbishop Newcome was one of the eminent divines of the liberal school of the eighteenth century. He was an assiduous Biblical student, and wrote many valuable works, as Harmony of the Gospels, Observations on Our Lord's Conduct as a Divine Instructor and on the Excellence of His Moral Character, New Versions of the Twelve Minor Prophets and of Ezekiel, A Review of the Chief Difficulties in the Gospel History relating to Our Lord's Resurrection, and An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations from 1526-1776. The best of these is the Harmony of the Gospels, which contains much useful criticism and valuable information. It led to a controversy with Dr. Priestley on the duration of our Lord's ministry, Bishop Newcome arguing for three years, while Dr. Priestley limited the time to one year.

New Connexion Baptists. [Baptists.]

New Connexion Methodists. [Methodists.]

New Jerusalem Church.—A society that was founded by the followers of Swedenborg [q.v.], and so called because they hold that their Church is the "New Jerusalem" spoken of in the Apocalypse.

In December, 1783, five persons met together in London in answer to an advertisement for admirers of Swedenborg's writings, and these continued to meet at intervals, and by April, 1787, they had increased their number to thirty, and resolved to form a society. Amongst the first disciples were two clergymen of the Church of England, Thomas Hartley and John Clowes, also two Wesleyan preachers. The following is a copy of the Articles of Faith held by the New Church, not indeed written by Swedenborg, but drawn up at the Annual Conference of Ministers and Laymen.

The Articles of Faith of the New Church, signified by the New Jerusalem in the Revelation, are these:

1. That Jehovah God, the Creator and Preserver of heaven and earth, in Love Itself, and Wisdom Itself, or Good Itself and Truth Itself; that He, one, both in Essence and in Person, in whom nevertheless, is the Divine Trinity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which are the essential Divine, the Divine Humanity, and the Divine Proceeding, answering to the soul, the body, and the operative energy in man. And that the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is that God.

2. That Jehovah God himself descended from heaven as Divine Truth, which is the Word, and took upon Him Human nature for the purpose of removing from man the powers of hell, and restoring to man the powers of heaven, and making all things of God, and all things in the Church. That He removed from man the powers of hell, by combating against victories over them, in which consisted the great work of the Redemption. That by the same acts, wherein He was in the flesh, and was called Jesus, and was the Passions of the Cross, He united, in His Humanit divine Truth to divine good, or Divine wisdom, Divine love, and so returned into His Divinity with them, or all things natural and spiritual, together with and His Glorified Humanity; wherein He for ever has the infernal powers in subjection to Himself. At that all who believe in Him with the understanding from the heart, and live accordingly, will be saved.

3. That the Sacred Scripture, or Word of God is Divine Truth Itself containing a Spiritual sense heretofore unknown, whence it is Divinely inspired and holy in every syllable, as well as a literal sense or sense literal; according to every natural expression, containing an image answering to, and including, a spiritual or Divine idea. And thus, that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven, and conjunction with the Lord.

4. That the government of the Lord's Divinity Love and Wisdom is the Divine Providence; who is universal, exercised according to certain fixed laws of order, and extending to the minutest particulars of the life of all men, both of the good and of the evil. That in all its operations it has respect to what is infinite and eternal, and makes no account of things transitory but as they are subservient eternal ends; thus, that it mainly consists, with man, in the connection of the eternal things eternal; for that the continual aim of the Lord, by His Divine Providence, is to join man to Himself, and Himself to man; that He may be at all times in connection with every constitution of his body, every natural expression, every image answering to, and including, a spiritual or Divine idea. Thus, that the Word is the medium of communication with heaven, and conjunction with the Lord.
all in the natural world; but is received differently by every one, according to his quality and subsequent state of reception.

6. That man, during his abode in the world, is to his spirit, in the midst between heaven and hell, acted upon by influences from both, and thus kept in a state of spiritual opposition between God and evil; in consequence of which he enjoys free will, or freedom of choice, in spiritual things as well as in natural, and possesses the capacity of turning himself to the Lord and His kingdom, turning himself away from the Lord, and contracting himself with the kingdom of darkness.

and that, unless man had such freedom of choice, the Word would be of no use, the Church would be merely the name, man being unable which he could be joined to the Lord, and the cause of evil would be chargeable on God Himself.

7. That man at this day is born into evil of all kinds, or with tendencies towards it. That, therefore, in order to his entering the kingdom of heaven, must be regenerated or created anew; which work is effected in a progressive manner, by the Lord alone, by charity and faith as mediums to man's co-operation. That as all men are re-made, all men are capable of being regenerated, and consequently saved, every one according to his state.

And that the regenerated man is united in common union with the angels of heaven, and the unremorse with the spirits of hell. But that no one condemned for hereditary evil, any further than he makes it his own actual evil; i.e., waits till no die in infancy are saved, special means being provided by the Lord in the other life for that purpose.

8. That repentance is the first beginning of the church in man; and that it consists in a man's amending himself, both in regard to his deeds and intentions, in knowing and acknowledging his sins, confessing the Lord, supplicating Him for aid, and beginning a new life.

The good d, all evils, whether of affection, of thought, or of life, are to be abhorred and shunned as sins against God, and because they proceed from infernal spirits, who in the aggregate are called the Devil and Satan; and that good affections, good thoughts, good actions are to be cherished and performed cause they are of God and from God. That these things are commonly known as of old, but that, under the acknowledgment and belief that is from the Lord, operating in him and by him, he can so far as man sinns evils as sins, so far they are relieved, forgiven, removed, and are made as good, not from himself, but from the Lord; in the same degree he loves truth, has faith, and is a spiritual man. And that the Decalogue says in what evils.

9. That Charity, Faith, and Good Works are indelitely necessary to man's salvation; since charity thout faith is not spiritual but natural; and faith thout charity is not living but dead; and both charity and faith, without good works, are merely mental and perishable things, because without use or fixedness. And that nothing of faith, of charity, or of good works is of man, but that all is of the Lord, all the merit is His alone.

10. That Baptism and the Holy Supper are sacraments of Divine institution, and are to be summarily observed; Baptism being an external sign or symbol of introduction into the Christian Church and representative of man's purification and regeneration; and the Holy Supper being an external sign, to those who receive it worthily, of introduction into the Church of the Lord, and of connection with the Lord, of which also it is a sign and seal.

11. That immediately after death, which is only cutting off of the material body, the spiritual man rises again in a spiritual or substantial body, in which he continues to live to eternity; heaven, if his ruling affections, and thence his mind, have been good; and in hell, if his ruling affections, and thence his life, have been evil.

12. That now is the time of the Second Advent the Lord, which is a coming, not in Person, but in the power and glory of His Holy Word. That it is attended, like His first coming, with the restoration to order of all things in the spiritual world, where the wonderful Divine operation, commonly expected under the name of the Last Judgement, has in consequence been performed; and with the preparing of the way for a New Church on the earth, the first Christian Church having spiritually come to its end of consummation, through evils of life and errors of doctrine, as foretold by the Lord in the Gospels. And that this New or Second Christian Church, which will be the Crown of all Churches, and will stand forever, is what was representatively seen by John, when he beheld the holy city, New Jerusalem, descending from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband.

The general affairs of the New Church are administered by a conference of ministers and laymen. Its principal societies for spreading its doctrines are the "Swedish Print ing Society," established in 1810, and the "Missionary and Tract Society," established in 1821. Its disciples are found now in all parts of Christendom; its first minister in America was ordained in 1798, since which time it has made great progress.

At the present time there are in England about seventy-five societies, twelve of which are in London or its neighbourhood; they are governed by a Conference, which meets annually, and is composed of ministers and representatives of the societies. In America, where there is a still greater number of societies, they have a general convention composed of eleven associations and six societies. They have also societies in Germany, Austria, France, Switzerland, Italy, Norway and Sweden, Australia, and Africa.

Newton, Sir Isaac [at Woolsthorpe, Lincolnshire, 1642; d. in London, 1727].—The greatest mathematician England has produced. In spite of feeble health he made great progress in mechanics and mathematics; he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1660, became a Fellow in 1667, and two years later was appointed Lucasian Professor of Mathematics. In 1699 he became Master of the Mint, and continued to hold the office till his death. The wonderful discoveries by which he has gained for himself lasting fame were chiefly made in the earlier part of his life; but it is not with these that we have to do. In religion he was deeply earnest, but displayed a tendency towards Arminianism. He was devoted to Bible study, the results of which he published in his Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended; Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St. John; and a Historical Account of Two Notable Corruptions of Scripture.

Newton, John, one of the leaders of the Evangelical party, well known as the friend of William Cowper, was born in 1726. His mother, who was a Dissenter, had a great wish that her son should be brought up to be a minister, but she died when he was seven years old. This made a great change in Newton's life, for, though his father and stepmother were kind to him, they had no great love for him. At ten years old he left school, and went on several voyages with his father. He afterwards was for some years at Alicante, and when he was about eighteen a prospect was opened for him in the West Indies, but before starting he went to Kent on business, where he met and fell in love with Mary Catlett, who afterwards became his wife. He stayed there too long, and the ship sailed without him.

Through the teaching of his mother he had been seriously inclined in his youth; but he came across Shaftesbury’s Characteristics, and the tendency to infidelity which they created in him was increased by an evil companion, and for a few years he lived in vice and profanity. He went to Guinea, where he had intended to make his fortune in the slave trade, but he mismanaged his affairs and fell into great poverty. After two years of misery he wrote home, and a ship was sent out to fetch him. On the way home came the turning-point of his life. There was a storm, the ship was wrecked, and the crew momentarily expected it to sink. Newton was frightened as his past life rose up before him, and made resolutions which he kept, in spite of one relapse when he was again in Africa, but a fever which he had there again convinced him of his sin. During his convalescence he studied the Bible, Divinity, and Latin. On his return to England he was married, early in 1750, to Mary Catlett, whom he had now loved for seven years. He used to say that the thought of her had some influence over him, even at the time of his greatest wickedness, and his married life, which lasted forty years, was very happy.

He would have liked now to give up his seafaring life, but there was no other way of earning a living open to him. It was some years before he decided on entering the ministry. He would have preferred that of the Dissenters, but his wife persuaded him to become a minister of the Church of England, when the Bishop of Lincoln, in 1764, consented to ordain him to thecuracy of Olney. He only received £60 a year, so found it very difficult to live; but Mr. Thornton gave him £200 a year to enable him to do more good among the poor. He remained at Olney fifteen years, during which time a new gallery had to be added to the church to provide for the increasing congregation, and the number of communicants became very large. It was here that his friendship with Cowper began.

In 1779 he was opposed by a hostile party in the town, and at the same time the livings of St. Mary Woolnoth and St. Mary Woolchurch were offered him by Mr. Thornton, and he accepted them. There he preached assiduously, generally between three and six sermons a week, and his church was always crowded. He had not a good delivery, but his illustrations were very apt, and his words struck home to his hearers.

He died Dec. 21st, 1807, continuing his work till the end. He wrote a good deal, the chief of his productions being the Apologia or Defence of Conformity, the Memoirs of the Rev. J. Cowper, and of the Rev. Mr. Grimshaw, a collection of his letters entitled Cardiphonia, and the Olney Hymns, which he composed in conjunction with his friend Cowper.

Newton, Thomas, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's and Bishop of Bristol [6, at Lambeth, 1704, d. 1782]. He was educated at Westminster School and then entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and was ordained priest in 1730. In 1761 he was appointed Bishop of Bristol, and in 1763 Dean of St. Paul's. His life and writings, forming six volumes, passed into two editions. The volumes are thus divided: 1, Life and Parliamentary Speeches; 2 and 3, Dissertations on the Old Testament and on Moral Subjects; 4, Sermons; 5 and 6, Dissertations on the New Testament, and five Charges on—[1] reading the Scriptures, [2] the increase of Popery, [3] the licentiousness of the times, [4] the late attempts against the Church, [5] dissipative from schism. He also published in 1749 an edition of Milton's Paradise Lost [2 vols.], with critical notes, and a Life of the author.

New Year, Celebration of.—It seems to have been the custom of most of the ancient nations to mark the first day of the year with rejoicings, and we find tokens of among the Chinese, Romans, Jews, Egyptians, etc. In the early days of Christianity the Fathers made a protest against the feasts and revellings that took place among the heathens on that day, and preached sermons on the subject. When Dec. 25th was recognised as the day of our Lord's Nativi Jan. 1st, as the eighth day after, became a festival, the day of Christ's Circumcision and Dionysius Exiguus dates the years of the Lord from the circumcision of the Lord. Many old documents the day goes by name of "the octave of the Lord." E. when the day first began to be kept as a h day it was some time before Christians thought of it as the first day of the year; but at last became a custom for the priests to delive New Year's omination, which habit was continued until the Reformation. In some churches is now the custom to begin a service at p.m. on New Year's Eve, and continuing till after midnight, while almost all "ring old year out and the new year in."

New Zealand.—The islands which comprise New Zealand were first discovered b itchman, Abel Janssen Tasman, in 1642, at the first European who landed there was Captain Cook in 1769. He found that the habitants were a savage tribe of Maoris. They were cannibals, and there was some sitation about visiting their island; but in 1699 several of them came to Port Jackson, where they were welcomed by Dr. Marsden, an chaplain to the convicts [Marsden, MUEL], who, having learnt about the country and people, came to England, and on returned with a small party, sent by the church Missionary Society, who landed on the northern island on Dec. 20th, 1814. Marsden's success was slow but real; in 1822 the Rev. H. Williams, and in 1825 the Rev. W. Williams, joined the mission. A translation of the New Testament and Prayer Book was made in 1833, and three years after New Zealand was included in the new See of Australia. In 1840, at the request of the chiefs, the islands were put under British rule. An English settlement had already been founded at Wellington, followed by settlements at New Plymouth and Nelson. 1841 was founded the Bishopric of New Zealand, the first bishop being the noble bishop Selwyn, whose life is a splendid epitome in missionary history. St. John's College was founded at Auckland, and four diocesanes were constituted. In 1846 the bishops were sent to preach to a warlike tribe, and were martyred. The first nativeacon was ordained in 1862, and others soon followed. An insurrection took place in 1862, aided by William Tamihana, a native who claimed himself to be the angel Gabriel, and installed a religion composed of Romanism, Wesleyanism, Mahometanism, and Church sects.

There are now seven bishoprics. The diocese of Canterbury was founded in 1850, and became a bishopric in 1856. The diocese of Nelson, Wellington, and Waiapu were founded in 1855, those of Christ Church and Dunedin in 1866. It is said that in 1874 New Zealand there were of the Church of England 172 churches, and an attendance of 9,916; the Presbyterians had 125 churches, with an attendance of 18,541; the Wesleyans 38 churches, with 12,723 people; Roman Catholics 56 churches, in attendance 19,567; Methodists, Free Methodists, and Congregationalists, an attendance of about 3,000 each.

The following is a percentage table of the denominations of the country according to the census of 1878:

Nicæa, Council of.—This was the first council in which East and West met together, and hence it is the first of the four general Councils of the Church. The peace of the Church had been greatly disturbed by the teaching of Arius and his followers concerning the Divinity of Christ, whereupon the Emperor Constantine, being anxious to see the Church united and at peace, summoned a General Council to meet at Nicea in Bithynia, in June, 325, to settle the questions at issue. Nicea was chosen as the place of assembly partly because of its healthy situation and partly on account of its nearness to the seat of government, Nicomedia, twenty miles distant.

The number of bishops who attended the Council has been generally received as 318; and each bishop had two presbyters and other attendants, so that the whole assembly numbered, according to some accounts, over 2,000. As Arianism was of Eastern growth, and unknown in the West, the great majority of the Council were Eastern bishops, only about ten coming from the West. The composition of the assembly was of a very mixed character. There were deputies from Egypt, headed by Alexander, the aged Bishop of Alexandria; in attendance upon him was a young deacon, twenty-five years of age, represented as small and insignificant, but who was none other than the great Athanasius, the champion of the orthodox; from Alexandria also came Arius, the leader of the opposite party. There were also bishops from Syria, including Eustathius of Antioch; Eusebius, the historian, of Cesarea, who was suspected of being an Arian; one bishop came from Persia, another from Armenia others from Asia Minor, Greece, and Cyprus. Another conspicuous bishop was Eusebius, of Nicomedia, a strong Arian. It was from his handsthat the Emperor Constantine, on his deathbed, received the rite of Baptism. Alexander, a presbyter, and Ace- sius the Novatian, represented Byzantium; and Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra, was a prominent speaker on the orthodox side; all these came from the East. The West was represented by deputies from France, Calabria, Sicily, and Milan. Rome sent two presbyters, Victor and Vincentius, her Bishop, Sylvester, being too aged to be present. From Carthage came Caecilian, and from Spain Hostus, Bishop of Cordova, who is represented as holding the chief place in the Council at the Emperor's right hand. The sight of these Fathers of the Church was rendered deeply impressive by the fact that the majority of them bore traces of the severe persecutions through which they had passed. They were truly an army of confessors; and for this reason they were peculiarly qualified to testify what was the true faith of the Church. Many heathen philosophers were attracted to Nicea, and discussed with the bishops outside the Council.

On the arrival of Constantine, the Council was formally opened; first, an address to the Emperor was recited by Eusebius of Cesarea, and a thanksgiving to God for the Emperor's victory over Licinius. Constantine from his throne in the midst of the Council, then addressed the assembled bishops, exhorting them to unity and concord; and then, in order to promote this desirable end, he openly in their presence burnt all the written complaints and accusations that various bishops had laid before him, adding these words: "It is the command of Christ that he who desires to be himself forgiven must first forgive his brother." Coming now to the main purpose for which the Council was assembled, viz. the determining of the faith which had been attacked by Arians, it seems certain that Arians were heard in defence of his opinions, and that he boldly adhered to them; whereupon the assembled bishops raised their hands and closed their ears in horror at such blasphemous words. Arius was expelled, and the Council set themselves to issue the result of their deliberations in the form of a creed, setting forth the true faith. First of all Eusebius of Caesarea presented a creed which had been long in use in Caesarea; the Arian bishops, about eighteen or twenty in number, were willing to sign it; but as this creed evaded the very points at issue, a very important phrase was inserted, viz. _homoousion to patri—"of one substance with the Father, and other alterations. The creed of Caesarea was then adopted as the faith or creed of the Council of Nicaea. The Emperor acquiesced in the decisions of the Council, banished Arius and his followers, and ordered all the heretic's writings to be burnt. He further decreed to banish any who refused to subscribe the Nicene Creed. Theonas and Secundus were the only two bishops who persevered in refusing to subscribe to the Creed, and they were banished.

The following anathema was added to the Creed:

"But those that say 'there was when He was not,' and 'before He was begotten He was not,' and that 'He came into existence from what was not,' or who profess that the Son of God is of a different 'person' or 'substance,' or that He was created, or changeable, or variable, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes them."

Another question was settled by this Council, viz. the date for keeping Easter. The Council decreed by common consent [i] to discard the custom of keeping the Christian Passover on the same day as the Jewish, viz. the 14th of Nisan, and [ii] to keep it on the Sunday that came next after the full moon of the vernal equinox.

The Council, before breaking up, passed twenty canons for the correction of abuses, and for regulating the discipline and government of the Church. Of these twenty Nicene canons, the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 17th refer to the morals and behaviour of the clergy; the 17th, forbidding usury; the other three restraining abuses now happily extinct. The 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 15th, 16th, and 18th refer to clerical discipline. The 4th is still observed throughout the greater part of Christendom and orders three bishops at least to be present at the consecration of a bishop. The 5th limits the power of the bishop, by ordering a Synod to meet twice a year, in order to investigate the cases of those excommunicated. The 6th and 7th preserved to the Metropolitan of Alexandria, Antioch, and Caesarea their ancient privileges. The 15th has been generally disregarded throughout the Church; it forbids the translation or promotion of ecclesiastics from one city to another. The 18th restrains the powers of deacons, who in the age practised a kind of tyranny, which had been imitated by the other orders of the ministry in later times. The 16th forbids bishops to ordain outside their own diocese. Other canons refer to the cases of those who have "lapsed" in times of persecution, laying down on what conditions such are to be received back into the Church. The last canon of the 20th, directs prayers to be offered up, the people standing.

Another question, of local interest only, was settled, viz. the Melitian schism in the Church in Egypt.

The work of the Council was now completed. The Emperor, in a letter to the Churches throughout the empire, set forth the settlement of the Arian and Paschal controversies; and, having entertained the whole of the bishops present at the Council, dismissed them to their dioceses, exhorting them to prize concord above all things, and beg to pray for him. The Council, which had commenced probably in June, closed with the banquet on July 25th.

Nicander, Sr., and Marcian, Sr. Martyrs in the reign of Diocletian. They were soldiers in the Roman army until the conversion to Christianity. Being brought before the Governor Maximus, they were charged with disobedience to their prince and impiety to the gods of the empire. The imperial edict was read, which obliged all to sacrifice to the heathen deities, and they were accordingly required to comply with it immediately. Maximus, however, said would make the matter as easy as he could and not insist on any great and solemn sacrifice, but be satisfied with their throwing little incense into the fire in honour of the gods. They persisted in their refusal to do this, and Daria, the wife of Nicander, urged her husband to remain steadfast in his faith even begging that she might herself share his martyrdom, and she was consequent imprisoned, but afterwards released. Nicand and Marcian were beheaded, June 17th, aed 303. The place of their martyrdom is supposed to be Mosia, a province of Illyricum, but some say that it was Venafro, in the kingdom of Naples, and that it was in the reign of Domitian.

Nicene Creed. [CREED, NICENE.]
Nicophorus I., Emperor of Constantinople, was originally Treasurer and Chancellor. In 802 he took possession of the throne, banishing the Empress Irene to Lesbos, where she died shortly after. He is ascribed as being of a licentious, rapacious, and cruel character. In his relations with the Church he heavily taxed Church property, favoured the Iconoclasts and sects, especially the Paulicians, and prohibited the Bishop of Constantinople from carrying on a correspondence with the Pope of Rome. He was ill in A.D. 811, in a war with the Bulgarians.

Nicophorus II. [Phocas] became Emperor in 963. He published a decree, providing that no bishop should be installed without the consent of the Emperor, and appointed officers to the charge of vacant sees, with orders to spend a limited amount for ecclesiastical purposes, and to pay the rest to the royal treasury. He was murdered in 969 by John Tzimisces, who succeeded him.

Nicophorus, St.—A martyr of Antioch during the persecution raised by the Emperors Valerian and Gallienus. He was a young man, and was a great friend of one Sapprius, a priest. But discord rose up between them, and for a time they never met. At last Nicophorus attempted a reconciliation, at it vain. The persecution breaking out, Sapprius was seized for his religion, tried, and, after going through great torture, was condemned to be beheaded. Nicophorus, as he were leading the priest to execution, came to him and intreated to be forgiven, at his request was refused by Sapprius. Mounting the scaffold the priest renounced the Christian religion, and thus saved his own life. Nicophorus did what he could make him persever, but to no purpose, declared himself a Christian, and ready to suffer in the apostate's stead, and was martyred 1 Feb. 9th, 260.

Nicholas, St., Archbishop of Myra, as born in the middle of the third century at Patara, in Lycia, of Christian parents. He entered the Monastery of Sion, near Myra, became Abbot, and was noted for his charity and benevolence. One of the deeds ascribed to him is that of throwing three bags of gold to the house of a poor nobleman who was able to furnish a dowry for his three daughters, and was tempted to sell them to a of shame until Nicholas thus delivered them. This constituted him the patron saint of virgins. Soon after his return Nicholas was chosen Archbishop of Myra. He is supposed to have died on Dec. 6th, 342.

The three balls, the attribute of St. Nicholas, are either the three bags of gold before spoken of, or three loaves of bread, an emblem of his charity. The fact that the three balls are the sign of pawnbrokers has a curious origin.

The three gold balls were a conspicuous object on the spire of St. Nicholas Church, Lombard Street, and as in the Middle Ages the money-brokers had their head-quarters in this street, it became the fashion for persons who set up as money-lenders to use the three balls of St. Nicholas as their trade mark. Nicholas is also the patron of thieves, because he forced them to return some property they had stolen; of sailors, because he stilled a storm when journeying to the Holy Land; and of children, because he is said to have restored to life three boys who had been murdered, dismembered, and put into a tub of wine. St. Nicholas is one of the most popular of saints, the chief patron of Russia and of Venice, Freiburg, and many other towns, chiefly seaports. There are said to be 372 churches dedicated to him in England.

Nicolaitanes.—A heretical sect, holding the doctrines of Antinomianism, and condemned in the Book of Revelations as holding "the doctrine of Balaam . . . to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication." Probably it was these whom St. Paul described as "gloriing in their shame, mind- ing earthly things." The Nicolaitanes are thought by some to derive their name from Nicolas the proselyte; others believe that the name is only the Greek form of Balaam, "destroyer of the people," of whom they were supposed to be symbolical. They are spoken of by Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria as being in existence in the second century; and Epiphanius says that the sect became merged in that of the Gnostics.

Nicole, Peter, was born at Chartres in 1625. He was a strong Jansenist, on which account he joined the Port Royalists, and became celebrated as a great preacher. He died in Paris, November, 1695.

Nicole assisted Arnaud in several works, as the Perpetuity of Faith and Logic of Port Royal. He translated Pascal's Provincial Letters into Latin, and wrote notes upon them. His chief original works are Essais de Morale, controversial tracts against Calvinism, a treatise of the unity of the Church, and a treatise concerning the Quietists.

Nicomedes, St.—This saint, during the Domitian persecution, attended the Christians while in prison, giving them all the assistance and comfort in his power. He also found means of giving their bodies a decent burial in spite of their persecutors, who would have interfered them as public criminals. While burying the body of St. Felicula, he was apprehended and beaten to death. He is commemorated on Sept. 15th.

Nihilists.—A sect that maintained that it was impossible for God to become man, inasmuch as God is unchangeable, therefore that Christ was not different after His Incarnation to what He was before. The Incarnation was a Theophany, and God suffered Himself to appear man. This theory, though not so strongly put, was started by Abelard at the beginning of the twelfth century, but greatly developed and brought into notice by Peter Lombard some years later. The sect was strongly opposed by John of Cornwall and Walter St. Victor, and finally condemned by the Lateran Council which met in 1179. In the course of the fourteenth century the name was applied to a German sect of a very short-lived existence, who declared that God, the devil, man, heaven, hell, good, and evil did not exist, only appeared to do so, that everything was nothing, in fact.

Nimbus or Aureole.—A circular disc surrounding the head of Christ, and of saints and angels, symbolising the light which was supposed to proceed from those filled with the Holy Spirit. It was used in very ancient times by the Egyptians, and the Romans adopted the symbol for the heads of those invested with power. The Christians adopted it in the fifth century, and applied it first to Christ, then to the angels, and finally to the saints. The nimbus round Christ's head was sometimes triangular, symbolising the Trinity.

Ninian, Sr.—The apostle of the Southern Picts, who lived in the fourth century. He was the son of a Cumbrian prince, and resided some time at Rome, where he was instructed in religion and then returned to his native town. He built a stone church, which the Britons, having never before seen a building of stone, named _Conceda casa_, or White House, which was afterwards called Withern. Here he fixed his See, dedicating the church to St. Martin. Ninian converted the Cumbrians and Southern Picts as far as the Grampians, and his followers did great good through the whole land. He died Sept. 16th, 432.

Nitzsch, Karl Immanuel, one of the most distinguished of modern German theologians, was born at Born, in Saxony, in 1787. His father was Professor of Theology at Wittenberg, an ardent follower of Kant. The son was also educated at Wittenberg, where his principal theological teacher was Reinhard, one of the last Supernaturalists; but his teaching was soon counteracted by the influence of Schleiermacher and Daub. In 1810 he became Assistant Pastor, and subsequently Parish Minister, at Wittenberg. His opinions soon made themselves felt, and he was considered one of that new school, of which Neander is the head, who endeavoured to reconcile faith and science, not by forced methods, but by showing in their own lives that union of reason and reverence for which they argued in their writings. In 1822 Nitzsch was called to Bonn as Professor of Theology and University Preacher, and laboured there for over twenty years, writing and busying himself in all matters concerning the Prussian Church. He wrote several treatises in favour of the union between the Lutheran and Reformed branches of the Church, and was one of the leaders of the General Synod which met on the subject at Berlin in 1846. In the following year he succeeded Marheineke at Berlin, where he became Professor of Theology, Universitary Preacher, and Upper Consistorial Councillor, and in 1854 Provost of St. Nicola Church. He died Aug. 21st, 1868.

Nitzsch and Twisten have been considered the principal followers of Schleiermacher's theology, though they differed in some points as in God's relation to the world, the Divine attributes, etc. He was also one of the founders of the German Evangelical Church Diet, which first met in 1848. His chief work is his _System of Christian Doctrine_, showing the moral bearing of all the articles of faith and the doctrinal root of all the Christian virtues. He takes his material wholly from the Bible, and in a number of notes refers to later opinions and systems. Another notable work is his _Practical Theology_. In 1853 appeared A _Protestant Answer to Möhler's "System of Christian Doctrine,"_ and he also wrote against Strassen a work on _Dogmatistics_. His other works consist chiefly of sermons, and of various articles which appear in the theological journals.

Noailles, Lewis Anthony de, Cardinal, was born in 1651. He became Doctor of Divinity at Paris in 1676, Bishop of Cahors in 1679 and of Châlons upon the Maine in 1681, and Archbishop of Paris in 1695. He strongly opposed the Quietists, writing treatise entitled _A Pastoral Instruction touching Christian Perfection and the Inward Life against the Delusions of the Pretended Mysticism in 1697_. In 1700 he became Cardinal with the title of St. Mary Minor. He died May 4th, 1729.

Nocturns.—These were prayers said during the night. In the Roman Church the Psalter is divided into portions consisting each of nine psalms, each of which portion is called a nocturn. Nocturnal prayers: read on the vigils of feasts.

Nocturnal services seem to have been used in the earliest times of Christianity. During the persecutions, services were held at night to avoid detection, and, when all fear was over, the custom was still continued. Nocturnal services became very frequent when coenobitical or monastic life grew a flourishing.

Noel, Alexander [b. 1639, d. 1724] Ecclesiastical writer of the Gallican Church and Provincial of the Dominican Order fr 1706. He wrote _Select Chapters of Ecclesiastical History_, and an Old Testament history. Gallicanism gave so much offence that his work was placed on the Index Exemplarum by Pope Innocent XI.; but Noel defended himself w...

Noel, Baptist Wriothesley [b. 1799, d. 873], was educated at Cambridge and ordained a Church of England, becoming Incum ten of St. John's, Bedford Row; but he left the Church and became a Baptist minister. He was the author of Essay on Christian baptism, Letters on the Church of Rome, A Selection of Psalms and Hymns, etc.

Noetians.—Followers of Noetus, who founded a sect of Monarchianism. Noetus was a native either of Ephesus or Smyrna. He put forward his theory at Smyrna, and was excommunicated about 230 by a synod e refore which he was summoned; afterwards he gathered around him numerous followers, and founded a school in which to teach his doctrines. He died shortly afterwards, but his theory was taught by his disciples, chief among whom were Sabellius and Epiponus. The heresy spread and was adopted by many Christians in Rome and elsewhere. [See ATRIPASSIANS.]

Nominalists.—One of the parties into which the Schoolmen were divided in the seventeenth century. That general notions exist, we all admit, and some sort of classification comes natural to us. Thus we distinguish between trees and horses, we form notions of men which exist no doubt in the mind alone, but we realise that there is a form or idea of men which must have been in the mind of the Creator. The general properties which certain things share alike, and which we abstract in our minds from the particular things that exhibit them, were known by the Schoolmen as Universals. Thus we realise the words "whiteness," "truth," "animal." Then the Schoolmen proceeded to enquire—Are these "universals" real existences? or are they mere modes of intellectual presentation that have no real existence except in our thoughts? The Nominalists maintained that genera, species, etc., of all individual objects, and that there nothing general except names. Thus the name "circle" is applied to everything that is round, and is a general name, but no independent fact or property exists corresponding to the name. Some Nominalists held that the names of the Holy Trinity are the names of three Individual Substances, and that the unity of the Trinity is a mere verbal expression. This school of thought is thus directly opposed to the Realists [q.v.].

There were, however, shades and degrees of nominalism. Thus Roscelin, the Canon of Ompagne, who was compelled to retract his anti-Trinitarian heresies at the Council of Pistoia [ROSCELIN], was an Ultra-Nominalist, holding that the only realities are individual things which we group together by the aid of mere names. His pupil, Abelard, held the Sabellian doctrine concerning the Trinity. In the fourteenth century William of Occam, an English Franciscan friar and a pupil of Scotus, revived the Nominalist theory in modified form, which was maintained by many eminent men. The controversy subsided at the Reformation.

In more modern times the chief Nominalists have been Hobbes, Hume, and Dugald Stewart.

Nomination.—The act of appointing a person to any office; in the Church of England, the act of presenting a clergyman to any ecclesiastical preferment. Sometimes it may be distinguished from a presentation, as the lord of a manor may have the right of nominating a man to some benefice under his patronage, but can only refer him to the ordinary for presentation.

Nomocanon.—A Greek name for a collection of canons, with the addition of those civil laws to which they refer. The first collection of this kind was made by John of Antioch, Patriarch of Constantinople, about the year 554, and was divided into fifty titles. Photius of Constantinople made another nomocanon about the year 885, reducing the heads to fourteen. Balsamon wrote a commentary upon it, about 1180, showing what was, and what was not, in use in his time, etc. In 1255 Arsenius, monk of Mount Athos, wrote notes on it showing the conformity of the Imperial laws with the Patriarchal constitutions. The third collection was made by Matthias Blaistes, monk of the Order of St. Basilius, in 1335, and was named the Syntagma—that is, a collection of canons and laws relating to each other.

Non-Communicating Attendance.—The custom of remaining in church during the Holy Communion without receiving, usual in many Anglican churches at the present day, is the subject of much controversy. In the Roman Catholic Church it is, we need not say, a usual thing, inasmuch as every man is bound to be present at Mass on "days of obligation," but is not bound to communicate, in fact, cannot do so without previous confession. But non-communicating presence in the Church of England, whatever may have been the custom in Reformation times, had quite died out in the beginning of this century, but has been, as we have said, revived in some churches. It is said in defence of it that the Holy Communion, the chief of all Christian acts of worship, had come to be altogether neglected, except by a few; that this service, a preaching of Christ in act, a "showing forth of the Lord's death," which ought to be made the one characteristic ser tice of the Lord's Day, was turned into a service to be observed by those who professed a higher holiness than the general, not into a worship which all believers in Christ might rejoice in. To this it was replied that the Lord's Supper is a Communion, a Feast to be partaken of, not a Sacrifice to be adored. It is obvious, then, that the question turns upon the deeper question: Is the Eucharist a sacrifice? This has been discussed elsewhere. We have here to inquire what was the intention of the compilers of the Liturgy. In the Convocation of 1663, the Puritan party proposed a Canon that "That no person abide in the church during the time of the Communion unless he do come communicative; that is, they shall depart immediately after the exhortation be ended, and before the confession of the communicants." This was opposed by the Catholic party, and rejected by the Convocation. [See Strype's Ann., vol. i. p. 340.] In accordance with this, the Convocation of 1664 passed the following Canon [xvii.]. After giving direction for proper reverence in church, it proceeds: "None, either man, woman, or child, of what calling soever, shall be otherwise, at such time, busied in the church, than in quiet attendance, to hear, read, mark, and understand that which is read, preached, or ministered; saying in their due place, audibly with the minister, the Confession, the Lord's Prayer, and the Creed; and making such other answer to the public prayers as are appointed in the Book of Common Prayer; neither shall they disturb the service or sermon by walking or talking, or any other way; nor depart out of the church during the time of service or sermon, without some reasonable or just cause."

There is added another Canon, directing the churchwardens to see that all stay to the end; first, they are to see that all parishioners resort to the parish church on Sundays and holidays, adding, "and there continue the whole time of Divine Service" [Canon xc.], "and if they do not obey, they are to be presented to the ordinary of the place."

It may be considered further that there is apparently no assumption that any person will withdraw during the service; there is no rubric directing a pause for the purpose, but the service goes straight on unbroken. Probably the rubric which directs that intending receivers shall give their names beforehand is intended that the minister may know for how many to prepare.

With regard to the practice of the early Church, Bingham (Ant. b. xviii. c. i. s. 6), shows that the Canons of the Council of Nicea [xi. and xii.] did not only allow, but required attendance without oral communion in certain cases. He remarks, "In all which we may remark, that the word 'communicating' does not always signify partaking of the Eucharist, but communicating in prayers only without the oblation, which is but an imperfect sort of Communion." The Council of Nicea calls this communicating with the people in prayers only. Of the order of penitents, the consistentes were the fourth. They were so called, says Bingham, "from the having liberty [after the other penitent, energumen, and catechumens were dismissed to stand with the faithful at the altar, and join in the common prayer, and see the oblation offered; but yet they might neither make their own oblation, nor partake of the Eucharist with them."

Nonconformists.—This term, as not in use, includes all who abstained from the worship of the Established Church of England on the ground of conscience, and in this sense is synonymous with the word Dissenters [q.v.]. But in a stricter sense it was applied to those ministers who were ejected from their livings on their refusal to submit to the Act of Uniformity passed by Charles II. in 1662. The number of these was about 2,000, and their burdens were increased by the passing of the Convincing Act in 1664, which they were prohibited from meeting any number greater than five, in any other manner than was allowed by the Liturgy or practice of the Church of England. This was followed in 1665 by the Five Mile Act [q.v. on Nones] and in 1673 by the Test Act [q.v.]. This last Act was intended to deprive them of all political power and religious influence. Among the ejected clergy were some of the most pious and learned divines of the day, Baxter, Howe, Flavel, Philip Henry, etc. James I. showed a decided disposition at first to crush the Nonconformists, as evidenced in the trial of Baxter, but he afterwards relaxed the laws, hoping to gain toleration for the Rom Catholics, and published his Declaration of Liberty of conscience. Soon after the accession of William III. the Toleration Act was passed, which granted to the Nonconformists a partial relief, and in George I. I. reign the laws against them were never enforced. The Bill of 1829 removed parliametary disabilities, not only from the Nonconformists, but also from the Rom Catholics.

Nones. [Canonical Hours.]

Nonjurors.—Those clergy of the Church of England, about 400 in number, who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution of 1688 and were therefore deprived. Among the were the Primate (Archbishop Sancroft), a Bishops Ken, White, Frampton, Loyd, and Turner. The deprived bishops of course held that their successors were schismatical intruders, and regarded themselves still as holders of their sees. Sancroft, feeling himself bound to offer all legal resistance, remained in his palace at Lambeth, in the hope which many who had taken the required oath shared, that the schism might even yet be avoided, and the Government had some hope that the oath might yet be taken. Though it was prescribed to be taken before August 1 rigid in their Anglicanism. In 1717 began the division on "Usages." The principal of these were those connected with the Eucharist, i.e. the mixed cup and the other uses of King Edward VI.'s First Book; the others, not so connected, as Trine Immersion at Baptism, were also all found in the book of 1549. These Collier and Brett, with Campbell and Gadderar, the Scotch bishops, wished to see restored. Howes, Spinckes, and Gandy, were for retaining the Anglican book of 1662. Much was written on both sides, and Collier published in 1718 Offices of Holy Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, and Visitation, which differed little from those of King Edward. This division also led to a further division, in that the "Non-Usagers" refused to join any longer in negotiations for a union with the Greek Church, which had already been begun, but fell through on the death, Feb. 8th, 1725, of Peter the Great of Russia. The divisions, however, on the Usages outlasted Collier's life. He died, April 26th, 1726, and was buried in St. Pancras Churchyard.

Before his death, fresh bishops had been consecrated by both parties (the Non-Usagers again obtaining the help of Scotch bishops); but afterwards, about 1730, the disputes subsided, and all the bishops joined in communion except one, John Blackburn, consecrated 1712, who still firmly adhered to the Anglican book. He, however, made no attempt to continue his own succession, and died 1741. In the '45' none of the regular Nonjurers appear to have been involved; but some of the separatists, those who were in favour of the views of Collier and Brett, joined the rebels, and died as traitors. One of the separatists named Campbell desperately endeavoured to carry on the succession of his party. He was the last bishop left, and in defiance of canonical rule he alone consecrated a new bishop. Thus the line went on, the last being consecrated in 1795. One of these bishops, Cartwright, ended his life as a surgeon, practising at Shrewsbury, a legal subject of King George. The last of the bishops, Booth, died in 1805; but a Nonjuring clergyman was living in the West of England in 1815. They lingered there longer than in any part of England. Many of those who would not take the oaths were content to receive the Communion in the National Church as private individuals, and it is said that many purchased Church Prayer Books printed before the Revolution in order that they might ignore the reigning sovereign.

Many historians who differ from the Nonjurers altogether in their view, have yet acknowledged that they rendered important services to the religion and literature of the country. A Latitudinarian spirit came in with the Revolution, and many good men were strongly influenced by it. Against this the Nonjurers made a stand, and preserved the spirituality of the Church, which might otherwise have sunk into a mere State-establishment. Their example of conscientiousness, sacrificing station, influence, and worldly substance, was a lesson of self-sacrifice such as society is ever the richer for. Some of them wrote valuable books. Hicks, Williams, Law, Nelson, Charles Leslie, Jeremy Collier, are all honoured names in the great roll of English authors.

Non-Residence.—The absence of an incumbent from his parish or benefice for any length of time, while a substitute is entrusted with the discharge of his duties. At one time non-residence was very general in England, in consequence of the holding of pluralities; but it was forbidden by statutes passed in 1837–8. Under ordinary circumstances no incumbent may be absent from his benefice more than three months at a time, under penalty of losing part of his income. Exemption from this rule may be granted by the bishop of the diocese in cases of pluralities or peculiars; and severe illness, for at most twenty years, has been held a valid excuse for non-residence.

Norbert, St., Archbishop of Magdeburg and founder of the Premonstratensian Order, was born at Xanten, in the Duchy of Cleves, 1080. His father, Heribert, Count of Gennep, was related to the Emperor Henry V., and his mother, Hedwig, was descended from the House of Lorraine. He spent some time at the Court of Frederick, Archbishop of Cologne, and then with the Emperor, Henry IV. He was a Prebendary of the Church of Xanten and Almoner to Henry IV., who offered him the Archepiscopate of Cambrai; but he refused, fearing that the higher orders would put a restraint to him, for he gave way to all his passions and led a very dissolute life. This continued till he was thirty years old. One day he was riding, when he was suddenly overtaken by a thunderstorm, and a ball of fire fell at his horse's feet, which, in its terror, threw its rider. Norbert lay unconscious for some time, and on his recovery determined to give up his wicked life, and to work as a priest and missionary. He spent some time in preparation, and in 1118 sold his estate, which he gave to the poor, and resigned his preferments. He set out for Languedoc, where Pope Gelasius II. was at the time, from whom he gained permission to preach wherever he thought proper. He passed through all the northern provinces of France, preaching and imposing severe penances. His eloquence did much, but his example effected more. He fasted all through the year, eating only in the evening, except on Sundays. In 1119 Pope Calixtus II., who had succeeded Gelasius, held a Council at Rheims, at which Norbert was present and obtained a fresh grant. He here became acquainted with Bartholomew, Bishop of Laon, who prevailed upon the saint to accompany him to his diocese, and put him in possession of St. Martin's Church, where he was to reform the regular canons; but his rule was too strict for them, and he resigned his appointment. The Bishop then, knowing the Norbert wished for a solitary life, promised to give him any place he might choose, and is said that the Virgin Mary appeared to Norbert in a dream, pointed out a lonely valley in the Forest of Courcy, which received the name of Prémontré, and also chose the dress which he was to adopt. Here he retired, and formed from the followers who soon gathered round him the Order of the Premonstrants, under the rule of St. Augustine. The order soon spread all over Europe, and in 1119 Norbert was called to Antwerp. The pastors of St. Michael's, in that city, led a dissolute life, which Tanchelm, a heretic, turned to good account by asserting that this was a proof that the institution of the priesthood was idle fiction, and that the Eucharist was of service to salvation. He gained 3,000 followers, who, even after his death, in 1119, infected the whole country with their tenets. The canons of Antwerp applied for aid to the Bishop of Cambray, who implored St. Norbert to come to their assistance. He brought some of his canons with him, and the clergy of Antwerp settled the church and revenues of St. Michael upon them, which gift was confirmed in 1122. After putting matters in good order he returned to his first settlement, where the Order had increased so much that in 1125 there were ten houses besides the original house at Prémontré. In 1127 as Norbert was travelling through Germany, the Archbishop of Magdeburg died, and the saint was chosen to succeed him and was consecrated, though against his own wishes. He brought about several reforms, restored the revenues of the Church which had been usurped by the nobles, persuaded the clergy to practise celibacy, &c. It is said that one of the clergy in revenge hired an assassin to murder the Bishop in his confessional on Maundy Thursday, but the Norbert, knowing of the design, ordered the man to be searched, and the weapon was found upon him. After about three years of patience and courage overcame his enemies and he was allowed to regulate his diocesan peace. He still gave up some time to holy Orders, and also interested himself in the affairs of the Church. He strongly opposed Peter Leon, the Anti-Pope, who was condemned at the Council of Rheims in 1131.

St. Norbert died June 6th, 1134, and was canonised by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1588. At his death there were 1,200 members of his community.

North Side.—The rubric prefixed to the Communion Service directs the minister to begin the Service at the north side of the Lord's Table. It is a matter of controversy whether by this is intended that he shall stand on the north side of the front, still looking astowards, or at the north end, looking south. The last legal judgment left the matter to the minister's discretion. [EASTWARD POSITION.]

Norwich, See of.—This ancient See of East Anglia has not taken so eminent a place, historically, as some of the others, owing to its retired situation, but it has many features of deep interest. It owes its foundation to archbishop Honorius, who sent "Felix the burgundian" to be its first bishop at Dunwich. [DUXWICH.] On the resignation of the fourth bishop of the See, Bisi, Archbishop Theodore established a second See at Elmham for the "North folk;" but the terrible Danish invasion swept the board for many years. In the middle of the tenth century the bishopric of Elmham was restored under Eadulf. In 1075 it was transferred, under Bishop Herfast, to the stately minster of Thetford, then the second town in East Anglia, and possessing ten churches. In 1091 Herbert of Losinga, Abbot of Ramsey, in Huntingdonshire, obtained the See from William Rufus by means which approached very near indeed to simony. Very miserable a conscience afterwards, he made his way to Rome to ask for absolution, in spite of a furious outburst of wrath from the King. The Pope absolved and reinstated him on condition of his founding certain churches. On his return he removed the See in 1094 from Thetford "to the rich and populous Norwich," and began the beautiful cathedral, intended to be a monastic institution on the model of Canterbury. It was dedicated in Sept. 1101, in the name of the Holy Trinity. He built several other churches in his diocese, among them that at Yarmouth, which has now developed into the largest parish church in England. He also established Cluniac monks in the ex-cathedral of Thetford, and preached in Ely Abbey three years before it became a cathedral at the translation of the relics of St. Etheldreda. The cathedral nave was extended to its present length by his successor, whose successor, again, deserves notice as the only bishop in England who had the courage to stand by Becket in his struggle with the King. Glancing down the list of bishops, we note John of Oxford, a time-serving partisan of Henry II.; John de Grey, an unscrupulous tool of King John, during whose episcopate lived the good Sampson, Abbot of Bury, immortalised by Carlyle in his Past and Present; Pandulph, the Legate before whom England was abused by the wicked King John; Walter Calthorp, "the only Bishop of Norwich whose saintly life has been his chief characteristic," such a benefactor to the poor that he even sold his silver spoons to feed them, the builder of the hospital of St. Giles, and benefactor of the cathedral; Bateman, in whose episcopate the awful Black Death destroyed no less than 2,000 incumbents in that one diocese; Nix, under whom Bilney, the Lollard, was burned, and under whom also the suppression of the monasteries began; Thirlby, under whom Kett's rebellion took place; Hopton, under whom nine Protestants were burned at Norwich; Parkhurst and Scambler, two disgraceful to their office for their greed of money; Hall, in whose days the Puritan outrages were wrought upon the glorious cathedral; Reynolds, the author of the General Thanksgiving, loved by his people for his unbounded charity during the Great Plague; Bathurst, who lived till the age of ninety, and neglected his diocese shamefully; Stanley, who revived religious feeling when it was almost dead. We ought to mention Dean Prideaux, a good author and vigorous dean, who saw seven bishops of Norwich during his incumbency.

Notaries of Rome, since called Proto-notaries.—The office of notaries was instituted by St. Clement during the persecutions of the primitive Church, and seven were appointed to keep an account in writing of the imprisonment and death of the martyrs, each having charge of two wards of the city. St. Fabian appointed seven sub-deacons, whom he entrusted with the duty of seeing that the notaries carried out their work of preserving the records which they made. By this means histories of the martyrdom of St. Andrew, St. Polycarp, and many others were preserved, and the earliest collections of the lives of the saints were derived from these sources.
Nourry, Nicholas le, was born at Dieppe in 1647, and eighteen years after became a Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur, where he devoted himself to literary work. He came from Rouen to Paris, where he assisted James de Frisches in editing St. Ambrose’s works, and he also worked with Bellaise and Duchesne. His most noted work is the Apparatus ad Bibliothecam Maximam; criticism of the lives, writings, and opinions of the authors in the Bibliotheca Patrum at Lyons. In 1710 he published Lucius Cae cius de Mortibus Persecutorum, which he states is not, as was supposed, the work of Lactantius, and gives his reasons for that opinion. Nourry died at St. Germain-des-Prés in 1724.

Novalis.—The name assumed by Friedrich von Hardenberg, who was born at Wiedestedt, in Mansfeld, in 1772. His father and mother belonged to the Herrnhuters. He was educated at Jena, whence he passed to Leipzig and Wittenberg. He assisted his father for a time as auditor of the Saxon Saltworks, but was obliged to give up his post through ill-health, and devoted himself wholly to literature. He became acquainted with Schlegel and with Tieck, the Romantic writer, who wrote a biography of Novalis, and who seems to have had a great influence over him. He died in 1801.

Novalis’s best works are his Spiritual Songs, which show a beautiful simplicity and pure spirit of devotion. His other works, Heinrich von Ofterdingen, The Pupils at Sais, and Hymns of the Night, are remarkable for the imagination and enthusiasm which they display.

Novatian, the founder of the Novatianist sect in the third century, was a man of learning and eloquence, but of ascetic tendency. Educated as a philosopher, he was baptised on a sick-bed, but omitted after his recovery to present himself to the bishop for the laying-on of hands. Notwithstanding this, and in the face of some opposition, he was ordained priest by Bishop Fabian of Rome, who wished to enlist his talents for the Church, and he acquired great influence at Rome. After the Decian persecution, a dispute arose as to the treatment of the lapsed. Novatian headed a party which maintained that the Church had no power to re-admit apostates, and that, by receiving such into communion, it would forfeit its Christian character. The lapsed, they said, must be left to the mercy of God. At the election of Cornelius, a man of milder views, as Fabian’s successor, A.D. 251, Novatian, with his party, seceded from the Church, and three obscure bishops, obtained on false pretences, consecrated him to the See of Rome. Intimation of this consecration was sent to the great Churches, but these refused to acknowledge him, and many of his followers, alarmed at the schism, returned to orthodoxy. Nevertheless, the numbers of the sect increased, and the members swore, at the reception of the Eucharist, that they would never desert him or return to Cornelius. The now assumed the name of Cathari [i.e. Puritans], and adopted still harsher views. Not only the lapsed, but also those who had been guilty of any of the greater sins after baptism, were excommunicated for life. They declared the Church to have become impure, and its manifestations to be of no effect, and second marriages were forbidden as adulterous. The Novatian sect continued for a considerable time. They were perfectly orthodox as to the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and suffered with the Catholics, from the Arians. An attempt was made at the Council of Nicaea to bring them back to the Church, and they were generally un molested by the Catholics until the time of Nestorius and Cyril of Alexandria.

Novatus, sometimes confounded with Novatian, was a priest of Carthage, who became noted for his malpractices and disobedience to authority. In A.D. 249 he was cited to appear before his Bishop, Cyprian, charged with ill-treated his wife, robbing widows and orphans, appropriating the funds of his church, allowing his father to die of starvation, and refusing even to bury him; but the outbreak of the Decian persecution saved him from punishment. After the persecution, Novatus allied himself with Felici simus, a rich man for whom he had procured deacon’s orders, and the two set themselves to oppose Cyprian in every possible way, especially encouraging very lenient views concerning the treatment of the lapsed. Visiting Rome, he joined the opposite party of Novatian, and became as severe towards the lapsed as he had formerly been lax, influenced it has been hinted, chiefly by his love of opposition to regular authority. After staying at Rome for some time, he returned to Africa and is lost sight of.

Novices [Lat. novitius].—Those who are in a state of probation before entering a religious society, in order that it may be seen whether they have the necessary qualities and are likely to keep the vows. This period of probation is termed the novitiate. Until it is over no promises are made, and the novice may return to the world if desired.

Nowell, Alexander, D.D., an eminence divine of the reign of Queen Elizabeth [b. a Read Hall in Lancashire, in 1507 or 1508, d. i. London, Feb. 13th, 1602]. He was educated near Manchester till he was thirteen, when he entered Brazenose College, Oxford. He became the intimate friend of Foxe, the martyrologist, whose room he shared. In 1538 he was made Bachelor of Arts, in 1543 became Master of Westminster School, and in 1581 Canon of Westminster. Having adopted the Lutheran doctrines, he was obliged to leave England on Queen Mary’s accession, and ravelled in Germany till the accession of Queen Elizabeth, when he returned, and was appointed Archdeacon of Middlesex and Canon of Canterbury, and afterwards Dean of St. Paul's. Nowell was chosen by the Convocation of Canterbury in 1563 to preside at the drawing up of the Articles of Religion, and also to write a catechism, which he appears to have developed later into the Church Catechism which has been attributed to him with relabity. Another catechism which he wrote in 1571 was directed by Archbishop Parker to be taught as a preventive against error; and in fact he was always regarded as holding very orthodox views, and as remarkable for his learning and piety. The catechisms already mentioned, and a few others, are his only extant works.

Nowell, Laurence, brother of the above, entered Brazenose College, 1536. He travelled with his brother in Germany during Queen Mary's reign, and was made Dean of Chelsea on his return. He died in October, 1576. He was an eminent antiquary and Anglo-Saxon scholar, and left an Anglo-Saxon dictionary in MS., which is now in the Bodleian Library. Nowell also made several collections from ancient historical manuscripts.

Nullatenenses.—Bishops in title only, holding no dioceses.

Nunc Dimitis.—The Latin for the last words of the Song of Simeon, “Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace,” is found in Luke ii. 29-32, and is pointed in the Anglican Church to be read after the second lesson at evensong. It was ed in this place even in the early Church, is found in the Apostolical Constitutions, occurs in the Latin office for Compline, on which and Vespera the Anglican Evening Service was compiled.

Nuncio.—A representative of the Pope resides permanently at a foreign Court to carry out investigations upon ecclesiastical affairs. A nuncio is thus distinguished from a _legate ad astra_, whose duties are only temporary. Nuncios had formerly almost unlimited power, and held courts of appeal which were prior in authority to the national ecclesiastical courts. The nuncios were often at variance with the _legati nati_ [Legates], and a sharp controversy took place in consequence of uncivility being established at Munich in 1535, though it was swallowed up soon after the troubles of the French Revolution.

Nuns [The word is derived by some from Coptic _nonnos_, “holy,” but is probably in Low Latin _nuna_, “mother” (compare _nunna_), a familiar word used by _laren_ like _mamma_].—Women who seclude themselves from the world in religious communities, take a vow of chastity, and spend their lives in prayer and good works. Nuns met with very early in the history of the Church, under the name of _virginus Deo sacra_, but they did not at first live together in convents; they remained at home, but were distinguished from the rest of their family by a peculiar dress, and the asceticism of their life. Seclusion began to be practised towards the end of the fourth century, but for some time the nuns still attended their parish church on Sundays and festivals, and were under the guidance of the parish priest. They received their rules from the bishop of the diocese. In the sixth century it became customary to have a church attached to each nunnery, which also had its own priest; by this means was secured absolute seclusion from the world. A mother-superior or abbess was placed at the head of the community.

Nuns of recent order in the Roman Church are generally under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese, those of older foundation under that of regulars. A few are under a superior-general. They are allowed to take boarders to educate but under strict conditions. Their confessors are carefully selected, and in no case is a confessor allowed to hold office in the same establishment for more than three years. Nuns take their meals in one room, but each has her separate cell. There are a vast number of orders, but they are grouped under four principal classes—the followers of the rule of St. Basil (adopted by St. Teresa), of St. Austin (Ursulines and Dominicans), of St. Benedict (Fontevrault, etc.), and St. Francis (“Poor Clares”).

Nuptial Benediction.—Used by Jews and Christians after the marriage ceremony. It was pronounced by the Jews when the bride was brought home, by the chief of the ten elders, who were obliged by custom to be present. The custom is justified by the passage in the Book of Ruth where ten elders are said to have been present at the wedding of Boaz. In the Christian Churches marriages are consecrated by the benediction of the priest or minister, according to an injunction given by Tertullian in the first century. In early times marriages not followed by this benediction were declared to be illegal.

O

Oaths.—The custom of appealing to God to affirm the truth of statements, with an imprecation of His vengeance or a renunciation of His favour if they prove false, has been common to all nations. The Romans and Greeks used many forms of swearing, with ceremonies. The Jews at first used to swear by God only, but in later times they swore by Jerusalem, the Temple, the Altar, etc., and that it was against this that our Lord warns Christians, and not against swearing at all, appears from the fact that St. Paul calls...
God to witness the truth of his affirmations several times. This view was taken by the early Christians, and in several passages in the Fathers and Councils it appears that swearing upon solemn occasions was held awful. It then became a custom to lay their hands on the Gospels when they swore, and to conclude with "So help me, God, and the contents of this Book," to which in the Roman Church "all the saints!" was sometimes added. These oaths were called corporal oaths. Others swore by some particular saint, relics, cross, or altar. In the Middle Ages an oath was frequently called a canonical purgation, to distinguish it from the other modes of declaring innocence, as duels, ordeals, etc. By the Council of Meaux the clergy were forbidden to take corporal oaths, it being held that all ought to trust their word.

Obeah.—The negroes of the West Indies practise a species of witchcraft, and the name Obeah-man, or Obeah-woman, is given to the persons who exercise this power. The derivation of the word is unknown.

Obedience.—The performance of the commands of a superior. Ecclesiastically, the word is used in somewhat different senses, but all allied, as [1] the duty which all clergy owe to their immediate superiors in all things consistent with the law of God and the Church. [2] The submission which members of religious orders vow, on profession, to their own superiors and to the rules of the order. [3] A written command by which a superior of a religious order communicates some special order to a subject. [4] The term has also come to be used for a religious following or communion professing obedience to some head: e.g. the Roman obedience means the Church of Rome.

Obedience of Christ.—This is generally divided into active and passive. His active obedience implies what He did; His passive, what He suffered. Some divines distinguish between these, but the distinction is somewhat artificial. They refer our pardon to His passive, and our title to glory to His active obedience; but it cannot be clearly shown that there is such a thing as passive obedience; since it is clearly taught that our Lord's sufferings were an entirely voluntary obedience to the will of God. The Scriptures tell us much of the obedience of Christ, and show that it was voluntary [Ps. xl. 6], complete [1 Pet. ii. 22], wrought out in the stead of His people, and acceptable in the sight of God.

Oberammergau.—A village situated in the highlands of Bavaria, made famous by the Passion Play which is acted there every ten years. The following traditional account is given of its origin:—A plague broke out in the neighbourhood in 1633, which, in spite of all the efforts of the villagers, was introduced into Ammergau by a peasant, Caspar Schuchle, who had been working at Escheloh, one of the plague-stricken villages, and wished to visit his family. In a day or two he died, and within a month eighty-four persons had perished. Then the villagers assembled, and vowed that if God would take away the pestilence they would perform the Passion Play every tenth year. From that time none one died of the plague. The play was first performed in 1634, and has been enacted every tenth year since 1830. This is the tradition, but the play is of much older date. They now speak of it as something already well known, and it is only the acting it every tenth year that is new. The oldest text-book of the play bears the date 1662, and refers to a still older book. Since the year 1830 the play has undergone many improvements. Thus Lucifer, Prince of Hell, who, with his retinue, used to play a prominent part, has been banished. Father Ottmar Weiss, of Jesewang, ex-conventual of the Benedictine Monastery at Ettal [d. 1843], revised the play, and the improvements were carried on by Anton A. Daisenberg, the former pastor of the village. Up to 1830 the play took place in the churchyard, but since then theatre has been built for it. This is built entirely of boards, and is partly open to the sky. The auditorium is 118 feet wide and 16 feet deep. It comprises an area of 20,000 square feet, and is capable of conveniently seating 5,000 to 6,000 persons. Some say the stage resembles those of ancient classical Greek theatres, while others find more resemblance to the mystery theatre of the Middle Ages. There are five distinct places of action for the players:—The proscenium, for the chorus; processions, etc.; the central stage, for the tableaux vivants and the usual dramatic scene of the palace of Pilate, the palace of Annas, and the streets of Jerusalem. The prices of seats are from one to eight marks.

The great training school for the Passion Play has been the village church, with its ceremonies, processions, music, and son. Thus the dramatic scene of Christ's entry into Jerusalem is a repetition of the Chur-procession on Palm Sunday, even to the singing of the chorale, "All hail! all hail! O David's Son!" In the school the children are taught to learn by heart and sing passages from the great drama. The selection of the actors takes place there. The most talented are given parts for performance, the stage of the theatre, which remains during the nine intervening years, though the rest is taken down. During these years minor plays, religious and secular, are acted especially during the winter. Almost all the principal actors are wood-carvers. Josef Maier, who represented the "Christus" in 1877 and in 1880, and who has since died, is Schauer, who took the part in 1860, devoted themselves chiefly to crucifixes. Jacob He the "Petrus" of 1880, and Loechner, the "Judas," are also skilful carvers.

At five o'clock on the mornings when the play is to take place a cannon is fired to summon the villagers and visitors to attend mass. The performance begins at eight and lasts till two, with an interval of an hour and a half. It consists of eighteen acts, beginning with the entry into Jerusalem and ending with the Ascension. Each act is preceded by one or more tableaux taken from the Old Testament, which delineate symbols or prophecies of the scenes from the life of Christ. These types are explained by the chorus of eighteen schleutzeister, or guardian angels, headed by a leader called the prologue or choragus. The schleutzeister greatly resemble the chorus of the ancient Greek plays. The play was, in 1880, given more than thirty times, from May 17th to Sept. 26th; it always takes place on Sundays and festivals. Though many look upon the play as irreverent, it is acted with so much earnestness and piety that it is evident to all spectators that it is regarded by the people as a religious duty. It would, however, certainly not be so in any other place, as the attempts to introduce it into New York in 1881–82 clearly show.

Oberlin, Jean Frederic, Protestant pastor, noted for his holiness and benevolence, was born at Strassburg, Aug. 31st, 1740. He was inclined towards the military profession, but by his father's desire he pursued his studies at Strassburg University, and was ordained in 1760. He was Tutor in the family of M. Ziegenhagen till 1767, when he succeeded M. Stauber as Pastor of Dan-de-la-Loche, or Steinhall, in Alsace, where he resided for fifty-nine years. This valley, which was almost entirely inhabited by Lutherans, had been laid waste in the Thirty Years' War and again by Louis XIV. The oil was very barren, and the people almost civilized and very averse to any improvements, so that when Oberlin first went there his life was frequently in danger. He set to work to improve their condition, both physically and morally, helped them to make a road to Strassburg, to improve their land, and introduced new manufactures, as straw-plaiting, knitting, weaving, etc. He also built new schoolhouses, and is said to have been the founder of infant schools. During the French Revolution his district was left untouched on account of his well-known character, and he was able to give shelter to several proscribed persons. It is said that the population rose under his ministries from 500 to 5,000. He received the Legion of Honour from Louis XVIII., and a gold medal from the Royal and Central Agricultural Society of Paris. He was the first foreign member of the London Bible Society. He died June 1st, 1826.

Obituary.—A book used in the Roman Church in which to write down the names and date of burial of all those for whose souls masses are to be read.

Oblates.—A name given to several congregations, so-called because they "offer" themselves to God. The chief societies of Oblates are:

Oblates of the Blessed Virgin and St. Ambrose.—A congregation of secular priests founded by St. Carlo Borromeo at Milan in 1578. There is a house of this Congregation at Bayswater, with branches in several other parts of London.

Oblates of St. Frances at Rome.—A community of women established in 1433.

Oblates of Italy.—A society of secular priests founded at Turin in 1816.

Oblates of Mary Immaculata.—An association of priests founded at Marseilles by Charles de Mazenod, the Bishop, in 1815. Several of their priests are employed in foreign missions. There are eight houses in England.

The name "oblates" was also given during the Middle Ages to secular persons who offered themselves and their property to some monastery, to which they were admitted as a kind of lay brothers. They wore a religious habit, but different from that of the monks.

Oblations.—By special usage this word signifies the bread and wine offered upon the altar for consecration at the Holy Eucharist, these being distinguished from the alms of the poor and other devotions of the people in the phrase, "alms and oblations." It was an old custom for all communicants who could afford it to offer bread and wine, and sometimes other things, at the altar; out of which what was required was taken for the Eucharist, and the rest for a common meal. None were permitted to make these offerings but those who were also admissible as communicants; the offerings of the oppressors of the poor, of those living at variance, of idol makers and of abettors of heretics, even though they might be emperors, were sternly rejected. Oil for the lamps and incense—the first-fruits of grapes and corn—milk and honey for the newly baptised, were also offered at the altar, but always under conditions distinguishing them from the oblation of bread and wine.

From the oblation invariably accompanying the celebration of the Communion, the word was frequently used to denote the service of the Eucharist; as, e.g. in the phrases—"oblations for the dead," "oblations for martyrs," denoting the celebration of this sacrament at funerals or on the anniversaries of the day of death.

Occam or Ockham, William op.—One of the great Schoolmen, called Docteur singularis et invincibilis [b. at Ockham, Surrey, about 1270, d. at Munich, April 7th, 1347]. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, but, having joined the Order of the Franciscans, went to France to study under Duns Scotus. He afterwards opposed the Realism of his teacher, and formed a sect of Nominalists among his followers, holding the doctrine of Nominalism, of which he became the most vigorous and logical advocate. [Nominalists.]

He constituted himself defendant of Philippe Bel of France when the latter was excommunicated by Pope Boniface VIII., and some years later he attacked Pope John XXII., who had condemned one Berenger Talon for saying that ecclesiastical possessions were unlawful and contrary to the example of Christ and His disciples. For this William of Occam was imprisoned at Avignon, but escaped with one of his companions to the Mediterranean, and thence to Munich, where he spent the remainder of his life. He ranked high among the Schoolmen as a logician, and was engaged throughout his life in continual ecclesiastical controversies. Among his works may be mentioned Dissutatio inter Clericum et Militem, Expositio aurea (containing a summary of his Nominalist views), Decisiones Octo Questionum de Potestate summii Pontificis (based on the Sententiae of Peter the Lombard), and many other controversial works.

Occasional Prayers and Thanksgivings.—Those which are appointed to be read on special occasions. There were special prayers placed at the end of the mediaeval litanies, and also special masses for fine weather, rain, plague, etc.; but those in our Prayer Book are mostly original. The prayers for rain and fine weather were inserted in 1549 at the end of the Communion Service; but, with those for "In the Time of Death and Famine," "of War and Tumults," and "of any Common Plague," were placed at the end of the Litany in 1552. All the thanksgivings, with the exception of that for peace at home and the "General Thanksgiving," were written in 1604. These, with the prayers for Parliament and for all conditions of men, were added in 1662, and they were all then placed in their present position.

Ochino Bernardino.—An Italian Reformer who was born at Siena in 1487. He became a Franciscan, and afterwards a Capuchin, and was much famed for his preaching, which was very earnest and eloquent. He went to Naples, where he became acquainted with Juan Valdez and Peter Martyr. In 1538 he was elected General of his Order. In 1540 he was accused of heresy, for preaching upon justification without referring to indulgences, etc. He was afterwards summoned to Rome, but escaped to Geneva, where he preached to the Italian Protestants. He was at first strongly Calvinistic, but later adopted Socinian views. In 1547 his liberty was threatened, but he escaped to England, where he remained till the accession of Queen Mary obliged him to leave and go to Zurich. Here he wrote several of his books,—On the Lord's Supper; a catechism on the work of the Messiah and the Trinity etc., which contained decidedly unorthodox views, and he was banished. He went to Cracow, but in 1564 had to leave on account of the decree banishing all foreigners who were not Catholics from Poland, and he died on the way to Germany. He has been regarded by some as the founder of Anti-Trinitarianism. He wrote a work on marriage which is considered to favour polygamy against which Beza directed his Tractatus de Polygamy.

Among Ochino's other works are six volumes of Italian sermons written when he first went to Geneva; a book published in London on the usurped primacy of the Bishop of Rome; and Italian commentaries on Roman and Galatians.

Octaves.—The octave is the eighth day after any principal festival of the Church. The custom of keeping octaves was derived from the Jews, and in former times all the eight days were observed. The special prayers for Christmas, Easter and Ascension Day are appointed to be read seven days after, and that for Whitsunday six, as Trinit. Sunday falls on the seventh day and has no preface of its own. The first two days of the octaves of Easter and Whitsunday have special services, and it seems from the Ptoeu, Londonensis, published in 1714, that in the church of St. Dunstan in the West the Holy Communion was administered daily during the octaves of the three great festivals. All the days of octaves in the Roman Church (there are many more than in the Anglican) are kept most strictly, and, in some cases, other feasts are allowed to be kept which fall within an octave. In the Anglican Church the octave of the dedication of a church frequently kept. The octave of Easter Sunda is commonly called Low Sunday [q.v.].

Odenheimer. William Henry [b. 181 d. 1879], Bishop of New Jersey, U.S., learned divine of the American Episcop Church, and one of the most esteemed of its preachers. His sermons have been much read in England as well as in his own country, as he won much love from Churchmen on his visits to the Lambeth Conferences by his sunny and genial manner.

Odo, surnamed "the Severe," Archbishop of Canterbury, was born in East Anglia in ninth century, of Danish parents, who were Pagans. They gave Odo a liberal education and allowed him to mix with the Christians and be present at their instructions with any fear that he might embrace their religion. His father, on finding that the boy was impressed with the truths of Christianity, forbade him to hold any further intercourse with Christians; but Odo had the courage to run himself among the catechumens, and, in consequence, was disinherited by his father.
he became Preacher of Augsburg, but after a short chaplaincy to Franz von Sickingen he returned to Basel in 1522, and his chief work was carried out between this year and that of his death. He supported Zwingli at the Marburg Conference in the dispute with Luther concerning the Eucharist, having previously published a treatise in 1525 setting forth his opinions in the matter. He was also employed to carry on disputes with Roman Catholics on theology. In preaching at Basel he had denounced the fallacies of many doctrines of the Roman Church, and had thereby made himself hated by Roman Catholics; he also held controversies with the Anabaptists. His chief works were commentaries on the Bible, and treatises De Ritu Paschali and Quod non sit onerosa Christianis Confessio. His views on the Eucharist were modified in later years. At one time he did not rise above the "memorial" view, but he afterwards emphatically declared the Sacrament a means of grace.

Econom. — Stewards of church revenues, chosen by the clergy of each diocese out of their own number. Originally the distribution of the income of the Church, both among the clergy and among the poor, was entrusted to the bishop, who commonly associated his archdeacon with him in the work. But, as time went on, not only did the revenues of the Church increase, but also the number of converts, and with them came further demands upon the bishop's time, and more frequent calls for the discharge of the spiritual functions of his office. It was, consequently, deemed convenient to relieve him of the care of diocesan revenue by the appointment of the economists.

Ecumenical Council [Gr. oikoumene, "the world"]. — One gathered from all parts of the Church; as distinguished, therefore, from a diocesan or provincial synod. [COUNCILS.]

Oehler, Gustav Friedrich. — An eminient German theologian of the orthodox school of Delitzsch [b. 1812, d. 1872]. A translation of his Theology of the Old Testament is published by Messrs. Clark, of Edinburgh, in 2 vols., and is valuable both for its depth of piety and also for its good Hebrew scholarship.

Oetinger, Friedrich Christopher [b. 1702, d. 1782]. — A German theological writer of the Mystical school. His position in German theology is analogous to that of the Hutchinsonians with respect to the English Deists. He endeavoured to meet the Rationalism and Materialism of his country by philological investigations, by means of which he constructed a system of philosophy which was to unite subject and object, matter and spirit, in the living Christ. Much of his doctrine was derived from Swedenborg. His writings were voluminous and not without effect.
The Priests [q.v.] set a large value upon them on account of the careful spirit of investigation and industry which they display. For though his mind was inclined to everything fanciful and mysterious, yet he was learned, and, moreover, practical and full of good sense; above all, he was earnest and pious, and the people of Berlin recognised in him a genuine desire to give the mysteries of God a bearing on their daily life.

Offertorium.—A book containing the offertory sentences sung at Holy Communion.

Offertory.—[1] The sentences said by the priest during the Communion while the offerings of the people are being collected. They all speak of the necessity of supporting the Church and relieving the poor. The custom of making oblations at the Communion is Apostolic [1 Cor. xvi. 2], and is referred to by Justin Martyr and Tertullian, thereby proving that it was in use in the second century. The offertory sentences were sung in the choir before the Reformation. Chaucer’s Pardoner was especially successful in singing an offertory (“Prologue”), and in Marbecke’s Prayer Book with music the offertory sentences are set to varied music. But the rubric as it stands in the Prayer Book directs that the sentences are to be said by the priest. In some churches the attempt is made to combine this old custom with the rubric by the priest first saying the sentence, and being followed by the choir responding it musically. [2] The oblation of bread and wine placed upon the Lord’s Table along with the offerings made by the congregation. The rubric of the Prayer Book directs “When there is a Communion the Priest shall then place upon the Table so much Bread and Wine as he shall think sufficient.” The doctrine of the Roman Church is thus expressed by Bossuet: “The Church does really offer bread and wine, but not absolutely and in themselves; for in the New Covenant no oblation is made of lifeless things: indeed no oblation is made other than Jesus Christ; wherefore the bread and wine are offered that He may make them His Body and Blood” [Explication des Prières de la Messe]. All the ancient Liturgies contain an oblation of the bread and wine [see Hammond’s Ancient Liturgies, Clarendon Press], but the five prayers in the Roman Missal are of recent date. [OBSTRUCTIONS.]

Office.—The term in its ecclesiastical sense is applied to a devotional form of service not in the Prayer Book. Such as, for example, that used at the consecration of a church.

Office, Congregation of the Holy.—That department of the Papal Government which is charged with the government of the Inquisition [q.v.].

Officers Ecclesiastical.—The term sometimes applied to the three orders of ministers in the Anglican Church—bishops, priests, and deacons. And as officers must be under authority, so we are taught that they derive their authority direct from Christ Himself. It is sometimes applied in an inferior sense to those who handle the temporal affairs of the Church—such as churchwardens.

Oil.—It is certain that blessing of oil for holy uses is very ancient. St. Cyprian [Epistle 70, edit. Pamels] says that the oil used in the solemn administration of baptism was blessed on the same altar on which the Eucharist was consecrated. St. Basil the Great, in his Treatise of the Holy Spirit, c. 27, speaks of the blessing of oil, and the baptismal water as a practice established in the Apostolical times; and St. Optatus of Milevis [67 ‘Of Schism’] observes that the oil consecrated in the church in the name of Christ was for that reason called chrism. In the four first centuries, indeed, it appears that this solemnity was not fixed in any particular day; and the Council of Toledo, in the canon already quoted, expressly says the bishops might perform it when they pleased; adding that each particular church in the diocese was to send a deacon or sub-deacon to the bishop for what christ they were to use at the approaching festival, i.e. at the solemn administration of baptism on Easter Eve. But the present practice of the Roman Church is to bless the holy oils once a year, and that on Maundy Thursday. The oils are immediately distributed to the pastors and used till the return of the same day.

The consecration of the holy oils consists in three solemn consecrations or formal benedictions: the first was that of the Oil for the Sick employed in the sacrament of Extreme Unction; the second, of the chrism, used after baptism, confirmation, at the consecration of altars, churches, and kings; the third, of the Oil the Catechumens, so called because employed on the candidates for baptism before they are brought to the sacred font, which is also used at the coronation of sovereign princes and other occasions. This has been always looked on as an episcopal function, and the Council of Toledo, in 400, Can. xx., expressly forbid priests to perform this ceremony, as being peculiar to the bishops. [ANONITING.]

Olaf, St., or Olaf Haraldsen, one the most noted of the early Norwegian king was born in 985. He was descended from the ancient royal line, but was educated as exile as a Christian. He was one of the Vikings, and made his name feared through the coasts of Norway and Sweden fight fiercely against Canute. In 1015 he returned home, and, making good his claim, wrested the crown from the hands of Eric and Sver Jarl. He at once turned his attention to evangelising his country, and, gathering together a band of followers, put an end to the rule of the Swedes and Danes in Norway, and became overking. When he had secured ti thronc, he sent to England for some missionries, at whose head was Bishop Grimkii.

The measures he took for the conversion of his people were very severe; he made frequent journeys through his kingdom accompanied by the bishop, who on account of the shape of his mitre was called "the horned man," and, surprising the offenders in the middle of the night, slew their leader and invaded their property among his followers, and then forced them to allow several churches to be built and several clergy to settle among them. Olaf then, accompanied by another bishop, Sigurd, went against a powerful chief named Gudbrand, who hearing of his arrival called together from far and wide the people to resist these encroachments on the national faith. They repaired to Breeden, where Olaf and Sigurd were busy establishing churches, and a battle was fought in which Gudbrand's son was taken prisoner by Olaf.
It was then decided to summon a Thing to decide whether there was any truth in the new teaching, and having by chosen signs proved that Thor was powerless to defend his believers, Gudbrand was forced to acknowledge the Christian God, and forthwith ho and all present were baptised; Olaf sent them come clergy, and Gudbrand himself built a church. These scenes were constantly enacted in different parts, and Olaf even extended his area to Greenland, the Orkney Islands, and celand. He set a good example to his subjects by his own observance of the ordinances of religion, going every morning to hear mass, and then to the Thing to decide all matters of religion, together with Bishop Grimkil and other learned clergy. But when he met with opposition the means used were sometimes so cruel that many fled to Canute for help. In 1028 the Danish King entered with a large army, most of Olaf's people orsook him, and he fled to Russia, where he was furnished with an army of 4,000 men, with which he returned; but was slain at Stiklestad on July 29th, 1030. Soon, how-never, a reaction set in, partly because the people disliked their ruler, Canute's son, and also because it was said that miracles were wrought at the place where Olaf had been buried; so the people assembled in 1031 and he body was buried with great state in the Trondheim Cathedral. The fame of the miracles reached far and wide, pilgrims came from all parts of Scandinavia, and a book, written in the twelfth century, on his death and miracles, served to increase his fame. He was considered a saint, and though he was not canonised in the usual way, Rome never denied his sainthood, and he became the patron saint of Norway. In 1847 the order of Olaf was created by King Oscar I. of Sweden and Norway.

Old Catholics.—The Old Catholic movement arose out of the dissatisfaction caused by the decrees of the Vatican Council of 1870.
Symptoms of dissatisfaction and a desire for reforms had appeared from time to time within the Church of Rome, but had been sternly repressed by the ruling powers. This dissatisfaction, however, developed into open rebellion when it was sought to enforce submission to the dogma of Papal Infallibility.
The opposition to this dogma was specially strong throughout Germany, where over forty University professors, headed by Dr. Döllinger, the learned Professor of Theology at Munich,
and Professor Friedrich, issued a joint declaration against it. In April, 1871, Professors Döllinger and Friedrich were excommunicated by the Archbishop of Munich for their refusal to submit. Dr. Döllinger's answer was "As a Christian, as a theologian, as an historian,
as a citizen, I cannot accept this doctrine."
In September, 1871, the first congress of the Old Catholics was held at Munich, when the decrees were again denounced, and arrangements were made to organise congregations throughout Germany and Switzerland. They took the name of Old Catholics, to signify that they held fast to the Catholic faith as it had been handed down from the earliest Christian times, before it had been corrupted by the new doctrines imposed by the Papal power.
At starting, the movement met with enthusiastic support, and its prospects seemed most encouraging. It became necessary to provide an episcopate, and this was obtained from the Old Catholic, or Jansenist Church of Holland. On Aug. 11th, 1873, Dr. Joseph Hubert Reinkens was consecrated by the Bishop of Detrver as the first Old Catholic Bishop for Germany. Dr. Reinkens had been suspended from his Professorship at Nuremberg, and subsequently excommunicated for his opposition to Papal Infallibility. The movement was now organised as an independent branch of the Church. Difficulties of a serious character began to arise when the work of revising the service books was taken in hand. Many were very jealous of any material changes being made, others were anxious for a very thorough revision. The result was that many adherents reverted to the Church of Rome.
The chief alterations adopted were—the translation of the Mass into the language of the country, the omission of the Invocation of Saints, and a great reduction in the number of saints' days. In order to strengthen the position of the Old Catholics in their opposition to Rome, Dr. Döllinger arranged Reunion Conferences to be held at Bonn in 1874 and 1875. Divines from Germany, Switzerland,
France, Denmark, Russia, Greece, England, and America attended. Among those who came from England were Dr. Harold Browne, Bishop of Winchester; Canon Liddon, of St. Paul’s; and Dean Howson, of Chester. From America came, among others, the Bishop of Pittsburgh, and Dr. Nevin, American Chaplain at Rome. The questions which divided these branches of the Church were discussed, and formulae of agreement were adopted by the Conference. These formulae, however, were not received with favour either by the Eastern Church or by the Church of England. Dr. Pusey, in particular, expressed his disapproval of them. The question, however, which caused the greatest trouble to the Old Catholic community was the celibacy of the clergy; great differences of opinion prevailed on the subject. Finally, at a Synod held in 1878 at Bonn, it was decreed that the Old Catholic clergy were free to marry. This was followed immediately by the withdrawal from active co-operation of the greater part of the leaders, including Dr. Dollinger himself. Bishop Reinkens, although he disapproved of the decree, still retained his post as bishop. A great reduction also took place in the number of adherents, several congregations resigning in a body. The Old Catholics in Bavaria cut themselves off from all communion with the Church under the rule of Bishop Reinkens. In the last few years some of the lost ground has been regained, but the numbers on the whole remain very nearly stationary. At the present time there are computed to be about 70,000 in Germany and 80,000 in Switzerland. In Baden greater progress has been made than in other parts of Germany; thus, in 1873 there were 2,286 heads of households who registered themselves as Old Catholics, and in 1884 there were 7,118. In addition to these there are doubtless many adherents who have not ventured to risk persecution from Ultramontanes by openly registering themselves as Old Catholics. The Government, too, is by no means friendly to the community.

In Switzerland the first meeting of Old Catholics was held at Solothurn in 1871; but it was not till 1876 that Dr. Herzog was consecrated as their first Bishop by Bishop Reinkens. At the outset rapid progress was made; but, among other causes, the question of clerical celibacy caused the loss of “thousands,” as Bishop Herzog testifies. There was less difficulty, however, in revising the ritual and services of the Church here than in Germany. A yearly synod of clergy and laity has been established, and in the University at Berne an Old Catholic Faculty of Theology was instituted in 1874.

Old Catholicism has established itself in every Roman Catholic country except Belgium, but at present only to a small extent. Thus the movement, although not answering the expectations that were first formed of it, yet has surmounted its early difficulties, and steadily maintains itself.

Oldcastle, Sir John, more generally known as Lord Cobham, which title he assumed on his marriage with the daughter and heirress of that nobleman, was born at the close of the reign of Edward III. He was once an author, wit, warrior, and statesman, and, although little or nothing is known of his early life, is supposed to have been one of the bosom friends and wild companions of “Madcap Harry,” afterwards Henry VIII. Many believe that he is the Falstaff of Shakespeare. Be that as it may, he was very intimate with the young Prince, and whatever his youthful excesses may have been, like his royal comrade he repented of them in later life.

In 1407, in conjunction with the Duke of Burgundy, he raised the siege of Paris, having received the command as a reward for his services to Henry IV. About this time he met with the writings of Wickliffe, which took a firm hold upon his intellect. We do not know how soon he declared his religious opinions; but after the death of the Earl of Salisbury, the leader of the Lollards, who were killed during a revolt against the King, the vacant place was offered to him as the greatest warrior of the day. He accepted it, and generously threw open his castle of Cowling in Kent, to this persecuted sect, who made their base of operations. Henry IV., worn out by a turbulent reign, died without attempting to confront him; but his son, after trying to convert him to no purpose, was so exasperated by his obstinacy that he gave him up to the clergy. The unfortunate nobleman was besieged in his own castle, and dragged off as a prisoner to the Tower. Before long, however, he managed to escape to Wales. Soon news was brought to the King that he had collected together twenty thousand men in St. Giles’s Fields, and had formed a plot to destroy the royal family and most of the “spiritual and temporal lords.” The report was probably false, for the King merely surprised a handful of men at a prayer meeting. Many of these were destroyed by the royal troops, while the others were tortured until they confessed a plot, and pointed out Cobham as the ringleader. The King, believing it, set 1,000 marks upon his head, and offered remission of taxes to any borough which should betray him.

After escaping detection for four year which were blackened by the execution of thirty-nine prominent Lollards, Oldcastle himself was at last captured in the year 1311. His old comrade had no mercy for him, and after a mock trial, in which he refused to recant, he was suspended from a gallows by chains, and there burnt by a slow fire kindled beneath him, while a mob of jeering priests surrounded him, to prevent any expressions empathy from the multitude reaching the sufferer, and to embitter his last moments of gony. Such was the end of this great man. With him the hopes of the Lollards were buried, and in after years they were little more than an empty name.

As an author his talents were considerable, is chief work being Twelve Conclusions Addressed to the Parliament of England. He is the first author and martyr among the English nobility.

Olga, St.—A saint of the Russian Church old in high honour; she was of humble birth, married to the Grand Duke of Kieff. She died the country well during the minority of her son Swiatoislav. In 955 she visited Constantinople, where she embraced Christianity, and was baptised by the Patriarch Theophylikes, having for her sponsor the Emperor orophyrogenitus; she received the name of Elena. On her return to Kieff she endeavoured to convert her son to her new religion, at without success; but her teaching bore ulter later on in the mind of her grandson LADIMIR (q.v.).

Olshausen, Hermann, one of the most illustrious modern Biblical commentators, as born at Oldeslohe in Holstein in 1796. He studied theology at Kiel and Berlin, became a Privat-Dozent at the latter University 1820, Extraordinary Professor at Königsberg in 1821, and Ordinary Professor in 1827. In 1834 he accepted a call to the Theological professorship at Erlangen, where he died of consumption in 1839.

Olshausen's Commentary on the New Testament, which he left uncompleted, marked a new era in ecclesiastical literature. It is nicely noted for the way in which he enters to the very heart of his subject, paying careful attention to the grammatical exposition, but the same time laying open to the reader the hidden meaning of the text, showing its spiritual allusions and far-reaching bearings. He worked completed by his disciple brand, aided by Wiesinger, and was translated into English at Edinburgh for Clark's reign Theological Library. Olshausen also wrote a tract on the genuineness of the writings of the New Testament, and before ablishing his great work, put out two books containing his views as to the right way of writing commentaries. Omen is a word which, in its proper sense, signifies a sign or indication of some future event, especially of an alarming nature. Belief in omens was very general among the Greeks and Romans; the Scandinavians, Germans, Icelanders, and ancient Britons were all imbued with this superstition; indeed, most nations were so. Amongst the Romans in particular, the observation of omens was a religious rite, without which no petition was undertaken, or contract made. These omens were called auspices, from avus, "a bird," and specio, "to look," because they were based on the observation of the flight or other actions of birds. Priests, called augurs, were regularly maintained for these predictions. [DIVINATION.] There are numerous instances in history of events looked on at the time as good or bad omens, not only amongst the Romans, but also in our own and other countries. Archbishop Laud was a believer in omens; in the library of Lambeth Palace is preserved a piece of glass on which Laud wrote with a diamond recording the destruction of a church by lightning, and speaking of it as a bad omen. The Rev. A. M. Toplady (q.v.), also a believer, thus writes:—"Though it be true that all omens are not worthy of observation, and though they should never be so regarded as to shock our fortitude, or diminish our confidence in God, still they are not to be constantly despised. Small incidents have sometimes been prelusive to great events, nor is there any superstitition in noticing these apparent prognostications, though there may be much superstition in being either too indiscriminately or too deeply swayed by them."

Onderdonk, Henry Usti [b. 1789, d. 1858].—An American bishop. He was educated as a doctor, but afterwards went into the ministry, became Assistant Bishop of Pennsylvania, and in 1827 succeeded Bishop White in the See. He was the author of Episcopal Examinations and Re-Examined, and of some hymns which he contributed to the Hymn-Book of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America, of which he was one of the compilers.

Onkelos.—The author of the most celebrated of the Targums, or Chaldee translations of the Old Testament. According to the Babylonian Talmud, he was contemporary with Gamaliel, and from the purity of his Chaldee, which greatly resembles that of Ezra and Daniel, may have been a native of Babylon. It was the first work of its kind, and keeps very closely to the original, except in the case of anthropomorphisms or anthropopathies which might appear derogatory to God. This Targum has frequently been published, as in the Antwerp Polyglots, Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible, etc., but a critical edition has never been attempted.

Oosterzee, Jan Yakob van.—One of the greatest theologians of his day, of the Dutch Evangelical School. He was born at Rotterdam in 1817. He studied at Utrecht, and became, in 1840, Pastor of Kommers-Binnendijk, and four years after of Rotterdam. In 1862 he was called to Utrecht University, where he lectured first on theology and homiletics, and afterwards on doctrinal history and the philosophy of religion. He died at Wiesbaden in 1882. Oosterzee's Life of Christ, Christology, Theology of the New Testament, Dogmatics, Year of Salvation, Moses, and Practical Theology, have all been translated. into English. He also contributed St. Luke, the Pastoral Epistles, and St. James to Lange’s Commentaries.

Ophites.—An obscure sect, first heard of in Egypt in the second century. Origen denies that they were Christians, and although they professed to have received their philosophy from James, the brother of our Lord, their views were to the highest degree heretical. Their name [from ophis, “a serpent.”] was given them on account of the honour they gave to the serpent who tempted Eve, and was therefore the cause, they argued, of the world’s gaining a knowledge of good and evil. They maintained that Jesus and Christ were two distinct persons—Jesus, who was born of the Virgin Mary; Christ, the serpent, whose spirit was afterwards caused to descend upon Jesus. Their deity they named Jaldabaoth, who, after he had created man, was jealous of his perfection, so gave him a strict command, and then sent the serpent to persuade man to break it. Accounts of them and their extraordinarily profane creed are given in the writings of several early Christian writers, and in the code formed by the Emperor Justinian there are some laws against them. Another name for the sect is Serpentians.

Optatus, St., Bishop of Milevum, lived in the fourth century. He was an African, and was brought up as a heathen, but was converted to Christianity, and became a noted champion of the Church. He was made Bishop of Milevum, in Numidia, and was one of the opposers of the Donatists, writing, about 376, six books against Parmenian, the Donatist Bishop of Carthage, to which Pope Siricius added a seventh in 385. Little is known of the life of St. Optatus, but he is mentioned in terms of high praise by St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and Fulgentius. His book was edited by Du Pin in 1700 with the different readings from several editions, notes, and a life of the author. The saint is supposed to have died subsequently to 384, and is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology on June 4th.

Optimism.—This theory, although it exists to a great extent in most books on Christian philosophy, was first designated by the name “optimism” to describe the teaching of Leibnitz in the eighteenth century. Its chief point is that the world as it is, is as good as it possibly can be, seeing that God is a perfect Being, and that therefore His creations must be to a certain extent perfect too. But there are difficulties in the way of this theory. If God wished the world and mankind to be absolutely perfect, why does He not make them so? This is a question which has been eagerly asked age after age, and no answer is forthcoming which settles it. Pope’s Essay on Man sums up the Optimist theory in that famous line in the first book, “Whatever is is right;” but in the face of the sorrow and sin which we are compelled to witness, we feel that an epigram like Pope’s does not settle the question. Epigrams take hold of the memory, but they do not convince. Physical suffering, indeed, can be shown in many cases to result in good, and to conduces to the general welfare of man, but the conscience pronounces sin essentially evil. The Scripture points to a true Optimism when it points to a world to come where there shall be “no more curse,” and where God “shall wipe away all tears.”

Option [from the Lat. optare, “to choose”] is the right enabling ecclesiastics to choose certain benefits. Thus, when any of the friars prebends fall vacant, the prebendary next in age may, if he likes, take it by option instead of his own. Formerly an archbishop, after confirming a bishop, had the option of appointing an incumbent to the next benefice which fell vacant belonging to the See; when options were only binding on the bishop and themselves who granted them, and not on their successors. The law was done away with by Sec. 42 of 3 and 4 Victoria, cap. 113.

Opus operatum [“the work wrought”]. A term used to denote the nature of the power of the Sacraments as opposed to Opus operantis [“the work of the worker”]. The latter expresses the doctrine of some extreme Protestants, that the Sacraments are used as signs of faith in obedience to our Lord’s injunctions, and that they assist the mind in its approach to God, though the power of the work rests with the individual who makes use of the Sacrament. The Roman Catholic Church and the Church of England on the other hand, hold that the Sacrament are the instruments through which God bestows His grace and power on the recipients and that through them such grace is always bestowed, so long as there is faith and once with God’s will. The absence of faith is not only barrier, and only in so far as the recipient has this faith is there the question of operantis. The term was employed by the Council of Trent, and much used in the Middle Ages in controversy on this point.

Oracle, among the heathens, was the answer which the gods were supposed to give to those who consulted them upon any affair of importance. It is also used for the god who was thought to give the answer, and the place where the answer was given. The origin of oracles is attributed to Egypt where the principal oracles were those of Thebes, Jupiter, Hercules, Minerva, Diana, Apollo, and Mars, and especially of Latona. Greece, the oldest oracle was that of Zeus, Dodona, but the most famous was that of Apollo at Delphi; there were many others, but only the repute. The responses of oracles were given in various ways: at Dodona they issued fr ne hollow of an oak; at Delphi the priestess gave the answers in hexameter verse; at Ammon, in the desert of Libya, the priests pronounced them. In other places, the answers were given in such ambiguous terms that they admitted of altogether contradictory interpretations; sometimes they came in the form of a letter; and sometimes dice with ocular characters engraved on them were cast, and these characters were then deciphered from an explanatory table. Dreams, visions, etc., were also supposed to convey the will of the gods. The Romans, although they believed in oracles, had none very celebrated of their own, but usually consulted those of Greece.

Learned men have been much divided as to the source of these oracles; some suppose that they were the invention of priests, others conceive that there was a supernatural agency employed in the business. There are several circumstances leading to the former hypothesis, such as the gloomy solemnity with which many of them were delivered in subterranean caverns, the numerous and disagreeable ceremonies enjoined, as sleeping in the rings of beasts, and expensive sacrifices, the edium of priests, speaking images, vocal voices, etc., look very much like the contrivances of artful priests to disguise their villany. But, on the other hand, if we may credit the relation of ancient writers, both among the Jews and Christians, this hypothesis will surely account for many of the instances that mention, and since it cannot be proved that their possible or unscriptural, it seems at least possible that God might sometimes permit an intercourse with spirits, overruling, in some cases, and every other circumstance to its own glory.

Respecting the cessation of these oracles, there have been a variety of opinions. It has been said that oracles ceased at the moment the birth of Jesus Christ. History, however, makes mention of several laws published by the Christian Emperors, Theodosius, Gratian, and Valentinian, to punish persons who transgressed oracles, so that it would appear that they existed, and were occasionally consulted, as late as A.D. 338; but about that period they entirely ceased, and for several centuries before they had sunk very low in public esteem. Towards this there can be no doubt that the advancement of Christianity powerfully contributed.

Among the Jews there were several sorts of oracles. God's spoken words face to face with Moses; prophetical dreams, such as that of Joseph: visions, sent to prophets in an ecstasy; and specially the oracle of the Urim and Thummim worn by the high priest, which by an extraordinary brightness made known the will of Jehovah. This manner of quivering of the Lord was often made use of from Joshua's time to the erection of the temple at Jerusalem. After that time they usually consulted the prophets, who were frequent in the kingdoms of Judah and Israel. After the death of Malachi they appear only to have expected immediate Divine direction through what was called the Bath Kol, or Daughter of the Voice, which was a supernatural manifestation of the will of God, either by a strong inspiration or internal voice, or else by a sensible and external voice, which was heard by a number of persons sufficient to bear testimony to it. Such was the voice heard at the baptism of Christ [Matt. iii. 17].

The Scripture gives us also examples of profane oracles. Balaam, at the instigation of his own spirit, and urged on by his avarice, suggests to Balak a diabolical expedient of making the Israelites fall into idolatry [Num. xxiv. 14, xxxi. 16], by which he promises him a considerable advantage, if not victory, over the people of God. Micah, the son of Imlah [1 Kings xxii. 20, etc.], says that he saw the Almighty, sitting on His throne, with all the host of heaven round Him, and asking "Who shall tempt Ahab?" etc. Then Satan offers himself to be a lying spirit in the mouth of God's prophets, and God accepts his offer. The dialogue clearly proves two things: [1] That the devil could do nothing by his own power; [2] that with the permission of God, he could inspire the false prophets, sorcerers, and magicians, and make them deliver false oracles.

Orarium.—A stole worn in the Eastern Church by priests on both shoulders; by deacons, on the left only.

Orate, fratres, etc.—The opening words of the address said at the beginning of the Canon of the Mass after the "Lavabo." Originally the priest said merely "Orate" or "Orate pro me!" but the other words, "ut munem ac vestrum pariter sacrificium acceptum sit Domino," were added by Remi of Auxerre in 880.

Oratorio.—A sacred drama, sung by solo voices and choruses, and accompanied by an orchestra, but differing from the opera in not requiring scenery, stage-costumes, or action. This distinction was not always made in the case of the earliest oratorios, and most of those produced in Italy in the Middle Ages were performed in churches on stages erected for the purpose. The subjects of oratorios have been taken, almost without exception, from the Bible, and probably originated, like the old mystery plays, in an attempt to impress sacred events more strongly on the minds of the people. The first oratorios, in the present sense of the term, were held by Filippo de Neri [b. 1515, d. 1595], the founder of the Congregation of Oratorians, in the oratory of his church, and hence the name, "oratorio," was given. After his time the oratorio was developed in successive stages by Emilio del Cavaliere, Carissimi, Scarlatti, and Stradella; but the greatest step in its growth was in the works of Handel [b. 1685, d. 1759] and Bach [b. 1685, d. 1750], who changed its form from the Italian to the Anglo-Germanic. The chief difference between the treatment used by these two composers is that Bach's oratorios were still designed for use in churches, while those of Handel were somewhat secularised. With them the oratorio reached its highest standard, though in technical details it has been developed by Schütz and Sebastiani, and still more by Mendelssohn and Haydn.

Oratories.—Churches were so called as being houses of prayer, but the name is now applied only to private and domestic chapels in distinction to the parish church.

Oratory, Priests of the.—There were formerly two religious Orders of this name—one in Italy, the other in France.

The Italian Order was founded by St. Philip Neri, under whose name will be found an account of the Order. [Philip Neri, St.] After Neri's death the congregation continued to increase in Italy, and has produced many eminent writers, as Baronius, Rainaldi, etc. It was introduced into England by Cardinal Newman in 1847. The first house was at Mary Vale, and was transferred to Alcester Street, Birmingham, in 1849. In 1850 a house was opened in London, which was released from obedience to Birmingham in October of that year, and was transferred to Brompton, where a large domed church has been erected. It is said to be the largest religious Order now in England.
